Root Beer Floats and Green Tea

by desolateice

Summary

Johnny struggles with who he's become and realizes that it's not who he wanted to be. He decides to throw himself into apologizing and trying to make things better if anyone will let him.

Daniel struggles with the Johnny he thought he knew in his head and the actual Johnny he gets to know and how they don't line up anymore.

Notes

My understanding from the movies is that the tournament happens sometime around December or so, but I've moved it to after winter break and the beginning of the new semester. So we're starting somewhere in January immediately after the tournament is over and what happens at the beginning of KK2.

A thousand or so apologies

Laura Lawrence's manicured fingernails tapped on the marble counter while she watched the drive. She was waiting for Johnny to come home. She'd marked the tournament in her calendar but knew he didn't like his mother cheering him on in the crowd, plus she had to admit that she didn't like the panic and anxiety she felt when he stepped onto the mat and every hit hurt her more than it ever seemed to hurt him. So they'd come to an agreement, he'd tell her the play by play when he got home after all the blows were over. The last three years he'd come home late, out celebrating with his sensei and team, but he'd come home with a big grin on his face and a first-place trophy to show her. She'd make root beer floats and he'd tell her about the other people in the ring. He always spoke about how they telegraphed their movements and made it easy, but he'd also talk reverently about the effort they'd put in because he'd been competing against the same people for years now and he could see the improvement.

She chewed on her lip as she waited. This year though felt different. Johnny had pulled away more than he usually did. Ever since Ali had dumped him he'd seemed untethered. She'd pressed him to talk to her so that he could mourn the relationship and move on, and then he'd come home bloody and he didn't want to talk about it. This only seemed to continue to happen throughout the year, his knuckles were bloody and bruised and he seemed angry and frustrated. He wouldn't talk to her about it, just ducking his head murmuring he was fine and listening to his Walkman when he was home. Laura was pretty sure that Johnny never got closure or a chance to talk to Ali about what had happened and it ate away at him. It'd been a two-year relationship, his first serious one so Laura's heart went out to him.

The red Avanti pulled into the drive and she pulled out the root beer from the fridge, popping the caps and setting the ice cream on the counter to let it soften. She watched as Johnny walked towards the house, blonde head down and her heart sank. He must've lost. She left the root beers and hurried to the front door panic flooding her veins. He wasn't carrying his bag, he didn't have a trophy in his hands. Even when he had lost in the past, before his winning streak he'd still been so excited, so determined when he got home, just to talk about it, about the energy of the tournaments he'd fought in, of watching the winners fight, it was electric he'd said, eyes shining, but this... she hadn't seen this Johnny since before he'd started karate and got beaten on the regular by kids older and bigger than him, the Johnny the first time Sid lashed out.

He looked up at her and her heart sank. He had dried blood on his face and his neck was an angry red.

"Hi Mom," he said and his voice was raspy, there were tears in his eyes.

"Oh Johnny," she said pulling him into a hug. She felt warmth on her shoulder, wetness. He was so much taller than her, stronger, bigger, but he was shaking. She quickly pulled him into the house and to the kitchen before the staff saw him.

"What can I get for you?" she asked softly, gently as he let her maneuver him to a stool at the island.

Johnny took a shaky breath and put his head in his hands. Laura looked at the ice cream and the root beer, the cups and the straws with a frown. They'd done this since he'd started karate, but this seemed rougher than any loss he'd ever had and that red around his neck had her concerned. She quickly made the floats deciding tradition should continue and set one down in front of Johnny and sat patiently across from him. She wouldn't force him to hurry, he was slow to open up, slower still about things that hurt him. But she wasn't going to let him leave her sight until he spilled everything. After a while, he let out a sigh and looked up.

"I quit," Johnny said. "Cobra Kai," he added after a moment.

"You have to start from the beginning," Laura said patiently.

Johnny pulled his float close to him and looked down at it with a frown, dipping his straw in and swirling the soda around the ice cream. "You know when I was supposed to talk to Ali?"

"Of course, you and your friends took your bikes to the beach," Laura said.

"I think it started there," Johnny said softly, his throat clearly hurt but he continued explaining the new kid who took everything the wrong way and played a knight in shining armor to Ali, the fight. Her mouth dipped into a frown, she'd heard the Cobra Kai creed multiple times and she'd understood the reasoning when Johnny had explained it. You make sure your opponent is down so they don't jump up and keep fighting you. It sounded like hazing, only hopped up on karate and Johnny's frustrations over his broken heart. Apparently, the boy, a kid named Daniel LaRusso seemed to know exactly how to push the wrong buttons on Johnny and Johnny admitted to making sure Daniel didn't make it onto the soccer team, something he begrudgingly said Daniel was good at. He admitted to forcing the boy down a ravine and probably totaling his bike.

He wouldn't meet her eyes as he worked his way to Halloween. He got quiet. She remembered seeing him the next day bruised and battered. Johnny explained the fight, the way he went too far, the elderly man who stopped him when he couldn't stop himself. His voice had dropped so low, shame filling his voice. She pursed her lips, waiting for the rest. He explained the elderly man showing up at the dojo with Daniel to request they leave Daniel alone so he could study for the All-Valley. How Daniel used this truce to taunt Johnny, how Johnny kissed Ali in retaliation and made everything so much worse.

Johnny had thought less than a years worth of training couldn't defeat him, couldn't get Daniel into the semi-finals or even through the door to the tournament. But Daniel showed up with his sensei and with Ali and his mother at his side and then he fell into the tournament spiel like he always did. He talked about his fights, the fights he watched his friends in, and the fights he watched Daniel in, praising the other boy quietly. Daniel made it to the semi-finals and there Johnny paused for a while sipping at his drink then wincing at the bubbles. He told her how Kreese told Bobby to put Daniel out of commission in their fight.

While talking about the tournament he'd been looking at Laura, a bit of that spark was there, but now he couldn't meet her gaze again. She knew Kreese, the hold he had over the boys, how Johnny saw him as a father figure and felt her blood turn cold as she listened intently to Johnny tell her how Bobby had protested but ended up kicking Daniel in the knee and how the boy had crumpled in pain and how Bobby had thrown himself to the mat in immediate regret and apologies. The description of Kreese's face, how Bobby had quit Cobra Kai on the spot, and how Kreese had tried to win Johnny first place through trickery and additional damage. He spoke of his fear of Kreese at that moment, but how he still trusted him despite it. He hadn't wanted to win because his best friend had been forced to cheat and hurt Daniel. And he'd kept watching the locker rooms where Daniel had been taken hoping the boy would be okay.

Johnny had been watching Daniel fight and despite being a mouthy kid who knew all the ways to rile Johnny up, Johnny had wanted to see what Daniel could accomplish, how much he'd changed since that first sucker punch on the beach. Then Ali ran out right before Johnny had been given the trophy to announce Daniel would fight and Johnny watched the boy hop on one leg to the mat, bruised battered, exhausted, and gravely hurt and Johnny's voice was in awe while tears pricked in Laura's eyes.

"Braver than I ever was," Johnny whispered before continuing to talk about the fight. The bloody nose and Kreese telling him to go for his knee and how that had shattered something in Johnny. He wanted to win fair and square like Bobby had wanted. He didn't want to hurt Daniel further. He didn't want to win that way. But he'd still done it because it was Kreese. It was his father figure that he trusted blindly to lead him down the right path. And he did it. And Daniel still got back up. Johnny spoke with reverence of the crane kick, to do so with an injured knee, despite how much it had hurt to be on the receiving end of that kick.

"I was relieved," Johnny said softly. "To not have won that way, to get second place felt like an honor. I started crying and I grabbed the first place trophy and gave it to Daniel and told him he was all right as his sensei and Ali and everyone else cheered him on," Johnny said with a soft smile. "I wanted to cheer him on too. Less than a year of hard work and he defeated me in the ring. That's impressive. His sensei clearly knows what he's doing."

Laura smiled nodding, but she kept the smile small, eyes falling to Johnny's neck. It still didn't explain that or why he hadn't come home with the second place trophy or why his bag wasn't with him.

Johnny let out a shaky breath and explained what happened after the tournament. Kreese chewing him out for losing, breaking his trophy, essentially kicking him off the team and when he protested feeling like the world had suddenly fallen apart again Kreese started chocking him, throwing off the other Cobra Kai who tried to save him, until Daniel's sensei, Mr. Miyagi had come in. He had saved Johnny's life and had dodged out of Kreese's way so Kreese's fists went straight into several car windows and how Johnny and the other cobra's had fled Kreese, quitting on the spot and how Johnny had rushed to his car and driven around before his friends could ask how he was. He hadn't wanted to talk about it. He hadn't wanted to see the pity in their faces. "Because..." And he stopped.

And she knew. They had families to return to, fathers who'd understand, and Johnny now only had Sid. He didn't say it and it hung in the air between them. But she understood. Kreese had taken her Johnny and built him into the man before her and then tried to kill him, and Sid...well Sid wasn't better. Senior year wasn't over but Johnny no longer had karate or the Cobra Kai dojo to spend his time, to relieve his frustration or anger. He no longer had Kreese. Five years of study and making a home for himself, gone.

"I don't know what to do now," Johnny whispered into his float. His head was hung low, hair covering his face, she watched tears sparkle in the kitchen light and hit the counter. Her heart hurt.

"There are two things you have to do," Laura said carefully. "You have to apologize to Daniel and his sensei and you need to thank Mr. how do you say his name again?" she asked.

"Miyagi," Johnny said softly.

"Yes, you have to apologize and thank Mr. Miyagi. You owe them a lot for all the damage you've done, see if you can help out. You've got a lot of free time on your hands and a lot of muscle. So use it."

"They won't want to see me," Johnny said softly. "I wouldn't want to."

"You're still going to school with Daniel. You're still going to see him around until you graduate. You've got to clear the air. You didn't get to do that with Ali, you have to do that with Daniel. He might not forgive you, but you've got to say it. Because you feel it don't you? Sorry?" Laura asked, hoping he did. Hoping the little boy she remembered in the car next to her looking at her with big bright eyes telling her it was okay when she broke down in front of him wasn't entirely gone.

Johnny nodded.

"It's late, let them celebrate their win, then, do you know where Daniel lives?" Laura asked. She asked because she was sure he did. Johnny studied his opponents well. Knew everything he could know. And if this boy had whisked Ali away and been on Johnny's mind as much as he'd mentioned then Johnny knew where he lived.

"South Seas apartment complex in Reseda," Johnny admitted softly.

"Then tomorrow morning, you go and you apologize. You do not fight. You do not even make a fist. If he wants to hit you and you can take it you take it, but if it's going to really badly hurt you you defend. But you do not fight back. Understand?" Laura said tersely.

Johnny nodded.

Laura got up and gently cupped Johnny's head in her hands and kissed his forehead. "You can make this right. It won't be easy, but you can be better. Show them the boy... the man I know you are."

Johnny hugged her and she gently ran her hand through his hair. "I'm so sorry Johnny," she said softly. "Second place is still great."

Johnny got up early and drove the Avanti away from the big house before Sid woke up. He hurried to Reseda not wanting to lose the courage he had. His mother was right. He needed to apologize, take what licks Daniel would give him, and then find his sensei and apologize and thank him. If he was lucky the older man would tell him what the core creed of his karate was, tell him about it. He doubted they'd get that far. In his wildest dreams, he could study with Mr. Miyagi and have even an ounce of that calm fighting style that Mr. Miyagi had staring down Kreese and then playfully honking his nose.

It wasn't too early he felt as he parked the Avanti and hurried into the complex past the empty pool. It reminded him of the apartment complexes and places he'd lived with his mother before she'd met Sid. Though this seemed a little nicer. They hadn't even had a pool, empty or not. The problem was he didn't know which apartment exactly was the LaRusso's. There was an elderly woman sitting with a small dog in the courtyard and he stopped to pet the dog, scratching its chin. It wagged its tail and licked his hand. He smiled warmly pulling a treat out of his pocket. Ali used to have a dog, he still carried treats for it out of habit. It ate happily and he scratched behind the dog's ears.

"Do you know which apartment is the LaRusso's ma'am?" Johnny asked the woman.

"Apartment 20," she said jerking her thumb.

"Thank you," he said standing and saying goodbye to the dog before hurrying up the stairs. He took a deep breath, straightened his shirt and jacket, dusted himself off, fixed his hair, and then knocked. He wanted to run, but cobras didn't run. Then he remembered he wasn't a cobra anymore.

A woman with brown hair opened the door. There were similarities between her and Daniel and it took him a moment to remember her from Golf 'n Stuff and the tournament. She studied him.

"You're the boy from the tournament," she said, her voice was tight.

"Is Daniel home?" Johnny asked, feeling awkwardly like the first time he'd shown up on Ali's doorstep and her parents had answered the door to skewer him with a million questions. That time though he'd been confident. He had no confidence now, it was flagging.

"He isn't. What do you want with Daniel?" she asked stiffly.

"To apologize," he said quietly, he still stood tall, shoulders back and head held high, but he could feel her eyes on his neck and he wished he'd tried to sneak into his mother's bathroom to find her concealer.

She pushed open the door and motioned for him to come in.

"Apologize for what?" she asked.

Johnny stepped into the small apartment feeling immediate regret. He'd have to go through the same story he'd had with his mother the night before, but this was enemy territory. He'd get no understanding, no benefit from being on his side the way his mother was. Mrs. LaRusso motioned for him to sit and he sat down at the kitchen table feeling too big and out of place. The way she moved was like a tightened coil. She was making tea, keeping him in the corner of her eye.

"For a lot of things. I haven't been...I'm sorry Mrs. LaRusso, I hurt your son a lot this year and during the tournament. I quit my dojo," he said gently touching his neck.

She set the cup of tea before him looking at him with a steely gaze. "Did he get some good hits in at least?"

Johnny laughed, which hurt and he winced. "He sucker-punched me when we met, he doused me in water on Halloween... he's gotten me pretty good some times."

She nodded, "Tea's good for your throat."

He looked at her surprised, "Thank you."

"What happened?" she asked, motioning towards his neck. "I know Daniel didn't give you that."

"My sensei," he said quietly, dropping his gaze.

"Because you didn't get first place?" she asked, voice tight.

Johnny nodded drinking the tea.

"Cobra Kai," he began after a moment, "was like home for me, but my sensei, I realize what he taught me was wrong, the core values, weren't right and I learned that because of Daniel. And I owe him and his sensei. I owe him a thousand or so apologies," Johnny said then decided to switch to what he was more comfortable with under her watchful gaze like he was a dangerous animal that could strike at any moment. "You should be proud of him Mrs. LaRusso. I've been training for years, and even injured and with less than a year under his belt, he did amazing. Your son is amazing. That kick, it hurt like hell, but it was very cool."

She smiled at this. "Daniel is cool. He's a bit small, but he's sweet and caring and friendly."

"And talkative," Johnny said.

She laughed. "Everyone in our family is talkative," she said grabbing a book and setting it down opening it, and showing Johnny a picture of their family, it was big and extensive. "Imagine, all of us talking all the time. A quiet boy like yourself probably wouldn't be able to hear himself think."

Johnny looked at the photo, "New Jersey?" he asked.

"Yes. Daniel didn't want to move here. But I got a job, and well, it's not easy being a single mother trying to raise your son."

"I understand, My mom... she's done her best and I hate that I've let her down," Johnny said softly into his tea. It really was soothing. He liked their apartment. Mrs. LaRusso had made it homey, lots of photos and knickknacks, it wasn't as cold as Sid's mansion.

"My husband died when Daniel was 8," Mrs. LaRusso said softly.

It took Johnny a moment to realize what Mrs. LaRusso was hoping for and he looked at his nails and his hands uncomfortably. "My father left. I didn't know him," he whispered.

Mrs. LaRusso's hand reached out and gently patted Johnny's hand. "You should check out Mr. Miyagi's workshop. Daniel and Mr. Miyagi might be there. You know, for you to continue your apologies."

Johnny nodded, "Thank you for the tea Mrs. LaRusso. And I'm sorry again," Johnny said standing and heading awkwardly to the door.

For a moment he'd kind of hoped to see the other pictures in her book. He wanted to see if Mr. LaRusso also looked like Daniel. What Daniel had looked like as a kid before they'd met. Had he been even smaller? What had he worn for Halloween in the years before? Surely not pretended to be a shower. Johnny was sure Daniel had been a cute kid. Maybe if they'd met back then they would've been friends. Before Johnny had found Cobra Kai. Back when he hadn't had any friends. Daniel seemed to be quick to try and make friends, but then Johnny had blocked him from keeping almost any of them except for Ali.

Mrs. LaRusso walked him to the door and gave him directions to Mr. Miyagi's workshop. Johnny thanked her and hurried down the stairs. He couldn't give up now. She hadn't warmed up to him, but she was chatty like Daniel and had opened up a bit more than he'd expected. She'd probably been hoping Daniel would bring friends home to show the pictures too and Johnny had kept that from happening. He felt cold in his stomach. He'd become the type of person he'd hated as a kid. He'd gotten stronger, sure, but he'd become the bullies who'd tormented him and he had to make it right while he still could. He found the door to Mr. Miyagi's workshop and knocked gently.

"Come in," Mr. Miyagi said.

Johnny carefully pushed open the door with the wooden chimes. He scanned the crowded room. There were several little trees around. They were stunning, elegant, and delicate. He was so distracted by them that he hadn't noticed Mr. Miyagi was watching him and waiting. Johnny met his gaze after a while and felt a lump in his throat. He didn't know what to say. Thank you seemed too small.

"They're beautiful," he said about the trees.

"Bonsai," Mr. Miyagi said.

"Bonsai," Johnny repeated testing the word out on his tongue. "Mr. Miyagi, sir..." If his heart was pounding this much just to thank Mr. Miyagi then what would he do when he apologized to Daniel? He felt for a moment like it would've been easier if no one had stopped Kreese. But easy wasn't his way. He worked hard and had for years.

He could do this. "Thank you for everything," he said.

"Everything?" Mr. Miyagi repeated confused.

"Saving me. Saving Daniel," Johnny said, he'd been thinking it over since Halloween. He'd been grateful to watch the elderly man jump over the fence and put a stop to the fight. He remembered being so stunned and so relieved he'd barely fought back. "Thank you for stopping the fight... stopping me. And for stopping Kreese," he said working his way over the lump in his throat. He didn't talk too much, and all these apologies, thank yous, and explanations were going to make him lose what little voice he had left.

Mr. Miyagi stepped forward, "No bad students, only bad teachers."

Johnny shook his head, tears pricking in his eyes, "No, I've been awful. I owe you an apology. I'm sorry Mr. Miyagi. If I can do anything to help you, just name it."

Mr. Miyagi looked at him thoughtfully then picked up his tool bag and placed it in Johnny's hands. "Follow."

Johnny did, following Mr. Miyagi around the apartment complex. At first, he stood awkwardly behind him, but Mr. Miyagi told him what to do, and he found himself helping fix sinks, changing light bulbs, working with pipes and plumbing, holding the ladder for him, and then quickly asking if maybe he should be the one to go up the ladder instead, worried for the old man. It felt good to be working and not thinking. Add to it that he was fixing things and it felt right. He felt calmer than he had in a while and he realized it was all Mr. Miyagi.

At home, at the dojo, at school, Johhny always felt a bundle of energy, coiled and ready to spring. At home it was in case Sid was in a bad mood, he either had to fight and defend himself or bolt and hide somewhere, at the dojo he had to jump at Kreese's command and it usually was straight into fighting, at school it was to keep his head above water with teachers and with his friends and Ali. But he'd seen Mr. Miyagi fight. Mr. Miyagi could handle his own. He didn't need Johnny to defend him and he'd even gone out of his way to defend Johnny. Johnny who'd proved himself to be utterly irredeemable. He moved quietly and calmly and this brought ease to Johnny.

He felt safe he realized, even though he was on top of a ladder clearing out gutters. It was so shocking when he realized he almost never felt safe. Kreese had taught him to always be on high alert, that danger could come from anywhere. But here, with Mr. Miyagi it was so peaceful, he wasn't worried or concerned. He could relax. Mr. Miyagi was in charge and he could just follow the quiet directions he gave. It felt good to work with his hands even though they still ached from yesterday.

Mr. Miyagi invited him back into the workshop and poured him tea. Johnny sat and took it gratefully studying the small bonsai trees. Mr. Miyagi put on a pair of glasses and took a pair of tiny sheers and went to work, carefully pruning and directing one of the small trees. Johnny watched fascinated, sipping at his tea.

"Daniel-san is with Ali," Mr. Miyagi said softly, "still celebrate big win."

Johnny could feel the man's eyes on him, watching him for any giveaway. It still stung. Ali hadn't let him explain why he'd missed her birthday, hadn't explained why suddenly that had been the last straw. What in him was so worthless all of a sudden after two years? He wanted to know if he'd been as terrible all along and she'd just been patient right up until the end. If she knew he was becoming something awful and jumped ship while she could.

"They uh doing okay?" Johnny asked awkwardly.

"Daniel-san still learning not to leave beautiful lady waiting."

Johnny laughed and Mr. Miyagi looked at him with the smallest amount of surprise. "Sorry, that's just how I lost Ali apparently. We haven't had a chance to discuss it but she said it's because I didn't show up at her birthday party."

Mr. Miyagi nodded solemnly. "Important to show up."

Johnny nodded and they fell back into companionable silence until there were more things to do. Mr. Miyagi handed a list over to Johnny. "Shopping next," he said.

Johnny nodded taking the list and following Mr. Miyagi out. He thought about suggesting the Avanti but Mr. Miyagi beelined straight to his truck, then hopped up in the passenger seat looking expectantly at Johnny. Johnny was surprised, he never let anyone drive the Avanti, even Ali. Cars were important and letting him drive was putting their lives in his hands. For a moment that felt like too much. He swallowed and carefully opened the door.

No wonder Daniel liked his sensei so much. He barely said anything but what he said was important and worth listening to and the things he did spoke louder than any words Johnny could even try to think of. He hopped into the truck. From the outside, the truck didn't look like much but Johnny could see how well cared for it was. It moved easily beneath his hands on the way to the hardware store. There he carried a basket and followed Mr. Miyagi around as he picked out things he needed, different pieces of supplies, hmming over different brands and new things before picking them up and looking them over and picking out which one he thought was best. Johnny felt like he was a kid again, following his mother around in the grocery store, her hmming though had been in relation to what was on sale and if they could get a discount on any dinged cans, trying to figure out what they could afford.

"You wax car before?" Mr. Miyagi asked thoughtfully.

"I wax my Avanti about every three months," Johnny said.

"Good good," Mr. Miyagi said like he'd remembered something and set the can of wax down. "How do you wax your car?"

Johnny frowned wondering what Mr. Miyagi was talking about before slipping the basket down to the ground and showing him the movement he made. Wide circles then smaller circles, one side then the other. Mr. Miyagi nodded his approval and turned his back to look at sandpaper. Johnny quickly picked up the basket and followed him, feeling like he was lumbering after the smaller elderly man. They worked their way through the last of Mr. Miyagi's list before checking out and returning to the truck, Johnny's hands full of bags that he set gingerly between the two of them in the truck bed and drove back towards South Seas apartment complex.

There was a yellow car, a Ford super de luxe sitting sparkling near Johnny's Avanti and Johnny tensed. That was Daniel's car. He had to take care of this now. Had to apologize as soon as possible. He carefully parked the truck and Mr. Miyagi hopped out. Johnny filled his arms with the bags and locked the truck following the man trying to think of what to say. I was an ass. I beat the shit out of you and could've killed you I'm so sorry. No definitely not. How's the leg, Daniel? I could probably carry you around as penitence. There was no way Daniel would let him carry him around, even as an apology for making his knee worse. Hit me hard, however you want, I deserve it. For some reason, he doubted Daniel would just haul off and start beating him up. That was more of a Cobra Kai thing, more of Kreese.

His throat ached at the thought. He felt sick to his stomach thinking that the dojo was there, that some other unsuspecting kid like himself who was drowning would reach out and take Kreese's hand and listen to his promise. The promise to make him stronger and smarter and braver but really he'd grind the kid into a pulp and reshape him into something darker. Or what Johnny feared the most, find the darkness already inside and just bring it to the surface.

He followed Mr. Miyagi into the shop and Daniel was there, studying one of the bonsai carefully and talking to Mr. Miyagi about where he'd taken Ali.

"Here," Mr. Miyagi told Johnny and Daniel stopped what he was doing and turned, going stiff all over, eyes wide and looking from Mr. Miyagi to Johnny. Johnny grimaced internally. Daniel was checking to make sure his sensei was safe so close to the wild beast he thought of as Johnny. A monster. Did all teenagers feel like monsters or was it just Johnny? He felt like Frankenstein's Monster, scared of fire and lashing out hurting people. Johnny set the things down where Mr. Miyagi told him to.

"Talk," Mr. Miyagi said before putting away the things in the bags, moving around his workshop.

"LaRusso," Johnny began uneasily. "I'm sorry man, for everything. Your knee, the soccer team tryouts, your bike, pushing you off the edge so you fell," this was a long list, he took a deep breath, "Halloween, the night on the beach," he wanted to say some of it was also Daniel's fault but he could hear his mother's voice in his head. Apologize completely, excuses will just add oil to the fire and turn it into a nightmare to clean up. "Ali," he managed to stumble over her name uneasily, "I'm sorry, and if there's anything I can do for the rest of the semester before we graduate. Stay out of your way, out of sight, to make it easier, whatever, let me know."

Johnny couldn't look at Daniel, he was thinking of Kreese. He wanted to know why he wasn't good enough, why he couldn't have been okay with second place, or third place. Why Kreese had decided that he was no longer useful and better off dead. He gently brought his fingers to his throat, tears pricking his eyes. This wasn't how an apology was supposed to go. He should be saying something comforting.

"I'm not in Cobra Kai anymore," he said softly.

He could still feel Kreese's arm around his neck, the way he'd struggled to get him off, but not enough. For half a second he'd thought it'd been a joke, Kreese used to put them in headlocks all the time. Johnny had been in headlocks for lessons, but it hadn't been a joke. That hadn't really cut through until he'd heard his friends cry out and plead with Kreese. Until he'd felt the stiffness of muscles around his neck not relaxing like they always did before. Daniel usually talked a mile a minute. Daniel drove their teachers nuts with his incessant talking. He'd seen one teacher roll their eyes. But Daniel was quiet. Too quiet. Was Johnny talking to himself? Apologizing to tiny trees?

Daniel was watching him from the stool he himself had occupied hours before, hands on the edge of the seat between his legs that dangled. His expression was unreadable in the fading sunlight of the day. His eyes were dark.

Once one of the kids at one of the tournaments he'd been in apologize to their sensei on their knees, head bowed to the mat. He'd never seen an apology so deep and physical. He'd laughed at first because his friends had laughed but now he wondered if that sort of deep apology was necessary now. Like bowing to a king, offering your support in their battles. Did this make him a turncoat? He'd always thought it was cowardice to change sides in the middle of battle, but he was tired. He wasn't fighting anymore. There was no battle or war. And all the thoughts rumbling around in his head wasn't helping. He thought about what he'd told his mother, what he'd told LaRusso's mother.

"Your crane kick was really cool," Johnny said softly. "And all the progress you've made in less than a year. Congratulations LaRusso, on your win. I mean it. Really."

Daniel dipped his head, looking at his hands on the chair and Johnny wondered if that was the wrong thing to say. He didn't know what to do. He'd never talked this much around Daniel before ever. Daniel had never listened so intently. He was used to Daniel mouthing off, a constant stream of nothing and everything. Eventually, Daniel looked up and met Johnny's gaze.

"If you really want to do what I want, then leave. I don't want to see you ever again."

"Daniel-san," Mr. Miyagi said gently and Johnny didn't hear what else, dipping out of the workshop and hurrying towards his car.

He didn't know what he'd wanted Daniel to say. Part of him had hoped, after a small taste of the peace that emanated from being at

Mr. Miyagi's side that maybe he'd be lucky. Maybe he'd be forgiven and could still practice karate. But not Kreese's karate, Mr. Miyagi's. Maybe he'd be allowed to stick around, repair what he'd broken, given a second chance. Maybe explain himself, bubble up with the excuses, maybe not now but in the future when they could laugh about it over beers or whatever it was Daniel might drink, martini maybe? Hey, remember that semester when you used to beat the shit out of me our senior year? Daniel would ask laughing. What was with that?

And Johnny would frown into his beer and unleash everything. A torrent of his life with Sid, his mistakes, the loss of Ali so suddenly, and how Daniel had found him at his absolute worst. He'd hold it all in until that moment and maybe Daniel would nod, be sympathetic, understanding of how sometimes you find yourself on the wrong path and can't figure out how to get on the right one, especially when no one is there to help you find it, and the people you think are leading you are sending you further and further away from the right path into all-consuming and choking darkness.

Johnny looked at the South Seas apartment complex disappearing in the rearview mirror. Then something caught his eye. Something was in his backseat. At a red light, he blinked and looked back. A small tree was sitting in his backseat with an envelope. Tears pricked his eyes. It's the one he'd been looking at when he'd told Mr. Miyagi they were beautiful. Daniel was so damn lucky to have that man in his life, to guide him down the right path. Johnny took a deep shaky breath, he'd promised himself he'd do whatever Daniel asked of him as atonement. And while he didn't know a lot about his own dad, he could do the same thing he did. He'd made it look easy after all. He too could just disappear.

Perfect Attendance Thrown Out the Window

Daniel was thinking of the look on Johnny's face as he apologized. It seemed real. It seemed genuine. The dim glow of the setting sun had made the marks around his neck look more severe and yet fake all at once. He thought of the way Johnny kept absently putting his hand to his neck as if to remind himself there wasn't anything around it, trying to choke him. The way he seemed so broken and sad. He'd quit. Daniel felt like he should've been overjoyed by that admission, that turn of events, but it just left something sour in his stomach.

He remembered seeing Johnny from a distance, struggling for air, so shocked, just like he'd seen Johnny look shocked as his sensei had talked to him outside the mat after brushing blood from his nose. All he'd ever wanted was for Johnny to leave him alone. Maybe asking for a truce after sucker-punching someone wasn't the way to start things off, but Daniel tried not to think about that night. Tried not to think about how desperately Johnny tried to talk to Ali, the same way he'd done so at the arcade a few months ago. Trying to get her to listen to him and give him a second chance. But there wasn't another Daniel there to block him from doing so, just her and her friends and he wore her down.

He'd thought it over multiple times. What if Daniel hadn't been there on that beach? Would Ali have melted back into Johnny's arms the way she had done to Daniel? Would Johnny have ever even noticed Daniel? It twisted something in his gut. He knew his own intentions with Ali, his own reasons and wishes, and Johnny, well who was to say why Johnny had wanted to talk to Ali. He remembered hearing Johnny look at him, praising him and he wondered, what if they could've been friends?

What if in their English class Johnny had seen his booklet on how to learn karate and struck up a conversation about that with him? What if he'd been able to scrape up enough money to join Cobra Kai with Johnny and his buddies? But the what-ifs weren't reality and it hurt his head to think about. He remembered telling Johnny to leave and Mr. Miyagi coming up quietly at his side with his "Daniel-san" and soft words about forgiveness and how anger poisons and how people can change and become better if you let them. Only for him to sigh. Mr. Miyagi was right, always right, but Johnny was gone when he looked back. Had disappeared remarkably without setting off the wooden chimes at the door.

Mr. Miyagi had frowned deeply, "Johnny-san in lots of pain. Learning one's teacher is bad hurts. Learning one's path is wrong is difficult. Asking for forgiveness is very brave. Asking for help takes courage."

Daniel hadn't figured out what he'd meant by that last part. Johnny hadn't asked for help. But Mr. Miyagi always saw differently.

And the way he'd come in, arms full of shopping for Mr. Miyagi meant they'd spent a lot of time together so maybe Mr. Miyagi had learned something else. Maybe Johnny had come and asked for help to change and then Daniel had sent him packing with his cold tone. Mr. Miyagi was disappointed in him even though he didn't say it. Daniel could feel it. Mr. Miyagi was too forgiving if anything. Daniel needed time. Which is what he told Mr. Miyagi. He'd try to forgive Johnny if he really did turn over a new leaf. He figured school would be the best place to find out if that was true.

But no matter how much he looked for Johnny, he couldn't find him. He had perfected a Johnny radar early on in the school year. He knew where Johnny was at all times. He had picked up on his frequency. Knew the sound of his footsteps in the hall when they were the only ones around, could pick his voice out of a crowd and run the other way. But as he strained to listen for him, to try and find his blonde head above the rest he couldn't. His desk in their shared classes was empty and the teachers frowned during role call, murmuring to themselves "that's strange" as if the sudden loss of the blonde was more shocking and had left a void. The cobras were still in school, he saw them from time to time, heard them. But they stayed away from him. Kept their distance.

"Earth to Daniel," Ali said from across him at their cafeteria table.

"Oh, sorry," Daniel said. "What were you saying?"

"I was telling you about the movie we're going to see tonight."

"Oh, right," Daniel said.

"What's wrong?" Ali asked with a sigh. "I know that look, it's the I'm going to bolt look you always got when you saw Johnny. Johnny's not here."

"Yeah," Daniel said. "He's not."

"He's probably at home licking his wounded pride," she said with a laugh. "From that kick to the face. It was so satisfying to see."

"Yeah," Daniel said chasing some peas around his tray. "So the movie, huh?"

She started talking about the film again and Daniel wondered why he cared. Johnny wasn't at school. He should be happy. He should be relaxed. The knot in his stomach shouldn't be there. But Daniel was worried. What if Mr. Miyagi was right? He usually was. Maybe telling Johnny he never wanted to see his face was like slapping the hand of a drowning man rather than helping him out. Daniel didn't want to be that person. He wasn't that person.

Daniel waited for Johnny to come back to school. The week progressed and the teacher's frowns deepened. Ali even was quiet at lunch and in their class, the one where she played buffer between Daniel and Johnny and a few of his cobras the previous semester.

"You know," she said quietly. "Johnny's never missed a day of school before. He used to boast about his perfect attendance. He's nearly always on time for everything. You could set your time to Johnny."

"What do you mean?" Daniel asked feeling a coldness in his stomach.

Ali sighed, "When we dated, Johnny was always early. Every date, early. He was so reliable. If I asked him to pick me up, he was always there. Never missed a damn thing. He had all these awards at home, little gifts from schools and teachers about not missing a single day. We didn't go to the same schools growing up, so I didn't know him before high school. But he was so proud of it. I tried to get him to skip once. There was this event at the mall and I wanted to go. And he said he wouldn't miss school. He came to school stoned, hungover, bruised and battered, but never missed a day. Until this week. A day, sure, a guy who lost so badly and with so much damn pride might miss a day. But more than one day...that's not normal for Johnny. He's never missed anything, except my birthday."

Daniel looked at Ali. For as long as they had dated she'd never said a nice thing about Johnny but now she looked concerned. He glanced across their shared classroom at the few cobras in their room. At the empty seat where Johnny was supposed to be. They were frowning, but they weren't looking at Daniel. It was like Daniel didn't exist to them. They didn't look at him ever. Didn't say hello, if they nearly bumped into him in the hall they spun out of the way and kept going. Which Daniel knew because he'd tested it. He'd stopped directly in front of Jimmy and the boy had quickly sidestepped and spun past him, eyes glancing off of him and not saying a word. Tommy did the same thing.

Johnny must've taken what Daniel had said literally. There had been a hint of desperation in his voice when he'd asked for Daniel to tell him what to do. Daniel hadn't let that sink in. He'd been too on edge. He'd been too unnerved to see his sensei walk in followed by that giant who looked like he was carved from marble. He'd been at the other end of those fists, of those feet and to see him following Mr. Miyagi had sent panic through him. To see him casually in a space he considered safe had upset him. Even if everything was over.

Months ago if you'd told Daniel that there'd be a week where Johnny was gone Daniel would've celebrated. Demand it be declared a national holiday. Or Daniel thought he would've. But he missed seeing Johnny in class. Missed watching him roll his eyes as Daniel asked his fifteenth question in history class, or in English class. Missed debating him over allegories and showing off in science. They'd fallen into an academic rivalry and Daniel missed it even though he'd darted out of class first and always asked to be near the door so he could avoid Johnny in the halls.

"He missed your birthday?" Daniel asked, trying to hold onto the information Ali was supplying them. She had always been vague about her relationship with Johnny.

She sighed, "I'd made this big deal out of my birthday, and because he's always so punctual... when he didn't show up I thought he'd gotten hurt on that stupid bike of his. I panicked. I spent the whole night darting over near the phone to see if he'd called, waiting for him to call and he never did. Because if Johnny couldn't make it for some reason he always called. And he didn't. I got so worried I made myself sick. Then I heard he'd been out drinking with friends. Him and those damn cobras," Ali said bitterly. "I never wanted to put myself through that again. If Johnny was going to start binge drinking and driving I couldn't be the girl waiting worried he was going to crash into a ditch. I couldn't be the girl worried he was going to die because of the stupid Cobra Kai creeds that kept getting him into fights and worried it'd send him to an early grave. So I dumped him," Ali said. "And he kept proving himself to be an asshole, I mean look what he did when you showed up."

Daniel frowned. "Did he ever say why he got drunk?"

"Who cares?" Ali said flipping her hair. "I promised myself I'd stop worrying about him and here we are worrying about him. Whatever reason, it's not good enough. I don't care."

Daniel bit back his response. He wanted to know. He wanted to know why Johnny wasn't at school. Was it because of him, or like she'd said, had he gotten into a fight bigger than himself? Had Kreese shown up to finish the job? Daniel needed answers.

Ali sighed, "I hope his step-father didn't do anything to him."

"Huh?" Daniel said pulling himself back.

"Sid. He's a dick," Ali said before the teacher shushed them.

Daniel couldn't get her to elaborate on that so he spent his day coming up with a plan. Apparently, Johnny hiding from him wasn't what Daniel wanted at all, and tanking his senior year on Daniel's behalf just made him feel worse. So Daniel sweet-talked the lady at the front desk to get Johnny's address, with a whole bunch of missed school work as an excuse, and drove the Ford Super De Luxe to Johnny's house. He found his way past Ali's and deeper into the Hills, finding himself sweating and nervous. These were nice houses, with nice breakable things in them that cost more than anything Daniel owned. He could already see himself talking to Johnny's mother, awkwardly and then stumbling and sending some priceless vase onto the floor to be smashed into smithereens. It was a good thing he never went into Ali's house. He'd already destroyed part of their brickwork outside. Maybe that was why they never invited him in.

The house was big. The red Avanti wasn't there and Daniel frowned. He'd still try. Maybe there was somewhere else to park. He gathered up the books as an excuse, all the notes, and homework and hurried up the front steps ringing the doorbell and shifting uneasily from one foot to the next, a ball of nervous energy. What if it was a trap? What if Johnny was home and was going to beat the shit out of him? Maybe it was all a lie? Or maybe he'd run away. Maybe he had been drinking and then driven himself into a ravine and was concussed somewhere out there, bleeding out in the Avanti and no one knew? Okay, he had to stop. The door opened and a man in what Daniel could only describe as a butler's outfit looked down his nose at him.

"Here to see the young worthless bastard of the house?" the man asked after taking one look at him.

Daniel's brain froze. The words out of the man's mouth didn't match up with anything he'd expected by looking at him. Who opened a door and asked that?

"Er, Johnny?" Daniel asked.

The man nodded, one quick movement. "The bastard is not currently home."

"Could you-"

"No," the man said. Then paused and looked down at Daniel and at his arms full of books and dropped his voice. "If you'd like to see the lady of the house instead she could." His eyes snapped back up to look out past Daniel. He was waiting.

"Uh, yes please," Daniel said. "Could I see the lady of the house?" he said repeating what he'd said.

"Of course," the man said breaking into a smile and walking off briskly across shiny marble floors and Daniel had to hurry to keep up. The place was massive. Art was everywhere, the halls and ceilings were vast and brightly lit.

"A guest for you miss," the man said, knocking on a door.

Daniel heard a women's voice respond before the man opened the door and then left.

Daniel found himself standing before a beautiful woman and he saw where Johnny got it. If Johnny was carved from marble she was the blueprint, the beautiful sketch, a painting that Daniel would've expected to see in a museum. She looked up at him, taking him in, taking the visual, and comparing it to her mental checklists. He wasn't a cobra, so who was he seemed to be the question on her brow.

"Daniel LaRusso?" she asked after a while.

Daniel was stunned. He'd never told his mother about Johnny. Never mentioned the six-foot-tall blonde boy with striking blue eyes that beat him up on the regular. But apparently, Johnny had given his mother enough of a description about the boy he beat up for her to pin a name to a face in one go. What had he said Scrawny small dark-haired kid who looks like a dork?

"Yes Mrs. Lawrence," Daniel said softly.

She nodded, "What brings you here? I thought you didn't want to see Johnny?"

Of all the things Daniel thought about Johnny, being a Mama's boy was not one of them. He'd never thought that Johnny talked to his mother about anything. Heck Daniel tried to avoid talking to his own mother about most things, especially about Johnny. And here Johnny had apparently caught his mother up on everything Daniel related.

"I, is he okay?" Daniel asked, it felt like a stupid question as soon as it left his mouth.

She shrugged. "I don't know," she said.

Daniel frowned at that. How could she not know? She knew Daniel had banished him, who Daniel was on sight alone but didn't know how her own son was doing.

She studied him for a moment, "How would you be?" she asked. It was pointed. Oh Daniel thought. She meant Kreese. She meant the end of the cobras, she meant the mark around Johnny's neck. She meant the feeling of the world crumbling around you.

"Not great," Daniel admitted.

"He's a good kid," Laura said. To her it was a fact, she wouldn't let Daniel refute it. "He's made mistakes. Lots around you it seems."

Daniel frowned. How honest had Johnny been? He'd lied to his mother about his own bruises.

"I looked it up, by the way, that kick you did?" Laura said. "Apparently it's against the rules."

"I don't think kicking someone's hurt knee is a good way to go either," Daniel said tensely.

He didn't like where this was going. The playing field was uneven. He'd been thrown and she was making it hard, it was getting away from him, the same way every interaction with Johnny seemed to ever go.

"Mrs. Lawrence, I just wanted to check in on him, give him his homework, tell him to come to school."

Damn it, he hadn't meant to say that last bit, what if she didn't know he was coming to school? That'd be an ass-kicking for sure.

The door opened and a man leaned against the doorway. He wore a suit and though he wasn't muscular like Johnny he gave off an air of danger that only a rich person could do. Someone who looked at people like ants and took joy in stomping them out. His eyes traveled to Daniel and gave him a once over.

"Whose this pipsqueak?" he asked. "Not here to see that brat is he?"

"No, of course not Sid," Laura said soothingly, eyes darting behind Sid to a servant who was motioning to her and she nodding putting her hand on Daniel's shoulder "He's doing a project for the country club, had some questions for me."

Sid laughed, "Oh good." He leaned towards Daniel lowering his voice, "Listen, don't hang out with Johnny. He's a bad egg, absolutely going to be a worthless deadbeat just like his father. You don't want to get mixed up in that. Worthless kid, I should've sent him packing as soon as his shadow darkened my doorstep. The only good thing he ever did was date that Mills girl and he couldn't even keep hold of her," he laughed. "Oh and the karate, but the boys a quitter always has been always will be. He's probably going to just die in a gutter one day." He threw an arm around Daniel and pulled him from the room and into the hall. "Listen, you probably know him from school right? He's an idiot. Won't make anything out of his life, like a kid like you will. Show him his place if you know what I mean. I mean his newest hobby seems to be gardening, what teenage boy picks gardening?"

"Sid?" Laura called and Sid stopped, turning his head back to the room.

"Yeah?"

"Let the servants walk him out," she said smiling.

Even Daniel could tell it was plastered on and fake. But the arm around his shoulder full of threat left and a servant came to his side, saying nothing. Daniel followed, finding himself going up a spiral staircase and a door opened and a hand pushing him in before the door shut with a click behind him.

Daniel blinked in confusion. He thought they were taking him to the front door. He held the books to his chest and heard movement. He whirled and there was Johnny looking at him in shock. He was standing, clearly hiding something behind him. There was panic in his eyes that Daniel had only seen when Kreese- Daniel tore his eyes away from Johnny and looked around the room. There were band posters on the wall, all rock bands, books on the shelves, and a large bed.

Piles of cassettes sat around and a Walkman sat on the desk that Johnny was leaning against. The light on his desk was on and Johnny was trying to block something on it from Daniel's view. A dirty magazine Daniel thought. Had to be. Here Daniel had been worried that he'd messed up. Sent an already spiraling boy into a deeper spiral but he'd just used it as an excuse to stay home and jerk off. He should've known better to let pity and concern find root.

"I brought your homework," Daniel said holding out the books.

Johnny didn't move.

"Listen if it's porn, whatever," Daniel said, "Just take the homework will ya?"

Johnny looked torn then stepped forward carefully and Daniel caught a wisp of green from where Johnny had moved. It wasn't a dirty magazine. It was a tree. It was a bonsai, one of Mr. Miyagi's bonsai's from the workshop. He recognized that one. Remembered watching Mr. Miyagi work on it.

"Why are you hiding one of Mr. Miyagi's bonsai's?" Daniel asked stepping forward towards Johnny.

"He gave it to me," Johnny said quickly scooping the bonsai up and setting it on a shelf, out of reach. Only just. Daniel looked at the bonsai and then at Johnny. The bruise around his neck was fading. But he had bags under his eyes and looked tired. Rung out. It took Daniel a moment because it didn't make sense. Johnny was protecting the bonsai from Daniel. In what world did that make sense? Daniel loved the bonsai, all the little trees Mr. Miyagi made. He and his mother even had their own. He remembered Sid's words then. Gardening. Was this what he'd meant? Had Johnny spent the week tending and caring for one of Mr. Miyagi's bonsai?

"I-what do you think I'm going to do?" Daniel asked.

Johnny didn't respond. Daniel stepped closer, moving to get a closer look at the desk, at the pair of small shears, a stack of books on bonsai, a few brochures on schools, a pamphlet on taking the GED, a letter gently laid out in what looked like Mr. Miyagi's hand writing. Johnny turned with him.

"Do you seriously think I, who've watched Mr. Miyagi work on bonsai for hours, would do something to a tiny tree?" Daniel asked feeling incredulous.

"Thought you were Sid," Johnny said quietly, but he still didn't move, keeping himself between Daniel and the bonsai.

Daniel frowned, he didn't like that thought. Didn't like the implication. How bad was Sid? He felt his skin go cold. Was this Johnny's life? Kreese trying to kill him and living under a roof with Sid the- the what? Bonsai murderer? Johnny's shoulders were tense.

"I didn't steal it," Johnny said quietly.

"I know man, Mr. Miyagi gave it to you right?" Daniel asked. There was a look like the understanding was a thrown lifeline. The shoulders drooped and the uneasy atmosphere lessened. Johnny took a breath, arms folding across his chest, not in the way he usually did look down at Johnny, but with his fingers digging into his muscles as if he needed to hold onto himself.

"Yeah, he did," Johnny said.

Daniel sighed, Johnny never made anything easy. He'd thought he'd waltz in and Johnny would be pissed to see him and they'd start bickering like always and they'd fight and Daniel would know the Johnny in his head was the right one and he'd tell him to stop moping over losing and come back to school. But this wasn't the Johnny in his head. The Johnny in his head didn't protect bonsai or read up on them, he didn't study even though he did okay in class, he didn't skip school because Daniel told him he didn't want to see him ruining his perfect attendance. He did live in a big mansion but didn't hide in his room trying to protect a plant from his stepfather. He didn't get worried about what Daniel thought, that on top of bully Daniel would just add thief to the list. He moved towards the desk and dropped down all the homework onto it with a loud thud.

The Johnny in his head was always confident, always full of biting remarks, and never this sad boy in front of him with marks on his neck that made Daniel's fingers want to curl into fists and find Kreese and give him a good hit or five. But he feared if he let his fingers curl into fists if he let the anger he felt simmering in his blood turn into a boil Johnny would misconstrue it and he already had that frightened animal in a cage feeling. He looked almost as if he was trying to stop himself from grabbing the bonsai and jumping out the window.

"Thanks," Johnny said, flipping open one of the folders and seeing the notes from their teacher. "But I can..."

"Be at school man," Daniel said.

He wanted to put his hand on Johnny's shoulder but it felt like a bear trap. Daniel wanted to make sure he was okay but he was scared he'd get bitten by a sleeping cobra. So he slipped his hand into the jeans of his pocket, trying to be nonchalant. "Can't believe you let your perfect attendance go out the window."

Johnny blinked at him, a momentary spark of surprise, but the emotions he'd let through earlier had all slid away behind a mask. He was unreadable.

"It's fine," Johnny said.

It was awkward now. Daniel wanted to ask questions. He was burning with them. But they weren't friends sitting in a café chatting over coffee or at a diner eating burgers and drinking shakes. But he had to say something.

"I need time," Daniel said, "You made my life hell. But schools important. Graduating is important, don't just skip and get your GED. Your worrying everyone. I can't have that on my conscious Johnny. You don't have to hide. You will come to school right?"

Johnny wasn't looking at him, was fiddling with the folder on his desk. "Okay," he said.

Daniel turned and headed to the door. If he didn't hurry he wouldn't be able to keep his hands to himself any longer. He wanted to lift Johnny's chin and ask him to stop curling in on himself, to stand up straight like he always did. But that was not what rivals did. Not what enemies did. Johnny would punch him in the face. He paused at the door.

"I'll tell Mr. Miyagi you're taking good care of the bonsai," he said quickly before dipping out in a hurry.

Clinging to a Bonsai like a Life Preserver

Johnny stared where Daniel had left and looked up at the tree he'd carefully set on the shelf. It'd been automatic. Just like everything. He'd spent the week trying to do the opposite of what the voice of Kreese in his head said. The voice told him to go to school and pummel anyone who looked at him weird, who glanced at his neck and the bruises on his face or knuckles. He'd told his mom he wasn't going to school because he couldn't talk much. It hurt to do so. And she'd looked at him full of concern and asked if it was really because Daniel had said he hadn't wanted to see him. It was part of it, sure. But he also didn't trust himself. He didn't trust himself not to hear Daniel say something stupid and for it to set him off like a bunch of firecrackers on the fourth of July. He didn't need to add more things to his list of apologies for the boy. He didn't want to start a new feud either. Which he also feared would happen. That he'd take all that pent-up anger and frustration and direct it at some other kid who crossed his path.

He needed to calm down. So he called the cobras and told him he wouldn't be at school for a while, made them promise to leave Daniel alone, and then buried himself in taking care of the bonsai and researching what he could do. He could take is GED, he could tap into his emergency fund and go somewhere else. Every day he put the tree in the passenger seat of his car and would drive around with it, hoping it'd get enough sunlight, more than it would in his room, and tried to think. It was weird, he knew it was weird for a teenage boy to be driving a bonsai around the city but he also didn't want to leave the plant at home alone. Sid had destroyed most of Johnny's things. Most of the things Sid had gotten him himself. The drums he'd bought so Johnny could take lessons got smashed, the magic set was set on fire, the list continued on and on. Karate required Johnny to be out of the house at a dojo so it was one of the few things Sid hadn't been able to get his hands on and take away when the mood struck him. The bonsai tree however was another story and Johnny would be damned before he let Sid get his hands on it.

The Kreese in his head told him to always look for weakness in others and get rid of his own weakness. The Avanti was a weakness. Johnny loved his car. But it was worth more to Sid in good shape than not. It was worth more for Johnny to have a way out of the house than to stick around and be underfoot, or darkening his doorstep like a leech or parasite like Sid usually said. But the bonsai was a true weakness.

Without meaning to, Johnny had thrown himself into caring for the small tree. It was a target. Kreese, who gave the kids pet mice to care for then made them feed it to a snake would've taken one look at that tree and ripped it in half telling Johnny not to have such an easy weakness to exploit. So when Daniel had shown up instead of Sid Johnny expected his comeuppance. He'd expected Daniel to see the tree and think Johnny had stolen it and then taken it back. It's what Kreese would've done. It's what the cobras had been taught to do. There was no mercy in Cobra Kai.

Johnny reached up and carefully pulled the tree down off the shelf and studied its branches. He'd broken many boards in his life, destroyed plenty of wood, he'd walked through forests where the trees towered over him for Kreese's lessons in fighting, the times they turned into field trips like some demented capture the flag. But he'd never seen trees so small he could hold them on his lap. Something ancient and small that needed care and attention to grow and thrive. Something that needed him. Mr. Miyagi's note was basic care instructions with his name at the top so that Johnny knew it wasn't a fluke. Maybe Johnny would work with trees, maybe with plants. He liked the idea of doing something calming and peaceful, helping things grow. It felt better than crushing them. There was more reward in it. He'd been growing a small patch of flowers in the garden over the years, hidden from Sid. He pretended not to notice them, but the simple curve and bloom of the fuchsia brought him a small spark of pride every year when he saw them bloom.

He sat down at his desk and opened the books, looking at the homework he'd been given. He'd lost his perfect attendance, something he'd hoped to continue until he graduated. But he hadn't expected Daniel to know that he'd thrown that away. That Daniel would've even cared. He'd said he needed time. Maybe that night at a bar in their future could be a reality. Maybe they could get through this year without any more fights. Maybe Johnny could be redeemed and maybe he could spend time with Mr. Miyagi again. A small seed of hope was blooming and he didn't know whether to crush it before he could be let down, crushed and destroyed by reality, or to let it bloom.

Maybe karate didn't have to be over, maybe he could study with Daniel and Mr. Miyagi. It felt like too big of an ask. Too big of a dream for someone who'd tormented Daniel for a whole semester. It had felt like a game of tug of war and sometimes Daniel yanked him over the line and sometimes he yanked Daniel over the line, and sometimes Daniel just popped up like a mole in a whack a mole game to torment him back when he thought the tug of war was over. His mother had looked at the picture from the final tournament and being his mother had looked through the rules about the crane kick and how it wasn't allowed. An illegal move she said. It amused Johnny, it meant technically neither of them had won. Their fight wasn't over and a part of him wanted to try again, let them spar, on an even field without the animosity or anger. He wanted to know who was better when they weren't fighting for their lives. The game wasn't over, but he wouldn't push it. He wouldn't even mention it.

Johnny returned to school, showing up early. He hadn't known what to do with the bonsai. He needed somewhere safe to keep it while he was at school. He was safe at school from Sid, but his things weren't. Sid came home sometimes from Lorimar and if he was pissed he'd take it out on anything that wasn't his. Or at least he'd bought but didn't care for. So Johnny had brought the plant to school and hurried through the courtyard to the greenhouse the science classes used. He'd keep it there during the week, hidden among all the other plants. The teacher who used it was the one who'd given him the start for his fuchsia and Johnny felt like he could trust the teacher to not do anything to his bonsai.

He hurried back to the door taking another look at the bonsai. Maybe it was a bad idea. Everyone he'd trusted had let him down. What if the teacher overwatered it? What if some punk came in and destroyed everything? His unwitting bonsai included? What if it was too hot in here in the middle of the afternoon and his tree died? Johnny pushed down the small panic, what was he a dad dropping their kid off in kindergarten for the first time? He was a black belt in karate. He could leave a tree in a greenhouse while he was in class. It'd be fine. Hiding things in plain sight was the best way to hide things.

"Have a good day," he whispered because damn it that plant was his lifeline, and fuck it if anyone heard him. The books said plants responded to talking to him and that plant had gotten all the whispers of how he'd felt for an entire week. He wasn't going to stop now.

He shoved his hands in his pockets and ducked his head and hurried back towards the main building. Classes went well. His teachers seemed relieved to see him, which was shocking. He hadn't thought of himself as a good student. He didn't think his absence would have been noticed. He'd expected his friends to make fun of him for hiding for a week but instead, they fell in, crowded him like a secret service entourage, treating him like he was made of fine china and he didn't know whether to be touched or infuriated.

Bobby was the worst. He kept foisting snacks on Johnny. In between classes he brought Johnny cookies, chips from the snack machine, sodas. He was being mothered. Bobby's eyes kept flicking to his neck and he'd look away in shame. It was mostly gone, only the ghost of Kreese left. They didn't ask why he hadn't been at school. They didn't mention Kreese or Cobra Kai. They spoke quietly like they were scared to spook him, like he'd run off at the slightest noise. He was beginning to think they were trying to lure him back into the folds of their life like a cat. Quiet little sounds, food, just hand him a blanket and a pillow and some dark place to hide and that was it. He was supposed to be a snake. He was supposed to be cunning and swift. He felt Tommy's eyes on him at lunch, searching for new bruises, fresher than the faded ones and he ducked his eyes. He reached over and stole some fries off of Tommy's plate.

"Sid didn't hit me," he said, quietly.

Not this time. Not yet. He didn't understand why they were treating him with kids' gloves. They all knew he could take a hit, heck he could take a lot of hits. They'd all hit him before. He'd hit them. This wasn't his first rodeo and it wouldn't be his last. He caught sight of Daniel sitting and talking with Ali at a table across the room. He'd healed up pretty quickly, with no dark bruises or injuries. Heck last time he'd seen Daniel he was barely limping. Today he hadn't noticed at all. Relief bloomed in his chest. They hadn't permanently damaged him. There was still hope.

After school was out he told the guys he'd see them later, a lame "I got some things to do" falling from his lips when he turned in the parking lot and headed back towards the school. He'd thought about leaving the bonsai overnight but couldn't. He needed to see it. Needed to check and make sure it was okay. Wanted to talk to it about his day as he drove around in the Avanti. He cringed inwardly. What was it, his girlfriend?

It sounded exactly like when he'd dated Ali. Rushing home to sit on the phone and talk to her about her day, about her classes, about his classes, about karate, about their lives, their dreams, hopes for the future. All that garbage that fell apart when he made one mistake that she refused to ever hear his side on. He should've told the guys that. Don't know why you're all so damn concerned about me. I've had my heart stomped on before and I got through it. I'm used to disappointment and being a disappointment. I'm fine. But then he'd have to also admit that it was weird that he was sneaking back to the greenhouse to pick up his bonsai from its day at plant daycare.

It was still there, it hadn't changed or moved. Now Johnny had to wrestle with how he would take the bonsai home. How was he going to leave with his plant without someone noticing and painting a large target on himself? How would he make it look like he wasn't stealing a plant when the teacher wasn't around? He crouched down next to his tree and gently placed his hands around the pot. He was losing his mind. It was a damn tree. But it was his tree. It was a gift from the guy who'd saved his life.

The door opened and Johnny jumped up holding his bonsai awkwardly in his arms. Daniel leaned against the door.

"Seriously? What's with you and the bonsai?" Daniel asked. "You brought it to school?"

Johnny bit back his response. He couldn't just say, I'm sorry but if I left it at home there was no guarantee it'd still be alive by the time I got back. or I thought you needed time LaRusso, why are you following me everywhere? Leave me and my tree alone, you stalker. Are you looking for a fight now?

He'd have to find a new hiding spot for his bonsai he realized with a sinking feeling. This one had been perfect. Plain sight was always perfect. It's how he kept the Avanti safe. He always parked it very carefully between two of Sid's favorite cars. Sid wouldn't destroy his own cars, so he'd leave the Avanti alone. Too easy to swing too hard and accidentally ding his own car. He didn't know how to explain that caring for this plant was calming. That throwing everything into it helped ease the unending nerves. That when he had nightmares of Kreese's arm around his neck he could glance over and see the bonsai in the moonlight and remember he'd made it through and he could keep making it through.

Daniel ran a hand through his hair. "Are you like trying to make this the cool senior accessory, all seniors carry around a bonsai? Is it like what a home ec baby?"

Daniel was goading him. He could tell from his stance, the way he held his arms stiffly at his sides. It was the same cheekiness that Daniel always had when he'd run up and say something to Johnny and then hide behind a teacher so that Johnny would just stand there furiously but unable to do anything about it. Johnny shut his eyes and breathed in the smell of dirt and the plant. He didn't need to fight Daniel. He'd promised himself he wouldn't. Even though the boy's smug face made him want to slam a fist into it. He promised his mother he'd be better. He'd promised the bonsai, Daniel's mother, Mr. Miyagi, and Daniel himself. He didn't give up on his word. It still meant something to him, even if it didn't mean anything to anyone else. He let his eyes flutter open. Daniel was still there, watching him, waiting.

"It's safer here than at home when I'm not at home," Johnny said.

He didn't know how much Daniel knew but he seemed to have known enough. Sid had laughed at dinner the night Daniel had come, talking about smart boys who knew not to hang around Johnny. It could've only been Daniel. The uncomfortable look that passed Daniel's face made him worry. What if Daniel decided that maybe it was too dangerous for the bonsai to stay with Johnny? Johnny would protect it, he'd figure it out. He felt a rush of cold. He shouldn't have admitted to the weakness. What if Mr. Miyagi wanted it back?

"Hey," Daniel said. Johnny's eyes snapped to him, he felt like he was panicking, heart racing, feeling cold all over. "Come with me," Daniel said, turning from the greenhouse and walking across the lawn. Johnny stared after him before kneeling down, carefully opening his book bag and setting the bonsai inside, making sure it was safe and secure before gently swinging it around his shoulder and hurrying out of the greenhouse and across the lawn.

Bait for a Wounded Fish

Daniel felt that rage boiling as he stalked across the lawn back towards the parking lot. Past the soccer team at practice, past the band, past the track team. He didn't check if Johnny was following him. He didn't want Johnny to see his face right now. His image and understanding of Johnny Lawrence was fraying, coming apart in his fingers every time he reached out to it to try and hold on and steady himself. It was like it'd been painted gold and it was raining and he was realizing it was fake. Everything was a mirage. He couldn't handle it.

He'd talked to Mr. Miyagi about the tree. Told him that Johnny was taking care of one of the bonsai in what he'd attempted was the nonchalant way his mother mentioned that she'd seen a coworker at the grocery store.

Mr. Miyagi had hummed his approval. "See? Boy not all bad. Not all gone."

Mr. Miyagi was right. The bonsai made Johnny human, not some monster from his nightmares. He didn't get nightmares very often. But he'd had a few over the last week. More than he'd had in years. He'd only had one bad one last semester, after Halloween where Johnny and the cobras kept chasing him and laughing. Over the last week though it was him trying to get to Johnny as Kreese tried to kill him, yelling for Mr. Miyagi but not being able to find him, so he had to do it, but he couldn't. Trying to explain to Sid that Johnny was being held underwater and he needed to get past but Sid just laughing and putting a hand on Daniel's shoulder and not listening to him, or worse one time he did listen but just glanced back and then looked at Daniel and shrugged and said "So? Why do you care?"

His mother used to say that hate and love were the same sides of a coin. It was very easy for one to flip from one side to the other. Sometimes you missed people you once didn't like.

Daniel had thought that was messed up. He'd never thought he could miss Johnny. And yet he spent a week looking for him. Worried about him. He was a mess. It was stupid. It was frustrating. He cared. He had thought he shouldn't. He'd seen the way Johnny had held onto the bonsai, the way it seemed to anchor him. He'd seen the way the cobras had surrounded Johnny. Their usual boisterous laughter was gone and quiet concern in their eyes. The way Johnny wasn't snapping at them for the treatment. Daniel may have kicked Johnny in the face, but something had gone out. Something had broken that hadn't been broken when Johnny was giving Daniel the trophy with tears in his eyes and telling him he was all right. And Daniel was pissed about it.

His karate, the karate Mr. Miyagi had been teaching him was for defense, protecting others and himself. He couldn't let Johnny stay this way. It was against his nature. He stopped at the yellow Ford and threw his bag into the car and turned, Johnny wasn't holding the bonsai anymore but was walking towards him with his bag hung over his shoulder, thumb hooked under the strap. He was following, albeit slowly, like he was waiting for Daniel to hop in his car and peel off laughing at Johnny for thinking, thinking what? How little trust did Johnny have? To be fair Daniel didn't have a lot of trust to spare. But he was a people person. He liked talking and it usually wore people down. It wore Ali and Mr. Miyagi down. Got him those two as friends. Daniel leaned against his car and looked at Johnny.

"You want to ride with me or follow in your car?"

"I'll follow in my car," Johnny said.

No surprise there. Johnny didn't even ask where they were going. Maybe there was some trust there after all? Buried a little deep. But it was still there or else Johnny wouldn't just blindly agree to follow him. Daniel nodded and climbed into his car, waiting for Johnny. He was parked nearby. Not super close but close enough. He spotted the bonsai tucked into Johnny's backpack and watched as Johnny sunk into the Avanti. He expected Johnny to throw the bag in the back but he didn't. He carefully held the bag in his lap, long fingers unzipping the bag and pulling the bonsai out and setting it in the passenger seat, zipping the bag back up and setting it on the floor of the passenger seat.

Daniel started laughing. Johnny Lawrence treating a plant like a child. Who would've thought he'd ever see the day? Not in his wildest dreams. And his dreams had been pretty fucked up lately. Johnny looked over at him, seat belt fastened and Daniel realized he'd half expected with the level of care Johnny was giving the plant to seat belt the bonsai in as well, only to realize he was waiting for Daniel to lead the way.

Daniel led them out of the school grounds a small seed of doubt sprouting. Maybe this was a bad idea. He didn't like Johnny's red car following him. It drudged up all sorts of bad feelings. Johnny chased

Daniel for months, it was hard to let that feeling go, to calm the frantic beating of his heart. But when he looked through his rearview mirror it was just Johnny sitting in the Avanti. No cobras. Just Johnny and a little tree in the passenger seat that when they came to a stop too suddenly Johnny's hand shot out like a mother to steady the bonsai or protect it.

He laughed. The worry fading away. It'd be fine. Johnny was defanged. The snake had no bite anymore he told himself, and instead needed some care, the way you brought an injured bird to a sanctuary to heal and recuperate before releasing it back into the wild. Though something told Daniel that the cracks might be too deep, that maybe Johnny wouldn't survive being back out in the wild once free.

He pulled into the lot by Miyagi's house, parking the car next to the others, and leaned casually next to the car, bubbling with excitement. Johnny had never seen Miyagi's house. Maybe he should've told Mr. Miyagi about it first. But he wanted to embarrass the shit out of Johnny. Sit the three of them, four if you counted the bonsai, down for tea and tell Mr. Miyagi that Johnny had brought the tree to school and was treating it like a preschool child. He'd seen Johnny turn red with rage, but he wondered if he'd turn red in anger or embarrassment and if Daniel could spot the difference. He waited while Johnny parked and carefully picked up the bonsai, set it back down, unsure, taking in all the cars in the lot and then looking at Daniel, clearly lost.

"Bring the bonsai," Daniel said pushing off from his car and walking towards the house, slipping out of his shoes at the door and knocking carefully before entering.

"Mr. Miyagi, I brought a guest," he called through the house, he never knocked but with Johnny, it seemed better to do so. And he watched Johnny stiffen next to him. Daniel liked that he kept surprising Johnny, shocking him. Watching him falter brought him pleasure. It was like fighting, like sparring but gentler. There weren't any blows, no damage but more expression on his face. Different ones than the hatred and rage or the warm smirk Johnny usually had for him. Johnny was frozen half out of his shoes.

"Is this his house?" Johnny whispered, eyes a little wide in shock.

"Yeah," Daniel said easily.

Johnny looked spooked.

"He doesn't bite you know?" he said with a grin, trying to push past it, and stepping forward into the house to find Mr. Miyagi. Eventually, he found Mr. Miyagi sitting and making tea. His face lit up when he saw Daniel.

"Ah, Daniel-san. How was school?"

"Great," Daniel said warmly. "I brought Johnny with me," he said quickly, voice low.

"Oh?" Mr. Miyagi asked tilting his head, waiting.

Daniel frowned, he thought Mr. Miyagi was good with Johnny. That thing had been all patched up on their end. But it was weird wasn't it? Bringing Johnny here. Daniel took a deep breath the way Mr. Miyagi taught him.

"I think he needs to be here," he managed after a moment.

It was vague, strange. He didn't know how to explain it quickly with Johnny presumably frozen half in and half out of his shoes at the front of the house. Daniel was willing to share Mr. Miyagi if maybe it'd bring some more life into that pale skin of Johnny's. If maybe he'd stop curling his shoulders over the bonsai plant as if trying to shield it with his whole body.

Mr. Miyagi nodded like he understood without Daniel needing to explain. It was why Daniel loved Mr. Miyagi. They just got each other. He'd listen when Daniel needed to talk but he also picked up on the things Daniel couldn't bring himself to say. He smiled brightly. Mr. Miyagi stood.

"Bring to back," Mr. Miyagi said.

Daniel nodded hurrying back to where Johnny was looking out at his car like he was trying to decide whether he should run away. Daniel grabbed his arm, half expecting to be thrown, to find himself sailing through the air. But Johnny flinched instead. Daniel had never seen Johnny flinch and he quickly pulled his hand away.

"Come around back," Daniel said, slipping back into his shoes and hopping off the porch and into the dirt to walk around.

Johnny slipped his one foot that had come out of his shoe back in and followed. Daniel started walking backward, he wanted to see Johnny's face when he pushed the gate open. Wanted to see if he had the same look of awe that Daniel had had. He stumbled, his feet went out from under him as his shoe hit a root, something he wasn't expecting. He watched Johnny shift the bonsai in his arms, his other hand reaching out and grabbing Daniel before he fell, moving quickly to scoop his newly free arm behind Daniel's back. In all their fighting Daniel knew Johnny was sturdy, knew he was muscular and fast, but being, even momentarily in his arms was a different feeling altogether and he didn't know what to do with this information. He felt safe, secure, his hands had gone up to reach for Johnny as he felt and now were over Johnny's chest, fingers gripping onto his shirt for security, and damn that muscle while Johnny was flexed was impressive.

"You okay?" Johnny asked.

There was concern there, worry. He hadn't moved, was carefully holding Daniel and the bonsai, and didn't even seem to be straining despite supporting most of Daniel's weight. Daniel tightened his grip on the soft cotton of Johnny's shirt using it carefully to pull himself up till he was standing again, too close. Daniel was a little surprised, the pounding of blood rushing through his veins, his mouth dry. He would've thought he would've panicked to be so close to Johnny, to see those muscles in action again, even if minutely so. He had been preparing himself for the possibility of sparring. He wondered if this was why Ali had dated him. The safe feeling of being caught from falling. He was sure his face was red, but grateful that it could be construed as embarrassment.

"Yeah," Daniel said a soft laugh. "I'm fine. Probably should be watching where I'm going."

Those blue eyes sure were intense up close. His hands were still on Johnny's chest, the arm still out just in case. Step away Daniel. He told himself. This isn't some petting zoo, back away from the boy before you do something even stupider. It was harder to do than his brain commanded. There were too many things he wanted to do and he felt his ears burn. It was unexpected like a floodgate had opened. He stepped back, carefully pulling himself away from Johnny's arm.

He'd half expected Johnny to roll his eyes, to call him an idiot. And it was there, in his eyes, a glittering of amusement but he was still biting his tongue. If it was Daniel he would've been bleeding by now. He couldn't stop himself most of the time. Maybe Johnny was better trained on most things than Daniel even expected. Daniel hurried to the gate and rushed through, holding it open for Johnny. This was safer, to watch while not moving as Johnny stepped through the gate, shifting his bonsai in his arms and looking around.

It was worth it. Johnny couldn't hide when he stepped through the gate. Mr. Miyagi was standing on the porch, hands watching as well. Johnny took in the bonsai's, the green grass, the wooden walking paths. Daniel wished he had a camera. Johnny was taking it all in like he was trying to memorize everything. Like he couldn't believe he was there. He turned to take in the house and his eyes fell to Mr. Miyagi.

"It's beautiful sir," Johnny said.

There was no joking in his tone, pure awe. Something warm filled Daniels's chest. Misgivings fading away. This had been the right choice. There was no way a boy who looked at Mr. Miyagi's garden like that, who held that damn bonsai like a security blanket would destroy the space.

"Always lots to do," Mr. Miyagi said walking forward.

It was bait. Daniel knew it was bait. Mr. Miyagi was an expert fisherman and knew the right type of lure to reel anything in.

Johnny shifted on his feet, pulling his gaze away from the garden, and looked at Mr. Miyagi. "If you need any help sir, I could, if you want-"

Johnny was struggling. Daniel felt the blue eyes slip to him, he didn't feel welcome yet. He was offering free labor and yet didn't feel welcome even to take that scrap. Something Mr. Miyagi had him doing right off the bat. He clearly wanted to be here so badly. What did you do if the fish just jumped straight into your hands but then seemed too wounded to even flop around? Daniel shut the gate and hurried towards the spot where Mr. Miyagi usually worked in the back yard and then saw Johnny still stuck and went back and pulled him along, going for the edge of his shirt. The fact Johnny let him touch him, or rather his shirt, let him just pull him or push him around like he was clay ready to be molded was going to go to his head if he wasn't careful. If there weren't boundaries Daniel would start overstepping them and end up all tangled up before he knew it.

"Mr. Miyagi always has stuff he needs help with," he said with a laugh. "I'm sure he'd appreciate the help."

Johnny nodded following along to where Mr. Miyagi sat with some tea, pouring it into cups for the boys. Watching them curiously but saying nothing.

"Mr. Miyagi guess what?" Daniel said, that desire to see how far he could push it bubbling up. Maybe it was mean. But it was what had kept him going.

"What Daniel-san?" Mr. Miyagi asked as Johnny carefully set the bonsai next to him and took the cup of tea to breathe in the smell.

"Johnny brought the bonsai to school," Daniel said, a Cheshire grin spreading across his face. Only the tips of Johnny's ears were pink. He'd shut his eyes and took a sip of the tea.

"Ah," Mr. Miyagi said thoughtfully looking at the bonsai.

He didn't look like he found amusement in this fact. Instead, there seemed to be a moment of concern. Daniel hadn't mentioned Sid but Mr. Miyagi was smart. He always knew more than he let on.

"I-" Johnny started and stopped, worrying the edge of his cup, and then seemed to steady something within himself. His shoulders which had been curving in straightened and he held his head tall and looked at Mr. Miyagi. "I promise I will take good care of it, sir. Thank you for the bonsai."

Mr. Miyagi blinked and raised his hand to wave away Johnny's words. "Miyagi know."

Johnny blinked, it was there only a moment, a glassiness of tears and emotion that were quickly reigned back in but Daniel caught it. He shifted in his seat to sit on his hands. If he wasn't careful he was going to hug Johnny Lawrence and then where would they be? It was like, he realized, he'd brought a big dog into Mr. Miyagi's yard and was wanting to keep it. A dog he'd seen kicked too many times or heard of being kicked. He wanted to give it a bath and oh shit that was not where he wanted his brain to go. Come on Daniel Get a grip. he told himself.

Mr. Miyagi glanced out over the yard. "In your karate, did you do kata?"

Daniel stiffened at this. He wasn't expecting Mr. Miyagi to start on with the karate. He hadn't meant to open that door. He'd just meant to bring some calm into Johnny's life. Calm that the backyard at Mr. Miyagi's gave him. He wasn't ready to share his karate. Maybe he was selfish. But he had to do chores for months before Mr. Miyagi showed him the point of what he was doing. He'd worked himself to the bone for the pleasure.

"No," Johnny said.

Mr. Miyagi nodded thoughtfully. He looked around like he was trying to find chores to do. Like he hadn't given all his chores to Daniel. Trying to think of something to spin into a lesson. Mr. Miyagi had seen Johnny in action but neither he nor Daniel really knew where Johnny was and how that offensive karate meshed with Mr. Miyagi's defensive karate. Daniel had to admit despite himself, despite that flare of jealousy, he wanted to see it. He wanted to see Johnny working himself to the bone for Mr. Miyagi, scrubbing floors while Mr. Miyagi walked away reminding him to breathe while he did so. He needed someone else to go through what he'd gone through.

"This weekend, if wish to help," Mr. Miyagi said. "Come here, six o'clock."

"Yes sir," Johnny said.

He held himself like what Daniel expected a soldier to, spoke like one too. He was too well trained, too coiled up and twisted into the version Kreese made, Daniel wanted to dig his fingers into Johnny's shoulder and move him, to adjust the stance and make him different but the same.

They fell into silence, it felt companionable, the two of them sitting out looking at the yard, birds hopping around pecking at the grass as they drank their tea. Daniel couldn't help himself. Started rambling. About classes. About the projects, he was working on in his classes. It was strange. Looking from the outside it seemed like they weren't listening. But Daniel knew Mr. Miyagi listened when he rambled like he was trying to parse through it to figure out whether Daniel was okay or not, whether the day had been good or bad, whether he'd gotten into fights or not. But Johnny, Johnny had his head cocked to the side. He'd seen that when Johnny was listening to his friends but staring out over the cafeteria. Listening but being aware. He'd never used that around Daniel and Daniel couldn't stop. He followed the train of thought from school to his cousin in New Jersey and found himself spinning right back to California, slipping into a discussion about cars, about the Ford, about his mother's car.

He wanted to stop talking. But he couldn't. He started talking about his mother's job, how it was going, about their little apartment and the strange sound the pipes made sometimes, and how his mother had promised him a pool the entire ride to California, and the pool wasn't full, ever. He'd been in California for months, full semester and hadn't seen a pool outside of the Golf 'N Stuff and how Ali kept saying they would ride the big slide and yet never had and this time of year in New Jersey it was cold but here it was warm so like you could still go swimming but he hadn't gone swimming, not really the entire time he was in California and what even was the point of being in California if you didn't get to swim?

He paused. He'd talked about Ali in front of Johnny and had expected something to explode in him, there was just a twitch of his jaw, but nothing else. He was dying to ask, and that's why he'd spiraled. He wanted to know how long they'd dated, why he'd not shown up at Ali's birthday party and left her waiting and concerned for hours. He wanted to get Johnny to open up. He needed to see how much gunk had been poured in by Kreese and Sid and what was salvageable. What he and Mr. Miyagi could fix. Because that was it now. Like a stray Johnny was warming up a spot in Daniel's life faster than he'd expected. It tumbled out before he could stop it. He'd been so good. He'd tried so hard to veer straight out of the question. It was humiliating's to ask in front of Mr. Miyagi.

"Why did Ali break up with you?"

There was a good chance he was going to get hit. That he'd just collapsed this house of cards he'd worked on. They weren't friends yet. They weren't anything. But it was eating him up. He wanted to know. Because he liked Ali, but the Ali that fought Johnny, punched him after he kissed her, the Ali who egged Daniel on in his rivalry for revenge against Johnny didn't match up with the Ali who'd been concerned he'd been missing over a week. The Johnny that she'd dated for who knows how long and said he was reliable and she could set her to watch to him. That said she jumped ship before he spiraled out of control. The silence in the garden was deafening and Daniel thought maybe he should run. Get a head start.

A Happy Place to Escape to

Chapter Notes

Moved something Daniel did in KK2 up a bit to here.

No one had ever asked Johnny why. No one usually asked Johnny a question and expected a real thought-out answer. Except for teachers or his mother. Sid's questions, Kreese's questions, were always rhetorical and dark. Always less of a question and more of a fact. When Ali broke up with Johnny Sid just laughed a cold mirthless laugh. Of course, she broke up with him. She was too good for him. What was he if he couldn't keep a girl? Maybe he should try a boy next and see if that was more his speed. It was meant as a joke, a mean joke, but Johnny felt stricken. He'd tried to hide that that was an option he'd been thinking of. His mother knew and she just gave him a look of you're still safe, but he remembered the way his heart had thrown itself against his rib cages and the cold sweat on his skin ready to grab his go bag and run.

He remembered Kreese asking where his girl had gone. Ali used to come by sometimes to meet him at the dojo. Dutch had unhelpfully supplied an answer that wasn't any of Kreese's business now that he thought about it. That with a laugh Ali had dumped him and hooked up with some transfer student from New Jersey with a big mouth. Kreese recommended revenge, to put the boy in his place, and all the students had agreed. They'd all agreed because they just did with Kreese. Who took their bursts of anger and fed the flames until Johnny found himself all riled up and not remembering what had set it off. Just Kreese's whispers that LaRusso was probably making fun of him with Ali wherever he was and you have to strike first and show no mercy. And he did. Maybe their laughter wasn't always at him, but it felt like it. Felt like they were making fun of Johnny behind his back. But LaRusso was full of jokes, he'd seen it in class. He was a class clown when he wanted to be. And now in retrospect, there was a good chance he was just making Ali laugh, not at Johnny but in general. And maybe Johnny was a little jealous. He didn't have much to laugh about.

He hesitated.

"Daniel-san, no need to stick fingers in healing wound," Mr. Miyagi said, admonishing the boy.

"I don't know," Johnny said, the words bubbling up. "I missed her birthday, was all she told me. She broke up with me over the house messaging machine. Sid got a kick out of that. Played it over and over and over. She sounded pissed. Er, sorry sir," Johnny directed at Mr. Miyagi. "She was angry. I missed her birthday because," Johnny paused looking at his cup of tea. "The short version of it is that I was out drinking with my friends. We have fake IDs. Got absolutely trashed. The long story though is Sid's dad died. It was like...like a grenade went off at the house. It was sudden and shocking and everything was a mess. I didn't tell the guys what had happened just that I needed to make myself scarce for a while. So they took me drinking. I drank more than I should've. I remembered it too late, tried to get to the phone but there was this girl sobbing into it all night. When she finally stopped sobbing into it she smashed the damn thing. Sorry, sir. I couldn't get ahold of Ali to tell her what happened. I was in no state to drive. I had no way to contact anyone to get over there. And I didn't want Mr. and Mrs. Mills to see me like that, y'know? They only liked me because of Sid's money. If they'd seen me they wouldn't have let me through the door anyway," he sighed. "Even if I hadn't been drunk."

"Why didn't you tell her?" Daniel asked.

Johnny looked up at him pointedly. "I tried."

"Oh, right," Daniel said deflating into his seat.

"I-" Johnny took a deep breath, eyes falling back down to his tea. Mr. Miyagi had poured him more. "Maybe it was for the best you know? Like in her message she already sounded like she'd already made her mind up long before and the birthday thing was just the match to set the whole thing up in flames. I think she was already halfway out the door and didn't want to tell me, didn't want to...explain what I'd done wrong, or let me try to fix it."

He lifted the tea to take a sip. It was hard to control his emotions when talking about Ali. He thought he loved her. Thought maybe she saw something in him that no one else did. Something good and worthwhile. And he wanted that to be true. He'd clung to that so desperately that he worried he smothered it. Daniel was watching him, it almost looked like pity was on his face. Pity and confusion.

"Shortest version," Johnny said remembering Mr. Miyagi's saying in his shop. "I kept her waiting."

"But you didn't mean to!" Daniel said. It escaped his lips like an explosion. Johnny was startled and looked over at him. The pity and confusion were replaced by anger.

"She's your girlfriend now," Johnny said gently. As much as he'd tried to drive a wedge between the two of them before, he hadn't ever wanted Ali to get hurt. "She's a nice girl. Take good care of her for me, will ya?" Johnny asked lifting his teacup in a cheer and tipping back the last in his cup. Johnny thought that was cool. Johnny thought that would calm him down but Daniel still looked pissed.

"Daniel-san, breathe," Mr. Miyagi said calmly from Daniel's side.

"But Mr. Miyagi. I met Johnny's stepfather. He's.. he's almost as bad as Kreese, maybe worse. And if Johnny had to flee the house because he blew up, it's not fair she broke up with him."

"Daniel-san," Mr. Miyagi said, patting Daniel's shoulder. "Breathe in," Mr. Miyagi said clasping his hands together, "through nose" he said and then moved his hands out in front of him "Breathe out through mouth." He pulled his hands back to his chest, "Breathe in" and then his hands went up, "Breathe out. Now again. Breathe Daniel-san. Close eyes." Mr. Miyagi opened his eyes and nodded in approval, coaching Daniel into breathing. Johnny wondered what his life would've been like if someone had stopped him every time he nearly flew off the handle to just breathe and take a moment. The person would have their hands full he thought with a small smile. The tension in Daniel evaporated and he blinked his eyes open.

"Better?" Mr. Miyagi asked.

Daniel nodded. "I mean I feel better, but I also don't feel better," he said softly.

Johnny wanted to say that was life but he bit it back, instead, he said, "It's fine, LaRusso. Ali didn't want to know and I've learned my lesson from trying to make her," he said rubbing his jaw. "She's got a mean hook and honestly it's not her business anymore. Would I like to know why exactly that tipped everything over the edge, yeah, but I'm not really losing sleep over it anymore."

It was true. He wasn't. He was losing sleep over other things instead. Fingers digging into his neck, vases thrown at him, running and never escaping fast enough before the doors locked him in. The bonsai helped. With any luck, it'd be around longer than him and that gave him some comfort. He'd read that trees could live over a hundred years, even the bonsai ones. And he liked that. Damn, he was relying on a tree too much.

It was so peaceful in the backyard at Mr. Miyagi's place. Johnny's eyes ran over the yard. It was the perfect place for just about anything. Karate lessons, working away on projects, having a cup of tea. Everything was lovingly well maintained. Johnny wanted to memorize every blade of grass.

When he'd started learning karate he'd checked out books about it at the library, which led to books about meditation which Kreese had told him was pansy-ass bullshit. But he remembered that a key to it was to create a happy place in your mind. A place you could escape to when things got difficult. Johnny didn't have that place, he'd never thought of one, just dipping into music and focusing on the sound instead of reality. But this place, this was it. Johnny felt like for the rest of his life, even if he wasn't allowed back ever again, this would be his happy place. Sitting and drinking tea with Mr. Miyagi and Daniel blabbering on about nothing important in this backyard. And maybe, with that, he'd get through the rest of the year. And then who knows what. Maybe like Sid said, he'd die in a ditch somewhere, or maybe he'd get to do something cool. What that was he didn't know. He didn't know anything about his future. He didn't have any plans or dreams. Not anymore.

He could feel Daniel's eyes on him again. He wondered if he was looking for cracks, seams to stick his fingers in like Mr. Miyagi had said, wounds to dig around in. Johnny had plenty. He usually snapped when someone prodded one of them. But Johnny was so tired. He was exhausted. It felt like he'd been holding up the sky, Atlas, he remembered. He felt like Atlas. A hand found its way to his shoulder. Daniel kept touching him. He tried not to flinch, watched it coming tensely. It wasn't awful. It didn't burn. He didn't dig his fingers in or his nails like Sid did during fancy dinners.

He had expected Daniel to be over the moon when Johnny's world came crashing around him, as he peeked around at the shambles that was Johnny's life, the one he hid. His hand was a solid weight, comforting and warm. He kept waiting for the other shoe to drop. For Mr. Miyagi to change his mind about Johnny coming by over the weekend. About Daniel feeling comfortable with him being there at all. He'd expected a lot of things and kept waiting for them. But it didn't happen. The evening wore on and Mr. Miyagi invited them for dinner. Johnny protested that he didn't want to intrude, but Daniel was pulling him up and into the house. Talking a mile a minute about

Mr. Miyagi's cooking and all the food he made and how delicious it was and how Johnny couldn't leave yet. They took their shoes off at the door and Johnny felt too big and clumsy for the space all of a sudden. There were breakables everywhere. He spotted a framed medal of valor on a shelf and Daniel caught his gaze and started a new spiel.

"That's Mr. Miyagi's. He fought in World War 2. I made that frame. Do you like it? Thought it'd make it pop. It was just sitting in a box Mr. Miyagi showed me. You got to show that kind of stuff off you know? Like trophies or certificates and awards or family photos. I'm working on making frames for his other stuff, but he's a bit stubborn. Says he doesn't want me making a fuss. But it's a big deal, right? He's a hero."

Daniel was beaming with pride for his sensei. Kreese had also been in war. Both veterans but in vastly different ways. Kreese talked about it a lot. Mostly to tell them of the horrors of it. Prepping his students for the war against life. Which when everything was awful, hit home. Everything snaked in and made itself at home, all the toxic garbage, and Johnny had a feeling he'd be sifting through the wreckage for years.

"It's nice," Johnny said when Daniel handed him the frame to inspect.

He probably made it in shop class. It wasn't a class they took together, but Johnny knew Daniel was in it. Daniel grinned brightly at the praise even though it wasn't much and Johnny's heart fluttered. He wondered if he was sick. What did a heart attack feel like again? What were the warning signs? He was too young for heart attacks, right? If there was anyone with awful luck enough to die from a heart attack in high school it was Johnny. Daniel was talking now about Okinawa, a place where Mr. Miyagi was from, and the few smatterings of facts he knew. Something smelled good. Daniel was standing close, showing him pictures of Mr. Miyagi in uniform and his hand was on Johnny's bicep, he was leaning close, talking softly.

"It wasn't a good time for him, so don't mention it. They put his family in a concentration camp while he was out fighting," Daniel said quietly.

"That's fucked up," Johnny said, eyes wide.

Daniel nodded. "They died. His wife and son."

Johnny glanced through the house. He could hear Mr. Miyagi singing as he cooked.

"Fuck," Johnny breathed.

He didn't know why Daniel was telling him this. Why he was standing so close that Johnny could feel his breath. Why he'd even been invited in the first place. He thought Daniel wanted to be left alone, avoided, yet here he was hand on his arm whispering to him in the dim-lit room.

"Were you holding all your curses in?" Daniel asked, his voice was full of mirth, he was teasing Johnny realized. Making fun of him but in a gentle way. Playful. "Got any more you need to knock loose before we join Mr. Miyagi?"

"No," Johnny said as Daniel put everything back and then made a move towards the kitchen, gently pulling Johnny along by his sleeve.

Dinner was warm and comforting. Different than the dinners Johnny had at the country club or at the house with Sid's guests, different from the dinners he had with his mother. Mr. Miyagi had made fish, rice, and soup.

"Simple, but hearty," Mr. Miyagi said with a smile filling the boy's bowls.

Johnny watched Daniel pick up a pair of chopsticks and set about eating with ease. Johnny picked up a pair and stared at them, watching the other two eat. He could sit at any fancy restaurant and not worry about which fork to use first. His table manners were impeccable. But chopsticks weren't something he'd used before. He watched Mr. Miyagi deftly start using his chopsticks to slice the fish into sections and then found Daniel looking at him. Daniel held up his hand, the chopsticks posed between fingers, and then slowly moved them together. Johnny followed suit, glancing from his hands to Daniel's until it matched and followed his movements as he cut up the fish on his plate as well. It wasn't easy. It used a completely different set of movements than what he was used to. But it was satisfying when it worked out, even though it was clumsy. Everything he ate was new to him. He'd had rice and fish and soup of course, but not with these flavors or combinations.

"It's delicious sir," Johnny said.

"Johnny-san," Mr. Miyagi said looking up at him. "Mr. Miyagi, Miyagi-san, okay? No sir."

Johnny blushed lightly. He was so used to sir. Kreese was always "yes

sir. Yes sensei." heels together, back straight, arms behind back, almost like a soldier. It was a habit. Sid was also, sir. "Uh, yes, sir-er Mr. Miyagi," Johnny said.

Mr. Miyagi smiled, "Glad you like. Caught myself."

"Mr. Miyagi likes to fish. Whole family is fishermen," Daniel explained around a mouthful of rice.

Mr. Miyagi nodded proudly. "Do you like fishing Johnny-san?"

"I've never done it," Johnny said.

Mr. Miyagi hummed thoughtfully. "Very peaceful," he said.

"Also very boring," Daniel whispered to him when Mr. Miyagi got up to get more rice.

While Johnny focused on maneuvering his chopsticks, proud with every successful bite, Daniel took over the conversation. Filling the quiet space around them with warm talk of the last time he'd gone fishing with his uncle. The type of fish he'd caught, how they spent most of the day out in the sun and caught almost nothing, so the few fish they caught were big deals. Only the fish his cousin caught was tiny and the fish Daniel caught slipped away. Which was fine because they had to let them go anyway. They didn't catch anything they could keep. Which led to more talk about New Jersey, his accent becoming thicker as he spoke of the foods they ate. A couple of Italian seafood recipes that he'd have to try some time now that he was on the coast.

He spoke animatedly, talking with his free hand as he ate. It was atrocious table manners, Sid would've slapped Johnny for even attempting it. But somehow it fit with the atmosphere. Johnny wondered how Daniel never seemed to run out of things to talk about. Johnny felt like the few wells of interesting topics he usually went to had dried up. He had nothing interesting to say. Daniel made it look easy.

Mr. Miyagi got up when they finished and brought out a bowl of fruit, taking a knife and carefully cutting up apples and peeling small oranges passing the sliced apples to Johnny and Daniel. Johnny hadn't had anyone slice an apple for him in, he didn't remember how long. He tried to remember if his mother did it. It would've had to have been before Sid, when he'd been really little. Probably to cut out bruises or soft spots. The apple was perfectly sweet and crisp and the little orange, "tangerine", Daniel explained in a side step of his running dialog as Johnny picked it up and studied it, was juicy with a bit of tartness. The slices were so small and perfect. It matched the dinner well. A perfect opposite. Savory and then sweet. Not greasy as the burgers Johnny sometimes got when he didn't want to eat at home, when he was avoiding being at home and when he ate in the Avanti in a dark parking lot somewhere. Or as heavy as the steaks that practically still bled that Sid liked for dinner, with potatoes drowning in butter.

Before he knew it it was time to go home. Johnny didn't want to leave. But he had no reason to stay. He carried his bonsai out to the car, thanked Mr. Miyagi again, and wishing him a good evening. Daniel was talking quickly to the man on the steps while Johnny put the bonsai in the passenger seat of the Avanti and breathed in the cool night air. There was a crunch of dirt and gravel and footsteps hurrying towards him. He turned.

"Six o'clock on Saturday, remember?" Daniel asked.

"Yes," Johnny said.

"Will you be able to find your way home okay? Find your way back here on Saturday?" Daniel asked.

"Yes. Don't worry about me," Johnny said. He'd meant this as a polite thing, that he was capable. But Daniel frowned. Johnny tried to give a reassuring smile, but it felt wrong. It was harder to smile now.

"Get home safe Johnny," Daniel said, before heading over to his yellow Ford. "See you at school."

Johnny nodded and slipped into the Avanti and slowly drove home.

Ready to Fight

Chapter Notes

> I honestly don't know what the inside of Miyagi's truck looks like very well so I took some liberties, went with a tall stick shift control if that makes sense.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Daniel strolled into Mr. Miyagi's house on Saturday at 7am. He wanted to see what Mr. Miyagi had put Johnny to work on. Waxing the cars? Sanding the floors? Washing windows? How many chores could Johnny boy handle before he got frustrated? Daniel thought it was around painting the whole fence on both sides that sent him grumbling. He looked around. Mr. Miyagi tended to disappear once Daniel got to work on a project, so of course, he'd made himself scarce once Johnny had started as well. He wasn't by the cars, so Daniel headed to the back, he wasn't panting the fence or sanding the wood. He put his hands on his hips, where the hell was he? He walked out on the boards and turned back to look at the house. Did Johnny not show? Did Mr. Miyagi take him somewhere else? He'd seen the red Avanti in the lot, so Johnny was here and there was his bonsai carefully nestled in the garden somewhere where it could get sun.

Daniel held a hand over his eyes and searched. How could one not be able to find a tall muscular blonde? It wasn't like he was Waldo. He couldn't hide easily. He spotted a ladder and followed it up. Johnny was on the roof, his shirt was folded up to the side and he was working in the early morning sun in a tank top that showed off his muscles and clung to his chest. Daniel felt his mouth grow dry. Damn. Johnny hadn't noticed him yet so he continued to stare. Johnny was focused, he was holding nails between his lips, moving methodically across the roof, removing old pieces of roofing and replacing it with new.

Daniel remembered Mr. Miyagi murmuring about how he needed to fix the roof. Daniel had asked him not to do it himself. Was too scared Mr. Miyagi would fall and break something, even though he was pretty sure on Halloween Mr. Miyagi had jumped a fence to save him. Roofing though was different, more dangerous. But Johnny was making it look easy. He'd figured out the rhythm, and he was moving. His jean shorts looked tight from this angle, hugging all the right places. Daniel felt his face flush. Okay, maybe too much staring.

Johnny shifted to the other side, settling down to start on a new section. The sun hit his hair just right to make it look golden. He looked like he stepped out of a magazine, or one of those calendars the local fire department sold every year in Newark. The one his mother's friend bought and hung up with a laugh saying it was for a good cause, the one Daniel had sneaked peeks at checking out all the months and flushing red with each turned page.

It took more effort than Daniel wanted to admit to pull his eyes off of Johnny and keep them off. He looked at a cloud and then his eyes were drawn back, watching the muscles of Johnny's arms work, as his fingers brushed his lips, distracted as he tried to find one of the nails between them, as he brushed a bit of sweat from his brow onto the back of his hand.

He forced his eyes down, past the roof and at the dark house. Where was Mr. Miyagi? He needed to find the man. He needed to be saved from himself before he did something stupid like call out to Johnny. With Daniel's luck, he'd tell him he looked like a guy who belonged on a calendar. And if anything Daniel ever said warranted a black eye, that did. There was no way Johnny would take that as a compliment and the unsteady shift of their relationship would surely crumble. Daniel wasn't ready for that. He'd already promised himself he'd help get Johnny back up on his feet. Get a warm smile on the boy's face.

And first, he needed to stop ogling. The boy sure did glisten in the morning sun. Since when were tank tops practically obscene? Stop Daniel. Look away. What is wrong with you? Find Mr. Miyagi. If you say anything to Johnny there's a good chance he'll fall off the roof, and then where would you be? Taking care of him? Nursing him back to health? That's a stupid idea. Mr. Miyagi. Find Mr. Miyagi. One step in front of the other. Good.

Mr. Miyagi was in his house, reading the paper with his glasses low on his nose.

"See Johny-san?" Mr. Miyagi asked.

"Yes," Daniel said. It came out squeakier than he meant. His skin still felt warm.

"Fixing roof. Then we go to beach. Work on balance more."

Daniel frowned. Working on balance more meant trying to stand in the ocean while the waves crashed down on him. He hated it. He was pretty sure Mr. Miyagi just delighted in watching him fall over. The only plus was that most likely Johnny would also fall over and collapse in the waters drinking a mouthful of saltwater. That would be fun to see. Though now he was thinking of roof Johnny, flicking water out of his hair in the sparkling ocean waves, tank top practically see-through and clinging, and he really did need to get a grip.

He sat in the house drinking tea and listening to the quiet hammering Johnny was doing, while Mr. Miyagi read the paper. He ate some of the snacks Mr. Miyagi had and then after a while the hammering stopped. Mr. Miyagi folded his paper and headed outside. To be honest with himself it was nice to be on this side of the chores. Watching Mr. Miyagi go outside and hmm over the work done, compliment, and then find something else that needed to be done. In this case, it was all done. It seemed Daniel had missed that step, the other drop of the shoe that oh, there was more that needed work. Something he'd missed. He watched Johnny come down carefully off the ladder and put it away as Mr. Miyagi came back in. Soon Johnny came as well. He'd dried off with a towel that hung around his neck. His gaze met Daniels.

"Hi," Daniel said, trying to be as nonchalant as possible.

"Hey," Johnny said, taking the glass of water from Mr. Miyagi who looked between the two of them for a moment.

"Let's go," Mr. Miyagi said and heading to the truck.

Daniel didn't know why he'd expected them to take his Ford. It just made more sense to him, there was a back seat. Or the Avanti which also had a back seat. But before he knew it he was standing outside the truck with Johnny while Mr. Miyagi waited with the passenger door open. It was a squeeze with Mr. Miyagi handing the keys over to Daniel and with Johnny sitting in the middle between them. Johnny stared out at the Avanti in the lot like he too was wondering why they were all crammed into the truck but he didn't ask the question. Chicken. So Daniel would have to do it.

"Mr. Miyagi, wouldn't you be more comfortable in the Ford? If all three of us are going together shouldn't we-"

Mr. Miyagi shook his head. "Truck is better."

Daniel wasn't so sure about that but stuck the keys in the ignition. Johnny probably was regretting his decision to come by Mr. Miyagi's, crammed between the two of them like they were scared he was going to run. He wasn't even sure Mr. Miyagi had said why they were going to the beach to Johnny. Yet Mr. Miyagi said go and he went. Daniel didn't know whether it was sweet or some of that unquestioning obedience leftover from Kreese.

Daniel could feel Johnny's bare warm arm against his arm, his thigh against Daniel's. Daniel reached over for the stick shift and realized just how awkward this drive was going to be. Johnny had long legs and was as pressed against the seat as far as he could go but there was no escape from the fact the stick shift was between his legs. Daniel could still maneuver it, it just meant his forearm would brush against Johnny's thigh, a lot, on the drive to the beach.

He snuck a quick glance at Johnny through the mirror. He was tomato red. It wasn't the red of anger, but embarrassment. Daniel moved it, arm brushing the warm skin, his heart pounding in his ears, they moved forward. This was going to be a long ride and torture. Johnny couldn't retaliate without them possibly dying. He was trapped. If this pissed him off they were screwed.

Because of the shorts, he kept brushing skin every time he had to reach over and Johnny was tense at his side. Stiff as a board, leg muscles taut. Daniel wanted to laugh. Only he would ever find himself in this situation where he had to keep reaching between Johnny's legs for a purely non-sexual reason. It was absolutely ridiculous. Like he was trying to steal cheese off of a set mousetrap. It was too much. He was going to die. They'd get to the beach and Johnny would murder him as soon as Mr. Miyagi's back was turned.

It wasn't until after he parked, his fingers brushing against Johnny's thigh one last time, and he hopped out of the truck that he realized how tense he'd been, how he'd been holding his breath. He kept expecting it to be too much for Johnny, too much indignation would just explode like a shaken soda bottle. Too much of being close to Daniel, the unmanliness of the situation, but Johnny didn't snap. He didn't explode. They'd made it safely to the beach and Johnny quickly escaped the car as soon as space freed up. He didn't grab Daniel's shirt full of anger or rage, like he'd expected. Just stood, face pink, waiting to hear what Mr. Miyagi had to say.

Mr. Miyagi explained the exercise, standing in the water, trying to stay up, how it was good balance and great for a hot day, and then he walked around to the back of the truck and grabbed a tackle box and fishing rod. Oh, so that's why we took the truck. Of course. He wanted to go fishing. Daniel wanted to tell Johnny, explain again Mr. Miyagi's love for fishing was why he'd suffered the ride over, but Johnny was gone, had taken off towards the water, shoes discarded along the way. It felt like a challenge. Like the ready set, go had been shouted and Daniel had been distracted and hadn't noticed. He raced after Johnny, hopping out of his shoes and tossing them next to Johnny's before hurrying into the cool waves.

The shock of the water sent all the warmth from his skin packing. The flush he was sure that probably wasn't noticeable retreated and he found himself hopping after Johnny, struggling as waves crashed against his legs. Johnny was turning to face him and a wave rocked against him and he stayed standing. Unfair. Daniel thought. The first time he'd come the waves had knocked him on his ass before he'd even found a spot to try and root himself. But this time Daniel would show off. He'd show Johnny how good he was. It'd be like a mechanical bull, both of them would be thrown off eventually, but Daniel would make sure it'd be Johnny first. Show him what studying under Mr. Miyagi was like. A sort of laugh bubbled in his throat, excited to watch Johnny face plant into the ocean and come up sputtering but determined to do better next time, the way Daniel had. Daniel turned his back to the water and stood next to Johnny.

He searched the beach and spotted Mr. Miyagi setting up a ways away with his hat on, casting off with an air of pure calm. Daniel turned his gaze back forward as the waves crashed against him. The ebb and flow. Johnny was standing tall and it was like he was on land. The waves weren't moving him. Was it because he was taller? Because he had more muscles? Daniel didn't know what it was but it was pissing him off. He was struggling to keep a look of calm on his own face, struggling to remember to just breathe and not grit his teeth and dig his toes in the slippery wet sand as waves tried to knock him over.

Mr. Miyagi's karate was focused on balance and defense, whatever Cobra Kai taught Johnny shouldn't have been applicable. This was something Daniel was supposed to be better at than Johnny, but of course, tall beautiful blonde Johnny wasn't even wobbling. Daniel wondered if it'd be unsportsmanlike to try and spar with Johnny in the ocean. If he could knock Johnny's legs out from under him and pretend that he hadn't done anything. It was like spending all your allowance trying to dunk someone at the carnival dunk tank and striking out. Daniel had been looking forward to this since Mr. Miyagi had first hinted at it. This was his dojo, his chance to be intimidating and the better student. It was where Daniel was supposed to stand out and shine in the spotlight.

But Johnny was standing effortlessly in the water and Daniel stumbled with that last wave. He cursed quietly and tried to focus on his breathing, he was getting too riled up by how Johnny looked, how smug he seemed. It was for sure a challenge, a little battle, and Daniel went under. He came up pissed because Johnny was helping him up and of course Johnny was laughing at him, he was always laughing at Daniel. Nothing Daniel did was right. He picked the wrong girl to flirt with on the beach, he picked the wrong dojo to check out, went to the wrong school, and was always put in Johnny's crosshairs against his own wishes. He pushed Johnny away storming the beach, blood boiling. Johnny made his life miserable and couldn't even have the decency to fall over. He "had to be so damn perfect all the time," and oh shit he was talking aloud.

"LaRusso," Johnny said quietly, following after Daniel.

Daniel whirled pushing him hard, his foot slipping in the sand, and they landed together on the beach, the waves only sliding up to Johnny's waist.

"What the hell?" Daniel said, pushing himself up. "If you're so damn smug then what's your problem? Are you just holding it all in? Are we going to fight? I'm tired of you making fun of me. I'm tired of that look on your face, always laughing at me." His hand was on Johnny's wet tank top, twisting it in his hand, sitting on him while Johnny lay on the sand looking up at him.

Johnny's face was infuriatingly calm. That damn mask. He'd done it at school too many times for Daniel to count, riled him up, and then when a teacher came was suddenly totally fine. Well, there were no teachers here.

Johnny lifted his hand, Daniel waited, tense and ready for the blow. Daniel would win this time, he'd take whatever Johnny gave him and give him it back a thousand times worse, and then Mr. Miyagi would see, some snakes never change.

"Here, you can tell Mr. Miyagi I hit you first," he said.

Daniel was ready, all coiled up and prepared for the fight. Johnny's hand gently tapped Daniel's cheek, more of a pat to the face than a smack and then he dropped his hand and closed his eyes, bracing for the punch. When it didn't come he opened his blue eyes. Daniel was still furious. His hand balled into a fist. He slammed his fist down into the sand next to Johnny's head.

"What's wrong with you?" Daniel asked. "Are you making fun of me?

Won't fight me anymore? Why because your suddenly too good to fight the champion? Because I'm not good enough? Do you think it was a fluke that I won? What the hell Johnny?"

"LaRusso, do you want to talk or do you want to hit me?" Johnny asked.

Daniel frowned. Johnny wasn't going to fight him. He was just going to take the hits like he felt he was due a few. He was dripping saltwater, soaked, and Johnny was still dry from his shoulders up but was getting wet now from Daniel dripping onto him. Daniel didn't know what to say, his tongue felt leaden, he was so furious. Where was the Johnny he'd fought all school year long? The one who made fun of him at every turn? Did he just pop up to aggravate him and then hide away again? None of this was fair. His hand gripping Johnny's shirt was shaking, Daniel realized he was shaking, he didn't know how to direct his anger, didn't know how to deal with this. Johnny was the enemy and yet he wasn't doing anything except having the same stupid face he always had.

"You're from New Jersey and you've been doing karate for less than a year," Johnny said slowly, cautiously like feeling out a frozen-over lake in winter unsure whether it'd crack and he'd fall through. "I've been doing it for over five years and I've lived in California my whole life."

"What's that have to do with anything?" Daniel demanded, those stupid blue eyes, those stupid lips.

"Balance isn't the core belief of Cobra Kai, but I still had to learn it. Kreese made sure we could continue standing despite constant blows. I grew up around here...so I've stood around in the ocean a lot, did so all the time as a kid. Sometimes it was..." Johnny trailed off and then closed his eyes, taking a deep breath. "Sometimes it was easier to have salt-crusted skin and clothes than sweaty, and dirty clothes." He paused again. "I spent a lot of time, running into the water to clean up, then using the beach showers to wash off the salt because it was all I had access to."

He wasn't looking at Daniel. Not being able to see his eyes, trying to figure out what he was hiding from him was somehow so much worse, the implications made Daniel's stomach churn.

"So I learned how to not get knocked down by the waves unless I wanted to really early on. And when Mom and Sid married one of the many things I tried to do was surf. The board...survived about a year."

Johnny was tense underneath Daniel. Daniel's hand relaxed and just rested on Johnny's chest. Johnny's blue eyes flicked open again, looking up at Daniel.

"Less than a year of training and you're still doing so well. You should be proud of your progress and how you're doing. You shouldn't compare yourself to me in this case, you should stop doing that. It's not balanced. I've got over four years more training than you've had a chance or access to as well as home-field advantage. It's not because you're not good, it's just that this is second nature." Johnny fell silent for a beat then frowned. "That doesn't help does it?" Johnny asked. "It sounds conceited like I'm trying to start a fight. I'm not. I really am not trying to start anything. It's just you should really be happy with your own progress. You're doing great. I'm impressed." Johnny sighed when Daniel didn't respond and covered his face with his hands. "I don't know what to say, Daniel, nothing I say isn't going to sound awful to your ears after so long of it being actually awful."

Daniel. He called me by my actual name. Daniel felt his ears burn. It felt too intimate all of a sudden. He had a girlfriend for crying out loud but here he was on the beach sitting on Johnny, throwing a tantrum about the fact he embarrassed himself in front of him and Johnny was trying his best to be helpful but Daniel couldn't not misconstrue his every action and facial expression. He was so used to a fight existing or bubbling up that he was seeing them where there were none.

"If you don't want me around, I can catch a cab home. I don't want to make this worse."

Daniel pulled Johnny's hands from his face. He couldn't help himself. Johnny sounded so miserable. He couldn't let Johnny just take a cab home. He'd never be able to face Mr. Miyagi again. Mr. Miyagi was trying to teach him patience and kindness and all the stuff he wished his dad was still around to teach him.

"I thought you were laughing at me."

"Your face was funny," Johnny admitted with a frown. "You looked like you were going to try and challenge the waves to a fight. I expected you to start yelling at them. But it wasn't-"

"The same as before," Daniel said with a sigh, running a hand through his wet hair. "I keep thinking I've figured it out and then, bam I think you're making fun of me, or the same as before, and then it gets under my skin and I feel like I've dragged us straight back to square one."

"It's f-"

"Don't you dare say it's fine," Daniel interrupted. "You're trying, right?"

Johnny nodded, his hair was full of sand at this point, his wet clothes were probably caked in it.

"The person I want to be is a person Mr. Miyagi can be proud of. And Mr. Miyagi would not be proud of me right now. It's so slow. I want everything to be better faster. But there's no quick fix no matter how desperately I want there to be one. I mean just one look and it set me off. And yeah it sucks, but you're right, I keep forgetting you've been doing this longer and I was...learning quickly and desperately. Though I think my karate is better than yours," Daniel said.

He felt a tremor underneath him, the challenge had hit, ever so minutely Johnny had taken what he said as an offense. But nothing in his face changed.

"I'm teasing," Daniel elaborated. "Sort of. Mr. Miyagi's karate is amazing. But I think it'll be a while before teasing doesn't come off as fighting words for either of us. There's too much already between us for us to just snap into being friends. Or friendly acquaintances. Allies? Whatever. We were like mortal enemies. Or at least it kind of felt like that. Like I was a mouse you were playing with, trying to eat or something more messed up. But." Daniel rested his hand in front of him on Johnny's chest. "I'd like things to be better, I think we just have to be patient you know? It's the whole balance thing Mr. Miyagi was talking about. He says you need to have balance in your life too, not just in karate and maybe we can balance each other out or something. Could end up being pretty cool."

Johnny was watching him, his blue eyes were stunning, there was something about being under the vast blue sky that made them so much more colorful. Lately, he always looked like he was listening to every word Daniel said. No one listened to everything Daniel said. Mr. Miyagi sifted through it like he was an old prospector searching for gold to figure out what Daniel was actually getting at. His mother listened if it was important but a lot of his conversation she just let roll right off of her. She was too used to it. He liked being listened to. He liked having those eyes on him like he was on a stage under a spotlight. And Johnny's lips looked soft. Daniel had a strong urged to lean down and kiss him. You have a girlfriend, get a grip Daniel. He wasn't that kind of boy. Not one to cheat on his girlfriend with an ex-rival. He realized he'd leaned forward a little and pushed himself back.

"LaRusso?" Johnny asked quietly.

"Huh?"

"How long are we going to just sit here with your hand on my chest?"

Daniel glanced down at his hand. It was on Johnny's pec. If Johnny was a girl he would've been slapped so hard his head would've spun.

"I thought your chest would've been pure muscle. It's soft," Daniel said, then realized he'd said it aloud and quickly pulled his hand away like he was burnt and scrambled up.

"Only when I flex. I also only have a six-pack when I flex," Johnny said sitting up.

Daniel didn't know what to do with this information. It was too much. He rushed back towards the water, his face burning. This wasn't good. Knowing his subconscious this tidbit was going to mess with him. The worst part was that he wanted to touch Johnny's chest again, curious what would happen if he gave it a squeeze. He dove into the waves. He couldn't believe he'd said it aloud. Couldn't believe a lot of things about himself. He stood up again, took a deep breath. If ever there was a time for Mr. Miyagi's meditation and breathing techniques it was now. He needed to get ahold of himself.

He stood up and breathed feeling the water try to push and pull him. He rooted his feet into the sand and breathed in through his nose with the tide and out through his mouth. He kept his eyes shut. It helped. Eventually, the pounding of his heart calmed and he opened his eyes. Johnny wasn't on the beach anymore. He didn't know why but he'd expected the boy to be propped up on the sand watching him with those piercing eyes from where Daniel had left him.

He scanned the shores and saw Mr. Miyagi pulling in a fish that he then put in a cooler. Daniel smiled, at least Mr. Miyagi was catching fish. That made Mr. Miyagi happy which in turn made Daniel happy. Daniel stayed standing longer this time without Johnny by his side. If he just focused on himself and didn't make it a competition then he was fine. That was probably the whole point. While this was a test to see where Johnny was, for Daniel this was probably a chance to realize that Johnny was just another kid with his own issues and that they could work in harmony if they didn't compete. That however would be a never-ending battle.

Daniel felt like he and Johnny could compete over sharpening pencils or something else as utterly ridiculous. And Daniel had to admit he missed that. So much work needed to be done. It was like all the bones had been removed from Johnny and he had to figure out which one went where so he'd prop himself up again and they could just be competitive friends. His cousin got that way. Louie and his best friend could turn anything into a competition but they always had a blast and Daniel wondered if maybe one day that could be him and Johnny. First, though Johnny had to get back to his old self, well a version of himself, Daniel guessed. He didn't want Johnny terrorizing him, but he didn't want him moping either. He wanted to see Johnny smile more, to smirk and laugh and tease but without it sending Daniel into rage or fear. And that would require Daniel to be more balanced. He didn't know how Mr. Miyagi did it. But he always gave Daniel the right thing to do at the right time.

Chapter End Notes

You ever like just have a ton of random knowledge about something that you didn't actually seek out? I've learned a lot of random stuff about muscles lately because it just filters onto my tumblr feed. But a lot of it surprised me that shouldn't have like, of course, muscles aren't hard all the time, I mean I can flex and my arm will be stiff but then relaxed it's not. But I didn't really think it fit with muscle-y people until I started reading about it. I thought they just always looked like that, like in action films. But I also learned that a lot of the times to get that look actors dehydrate themselves which is super dangerous and that six-packs aren't always visible (depends on the person) unless people flex which leads to a lot of people being disheartened that they don't look a specific way because of the way it's showcased in films and magazines.

Here's a source from men's health about it how actors dehydrate themselves for action films (pretty sure the guy from Witcher talked about this too somewhere): https://www.menshealth.com/uk/building-muscle/a757464/why-dehydrating-your-body-to-look-good-is-dangerous/

Anyway, thus the soft pec when not flexed. Thanks for reading.

Drink some water. (Also a note to myself to drink water.)

Escape Route Needed

Johnny watched Daniel disappear under the waves and found a different spot to stand and balance. He'd been so full of hope and he'd allowed himself to dream, he'd thought maybe this could lead to karate and then to sparring. Something he'd always liked to do with his fellow cobras. But clearly, they weren't there. They might never get there and it might just be better to let that dream go. Let the tide carry it out and away.

He dipped himself in the water to clear sand out of his hair and off of his clothes and he felt like a kid again. How many times when they were living out of his mother's car had he come running into the ocean because he was dirty? How many times after his mother and Sid had married had he snuck off on his way home from school to get rid of the mud on his clothes from the older kids, or the one time he'd desperately tried to get the gum out of his hair.

He'd used to believe what his mother had told him the first time she'd brought him to essentially bathe in the sea. That it could wash away every bad thing. But it turned out it didn't work on gum. He'd end up cutting it out of his hair and his Mom wordlessly took him for a haircut. Sid had laughed.

Daniel wasn't falling often Johnny noticed. Clearly being near had thrown him off. Gotten in his head and under his skin. Johnny stood carefully and quietly. He'd hoped the waves would wash away the lingering feeling of where Daniel had touched him. The weight of him, the hand on his chest, the fingers that kept touching his thigh every time Daniel had shifted gears. Johnny wasn't sure if he'd survive the drive back.

Part of him had been desperate, hoping Daniel would tell him to pack up and go home, thinking it'd be the perfect excuse to get out of sitting with the gear shift between his legs and Daniel touching him the entire drive back to Mr. Miyagi's. Clearly, no one was making a big deal about it, except for Johnny. He felt like he was going to fall apart, squeezed between the two of them in the truck. Mr. Miyagi had taken up more space than Johnny ever thought possible, pushing him up against Daniel who didn't make any big deal out of it and all Johnny could hear the entire ride was his heart pounding rapidly in his chest and the gentle whispers of Daniel's fingertips and palm brushing against his thigh.

Johnny breathed. He could handle this. He shifted his feet in the sand and stood firmly. Daniel was moving through the water, hands moving slowly like he was dancing. Kata, it had to be a type of kata. It was beautiful. The sun was glittering off the waves. There wasn't a single hiccup or falter. Just graceful movements through the water. It had clearly all been Johnny. He wound Daniel up too much. The history couldn't be ignored and even though Daniel's face had been funny, it had clearly set him off and Johnny would have to work on that. He hadn't thought Daniel had noticed the smile on his face. He'd thought he'd mastered the neutral look but apparently, it'd broken through more than he'd thought.

After a while, he saw Mr. Miyagi walk along the sandy beach in front of them holding out a large towel. Johnny watched Daniel hop out of the waters and straight into the towel, almost like a little kid out of the bath. Johnny moved slowly through the water towards shore and stood dripping nearby. It was a big towel, almost like a blanket, Daniel was all wrapped up in it but Mr. Miyagi was looking at Johnny expectantly with a warm smile. That was too close. Mr. Miyagi had to realize that right? Yes, the towel was ridiculous and could cover both of them, but getting all up in Daniel's space again so soon was a terrible idea.

"Johnny-san, dry off and we go," Mr. Miyagi said.

Johnny took an obedient but tentative step forward. Mr. Miyagi threw the other side over him and wrapped him in the towel. He found himself chest to chest with Daniel who was staring at him. Johnny couldn't place the look. Did he look ridiculous? Had his hair done something weird after he'd dipped under the surface? Was it because they were too close? Was it because it seemed like Mr. Miyagi thought they were five-year-old boys who'd gotten into an argument over who ate the last cookie and not two teenage boys dripping wet and being forced to share a towel that trapped the humid heat of their wet skin and clothes. They turned and walked back up to the car and Johnny moved slowly and carefully not wanting to rush Daniel and worried about his knee with the uneven sand.

Daniel hadn't come to school in crutches or a boot or a wheelchair, all things Johnny had dreaded. He barely limped. But Johnny remembered Bobby's ashen face when he came back after their fight saying he'd heard a crack. The sound Daniel had made when Johnny swept his leg haunted him, and when he thought Daniel wasn't looking he kept an eye on his gait, wondering if he'd made a miraculous recovery or was just hiding, like the way Johnny had hidden many injuries in the past. They climbed into the car, Johnny once again crammed between the two of them, feeling too large for the space. He looked at Daniel's knee and frowned, there wasn't any bruising or discoloration, it wasn't swollen. Daniel's hand found its way to the stick shift and moved the truck into reverse to pull away and again to drive. The question bubbled up as Daniel's hand brushed Johnny's knee.

"Is your knee okay?" Johnny asked voice tight.

Daniel glanced at him and barked a humorless laugh, "What, you going to carry me around if I say it bothers me? Suddenly switch over to being a protector? Going to wait on me hand and foot out of guilt?"

"Daniel-san," Mr. Miyagi said a soft warning in his voice.

"Yes," Johnny said quickly. He'd been helping Mr. Miyagi as payback, but he hadn't done anything for Daniel yet. "If you want. I can."

Daniel's eyes flicked over. "You're serious? Listen it hasn't bothered me much, Mr. Miyagi took care of it."

"You didn't go to the hospital?" Johnny asked incredulously. Mr. Miyagi might be amazing but that didn't replace an x-ray.

"No."

"But we might've broken or fractured something," Johnny said.

"It's fine."

"It's not fine. What if all of this is just making it worse?"

Daniel huffed. "It barely bothers me, you're overreacting."

"I'm not, Bobby, he said he thought he heard a crack," Johnny whispered. "And not the kind that happens when you crack your knuckles. The kind that means something much worse. You can fracture something and not realize it sometimes."

Daniel pulled to a stop at a stop sign and looked over at Johnny. "Seriously? It's been over a week. What good would going now do me? Or do you just want to ease your conscious with some x-rays?"

Johnny looked away and Daniel continued on. He chewed at his lip. He remembered the time he crushed a bone in his foot and he'd thought nothing of it, did nothing until the occasional pain persisted and sent him to the doctors. He couldn't remember when or how he might've hurt himself as he was getting hurt all the time so one specific instance didn't stick out to him. But the physical therapy exercises had eased the pain, made him feel better knowing.

"It helps," Johnny said softly. "To know and if something did happen, to know what to do."

"X-rays are expensive," Daniel said flatly.

"I'll pay."

Daniel was stiff at the wheel, fingers gripping it tightly. Johnny wondered if he'd said the wrong thing. It'd slipped out. He didn't know how much x-rays cost. He didn't know if he could pay for it for Daniel. He thought he could. He did get an allowance and he'd squirreled some of that away in case he ever had to go on the run. He figured cracking into that piggy bank was okay if it was to make sure he hadn't done everlasting damage to Daniel's knee. But maybe Daniel was too proud to be helped. Or maybe he wasn't too proud, he just didn't want help from Johnny.

"Johnny-san right," Mr. Miyagi said. "Better to check so not to make worse."

Daniel's lips were in a tight line, he reached over to grab the stick harshly but miscalculated and nails dug into the flesh of Johnny's thigh. Johnny didn't move, didn't make a sound, and just looked out the windshield at the road. They were getting close to Mr. Miyagi's and soon he'd be able to get into the Avanti and get home. He knew when he was hurt he usually didn't want help, especially not from someone with who he didn't get along. He'd made a mistake offering and trying to press it. He should've kept his mouth shut. Should've thought of a different approach.

They pulled into Mr. Miyagi's home, the truck fitting next to the yellow Ford, and Johnny felt antsy. He needed out of the car asap, he needed to be gone, in the front seat of the Avanti and on his way home with that little bonsai next to him. He needed to breathe in the dirt and listen to his radio. This quietness in the truck felt heavier than the heat of being shoved under a towel next to Daniel. More suffocating. Daniel's hand moved and Johnny's eyes flicked down. His thigh was bleeding, there were angry red scratch marks. Mr. Miyagi was moving slow. Daniel wasn't saying anything.

Next time Johnny decided, if there ever would be a next time, just let him sit in the back of the truck. That way he could escape, jump over the back, and bolt before he made a fool of himself. The door on Mr. Miyagi's side was opening, Daniel was grimacing, his eyes had slipped down to Johnny's thigh where blood had started to run and Johnny quickly shifted towards Mr. Miyagi, pulling the edge of his shorts down. It didn't do anything, but it'd seemed worth the try to try and cover up the scratches. Mr. Miyagi was finally making his way to the back of the truck to get his fishing equipment out and Johnny was out of the truck.

"Thank you Mr. Miyagi, let me know if you need any more help sometime," Johnny said hurrying over to the Avanti and opening the car door. "Have a good evening."

He'd left the keys in the car because who would even think of stealing his babies while he was here? The bonsai was sitting patiently in the passenger seat. The engine purred to life and he carefully reversed, gave a wave without making eye contact with either of them and as soon as he was past the gates he felt the tension in his shoulders relax. He was still damp and he worried about his seats but this escape was worth it. He'd deal with the damage later, he had a towel around somewhere and he could just dab everything off if he was fast enough. The sun was setting and the sky was full of color.

"Have a good day buddy?" Johnny asked the bonsai. It looked good, nice and green, leaves seemed healthy. "Good."

The Wrong Idea

Daniel sat frozen in the truck looking at the spot where Johnny had been, he'd felt his nails hit skin, harsher than he'd meant. He hadn't meant to claw Johnny but he had and the angry red marks on his thigh were proof. The guy hadn't yelled or made a fuss or anything. Just let him dig his nails into his skin. He could think of at least twenty different ways that could've gone. Johnny socking him, yelling at him, starting a fight, something to cause a wreck and kill them all, but he hadn't said a word. Hadn't made a sound.

He heard the sound of the Avanti's engine and quickly pushed the door to the truck open, heart pounding in his chest. He pushed himself out the door only to get stuck because he'd forgotten to unlatch his damn seatbelt and then he was hopping out of the truck and into the dirt and watching the Avanti speed off. He didn't even get to apologize. He didn't get to explain that he'd meant to grab the stick shift and he'd been upset and hadn't meant to hurt him.

Mr. Miyagi had his fishing gear half in and half out of the truck bed and his eyes slowly left the empty gate and turned towards Daniel. Guilt settled like a lump and then flames of indignation rose up. Why should he have to feel guilty? Johnny was the one trying to put his own guilt to rest by buying his way out of Daniel's life. And Johnny had hurt Daniel worse, more frequently. Johnny was built like a fighting machine, it wasn't fair to compare the two. It wasn't fair to have pitted them against each other.

"Johnny-san trying to help," Mr. Miyagi said.

"What if I don't want his help?" Daniel snapped. He hadn't meant to and he quickly folded his arms over his chest and looked away. "Sorry Mr. Miyagi I just, I don't trust him. What if all of this is a trick? All this nice helpful Johnny?"

Mr. Miyagi took the fishing gear out of the back of his truck and headed towards the house. "Daniel-san, if think everyone is always bad without change then life will be sad and difficult. No one can make mistake and learn. One Strike and out."

Daniel frowned and hurried after Mr. Miyagi. "But Mr. Miyagi what if my gut feeling is right? I should trust my gut right?"

Mr. Miyagi set his things down and tapped Daniel's stomach with his cooler of fish. "What if wrong? What if misguided by anger?"

He slipped out of his shoes and stepped inside.

Daniel frowned. His mother had been begging him to get his knee looked at since the tournament had ended. Her eyes were always filled with worry and Daniel had brushed it off again and again telling her he was fine, Mr. Miyagi had worked some magic. She always responded sharply that it couldn't hurt and then Daniel would remind her how expensive x-rays were. It went around and around and around in circles until Daniel felt sick and locked himself in his room. If Johnny paid for it, then he lost his argument with his mother. She'd make him go anyway, immediately take Johnny up on it because she felt they were owed it.

After all, she mumbled around the apartment about how they were lucky they weren't the suing types. Though Daniel knew it was more likely because he was injured in a competition he signed a waiver for and had entered willingly. It'd probably be thrown out. Plus would they actually sue Johnny or Bobby in that situation or his dojo? Would they sue Kreese? Or would they sue the tournament? A tournament he won. Plus they couldn't afford the legal council. It was another argument that had gone around and around and around. If he went home and offered her this maybe she'd calm down. Maybe her eyes wouldn't be filled with so much worry and she'd stop smothering him. And then maybe Johnny would stop treating him like he was made out of glass. But he didn't know what to say.

The door slid open and Mr. Miyagi came out, holding up a shirt.

"Johnny-san forgot, you go take him," he said pressing the soft cloth into Daniel's hands.

"But Mr. Miyagi," Daniel protested but the look in Mr. Miyagi's eyes quelled the rest of his sentence.

He was worried. The way Johnny came to help then would run away. Mr. Miyagi was so determined that Johnny was just a lost scared boy, the way Daniel had been. The only difference was Daniel was loud when he was upset, crying about how much he hated being in Reseda and California and taken from home and his stupid bike. Johnny just took his licks and then escaped. And Mr. Miyagi being Mr. Miyagi wasn't comfortable with letting that be. Clearly one of them had to check in on Johnny and it couldn't be Mr. Miyagi. There was a pointedness to the silence. Make sure he's alright.

"Okay Mr. Miyagi," Daniel said. "I'll take it right away."

Mr. Miyagi nodded his head in approval and then dipped back into the house. Daniel groaned burying his head in his hands, why him? Why was it always him? He got a strong smell of Johnny. The shirt was soft against his face and up close the smell didn't trigger his fight or flight response like he would've assumed. It didn't smell bad, the cologne he used. Probably something stupidly expensive. He hopped off the steps of Mr. Miyagi's house grumbling to himself about rich kids, and mostly about Johnny specifically and how stupid of a drive it was and being unable to keep a watch on his own things, what was he a five year old?

The drive to Johnny's house went by too fast and Daniel felt his heart pound, the closer he got the more panicked as realization hit. He'd have to deal with everything. The awkwardness to try to get to Johnny and his room without interacting with the staff, without running into Sid. His mouth went dry and he pulled the Ford outside the gate and parked it. He didn't know how he was going to get in. He saw a dirt bike pull to a stop in front of him and park and a boy get off and shake shaggy hair out of his helmet. He turned and squinted at the yellow Ford and his eyes widened and he came over in a jog. Daniel felt himself panic, his skin got cold and clammy and his fingers curled into a fist around Johnny's shirt.

"I thought that was you," Bobby said.

Daniel had left the window down like some stupid girl in a bad horror movie and it was too late to put it up. Bobby was leaning over it.

"Man, this is a cool ride."

"Thanks," Daniel said.

He hadn't really interacted with any of the ex-cobra's other than Johnny since the tournament and Johnny's words were bowling around in his head, Bobby, he said he thought he heard a crack. His hand went to cover his knee, taking Johnny's shirt with it like it was some kind of shield against Bobby. He remembered the pain. It'd been excruciating.

"You here to see Johnny?" Bobby asked.

Daniel nodded, not trusting himself to speak.

"If you haven't been here before there's a trick to it. You can't go in the front door. His step-dad's got the place messed up. You can't ask for Johnny. Or else you'll get this garbage spiel he makes all of the staff say when someone mentions Johnny. There's a back way, want me to show you?" Bobby asked.

Daniel didn't want to go with Bobby, he wanted to run, but Mr. Miyagi had been clear. He swallowed and took a breath then nodded again.

"Cool, your car's fine here. Just lock it up and follow me," Bobby said stepping away from the Ford.

Daniel turned off the engine and got out, locking the car and slipping the keys into his pocket. He was worrying the fabric of Johnny's shirt, it was so soft. He held it tightly in his hand. Bobby glanced at him before heading off around the corner. He pushed on a bit of the fence and it broke off like sawed-off jail bars and he climbed through then turned and waited for Daniel. Daniel followed.

It was getting dark out and the grass looked strange in the darkness. Bobby put the bars back when Daniel was through and hurried across the lawn passed an enormous pool filled with water glittering in the dim light to a back door that he pushed open. Daniel followed him into the house and through the hall up a narrow staircase and then into a hall that looked vaguely familiar. Bobby walked like he knew his way around. He stopped at a door and looked back at Daniel.

"Hey," Bobby said, hands on the doorknob, voice soft. "I'm sorry about your leg and all the shit we did last semester."

Daniel didn't know what to say and Bobby didn't give him a chance, pushing the door open and hurrying in, pulling Daniel along with him. It was that same cologne, it hit like a wave. He'd noticed it the first time but after sticking his face in Johnny's shirt it was more prevalent now. Daniel was pretty sure he'd be able to pick it up out of a collection of smells now. Johnny was sitting on his bed, eyes closed listening to his Walkman. The bonsai was on his desk. There were more books on his desk than last time. Books about World war 2, Okinawa, and a book about the internment camps.

"Damn, did he get a new girl? Or get in a very weird fight with a cat?" Bobby asked.

Daniel tore his gaze off the books and looked at Johnny.

He'd cleaned up the scratches but they were still an angry red and along his inner thigh up to the top of his thigh. Daniel flushed. From an outside perspective the location was intimate, though Daniel wasn't sure how exactly and was trying to curb his brain from going down that path. Bobby flopped down on the bed next to Johnny and Johnny's eyes snapping open and his hand jumping to his ear to pull the headphone away and look over at Bobby.

"Hey," Johnny said tension fading away.

"I come bearing gifts," Bobby said opening his jacket and pulling out a plastic container, it was full of cookies.

He popped it open and the sweet smell wafted through the air. Bobby then motioned to Daniel and Johnny who'd half reached out for a cookie stopped and his eyes slid over to Daniel, realizing it wasn't just Bobby in his room. The tension returned to his shoulders. Daniel walked across the room and sat down on the edge of the bed, trying to be as casual about it as Bobby had been and tossed the shirt at Johnny's face.

"You forgot this," he said.

It slipped out of his mouth before he realized the implication, before he saw the look on Bobby's face, eyes darting from Johnny to Daniel and then down at Johnny's thigh and back at Daniel.

"Thanks," Johnny said softly.

He threw the shirt into the laundry basket to the side of the room and it went in. Daniel felt a twinge of regret that he pushed down.

"I'm going to take you up on your offer," Daniel continued trying to ignore the look on Bobby's face, the way his eyes were wide and the way his mouth hung open. "When's good?"

"Anytime you want," Johnny said after a moment of hesitation. "I'm at your disposal."

Damn. Bobby was going to get the wrong idea. But Daniel couldn't explain it now, there were too many pieces. He tried to think of what he knew of hospitals and doctors' offices and realized his mother handled all of that.

"You pick the place and time," Daniel said.

If Johnny wanted to be of help he could do all the grunt work. He realized with a sinking feeling that Johnny probably didn't have his number so he leaned over and grabbed a notebook off the desk and a pen and wrote his number down. He could feel both of their eyes on him as he did so. He handed the notebook over to Johnny then reached over and snagged one of the cookies.

"Call me and pick me up," he said then stood.

"Okay," Johnny said looking at the number on his notebook like he was checking over a math problem for an error. He glanced up and Daniel met his eyes.

"Sorry about scratching you," Daniel said. "Didn't mean to."

"It's nothing," Johnny said.

Daniel nodded and gave a short wave before hurrying out the door. He shut it behind them and leaned against it with a sigh. It seemed so easy. Mr. Miyagi made everything seem so damn easy but it never was. He took a bite out of the cookie. Homemade chocolate chip. It was good.

"Are you fucking or fighting LaRusso?" Bobby asked and Daniel nearly choked on the cookie.

He knew Bobby had gotten the wrong idea, he just hadn't expected him to be so blunt.

"I'm taking him to get his knee looked at. You know the one you and I probably damaged?" Johnny said.

"Oh," Bobby said. "Isn't Tommy's uncle a doctor? What about him?"

"I don't think Daniel would be comfortable with someone related to any of us. I'll call around," Johnny said.

Daniel felt his heart pound and a shiver his spine at the sound of his name. He pushed away from the door and hurried out the path Bobby had showed him, his face feeling hot. The air outside was only just barely refreshingly cooler and he hurried towards the spot in the gate, staring at it in the dark trying to remember which piece came loose. He had to try several before finding it and hurrying to the Ford. His mother was going to be so relieved. And maybe Mr. Miyagi was right, maybe this was a good thing. Maybe the Johnny that said his name softly like it was a precious thing was who Mr. Miyagi saw beneath the surface.

A Taste of Memories

He'd asked around and according to everyone he spoke with, Dr. Fletcher, was the best orthopedic doctor in the area. She'd won awards and he could see them, displayed proudly about the office, glittering in the sunlight. She was also booked solid so it had taken a lot to figure out his in. Turned out like in old societies and children's shows sometimes bartering works out. She was a big fan of the band the Police so Johnny had asked around, traded things like an old signed baseball Sid had given him as a gift after forgetting his birthday again and that he didn't really like baseball or at least not that team, for a signed record collection to a signed guitar from the Police.

"At least you're taking responsibility," she sighed holding out her hand for it.

Johnny handed it over and she held it gingerly in her hands, scrutinizing the signature and studying it the way Sid studied bottles of wine at the country club, trying to tell if they were really as good quality as promised. Like he, a guy who worked in television knew better than the sommelier. She set it gently down against the wall in her office and turned back taking a bite of her salad and turning to flip through a calendar on her desk. She studied it for several minutes, flipping between pages, "Bring him and a guardian for him at 8 am on Sunday, we're not normally open but it's the only time I'm free."

"Yes ma'am," Johnny said. "Thank you Dr. Fletcher."

"Don't thank me yet," she said. "Who knows what you did to this boy's leg." She opened a drawer and pulled out some forms. "To make things go smoother have him and his guardian fill this out. The second page will be your information for payment, so you fill that one out, okay?"

Johnny nodded taking them in his hands and quickly leaving before she could change her mind. He called and asked Daniel if the appointment time was okay and if his mother was free to come with, relieved when he gave a curt yes, and Johnny promised to pick them up early.

On Sunday he parked the Avanti in front of the South Seas apartment complex. His palms were sweaty as he walked up the steps to apartment twenty to knock on the door. It was like the first time he'd knocked on Ali's door to pick her up for their date, concerned that her parents might open the door first.

Daniel opened the door. His mother was behind him, talking about a list of things she needed to have. Double-checking she had them aloud as she went through her purse. She glanced up at Johnny momentarily before pushing past Daniel and down the stairs towards the Avanti and Daniel locked the door. They headed to the stairs together and after a couple of steps Daniel let out a hiss of pain when he put his weight on his knee.

"I can carry you," Johnny offered, holding out a hand.

Daniel swatted at his hand. "I'm fine you oaf, I just slept wrong." He took another step and winced.

Johnny ducked low and slid himself under Daniel's arm, pulling his weight onto himself, not carrying Daniel but hopefully taking some of the pressure off. Daniel looked up at him but didn't push him away and they slowly made their way down the rest of the stairs. At the bottom, Daniel pushed him away.

"I don't want my Mom to worry," Daniel said a warning in his tone and eyes.

Johnny nodded. "I won't say anything."

They walked to the Avanti. Mrs. LaRusso was sitting in the backseat, eyeing the dashboard curiously, her purse on her lap. Daniel sunk into the passenger seat and Johnny got in, waited until everyone was buckled, and drove them to the doctor's office. Daniel was quiet. Too quiet. His mother did the talking. She'd read up on the doctor and was impressed Johnny had gotten an appointment. Her coworkers were impressed. Johnny didn't know doctors were famous enough that in whatever her line of work was they'd know about it. At the waiting room, Johnny waltzed up to the front desk and spoke softly to the receptionist. Now that they were there he felt even more nervous, he was trying to remain calm, to keep an air of ease.

He handed over the forms and the lady at the front desk nodded and called Daniel and his mother to the back to see Dr. Fletcher. Not sure what to do sat down in the waiting room as the two walked past him into the back. He flipped through magazines idly before giving up as his heart pounded nervously and frantically in his chest. Soon he'd know how bad he'd fucked up. Soon he'd know the full extent of the damage he and Bobby had done and the weight of it. They'd know whether it was permanent or if things would be okay and if they'd gotten lucky.

When he'd told Bobby what he'd offered, what he'd planned to do Bobby had looked him in the eyes, face deadly serious.

"You tell me what I can do to help," Bobby had said.

Even though Bobby had done the initial damage Johnny didn't think it was fair for him to shoulder the burden. Bobby had protested every step of the way, trying to reel Johnny in at almost every fight where Johnny went too far, trying to stop him from becoming the monster Kreese had found within him and brought to the surface. Johnny wasn't sure who he was anymore but Bobby was kinder than the rest of them. His moral compass had only slightly rusted under Kreese. He remembered Bobby protesting to Kreese so loud he thought for sure the referees heard. He remembered looking at them, unable to say anything, fearing what dissent would cause, fearing Kreese's ire.

Johnny's hands were clammy and he ran them over his jeans, pulling out his Walkman, closing his eyes, and listening to the music. Just like every time Sid started yelling, every time things got to be too much he could just disappear into the music. He'd done it ever since he was little, since his mother had given him the Walkman.

"You know how you like to listen to the radio?" she asked warmly from the driver's seat of the car in the parking lot of the awful apartment they'd had before they'd lost it. Before they'd been evicted because his mother had to choose between food and rent and she couldn't bear to see Johnny go hungry and even though Johnny had always told her he wasn't hungry his stomach always betrayed him.

He'd looked up at her and nodded. It was his favorite part of the car and the restaurant she worked at. He liked listening to the songs. Sometimes on his way to school, he'd pass a shop that sold instruments and the owner was always in there playing. He'd stop for a while and listen until he'd wasted too much time and was in danger of being late so he'd have to run the rest of the way.

"This allows you to take the songs you like with you, and create your own little bubble, a chance to escape into the music when things get too much," she'd said carefully showing him how to use the machine and then slipping the headphones over his ears.

His eyes had widened because the music was right there, it drowned out everything else and he grinned up at her and she smiled down at him. It'd been one of the gifts he'd ever gotten. She'd patted him on the knee, a motion to stay in the car that he knew. He watched her get out and walk to their landlord, their body language was all tense. They were fighting, arguing about something. Johnny closed his eyes and focused on the music quelling the panic. Everything was okay. His mother had given him this so that he could escape, so he'd be okay when things got bad.

For the longest time, he only had one cassette and he played it over and over and over again until the sound warped and got crinkly. He still had it, in a box somewhere in his room. He couldn't bring himself to throw it out even though he'd bought a replacement. It felt like a shield and to throw it out would throw out any protection he had even if it was threadbare. He'd had to replace the headphones multiple times growing up, but the machine still worked and that was the part that mattered the most.

He'd always wondered how his mother got it. They could barely afford food, let alone splurge on something like a Walkman. But he'd never dared ask. He'd tried asking once about the time before Sid, about the time they lived in their car, but Laura's face had darkened so suddenly he quickly vowed never to ask again. He vowed not to complain to her about Sid, never to tell her all the things he did or said, he'd just suck it up and be quiet. Because he knew how much she'd sacrificed for him and knew there was a lot more she probably had to suffer that she'd never tell him.

Something hit his foot and he cracked his eye open and took in Daniel. He was leaning on one crutch the other one tapping at his foot. His face was all frowns and Johnny's mouth went dry. He scrambled to turn off the music and let his headphones fall around his neck slipping the Walkman safely into his jacket pocket and standing. Mrs. LaRusso stood behind him, her face was unreadable.

"The receptionist wants to chat with you," Daniel said.

There were a million questions bubbling up in his chest and he clamped them down hurrying over to the front desk where the receptionist didn't actually talk to him just handed him the bill. It was exorbitant but feasible. He wouldn't be able to run away from home and live in the lap of luxury, but he'd still have enough money for gas out of town and a room somewhere for a month. He pulled out his checkbook, something he didn't normally carry on him, and wrote the check, carefully making sure the amount matched up between the bill and then balancing and counting the numbers in the back. He hated taking Sid's money anyway, this was a better use for it, he told himself. Plus it wasn't like he was paying for karate classes anymore or any classes.

The woman took the check and then gave him a nod. He turned and looked at the two LaRusso's. Daniel turned away from him and started swinging himself towards the door on the crutches. Johnny rushed over, opening the door. He nearly offered to carry Daniel again but was afraid the boy would slam one of those crutches into him if he opened his mouth so he kept it shut. They walked to the Avanti, the LaRusso's uncharacteristically quiet. Johnny didn't know what to do. He was dying to know, he needed to know. It must've been absolutely terrible news. He felt a little dizzy as he opened the driver's door. He must've shattered Daniel's kneecap. Busted it up like some villain mob boss in a movie. Daniel wouldn't be able to run again, not from bullies and with that big mouth of his and penchant for trouble that was a death sentence. Johnny had maimed him and Daniel would die somewhere, having pissed off some bikers or a gang. He turned to look past Mrs. LaRusso and picked up the bonsai and carefully put it in his own lap. The weight of it calmed him. The smell of the dirt and the leaves that brushed against him. He put his keys in and drove.

"Hey," Daniel said from beside him, Johnny could hear the frown in his voice. "This isn't the way back home."

"No," Johnny agreed.

"You can't just abduct us! Ma's got stuff to do today. Heck, I've got stuff to do today. Mr. Miyagi and I-"

At least he was talking again. He was getting all pissed off, but Johnny was getting used to that. It seemed no matter what Johnny did it pissed Daniel off. But the flame in him that usually rose up to meet Daniel's fighting words had been doused and stomped out. If Daniel wasn't going to tell him what the prognosis was then Johnny was going to continue on as planned but not say what the plan was. Let him stew. It wasn't like he could throw himself out of the moving car without freaking his mother out and getting even more injured. Or at least Johnny hoped. Daniel did some stupid shit. Like continuously bait Johnny when he knew Johnny's response to baiting was to kick his ass. Was. Fully past tense. It was his response.

He eased into the parking lot of the carhop. A girl in skates rolled over on roller skates as he cut the engine and Mrs. LaRusso looked around eyes wide with delight.

"I haven't seen one of these in years," she said with a grin, happily taking a menu.

"My mom always took me here after a doctor's appointment," Johnny said.

She had, usually because their ice cream was super cheap, one swirl cone for a kid was practically free. Especially when his mother told the waitress what a good boy he'd been at the doctor or dentist. They always gave her a discount when she said that and the ladies had cooed over him and sometimes brought him French fries on the house. He loved it so much he barely noticed his mother never bought anything for herself. When he got his own car and driver's license the first thing he did was drive his mom back to buy her a real lunch. They came back frequently and tried everything on the menu until they nearly got sick.

Daniel's eyes were on him as he thanked the waitress for the menu and handed one over to Daniel. Their fingers brushed and lingered for a second too long. Mrs. LaRusso was talking enthusiastically about the options on the menu. It reminded him of his mom and he wondered if he snuck her back some fries if she'd be happy or hurt that he'd taken the LaRusso's there without her.

Daniel opened the menu suspiciously, eyebrows furrowed.

Johnny knew what he wanted. He knew the menu backward and forwards. His order was simple and cliché: cheeseburger, fries, chocolate shake. In the California sun, the shake would melt before he could get it home, so he couldn't bring his mother back one. But fries, he'd done that before. It'd worked out.

He trusted his mother in his car to eat he realized suddenly but there was a chance the LaRusso's who spoke with their hands flying every which way would spill on his leather seats. He swallowed the grimace at the thought. It'd be fine. He could clean it up.

The waitress skated back with a notepad and pen ready to take their order. Johnny placed his, adding the second set of fries to take home, and then motioned to the guests in his car. Mrs. LaRusso happily asked many questions about the items on the menu, asking the waitress what her favorite was and what sold the best, and how were the onion rings? What about the shakes, did they use real stuff or the powders? Oh, what about the malts? It'd been years since she'd had a good chocolate malt. The waitress smiled patiently answering her questions and taking her order when she settled, a burger, onion rings, and chocolate malt. Johnny felt like they'd probably all order about the same thing.

The waitress skated around to the other end of the car and Johnny carefully lifted the bonsai off his lap and set it in the backseat next to Mrs. LaRusso, nearly having forgotten it was there if he hadn't noticed the look the waitress had given him as her eyes flicked down to his lap. Daniel was leaning over the side of the car towards the waitress pointing to things on the menu. He ordered a chili dog, fries and a strawberry shake then she skated off to put their orders in. Daniel sank back into his seat with a frown that was almost a pout on his lips, arms crossed.

"Why didn't you just say you were driving us somewhere for lunch?"

Saying it was to rile Daniel up more in a petty manner seemed like backsliding. Saying something like If you trusted me you wouldn't have freaked out. Also seemed the wrong thing. Countering with Well you haven't told me anything about the appointment I paid for or your knee. and how the wait to learn how bad it was felt like pure torture also seemed likely to set Daniel off. There was nothing he could say so he shrugged.

Daniel was watching him and he turned his whole body towards Johnny and uncrossed his arms. Mrs. LaRusso leaned forward from the backseat and her hand came down onto Johnny's shoulder. He flinched. He hadn't meant to, it was completely involuntary, he'd been doing it anytime someone touched his shoulders. And he could hear Kreese's snide laughter in his head for it. Thankfully she didn't say anything.

"Doctor said he should elevate his leg and use crutches on days it hurts. She did all sorts of stuff, used more machines than I knew they even had to look at his knee. The damage isn't that bad. He just should've gone in sooner, which I told him," she said pointedly shooting a look at Daniel who didn't meet her gaze. "No more crane kicks for awhile, he's got exercises he's got to do at home, and he's got an out of P.E. free card that she signed for the rest of the school year. She was a great doctor. Explained everything very basic like so we understood and was firm and didn't take any of Daniel's sass."

Johnny nodded looking at Daniel.

"I'm glad it's treatable," he said trying to hold the relief out of his voice knowing it was another thing that'd probably set Daniel off.

"Daniel said Mr. Miyagi did something right after he got hurt, probably helped keep the injury from being too bad," Mrs. LaRusso said.

Johnny felt cold. He was indebted to Mr. Miyagi beyond what he thought. Every time he turned around he felt like the hole he was in was deeper, the shovel in his hand covered in dirt he didn't remember digging. Driving the old man around and helping him with chores wasn't going to be enough. Johnny wondered what he could get Mr. Miyagi. Or make him. He seemed to appreciate homemade things, which was good because it meant he wouldn't have to deal with Sid. Maybe he could build Mr. Miyagi a greenhouse for his trees, but then again the California sun might just bake all of them if he built it wrong. It wasn't like Johnny knew how to construct anything. Maybe he could buy him a ticket back to Okinawa, just to visit, round trip airfare, first class. But there had been something quiet in Mr. Miyagi, how he didn't talk about going back to Okinawa that made Johnny wonder if there was something keeping him from going home, something beyond money.

It would also probably piss Daniel off if Johnny sent his sensei away all of a sudden, even if it was an all-expense paid vacation. Maybe if it was a cruise or something with people his own age where he could meet ladies... he frowned. Daniel would straight-up murder him. Plus Mr. Miyagi didn't seem to be that type of guy and that's what Johnny liked about him. He wasn't always ogling every female specimen in eyeshot, unlike Sid who did it even when his mother was right there. The bar was remarkably low Johnny realized with a sinking feeling. And yet somehow he'd found himself buried underneath it, desperately trying to claw his way back up.

The waitress skated back coming to a stop next to the Avanti and fitted trays on three of the windows and Johnny thanked her. She flashed him a big smile and handed him the check and he quickly handed her the bills while the LaRusso's were distracted. Mrs. LaRusso was explaining the carhops from when she was a kid and talking about some guy, some friend, Johnny guessed and how their parents would take them to places like this late at night like a treat and how it was the coolest place to be. Daniel listened, turned in his seat looking back at her, spine all twisted as she explained how it'd been before drive-throughs. Johnny glanced at her in the rearview, she spoke quickly, animated hands moving like Daniel. Johnny wondered if that was their whole family. What Thanksgiving and other holidays must be like all crammed in at some warm big table. Did they accidentally smack each other if they were sitting next to each other talking and not paying attention? Did that start a fight or were they used to it? Her eyes flickered to him and he looked away, caught, but catching the sparkle and mirth in her eyes.

Their food came and the conversation, dwindled only momentarily while Daniel took in the novelty of it all and then tried his chili dog. He had to pick the messiest item on the whole damn menu when he was in the Avanti, didn't he? It was like he was constantly baiting Johnny. Even though they had a truce, even though Johnny was trying to make amends Daniel still was poking him and prodding like I dare you, I double-dog dare you to fight me here right now in front of my mom, show your true colors, will you?

Johnny wondered if he did it on purpose or if Daniel just had a blissfully unaware knack for getting people riled up and making choices that were so stupid he was lucky he'd survived this long. What was Johnny going to do? Would he have to follow Daniel around the rest of their lives and keep him out of trouble? Apologize to biker gangs that he doesn't realize what he's saying is fighting words or he didn't mean to offend and he's just this pipsqueak without a large mouth and he could probably kick like one of your asses but as a gang, it's really unfair so I guess you'll have to fight me instead. He was surprised Mrs. LaRusso's hair wasn't stark white. Johnny wouldn't be surprised if he greyed early if he decided to take that path, not that Daniel would let him. He'd have to do it on the sly.

The burger was good, tasted like memories. He'd never brought anyone else here he realized all of a sudden. In their two years of dating, he hadn't taken Ali. Ali had been born into a nice family. The Mills had expensive taste and Sid had given him a date fund. Money to spend to show her a good time. And Sid had, before his first date with Ali grabbed his arm in a vice-like grip and said real low so no one else heard, The Mills are a nice family, don't you dare make a fool of me. Johnny hadn't understood why his dating Ali had anything to do with Sid. But he saw the Mills talking with Sid at the country club, laughing and getting along and how easy they were to charm and realized to them it was a good match because of Sid and Sid found some worth in him because Ali agreed to date him.

Johnny had rebelled on their first date, taking her to Golf 'n stuff. They'd had a blast and went back often. But he also got their names on reservation lists at fancy restaurants and took her dancing and all the rich kid shit he hated and they laughed about it, both knowing that their parents preferred them being there than out at some amusement park. That they'd rather the kids go to the opera than the movies, to show they had culture and class.

Johnny didn't think Ali could handle some drive-in theater or carhop. Her parents would've flipped, Sid would've heard about it and flipped. And the guys, they would've been insufferable. Bobby maybe would've behaved, but he could just see his car full of cobra's turning into a flirting machine likely to get Johnny banned from his favorite childhood place. But the LaRussos he realized appreciated it for what it was. They weren't too good for it, Daniel wasn't going to hound the waitress for her number and would just let her work without ogling her. Though if he had Johnny might've smacked him for Ali's sake. But Daniel was a good kid. He wasn't like that even though that's exactly what Johnny thought he was at first. Some slick kid from out of town trying to win Ali over with soccer tricks and obvious flirting while Ali was on the rebound and Johnny wasn't ready for her to move on. Just like he hadn't been ready for her to break up with him and to lose something that kept him in good standing with Sid.

Daniel was talking to his mother about back home, back in Newark trying to find something to compare the food to. He was talking with his mouth full and too fast. Everything about the two of them was relaxed. They were talking about restaurants they missed, the food they missed, mostly good Italian food, and laughing about things like the weird pizza they'd seen or found.

When they were done the waitress took their stuff and handed Johnny his fries for his mother and he started the car. Mrs. LaRusso shot forward all of a sudden,

"Wait Johnny!" she said and he paused blinking back at her. "We can't just leave." There was incredulity in her voice like she'd caught him doing something bad.

"Did I forget something?" Johnny asked wondering if she wanted a malt to take home.

"We've got to pay," she said opening her purse and holding out her wallet pointedly.

Johnny laughed and reversed the car out of the lot. "Already paid Mrs. LaRusso."

"When?" she asked shocked.

"Seatbelt on Mrs. LaRusso," Johnny said as he stopped at the edge of the carhop waiting.

She sunk back and put her seatbelt back on, eyebrows furrowed with confusion.

"I paid after we ordered when she set the trays up."

"Johnny Lawrence!" Mrs. LaRusso said. "How sneaky! I didn't even notice."

Johnny bit back his response, I may have made mistakes but I'm not that bad am I? That you'd automatically assume I'd try to dine and dash? He smiled the way he'd been trained, charming but fake. The sneaky scuffle to pay was something he did all the time with Ali. He'd excuse himself to go to the bathroom and would pay for their meal early, or she'd say she wanted to take a closer look at the art out in the lobby and when they went to leave he'd find the bill already paid. It was a habit at this point, to pay before someone else noticed. An inside joke of theirs that he realized now made it look like he was a criminal because why not? Already hurt her baby boy multiple times so of course, he'd also be a thief in her eyes, she probably thought he spent his weekend's robbing stores and stealing purses off of little old ladies for kicks. A warm hand found his knee and he glanced over at Daniel who gave his knee a squeeze.

"Thanks for lunch," he said warmly before pulling his hand back. It was sincere. His face too open and warm and Johnny had to look away, eyes on the road.

"Of course," Johnny said feeling the ghost of Daniel's hand lingering warmly there and missing the weight of it, they rolled to a stop at a stoplight. "Do you guys need to pick up anything at a pharmacy or anything before I take you home?" he asked, voice loud enough to carry to the back to Mrs. LaRusso, eyes flickering to the rearview so he could see her response.

"No, it's fine," Daniel said.

"We have some things to pick up," she said opening her purse and pulling out a prescription. She rattled off the pharmacy name and address. Johnny nodded.

"Ma!" Daniel whined.

"Doctor said you needed this stuff. Stuff for pain and whatnot," Mrs. LaRusso said flatly in a tone that barred no argument.

Daniel grumbled leaning his arm against the window and sticking his chin against his palm with a deep frown and pout watching the scenery pass. Johnny watched the city change as they entered Reseda and wondered if he should go in and buy the medication for Daniel or if that was too much. He wondered if they'd want him to go in or if knowing what medication had been prescribed was too much information, if Daniel would be more miffed. He parked the car in front of the pharmacy and his fingers hovered over his seatbelt. Mrs. LaRusso was up and out of the car hurrying to the pharmacy before Johnny could come to a decision.

"Sorry," Daniel said, softly and partially out the window as if he was apologizing to the bird hopping around on the concrete.

Johnny turned to him confused.

"After paying for the appointment and all the tests which she saw the price for and I've never seen her pale so fast, she refused to tell me how much it was, I swear I thought she was going to faint. It was a bit much. It was probably too much Johnny," Daniel said. "I think she wanted to get lunch, like pay for it you know? She makes this big deal of it with my uncle Louie, they fight over the bill and it seems like it's this big fight but they're just playing, so, yeah, she didn't mean it badly she just, she's got a lot of pride and it's hard to find some teen kid is treating her and taking care of things. Heck, she yells at me if I try to make dinner. Makes this big wounded deal about it, how her pride as an Italian mother is at stake. Even though she loves it when she comes home to a meal already made." Daniel turned towards Johnny and his warm hand found Johnny's knee again and he patted it. "Doctor explained to her all the shit you went through to get that appointment for me, and she saw the price, she doesn't think poorly of you you know. She knows you're trying to make things right. And I guess I do too. So don't let her get to you. She really didn't mean to insinuate that you'd dined and dashed."

Johnny lowered his gaze. He couldn't meet Daniel's eyes, if he'd seen through Johnny so easily then who knows what would happen if he held his gaze. He looked down at the hand still on his knee, soft, warm, and tan. The weight of it was comforting. Almost as much as holding the bonsai.

"And sorry for not telling you what the doctor said. I wanted to see you squirm," Daniel admitted, Johnny glanced over quickly. There was a grin on his face, playful. "I let it go too long though. You can breathe easily. I'm fine or I'm going to be fine. I just might one day be one of those old men who complain when it rains about my knee."

He laughed at the thought of it and gave Johnny's knee another squeeze. For a second Johnny wondered if it was a threat. Kreese would've told him it was, his enemy going to wound him, an eye for an eye. But it was gentle, the grip soft. More like how his friends would squeeze his shoulders or his arms. The way his mom used to squeeze his cheeks and hold his face in her palms and whisper How did I get so lucky? Which always confused him because he didn't feel like they were lucky, not compared to the other families in his schools, or the other families he saw. Lucky families didn't have parents overworked and still unable to pay for electricity or water, didn't get eviction notices or agree to marry an abusive asshole because it meant a roof over their head and food in the fridge. Lucky families were like his friend's families or Ali's, maybe even Daniel's family. Not Johnny's. Daniel's hand was still on his knee, a warm soothing pressure.

"I'm glad you're okay," Johnny said quietly.

"Yeah?" Daniel asked, that playful smile still there when Johnny glanced over. "Glad you don't have to carry me around everywhere?"

"Glad I didn't ruin your chance of making it to an old age," Johnny said.

"What does that mean?"

"You need both legs to run away from the fights you start," Johnny said.

"I don't start fights. I don't strike first, that's a cobra kai thing," Daniel protested.

"You don't mean to start fights," Johnny said. "But you rile people up and I worry that someday you're going to have to outrun a hornet's nest that you kicked thinking it was a soccer ball or something. I'm relieved that you'll be able to."

Daniel frowned at this, "Seriously? I can take someone in a fight. I took you on remember?"

"Yeah, you did. You did good," Johnny said. "But you also kept riling me up every chance you got. Like you just couldn't leave me alone. You kept pushing my buttons."

Daniel looked stunned, mouth open a little, he pulled his hand back from Johnny's leg and his eyes hardened.

"Cause and effect," Johnny said softly.

He wanted to stop talking, needed to stop talking, he hadn't planned to tell Daniel this but he was worried, worried Daniel would keep getting into fights and get hurt worse.

"I hate how I reacted to every button you pushed, everything I perceived, and how I let being in a group fall into a sort of dangerous mob mentality. But it was like I'd be minding my own business on a hike and you'd suddenly pop out and smack me on the face and run off like some stupid cartoon so I'd give chase. But in cartoons, your character is always fine, and my character always loses and I honestly just worry about what will happen if you do that to someone when Mr. Miyagi isn't around to save you, or if you do that to someone more dangerous than a stupid group of high school kids who do karate. Just promise me you'll try to be careful."

Daniel didn't respond.

He shouldn't have said anything. He had no right to ask Daniel to be more careful, to ask him to promise him anything. It probably wasn't his place and he was grateful when Mrs. LaRusso came back bag in hand and slipped into the backseat oblivious to the tension, talking a mile a minute about the pharmacy and the conversation she'd had with the pharmacist about Daniel's knee and how the pharmacist knew all about that having twisted a knee while snowboarding. Johnny was grateful for her chatter as he pulled into the South Seas apartment complex.

"Need any help?" Johnny asked, doubting Daniel would want him helping him up the stairs the way he had done helping him down.

Sure enough, he got a surly, "No." followed by the slam of the Avanti's passenger door which made him wince.

Mrs. LaRusso told him bye, gathering up her stuff and hurrying ahead of her son to unlock the apartment. Johnny waited, watching them disappear through the gate, and could barely see them make their way up the steps to the apartment. He strained to hear the door open and he leaned back with a groan. He really was trying, but it seemed his best, his attempts just were never good enough. He twisted and picked up the bonsai settling it gently into the warm seat Daniel had vacated.

"Like watching a train wreck huh?" Johnny asked it before driving home, ready to drop his fries off with his mom and lock himself in his room the rest of the day so he could think about how much he'd fucked up when he'd promised himself he'd be good.

Changing Sides

"You didn't even say goodbye to that boy," Lucille admonished setting her bags down on the kitchen island as Daniel hopped in. "It's the very least you could've done."

"Well at least I didn't insinuate he was a thief," Daniel said sourly, hoping past her towards the couch to put his leg up like the doctor had told him.

"What does that mean?"

"Ma, you flipped out thinking he dined and dashed, and you're mad at me for not saying goodbye? What do you want me to do kiss his hand for driving us around? He's literally just trying to ease his conscience. He doesn't actually give a shit."

"Daniel!" Lucille gasped grabbing a pillow and smacking him on the head with it.

"Ma!" Daniel complained, he sighed. He could feel the disapproval in her eyes, she was a second away from a lecture, he threw his arm over his eyes. "He told me he was glad I was okay because apparently, I'm always getting into fights because I push people's buttons and he said he was worried I wouldn't be able to run away. How messed up is that?"

He waited for her to agree with him, waited for a response. He got nothing. He pulled his arm from his face and looked up at her. She was chewing on her thumbnail the way she did when she was mulling over telling him something he probably wouldn't like. Like when she told him they were moving, or that Dad was dying.

He pushed himself up suddenly. "What! You don't agree with him?"

She sunk down next to him on the arm of the sofa, hands coming to his face and brushing her fingers through his hair. "Oh Daniel, everyone in Newark knew you meant no harm, but you had Louie with you to watch your back and explain that you were just joking. Here though, how everything went down... You know how little birds will sometimes pull on a big bird's tail feathers to get a rise out of them? Sneaking up when their backs turned and then yanking before flying off? You do that honey. Not always, but sometimes. You like to make people laugh and sometimes you pick the wrong target and they don't laugh with you. Remember your old science teacher?"

"Yeah," Daniel said uneasily.

"At our teacher meetings, all the other teachers said you were a joy to have, that you tried to make everyone laugh and have a good time and that you were helpful and friendly. He, however, said you were a class clown and that you teased the other kids. I think his exact words were 'You know that cliché of a boy who pulls the girl's pigtails because he likes her? Daniel does that, but to everyone, and one of these days he's going to do it to the wrong kid and end up with a black eye.' It felt like a damn premonition when you came home with a black eye as soon as we moved here."

Daniel flushed red. "I wasn't flirting with Johnny Lawrence!"

Lucille laughed and patted him on the shoulder. "I love you kiddo and I don't want you to change, ever, but I get his concern. Sometimes the people who care about you the most give you the harsh truths you don't want to hear. And you can't tell me Johnny Lawrence doesn't care, he proved that today in spades," she said standing up and leaving him to stew.

He wondered if she was right. If Johnny did care about him, and why the thought of that made his chest warm. Like it was finally defrosting the way his heart had frozen when he'd seen Johnny flinch when his mother had touched his shoulder. How he'd wanted to comfort him and thought maybe Johnny couldn't handle someone touching his shoulders or getting close to his neck anymore. It made sense. He'd seen what Kreese had done. When he'd flinched when Daniel touched him at Mr. Miyagi's he'd thought it was because it was Daniel. Like he was trying to stop himself from pushing him off, some involuntary thing. But for him to flinch because of the gentle touch of his mother was telling of just how deep that wound went.

It's why Daniel had gone for his knee this time to try and express comfort. He liked to think that was who he was. A comforting friend who was there for anyone if they needed him, even his ex-karate rival and ex-bully. Johnny hadn't protested, hadn't shoved his hand off, so he figured it was okay. But it had been that fake charming smile that had really set a stake into Daniel's heart. The I'm-fine face that wasn't real. Daniel didn't know how he'd known it was fake. It'd been one of the new looks he'd seen that day, like the peaceful look on his face when they'd come out of the doctor's office when Daniel had been planning to run over and spill everything but then had seen how peaceful he was and it irked him. Head back listening to music, blue eyes shut.

He'd thought Johnny would've been waiting with bated breath to hear the news and that he'd see the look of horror as soon as Daniel hopped out on the crutches. He'd been craving it the way he sometimes craved his mother's home-cooked Italian food. He'd wanted to tease him for just a moment but he'd looked so at ease in the doctor's office that Daniel had wanted to play it out and his mother had agreed. A little teasing for the damage, an extra price to pay.

But he'd been so quiet and tense and then hadn't driven them home and Daniel panicked. He hadn't expected to be taken out for lunch after, let alone to somewhere that Johnny and his mother went to that didn't seem fancy or rich. It screamed normal and the soft way Johnny had said it, like the place was special made Daniel's heart flutter like Johnny hadn't taken anyone else there except them.

And he got it for a moment, with this version of Johnny he could see why Ali had dated him for two years. A soft Johnny that let you in. That and the muscle and the blonde hair and the striking blue eyes that he'd been unable to keep his eyes off of. The Johnny who let him eat a chili cheese dog in his beloved Avanti. And if his mother had leaned over right then and there and said Johnny cared about him Daniel would've agreed. And then he'd seen that mask slide over his face as they were leaving, and that charming smile that sent a shiver down his spine because it was fake. It didn't reach his eyes. His shoulders were too tense. His body language was wrong.

He'd played over the conversation in his head over and over until he sifted through and realized what had happened. Johnny was a lot of things, but a thief wasn't one of them, not really. Johnny had been doing so good, had been so open, or at least more open than Daniel had ever seen before and he felt bad. Wanted to pull the boy into a hug and tell him he was okay that his mother hadn't meant that. But all he could do was awkwardly pat his leg and squeeze his knee for some stupid reason because he thought touching his shoulder was out of the question. And then Johnny had to open his mouth and say something so stupid, but apparently not stupid enough to only be Johnny's idea.

Daniel wanted to call Ali, wanted to see Ali. He needed to get his mind off of stupid Johnny and his stupid opinions and what better way to handle that than to spend time with his girlfriend? His mom brought him the phone and he called her. They'd meet up for the movies and go see something fun. She'd pick him up in her car and Daniel sighed relaxing back into the couch. This is what his life should be. A teenage boy should be out with his girl having fun, not moping over what some blonde oaf said to him in the car or how hurt he'd looked in that split second he'd thought no one had seen.

Ali and his mother chatted for a while while he changed into something more suitable for a date. Trying not to remind himself how much time he'd spent in front of the mirror that morning trying to pick something cool as if he was trying to impress Johnny. He remembered Ali saying how much she liked his hoodies, so he made sure to grab one on his way out of his room after fixing his hair for the third time and hurried to where she stood, wearing a cute dress and pink lip gloss that made his eyes immediately go to her lips. He wondered if that was how makeup worked, like art, it was meant to draw your eyes to one focal point and with Ali it was her lips. He was halfway out the door with his arm around her when his mother called after him.

"Your crutches Daniel!" she said and he winced.

"Crutches?" Ali asked eyes wide.

"I'll explain later," Daniel said quickly. "I'm fine Ma!" he called. "We're going to the movies, it's not a lot of walking." He let the door shut and hurried towards the stairs with Ali.

"Can I drive?" Daniel asked, knowing the answer was no.

"Oh definitely not," Ali said with a laugh hurrying past him to take the driver's seat as if she expected he'd try and sneak in there ahead of her and then refuse to move. He wondered if that move would work if he could ever beat her to the driver's seat and win it by not budging. He moved instead to the passenger seat.

"So," Ali said slowly and pointedly as she pulled out of the apartment complex.

"So," Daniel repeated with a grin.

"Crutches?" Ali asked, reminding him.

"Right, went to the doctor about my knee,"

"Finally."

"Hey, I thought you were on my side."

"Yeah but only on the surface. I agree with your mom."

Daniel groaned, apparently even the people he thought were in his corner weren't. It was a conspiracy. "Yeah, well I'm fine, 'kay? Just exempt from gym for the rest of the year unless it's like something I can do without bending my knee, or moving my knee, or putting pressure on my knee."

Ali shot him a worried look. "What about prom?"

"Oh I'm fine for prom," he said with a laugh.

Ali relaxed. "Good," she said relieved.

"But if I've got to do a lot of walking the doc wants me to use crutches. And I've got to keep my leg elevated which is annoying."

"I'm glad you went. What changed your mind? I know you were worried about the price."

"Johnny paid for it."

Ali's head swiveled to look at him so fast he thought she was possessed. "Johnny? Johnny Lawrence?"

"Yeah," Daniel said quietly. "I figured with Ma freaking out over it all the time I might as well take him up on the offer. I mean he did the damage why not let him pay for it right?"

Ali chewed on her bottom lip looking out at the street in front of them as she drove to the theater. He wondered if, even though he wasn't praising Johnny if this type of selfless act won points with her. If he should've kept his mouth shut. He had money to burn, so he would've thought it'd be low on the list of charitable ways he could redeem himself. At least for Ali.

"Did you spend all day with him?"

"Not all day, but we went to lunch afterward and he drove us so Mom could pick up my prescriptions," Daniel said.

Was he in trouble with her? Was hanging out with her ex a no-no? Everyone had told him to let go of the feud between the two of them but Ali had egged him on, laughing and saying Johnny deserved it and Daniel was beginning to doubt he actually did.

"How's he doing?" she asked quietly.

"Wracked with guilt," Daniel said, laughing trying to make the atmosphere light again and failing. It wasn't really funny. "I mean, he's quiet. He's not like punching me anymore or like anything like that. He's just quiet."

Ali nodded thoughtfully. "Did he... mention me?"

"Not today, no," Daniel said. It felt awkward.

He felt like if she continued down this path he might explode. He'd need to know why she'd broken up with him. Why she hadn't stopped the fight between Daniel and Johnny by saying dude this is my ex, we just broke up, he's not really bothering me I can handle it. Why instead she let things play out. If Ali had explained things, said anything to clue Daniel in that it wasn't his business then maybe things would've been different. Maybe Daniel and Johnny would've been friends and he'd get to sit at a table at lunch full of cool kids and not just at a table of pity with his girlfriend.

He yearned for that other reality, where he got on the soccer team, hung out with Mr. Miyagi because he was cool, and learned his karate because it was cheaper than Cobra Kai. He realized suddenly that a part of him blamed Ali almost as much as he'd blamed Johnny for his misery.He wanted to know about the Johnny that was head over heels in love with Ali and the Ali who dumped him and moved on so fast straight into Daniel's arms like she was rebelling and using Daniel to get some sort of revenge. Maybe he was being toyed with, a rebound who didn't know he was a rebound and was bound to get hurt. He shook his head, this was no way to think about his girlfriend.

"Oh," was all she said.

They pulled into the lot and got their popcorn and sodas and milled into the cool dark room taking their seats. Their hands found each other during the movie and it was sweet, it was nice and he needed to stop thinking about Johnny and the way he wanted to drag his hand up from Johnny's knee and see how much this new nice Johnny let him get away with. Fuck. Johnny and his old science teacher were right.

He felt popcorn hit his head and he turned feeling his heart sink. Cobras. Bobby, Tommy, Jimmy, and Dutch were sitting a couple of rows back and Dutch was throwing popcorn at them. Johnny wasn't there and Bobby was swatting at Dutch to get him to stop. Tommy and Jimmy were grinning like this argument between the two of them and the popcorn flying was the most entertaining thing they'd seen in ages.

"It's Dutch isn't it?" Ali whispered next to him, fingers tightening around his hand.

"Yeah, whole gang minus their leader," Daniel said sourly.

They were supposed to leave him alone. But he guessed cobras don't keep promises. Eventually, the hail of popcorn stopped and Daniel glanced back because he heard a cry of protest. Bobby had taken the popcorn from Dutch and moved away and was shoveling it into his mouth as if he could eat all of Dutch's weapons before Dutch could get over his shock and chase Bobby down. Jimmy and Tommy had moved faster and were next to Bobby, helping him eat all the popcorn, and outnumbered Dutch sunk sulkily into his seat.

His eyes met Daniel's and he sneered flipping Daniel off, but then folded his arms across his chest, kicked his legs up onto the back of the chair in front of him, and watched the movie. Okay, so maybe not all cobras were going to be a pain in his ass the rest of the year. Maybe just old habits died hard. Maybe as long as Bobby was around to reign the others in everything would be okay. It was flimsy, like a shield made out of tissue paper but it was better than nothing especially if the weapon was food and not fists.

"It's okay now," Daniel whispered to Ali whose hand was gripping Daniel's hand so hard that he thought she was trying to crush it.

He wondered what her problem was. The popcorn wasn't hitting Ali, they'd been aiming at Daniel the whole time. Just like always. Daniel was the target and Ali was left alone if not just teased a little. Her status and years of going to school with them, popularity, protected her but left Daniel out in the cold and he was starting to resent that. It wasn't fair. It hadn't been fair at all. He felt like he'd been tricked into a feud, a trap that everyone else who was local knew about but him.

She'd smiled at him, she'd wanted to learn how he did his trick with the soccer ball. He thought he was making friends with a pretty blonde and didn't know he was stepping in to make Johnny jealous or whatever it was Ali had been thinking. If she knew how Johnny was, knew that Johnny was so quick to snap or get jealous, had all that karate training then why'd she let him stumble forward like that? Let him make a fool of himself and get into a fight with Johnny?

Shouldn't she have grabbed his shoulders and said "Hey, we just met, this is my ex, we just broke up, he's a karate champion and I kind of dumped him without an explanation so like he wants to talk. Thanks for the lesson, welcome to town, I will be okay I've got a good right hook and Johnny wouldn't hurt me. But he would hurt you if you tried to go toe to toe with him."

Instead, she let Daniel think he was the knight in shining armor instead of a pawn, a random kid who didn't know what was happening and was just making everything worse.

When had this happened? When had he switched sides? When had he started to feel bad for Johnny Lawrence?

Right. After the match when all that bravado came crashing down and Daniel realized maybe what he thought was a glittering perfect life wasn't actually perfect. It just looked perfect. And maybe it was listening to Ali chatter next to him after the fight when they went out to celebrate about how cathartic it'd been to see Johnny Lawrence covered in his own damn blood for once because she hadn't seen him nearly die. She hadn't seen the way he didn't fight back as if he'd accepted that his life was over. That because he'd not been perfect and Kreese was pissed he'd just let everything end. She hadn't seen the marks around his neck. The lifelessness in his eyes. The way he bowed his head when he apologized, how his voice had rasped yet he pushed on despite how much it must've hurt to talk, to apologize to him, to Mr. Miyagi, to his mother.

And ever since the tournament the more he learned the less he understood about a lot of things, especially the girl sitting by his side, holding his hand and resting her head on his shoulder smelling like floral shampoo and perfume. He won the tournament, he got the girl, his enemies had been forced to recognize that he was a worthy opponent and yet he felt miserable. What he wanted was changing and he kept trying not to think about it.

He tilted his head and pressed his cheek against the top of Ali's head and breathed the way Mr. Miyagi had taught him, watching the movie, or trying. He didn't know how to proceed, he didn't know what to do. It felt like diffusing a bomb and after what Johnny and his mother had said he suddenly felt ill-equipped. What if he just made everything worse by prying? Maybe the best course forward was to talk to Mr. Miyagi. His advice always steered him the right way. Maybe he'd give him some ideas on how to move forward without bringing the life he'd won crashing down around his ears.

A Quiver in Brumation

Johnny was laying on his bed listening to music, tapping his foot to the beat. He could feel movement as someone opened the door but he couldn't be bothered. It was probably Bobby. Bobby didn't knock, Bobby and the cobras just showed up in his room. Sometimes with beer and weed, sometimes with cookies and baked goods. The former being Jimmy, the second being Dutch, the latter being Bobby. Tommy brought new music.

The vibrations weren't right for any cobra and he peeled his eyes open in the dark. The moon shone brightly through the windows and he saw Daniel carefully closing the door behind him and walking forward. Johnny sat up, taking the headphones off his head, the music seeping into the room.

Why was Daniel here? He'd already agreed to start going to school again and he had been. He hadn't been back to Mr. Miyagi's so he hadn't left anything else behind. They'd already taken care of his knee. He studied Daniel frantically suddenly worried that what he'd said before had come true, that someone had hurt him. But there weren't any bruises on his skin that Johnny could see, no scratches or cuts.

Daniel sat on the edge of the bed next to his hip, the bed dipping slightly by the weight. Sometimes the cobra's spent the night if they were too drunk to go home, or had been out or had gotten into a fight, sometimes with their parents. Johnny woke up with one of them on the other side of his bed snoring like a chainsaw smelling, like stale beer or weed or with red-rimmed eyes after a night of telling him how their parents just didn't get them. But they were always on the other side, plenty of space, totally platonic.

Daniel was in his space and he wondered if he needed to roll over, to scoot over and give him some more room. He didn't smell like beer. Johnny had never seen Daniel drink, but he also wasn't a kid who went to parties, which probably was Johnny's fault. He doubted Daniel had a fake ID. He didn't smell like weed.

Daniel pushed Johnny down, and Johnny didn't have a clue what was happening. A fight? They'd agreed to a truce. Though Daniel had tried to start a fight on the beach. Maybe this was that again. Was he pissed because of what he said earlier? Daniel wasn't saying anything and that was always so much worse.

"Daniel?" Johnny asked, wondering if he was waiting for the fake slap again. If he'd changed his mind about that.

He rose his hand to get it over with. Daniel grabbed his wrist and pinned it above Johnny's head and lunged forward kissing Johnny. His lips were soft and warm against his and it was better than Johnny would've guessed, assuming Daniel's experience was limited but who was Johnny to know what Daniel's life before California was. He nipped at Johnny's lower lip and then his tongue was in Johnny's mouth tasting warm and sweet as Daniel climbed on top of him pinning him to his bed, pressing his body close and Johnny forgot to breathe, heart racing.

Something rattled around in his subconscious and came loose.

This isn't real. It's a dream.

Daniel pulled away and looked at him with a big smile.

"Doesn't have to be," he said letting go of Johnny's wrist and leaning back to strip out of his shirt. "Why worry about that? We can have fun."

Definitely a dream. Johnny thought sitting up, a little dazed. Daniel's hands found his skin, fingers curling under his shirt and pulling it up, helping him out of it, kissing him again.

"Don't go," Daniel whispered into his neck, biting it determined to leave a bruise with his teeth, hands trailing down Johnny's stomach and inching slowly lower. Johnny knew where this was going and it was a dream. Daniel barely tolerated him, there was no way. Daniel moved to dispose of more clothing. Johnny took the opening and he rolled himself over and off the bed, hoping the fall would wake him.

His eyes flicked open and he jolted up. He looked at the dark ceiling of his room, hugging his blanket to his pounding chest. He cursed quietly. There was no Daniel and he didn't know what dreaming about Daniel meant. Maybe he was spending too much time with him. It wasn't like he hadn't dreamt about guys before. But never like a friend or whatever Daniel was.

There was some weight to his bed and Bobby was sleeping soundly next to him. He quickly escaped the bed and nearly tripped over Dutch who was sleeping on the floor. All of the cobras were there he realized, counting the bodies in the dark, and he was grateful he woke up first as he hurried to shower at the coldest possible setting because he didn't want to explain what he'd been dreaming about to get him in his current state or who he'd been dreaming about. Especially he thought as he caught sight of himself in the mirror with how absolutely pink and red he was, but no mark on his neck. He wouldn't have been able to hide it. He sunk to the bottom of the shower and pulled his legs to his chest and ducked his head over his knees.

Dream Daniel was too much and he didn't want to return to him. He normally didn't go back to sleep to the same dream, but with his luck and a room full of sleeping cobras, he would of course fall asleep and find himself back under dream Daniel who'd laugh and say "Welcome back" before continuing where he left off and Johnny had an idea what would happen. It'd be embarrassing and he'd never live it down. Especially if he talked in his sleep. Or did worse. He rubbed his eyes, what was wrong with him? So Daniel had a sweet smile and could be kind and gentle when he wanted to be, could be reassuring, and also could kick him in the face and send him falling in the dirt. It didn't mean he wanted to... well what?

What did Johnny want, because maybe if he named it he could add it to the pile of things he'd never have and bury it away with all the other things. Like a normal happy family, a father figure who wasn't absolute shit, a lover. Is that what he wanted from Daniel? Of all the stupid things, he'd spent a semester fighting and being a dick to the boy, and what? Now he wanted his dick? There had to be some sort of messed-up psychological thing about this. Or was this new? Had he always liked Daniel? Had he not? Was it purely teenage hormones because he wasn't with Ali anymore and hadn't taken Dutch up on his offer to find some hot chicks and get laid to get his mind off of her?

That ache in his heart from Ali when he prodded it didn't hurt as much anymore. Which was curious. So maybe not. He did remember being furious with Daniel but that had changed. Maybe if he'd stopped himself from being such an asshole earlier, realized the garbage Kreese had been spewing earlier he wouldn't be in this mess. Or maybe he still would've.

He had to get his mind under control. He wished his Walkman was waterproof. The cold water was helping, it was shocking, he just had to get his mind off of Daniel, LaRusso. Maybe if he stopped calling him Daniel in his head the distance would help. LaRusso who took any space given. When Johnny retreated he followed, crowding him. Was that it? Was it because Daniel Larusso wouldn't leave him alone? Did he want to be left alone? No.

Johnny did not want to go to school tomorrow. He didn't want to leave his shower. Think about something else Johnny, anything else.

Cobras. His room was full of his friends and he hadn't woken up. When had he got so lax? When had they gotten so sneaky? Kreese would be proud. Bobby hadn't smelled of beer so they hadn't been out drinking. He hadn't smelled weed either. So why were they crashing at his place? Was that how they snuck in this time? Because they were quieter sober? Was it like how snakes huddle for warmth in winter? It was January, even if you could barely tell in California. He thought he saw that in a nature documentary, back when he started Cobra Kai and became obsessed with snakes because of Kreese, because of his karate.

He threw out his books when he'd finished talking to his Mom after the tournament. He'd thrown everything that reminded him of karate or Kreese in a box and donated it. Books on karate, snakes, strategy, fitness, the military, and Vietnam. He nearly threw out his trophies, nearly tore up pictures but didn't, it felt too much like something Sid would do and he couldn't. Instead he shoved them in the back of his closet so he wouldn't have to look at them anymore.

He leaned his head back against the tile, he was shivering. Misery did it he realized standing numbly. No way he was going back to sleep though, not worth the chance. He washed and dried off heading back into his dark room to dress. He found his Walkman on the side of the bed and listened to the music to drown out his friend's snores and laid back down. He wouldn't sleep. He'd just breathe and not think. Until the sun rose.

"Dude, did you sleep at all?" Bobby asked.

Johnny cracked an eye open and looked up at Bobby who was pulling the headphone from Johnny's ear.

"Through a room full of snoring guys? No," Johnny said.

The sun was up, filling his room with warmth. The boys were up and moving, stretching and grumbling.

"It's unfair that Bobby always gets the bed," Jimmy complained.

"You always lose rock paper scissors," Bobby said.

"The fact you always win rock paper scissors is suspicious," Tommy said.

"Why are you here? We've got school," Johnny said pushing himself up. He was already dressed just had to brush his hair.

"Do we really got to be nice to LaRusso?" Dutch asked, his voice a whine.

Johnny froze and turned slowly to Dutch. "What did you do?"

"We went to the movies," Bobby said. "Saw that new comedy."

"And LaRusso and Ali were there," Jimmy said.

"So I started throwing popcorn at LaRusso and Bobby gave me shit for it," Dutch said kicking the leg of Johnny's chair. "I throw popcorn and snacks at people all the fucking time. I mean it's how you landed Ali in the first place. But Bobby had to be a wuss about it."

"Leave him alone okay?" Johnny said. His hands were in tight fists and he carefully had to remind himself to unclench his fists, to loosen his jaw.

"What are we going to do then?" Dutch asked, rolling around in Johnny's chair. "It's so boring. Can't bother LaRusso, can't heckle Ali, can't do karate. What else is there to do in this damn place but get wasted and high? Is that all we're going to do until we graduate? What a fucking waste."

"Could get laid," Tommy suggested.

Dutch burst out laughing and motioned to himself and everyone but Johnny. "We could get laid, but in case you forgot Ali is like queen bee at school. The other girls aren't going to touch Johnny unless they've got a death wish for their social life. Even if they're over there's this stupid unsaid rule about going after some girls ex or some other bullshit. Girl code or whatever. So he's out of luck unless Johnny's willing to go for some dick instead."

The stuff that came out of Dutch's mouth never surprised Johnny. He was so used to it that he'd learned how to school his features long ago. But this hit like a ton of bricks and Johnny felt his skin burn. He remembered dream Daniel pinning him to the bed to kiss him and how nice it'd seemed. He felt his heart pound in his ears. He knew he was screwed. He knew what he should've said, what he should've done. He should've laughed it off and said something about fish in the sea and how there were other schools in the Valley and he just had to cast a wider net. But he remembered Daniel's tongue and hands, hands he'd felt on him multiple times because the boy couldn't keep his hands to himself. And he'd been so good trying to bury that dream and the fountain of feelings he'd tried to plug up.

He wished they were all drunk or that it was nighttime or they were high or something else, but in the harsh morning light he couldn't hide and he knew he was the color of a tomato by the heat on his skin.

"Fuck," Dutch said eyes wide unable to take them off of Johnny.

"Dutch," Bobby said, warning in his voice that held an edge. If this all went south Johnny knew he'd still be okay. He might have to grab his bonsai and Avanti and bolt if Dutch made a big enough scene that Sid found out. But Bobby would have his back. And Johnny was faster than any of them.

Dutch threw up his hands, eyes turning to Bobby, "Shit man, is that why you always get the bed? You two dating or something?"

Bobby shook his head, the atmosphere of the room was heavy and Johnny felt sick. He should've never left the shower. Getting up was a mistake. Coming home was a mistake. He was looking at the bonsai mapping out his escape from the room when he felt a hand fall heavily on his shoulder and he flinched. The hand pulled away quickly and he looked at his friends. He wondered again if a teenager could have a heart attack.

"Who is it?" Dutch asked.

"What?" Johnny managed.

"Which guy at school do you have your eye on?"

"Dutch," Bobby said, his voice practically a growl and Dutch shrunk back.

Dutch had no self-control, no impulse control. He was great for fun, at parties, but he was wild. Down for practically anything.

When they'd all first met, Bobby had been the number one student at the dojo under Kreese but he didn't follow through with Kreese's decree to make sure the opponent didn't get up again. Kreese said "End it" or "Finish it" and Bobby always hesitated. Except for one day after class when Dutch had dropped a word Johnny hadn't really understood. He'd heard it once from a British guy visiting and chatting with Sid, it was a cigarette or like slang for one or something. But Bobby had grabbed Dutch by the front of his shirt and told him never to say that word again and Dutch being Dutch had laughed because what was Bobby going to do? He spat the word out at Bobby and Bobby beat the shit out of him. Bobby ended it. Kreese would've been proud. Dutch never messed with Bobby again. Bobby told him to stop something in that tone and he did. Bobby only gave so many warnings.

"We're going to be late," Tommy said glancing at the clock.

Johnny would've rather the earth swallowed him whole.

"How about we ditch?" Dutch suggested. "I mean Johnny already threw out his perfect attendance by just locking himself in his room. He's clearly miserable. We haven't done any fun shit since the tournament."

Johnny looked at Dutch with surprise. Dutch wasn't usually this chill about anything.

"Oh c'mon," Dutch said. "Do you seriously want to go to school Johnny?"

"No," Johnny mumbled.

He didn't want to see Daniel. He didn't think he could face him. He needed more time to evict Dream Daniel from his subconcious.

"Then let's go do something fun. We need it. It's not like school's really going to care. We're fucking seniors. Unless we do something stupid and get arrested we're fine. Live a little."

They all looked at each other than at Johnny. Johnny always said no when they recommended ditching school. He always said they could but he wouldn't join them. They did sometimes, but they'd slink back and complain how it wasn't the same without him, he assumed it was because they wanted to be in the Avanti. He had the best car in the group. No Johnny meant no Avanti. He groaned and put his head in his hands.

"Fine, this once, fine."

It seemed like a bad idea. He'd shown his hand without meaning too. He'd promised himself no one would ever know except Bobby and his mother. He'd never tell the guys or let them know because he didn't think they'd stay his friends. He didn't think they'd accept it.

Johnny carefully picked up his jacket and slipped it over his shoulders and picked up the bonsai and headed out to the Avanti.

He had nightmares about it sometimes. Kissing some dude whose face he couldn't make out only for them to find him and never talk to him again, pretend he didn't exist. They'd mention it to someone else and then Sid would find out. And Sid would never let him in the house again, locking his mother in like some princess in a fairytale. Only Johnny wasn't a knight or a prince who could rescue her.

He hadn't expected this reaction and he waited patiently for the other shoe to drop. He had his bonsai, he was going to his car. His Walkman was safely tucked into his pocket. If he had to bolt he was fine. He'd be okay.

They settled into his car and with the bonsai safely in his lap, he drove. They chattered around him in a comfortable way. He knew Bobby was watching them like a hawk. Or maybe it was a secretary bird, the bird that stomped the shit out snakes heads and brained them or something. Bobby was ready to do that and it made Johnny relax, seeing that tension in Bobby's shoulders.

Bobby had been the first one he'd told. Told him before his mother.

He'd cornered Bobby when they were alone and asked. "Are we best friends?"

"Of course," Bobby said looking confused.

"Forever?"

Johnny remembered feeling like if Kreese or anyone else heard him ask that, with mushy gushy friendship bullshit, he'd be made fun of to the moon and back. But before Cobra Kai Johnny hadn't had any friends.

"Yeah," Bobby said slowly with a look like am I going to have to help you bury a dead body?

"Even if I'm an annoying little shit? Even if I do something stupid? Even if I hurt someone? Even if I'm destined to die in a ditch somewhere? Even if I'm worthless? No matter what?"

It'd been all the stuff Sid said, all the stuff Sid believed. Bobby had frowned deeply and just nodded. It was enough.

"Then I have a question."

Bobby nodded and they sat. Bobby waited patiently for the question to come and Johnny struggled to ask it, to get over that one hump. Bobby had never lied to him, but the only unconditional love he had in his life was from his Mom and sometimes he worried it was conditional. That one day he'd fuck up so badly it'd be over.

"You know how sometimes you dream of a chick and the dream is super hot and it affects you?"

"Yeah," Bobby said.

"Do you...Do you ever also feel that way about guys?" Johnny whispered forcing himself to look at Bobby.

Health class had never covered it . Only the stuff with girls. Guys weren't mentioned with other guys so he'd held off asking. But he kept dreaming about both. The guys were faceless, or at least he couldn't hold onto any specific feature most of the time. Except that he liked them and liked whatever was happening. Sometimes it was some character from a movie or a tv show he liked, then they had faces and there was usually a story in there somewhere. Like he'd be a part of the movie and then suddenly the hero and he were making out because they'd saved the world or some other sappy romantic bullshit.

Bobby shook his head but smiled gently. "I don't, but it's fine Johnny. My uncle does. He's lived with his best friend since college for decades. They had a ceremony when I was a kid. They're married, but like not officially you know? Like not in the government's eyes but like in our family I've got two uncles who love each other so much, just like my parents love each other or you know anyone else."

Johnny nodded thoughtfully. He didn't fully understand that but he'd seen how Bobby's parents interacted. Sickly sweet around each other, lots of soft looks, gentle touches, and kisses. Always helping each other, listening to what the other said, remembering things about each other, just knowing.

"I don't know how other people would take it though," Bobby said softly, gently putting his hand on Johnny's arm. "You got to be careful who you talk to about stuff like this. My uncle said people try to beat the shit out of him when they find out. It's why he learned karate. He's the reason I do karate. He said it makes him feel safer."

Johnny had thought about that. It wasn't like he was going to talk about it to Sid, but he'd thought about asking Kreese and now he was glad he hadn't. Kreese didn't go in for those kinds of heart to hearts.

Johnny drove them towards a park. There was a section of the park that they used to hang out at after class, drinking soda or beer, whatever Jimmy got his hands on and it'd been the first place Johnny had smoked weed. Dutch had brought it and passed it around and they'd talked all night long. Johnny didn't think he'd ever talked so much.

He parked the Avanti and the guys spilled out of the car setting up camp. Johnny kept stuff in the trunk in case he needed to make a run for it. He'd never explained to them why. They just teased him and asked if he was a boy scout or something. Now it came in handy. Johnny sat on a picnic bench and set his bonsai gently on the table in a spot where it could get some sun and then laid down. He pulled his hood up from under his jacket and over his head and shut his eyes. Maybe here he could catch some more sleep and because it was a different space, a space Daniel hadn't been, he wouldn't be haunted by him. Before sleep even had the courtesy of knocking he heard the guys talking quietly.

"How long have you known?" It was Dutch.

"What's it matter?" Bobby sounded bitter.

"Is this why you beat the shit out of me?"

"No, but you deserved it."

"Guys come on," Tommy was trying to placate the two.

"Why are we even here Dutch?" Bobby hissed, "What's your big plan? Huh? Whatever your planning you better stay in line or I'll-"

"Calm your ass down," Dutch said. "You think I'd really do something to Johnny? What because he also likes dudes? Or only likes dudes? Whatever. Why are you on my case so bad?"

"Because you didn't do shit."

"What does that mean?"

"The rest of us tried to help Johnny when Kreese tried to kill him and you didn't do shit."

"I don't know if you realized this but you're pawing and pleading didn't do him or yourself much good either. None of us could've saved him. We thought ourselves some damn hot shots and Kreese swatted you all away like flies. Even you Bobby. What did you want me to do? I couldn't ever beat you in a fight when you put your all in, I couldn't ever beat Johnny. Kreese knocked you down while choking Johnny. What could I have done? Yeah, that little old guy made it look easy, but I panicked alright? I froze."

"You think that's why he flinched?" Jimmy asked quietly.

"Hell should I know?" Dutch said. "Probably. Bobby, I get it. You're fucking protective of Johnny. We all know he's been through shit, it's why we gave LaRusso hell. Because what Ali did, no matter how much I joke about it wasn't fucking fair. What Kreese did wasn't fucking fair. What Sid makes the damn staff say whenever you ask to see Johnny is so fucking messed up. You're not the only one who gives a damn."

"We feel like shit too," Tommy said. "Not being able to help him."

"If he likes dudes so what?" Jimmy said. "He's still our Johnny."

Tears pricked at Johnny's eyes but he didn't move. They probably thought he was listening to his Walkman like usual.

"So who does he like?" Dutch pressed.

"I don't think I should say," Bobby said.

Johnny frowned. He hadn't told Bobby anything. He'd just realized he liked Daniel. What, did Johnny moan Daniel's name in his sleep or something embarrassing like that? Bobby had been sleeping right next to him after all. Just kill him now if he'd done that. Put him out of his misery.

"Dude, come on. We all know we fucked up. That tournament was a nightmare and there was shit we could do for Johnny and we failed. But if there's some dude he's got his eyes on that we can do. We can be wingmen or something like that. Like the way we were with Ali. Let us help him get the guy," Dutch sounded way more enthused than Johnny thought possible. "Or if the guy isn't into that, find him another better guy. We need a clue, to figure out his type."

Bobby huffed, he was caving and Johnny thought about sitting up and telling them all to shut up and mind their own damn business. But he waited, heart pounding in his ears.

"He's spending a lot of time with Daniel," Bobby said carefully. "And like Johnny hasn't said he likes Daniel but like he came home with scratches on his thigh."

Johnny heard the movement in the grass. Bobby was showing them where the damn scratch marks were on his own leg as an example. He'd worn pants because Bobby had made such a stupid big deal over it.

"Shit who scratches someone there?" Tommy asked.

"Well, Daniel came to visit. I ran into him outside of the house so I showed him how to sneak in because..."

"Because of Sid's rule with the staff ," Jimmy said.

"Yeah, and well they were talking and I swear I couldn't tell whether they were flirting or fighting. And so I asked Johnny after Daniel left and he told me he was taking Daniel to the doctor to get his knee checked out."

"So what?" Dutch said, unimpressed.

"So, when I asked he turned bright red like before. Like this morning. Like I'd gotten it right. I mean I haven't seen him flirt with any other dude or stare at them longingly or whatever. But he's been bending over backwards for Daniel after the tournament. And I thought at first it was guilt, but like I saw the way Johnny was looking at Daniel and it's not the same way he used to. It's like...like how he looked at Ali."

Oh god. Was Johnny that obvious? Did he have a look? Had it been all over his face before he even realized his own feelings? Just out there in the open the way Bobby had said. He might as well have just stood around naked.

"Daniel LaRusso?" Dutch said incredulously. "That little shit? The one who wouldn't leave Johnny alone? Of all the boys in our school. Of all the guys in the Valley. The one that kicks him in the fucking face is the one he likes?"

"I think so," Bobby said softly.

Dutch made a thoughtful sound. It was quiet. Too quiet. He could hear the wind in the trees, some bugs buzzing about somewhere, a bird chirping.

"Daniel's funny in class," Tommy offered.

"He stands out," Jimmy agreed.

Dutch burst out laughing. "He likes short feisty ones huh? Is that it? That's his type? I mean didn't Ali also punch him?"

Bury him now. Just do it while he was still alive. Get it over with.

Ali had punched him when he'd kissed her to make Daniel jealous. It wasn't the same. It hadn't made him like her more. He'd felt a spark of comfort from it, that she could handle herself if someone bothered her. It'd been a good punch. Daniel though sucker-punched him first. He didn't get punched in the face with love. Oh shit, love. No, definitely he wasn't in love with anyone anymore. Like, scale it back to like. Like was becoming manageable. Love was a different ball park that he didn't think he was allowed to play in. But like, that he could watch from a distance.

He didn't have a type. The first guy he'd made out with had been a lifeguard he'd met before Ali. He hadn't punched Johnny. They'd just flirted and then they'd made out on his break for the two weeks he'd been in town covering for a friend.

"Would Daniel even...go for Johnny?" Jimmy asked softly.

"What's that supposed to mean?" Dutch asked voice full of threat. "He'd be lucky to have Johnny."

"We made his life hell. He's not like some other dude at school whose known Johnny for years. He's only seen our bad side. All of us. If we were wingmen we'd probably make it worse."

"Bobby said they were flirting," Dutch said, annoyed.

"He thought they were flirting," Tommy clarified. "Or fighting and a scratched up thigh could mean anything."

"How the hell do you get scratched there if it's not flirting? Dude's don't scratch each other when they're fighting. Pretty sure we all saw Daniel fight. He doesn't scratch," Dutch said.

"Yeah, I can't figure it out," Bobby said. "Johnny didn't want to talk about it."

"Then let's ask him," Dutch said.

Johnny's heart tried to bolt out of his chest. He could hear footsteps, the sound of grass beneath shoes, then onto the dirt towards Johnny. He couldn't fake it anymore and he sat up with a frown.

"Piss off," Johnny said.

Dutch laughed sinking into the seat next to him like he wasn't scared of the look on Johnny's face.

"Dude, are you and Daniel doing it?"

"No!" Johnny said.

He meant it to come out firm but it tripped on the way out. He felt his cheeks burn. The rest of the group came in and crowded around the picnic table.

"But you want to?" Tommy pressed.

Johnny tried to remember if they'd been this annoying about Ali. He was pretty sure they hadn't. Dutch had thrown candy at her, she punched him, and then chatted with Johnny about the movie. The next thing he knew he was asking her out and she'd agreed and they'd continued that for two years. It'd been so damn easy. This wasn't easy. This was torture. His friends were torturing him. He looked away from them, gently pulling the bonsai closer. His eyes shot up and he turned to Bobby, eyes narrow and frowning.

"How the hell did you know? Is my face seriously that obvious? I didn't even put it together until like this morning."

Bobby looked a little startled and then burst out laughing and if Johnny didn't love the damn bonsai he would've chucked it at Bobby's head.

"So you do like Daniel!" Jimmy said, eyes wide and Johnny retreated into looking at the bonsai like the leaves were the most interesting thing he'd seen in his life.

"How'd you get the scratch? Is that why you're wearing pants despite it being like over 90 degrees out?" Dutch asked tugging on the side of Johnny's pants. Johnny slapped his hand away.

"You wanna die?" Johnny growled.

Dutch laughed, "Seriously Johnny."

"It was an accident okay?" Johnny said. "It's not a big deal like you're all making it out to be. He was driving and missed the stick shift and I'd said something to piss him off and instead of getting the stick he got my leg."

"Wait, now I've got like a million more questions," Bobby said leaning forward. "So you weren't in the Avanti. Where the hell were you? What were you doing? How'd does someone miss the stick shift by that much? Are you sure it wasn't on purpose?"

"Like a sexy scratch?" Dutch asked with another laugh.

Johnny stomped his foot down on Dutch's foot.

"I went with him and his sensei to the beach. I'm like helping around the house or whatever, fixing stuff. As like...thanks," Johnny said softly, voice dropping to a whisper, eyes on the tree. "And so he invited me to the beach because of some balance thing he makes Daniel do or whatever. But we took his truck and somehow I got stuck in the middle with the...the stick...you know."

"I couldn't scheme something up better myself," Dutch said howling with laughter, getting up quickly before Johnny could swipe at him and holding his stomach as he laughed. "Dude are you sure this wasn't done on purpose? Sticking you in the middle so Daniel will flirt with you every time he had to shift gears?"

Johnny flushed bright red. "It wasn't like that. There just wasn't a ton of space. Daniel's with Ali you numbskull. He's not fucking flirting with me. I'm on this stupid ride by myself."

He buried his head in his hands.

Of course, he'd like the guy his ex-girlfriend decided to date. Of course, he'd make things an even bigger mess than they already were.

"Dude, fuck Ali," Jimmy said, earning a shove from Tommy. "She just dropped you without explanation. If you like Daniel steal him from her."

Johnny flung his hands out from where they'd dug into his hair and onto the table, it probably was sticking up now.

"Did you all forget that we were massive dicks to Daniel? That we beat the shit out of him? Made his life miserable? Fucked up his knee? You really think the fucking mountain of screw-ups is so easy to fucking ignore?"

"Is his leg really that messed up?" Bobby asked eyes wide.

"No. I mean, he's got to rest. The doctor gave him crutches and meds and stuff. But if he stays off of it and elevates or something like that for months he'll be fine. I think. He's not going to be in gym or sports for the rest of the year," Johnny said softly, knowing that pain of regret and fear in Bobby's eyes as he'd seen it in his own.

"Then fine, we hoist the boy around like a fucking king. We change gears," Dutch said slipping back into the seat next to Johnny and tapping his finger against the table. "Instead of destroying his senior year, we make it the fucking best."

"And how do you recommend we do that?" Johnny asked.

"Well, you've got him outside of school right? Like you're what was it? Community servicing your way out of your guilt or some other bullshit?" Dutch said waving him off. "So you're getting close to him there. Well, we've got lunches, classes, field trips, prom, and all sorts of other school shit where we can do a one-eighty and make him realize we're not so bad and if we're not so bad and he's seeing you be this nice guy outside of school then maybe..."

"Maybe what? He'll break up with Ali and date me? I didn't want to break up with Ali."

"Maybe we could get her to dump him?" Tommy recommended. "Get her to date someone else?"

"You offering up your services there bucko?" Bobby asked with a grin. "She hates all of us if you forgot."

"I don't think Daniel would appreciate meddling."

Dutch reached over and gave his bicep a squeeze. "Dude, all the girls fell over themselves for these muscles before Ali." He quickly ducked out of the way as Johnny swung at him. "If you just show off how hot you are then maybe he'll melt into your arms."

"I don't think that's how this works," Johnny said with a frown.

"The girls do talk about you a lot," Tommy said with a sigh. "They complain that Ali put you on a damn blacklist for the dating pool and say it's such a waste because you're hot. Like across the board man. I'm sure you could work that for a guy."

"Not just a guy, Daniel. How do you guys keep forgetting how messed up it is?" Johnny said stiffly.

How were they just going along with it like it was normal, like it was just the most basic thing, that, of course, Johnny Lawrence had a thing for Daniel and Daniel just needed what, some old-fashioned flirting to pick him over Ali? Or the stupid cartoonish posing some of the guys did on the beach to try and get girls? It made his stomach sour at the thought. He didn't want to hurt Ali. He didn't want to hurt Daniel. There was no way to try and win Daniel over without hurting one or both of them. And the elephant in the room, the bullying, and the fighting was the size of Mt Everest and the guys were ignoring it like it was just a chess piece they hadn't figure out how to move into position yet.

"I don't want you guys meddling okay? I don't think Daniel would date me if I was the last person on earth and I wouldn't blame him after all the hell I put him through. So just drop it. I appreciate the support but, it's not going to happen. Seriously. Daniel's with Ali. Just let me do my penance in peace."

"Johnny," Bobby said in that tone, the tone that was all soft and full of concern.

Johnny wished he had a beer. He wouldn't drive the Avanti with a beer but he didn't have to go anywhere. He could just lay down in that tent and not move. Especially because that tone was making tears well up in his eyes and he'd be damned before he cried in front of the guys over this.

"It's not even worth getting all worked up about, it's never going to happen. The only reason Daniel is suffering my company is because of his sensei, because Mr. Miyagi is...possibly the nicest person I've ever met and is humoring me."

The guys were silent for a while and Johnny wondered if he'd said too much. He didn't talk about this kind of stuff with them. With Bobby sometimes when he felt desperate, they were best friends. But he rarely shared when he was hurting unless he felt like he was going to burst. And he didn't feel like that. He just felt empty and tired. Tired of fucking up, of making stupid choices, of putting all of his faith in the wrong people.

Kreese wouldn't ever do half the stuff Mr. Miyagi did. Johnny had trained with him for years and had never seen his house or apartment or wherever the hell he lived, had never eaten a meal with the man. The idea of Kreese cooking for his students was so outrageous Johnny nearly laughed. He'd never given Johnny a gift like the bonsai. Never trusted him to drive him somewhere.

Dutch let out a groan and slammed his head into the picnic table. "Fuck." he cursed.

Startled Johnny scooped up his bonsai because it'd bounced from the vibration and stared at Dutch. Dutch rolled his head slightly and looked up at Johnny out of the corner of his eye. It was a dark look, one normally that meant a fight was brewing and Johnny tensed.

"I'll meet you halfway," Dutch said. "I won't tell Daniel you want to kiss him or do the naked horizontal tango or whatever, however it works between two dudes. I won't bully him. But I'm not going to not hype you up. Because this is going to drive me nuts," he motioned awkwardly at Johnny. "Because everything is fucked up and it all came crashing down around your ears, you're the one who took all the damage. We just, what don't have a dojo to go to anymore? Fine. I can study something else. There are like three other martial arts places near me that I can walk to from my house or bike to. I could do capoeira or muay Thai or jujitsu to deal with all my energy. Karate was just a cool thing to learn where I made friends. I liked the stupid logo. But I'm not like great at it. I didn't win trophies and I wasn't sensei's favorite or whatever. It wasn't like I was still going to do it after we graduated. I mean you all would probably go off to college and I'm not going to be the oldest person in the damn class left behind. But I know myself and I know I need some sort of structure that those classes offered. Something to do so I'm not just getting high out of my gourd and end up passed out in a cemetery or something stupid. Yeah okay, we were dicks to Daniel. We were dicks to a lot of people. Kreese encouraged it. Pitted us against the new kids who showed up at the dojo and had us beat the shit out of them to weed out the weak ones and when that's what you're constantly told to do it fucks you up. It carries into all parts of your life outside of the dojo. We're all recovering from that. Or at least I think we are. I am. Johnny, you clearly are grappling with it. But like hell am I going to let you spend the rest of senior year self-flagellating and don't you dare say some mopey bullshit about how you're not worth it or whatever. I'm being selfish as shit. We've got a semester left, supposed to be the highlight of our time at school. This isn't like freshman year or something. I'm going to go out with a bang and you're joining even if I have to drag your pathetic depressed ass with me. Hell be our stupid ass 9th wheel or whatever while we go out and get babes. But even if Cobra Kai is dead we're still cobra's for life. We're still fucking friends and I'm not going to let you just drown because you don't want to lift your head up out of the water because Johnny boy you're standing in the shallows and if you just fucking walk out of the water or take our damn offered hands we can get you back up on your feet." Dutch sounded pissed and he was glaring at Johnny, he rolled his head back and closed his eyes breathing into the picnic table. "Dumbass," he muttered.

Johnny just stared at him. Dutch wasn't going to let this go. He was stubborn. They all were. It was the best he could hope out of them. He looked away, out at the trees where a house finch was chirping, blinking hard.

"Fine," he said.

It's not like he could stop Dutch from interacting with Daniel. And it's not like he wanted to ruin the rest of the their senior year. It was a big deal. Dutch was right. College was around the corner after summer was over, what then? It wasn't like they were all going to go together or something like that. Dutch had been adamant he'd do trade school or work once he graduated high school. Bobby, Jimmy, and Tommy were off to college and Johnny didn't know what he wanted to do. He felt directionless, lost. He might regret it, but he also knew that this was Dutch trying. They were all trying and it was more than Johnny had ever dared hope.

Closing In

Daniel noticed Johnny wasn't around almost immediately. The Avanti wasn't in the parking lot at school. He had half a mind to leave and drive to Johnny's house and drag him to school. But what if he wasn't home? What if it was something Daniel had said? What if his Mom was right and he'd overreacted and been rude and now Johnny didn't want to see him again? Johnny was trying. Why couldn't Daniel? Why did Daniel always misunderstand Johnny in the worst way possible? Ali's arm hooked in his in the hall and he smiled at her.

"Finish your science report?" he asked.

"I did. Hey what are you going to do after school?" she asked while they walked down the hall together. No cobras he noticed.

"Go home?"

"No, I mean after we graduate."

"I don't know," he said.

His Ma and Mr. Miyagi expected him to go to college but he didn't really want to. School had been hell, why continue it? But he couldn't break that to them. It'd break their hearts.

"What about you?"

"I want to be a doctor," Ali said with a smile all warm and sparkly and there was excitement in her eyes.

"Dr. Mills, has a nice ring to it," Daniel said.

It did. He could see her being a doctor. She'd be great at it. She was smart, pretty, witty.

She laughed, delighted. "Right? It's a lot of school though. I'm going to be in school forever."

"Good thing you're good at it," Daniel said.

It was also going to be expensive. But Ali's family could afford it. Daniel's family couldn't. His parents had saved up a lot for him to have a college fund and that was for a small college fund. He'd still have to take out loans and try for scholarships and it was just too much of a headache.

She leaned over and kissed him on the cheek before leaving to go to her class. And Daniel put his hand up to his cheek. He liked Ali. He really did. But something had changed. For a moment he thought, maybe we should just be friends. Maybe that would be better. But that seemed ridiculous. He spent a semester getting into fights because he'd tried to win her over, to go on dates with her, and then... and then what? He realized maybe it wasn't what he wanted at all? Johnny would be so pissed.

At lunch, Ali was chewing her lip nervously again. She had noticed there weren't any cobras at school either. No Johnny.

"I guess once you start skipping you just don't have to stop," she said with a laugh but it didn't reach her eyes. It was awkward.

"You're worried about him," Daniel said.

"No! Of course not!"

"You dated for two years."

She blinked at him. "I didn't tell you that."

"Yeah," Daniel said softly. "You didn't."

"Then how? Johnny told you?" Ali whispered, gripping her tray tightly between her fingers.

"Yeah," Daniel said. "Why didn't you tell me? Why didn't you stop me from getting in between you two?"

Ali's eyes narrowed, "Between us? There wasn't anything still going on between us. We broke up."

"Yeah but, everyone else knew. I didn't know. I-I thought he was going to hurt you, you know. It's why I got between you two. Why I started the fight. I thought I was helping protect you. I didn't realize, I mean you didn't mention he did karate, that he was good at it. Like really good at it. You let me-you let me fight him on your behalf blindly."

Ali was frowning deeply. "I didn't let you fight him on behalf. You put yourself between us anyway. I didn't make you do anything. I never make you do anything. You're the one who always misinterprets everything. You're the one who thought I was just using you to make Johnny jealous, who got upset because you thought I cared about stupid stuff like the fact you didn't have a car and your Mom drove us on our date, or who thought I wanted Johnny to kiss me. You always take things the wrong way and run rather than face your problems. So what the hell Daniel?"

Daniel frowned, she was right. "I just, I don't get it."

She laughed and it wasn't a kind laugh. There was an edge to it. "You saw how Johnny was. Why would I want to be with him? Why do you care? Like he beat the shit out of you multiple times. Who would want to be with a guy like that?"

"He's apologized, he's making amends, he's being nice," Daniel protested. "Sure his karate stuff was bad, but he doesn't go to that dojo anymore. He gave it up."

"Seriously?"

"Yeah," Daniel said softly, he didn't add that Johnny probably couldn't go back if he wanted.

"Huh," Ali said.

And Daniel wondered again if he fucked up. If telling Ali these things was giving her a one-way ticket out of their relationship and sending her back to Johnny like some weird party game. Or if he was doing it on purpose so she would.

"Listen," she said after a while of staring at her lunch and then back at Daniel. "Johnny is, he can be...cool. But I don't know what you want from me Daniel." She reached out and took his hand in hers and brushed her thumb over the back of his hand. "We're together now. Who cares that Johnny and I dated for two years? Who cares if he's mending his ways? He's not hurting you? That's great. You guys become friends? Weird but fine. It's better than you getting beaten. But when I make my mind up about something that's it. Done. So like, stop worrying. I'm not going back to Johnny."

Daniel wanted to protest that that wasn't true. He'd talked to her and wore her down into forgiving him and she came back to him. But he didn't feel like pointing it out. It somehow felt like it'd make everything worse. But he also didn't agree with the conclusion she'd drawn. It made him feel like an insecure boyfriend. Was he? He didn't feel like Johnny was out to get Ali anymore. He believed Johnny. But he didn't trust that Ali would stick with him and he wasn't sure if he wanted her to. He felt like he should've cared a lot more. He flipped his hand over and gave hers a gentle squeeze.

"It's just weird that they're not here, like all of them, is all," he said softly.

She smiled. "Yeah, it's like too quiet. But we should enjoy it. Wherever they are there's bound to be some chaos and I feel bad for whoever's with them." She laughed and it was full of mirth and Daniel smiled softly but didn't feel it.

The next day in gym class Daniel was sitting on the bleachers. Even though he couldn't participate and the teacher gave him shit for it, the note was non-negotiable. Dr. Fletcher had put an official seal or something on her forms so it wasn't something kids could forge. The cobras were back, Johnny among their ranks. Daniel kept watching them. The way they'd say something and burst into laughter and Johnny would push them away, swat at them. Johnny fought their familiarity, their advances into his space and that made his stomach twist up in knots.

Johnny didn't shove him off, didn't push him away when he got close. Johnny just let Daniel do whatever and part of him wondered how far that went. Was it because he felt safe because Daniel didn't practice cobra kai? He didn't strike first? So he thought Daniel wouldn't attack him? He'd offered to let Daniel beat the shit out of him, just laid there under him with a look of defeat, hair in the sand, beautiful in the sunlight. Damnit. Every time.

He heard the whistle and jumped. The teacher was yelling at someone and they came jogging over. He recognized Dutch who glanced at him with a look that spelled danger. Daniel wondered if he could run. Out of all the cobras, Dutch seemed the most out of control, the one more likely to egg Johnny on, to continue to torment him despite the ceasefire. But here he was grabbing a water bottle and out of the whole bench, out of the whole set of bleachers, was plopping down next to Daniel.

Being in the same gym class with Dutch was hell. The boy took everything as a chance to trip Daniel, elbow him, kick him, punch him. Bad sportsmanship all the way around. Whatever he could get away with. He wanted to move but it felt like any sudden movements would send Dutch on the attack. So he stayed put and focused on the game, eyes on the teacher, praying he'd keep an eye on them.

"What do you want?" Daniel asked after Dutch finished chugging his water and let out a satisfied breath of air.

"I suppose I should start with sorry for being a shit," Dutch said and Daniel turned to look at him surprised.

At this point, all of the cobras had apologized. Tommy and Jimmy had said it in the classes they shared, Bobby had said it at Johnny's house and Johnny was constantly saying it. He never expected Dutch to say it. The last time he'd seen Dutch Dutch was flipping him off.

Dutch leaned back, arms against the seats behind him, body relaxed and open. "You gotta know the dojo was like our life right? Like before that we weren't friends, hell we didn't even know Johnny before the dojo. Didn't go to the same school, nothin'." Dutch was watching the game. "And Kreese, man, sensei, he was like the toughest motherfucker I'd ever seen. Didn't take shit. Everything he said hit here." Dutch's hand thumped his chest over his heart. "About how life isn't fair, not some kid cartoon crap where the good guys win, but it's actually a shit show and if someone comes after you you got to make a stand, you gotta put a stop to it because otherwise they'll come back and stab you when your backs turned. It's why he had that credo or whatever, strike first before they do so you've got the element of surprise but he also meant that for dating and like life you know? Be the first one to sign up for the shit you want, see a babe you like get to her before anyone else does, don't just sit on your hands and do nothing. You gotta move. Strike hard, don't do anything half-assed, keep your opponent down. You pull your punches and guess what the dude gets up and stabs you. You wanna do something you put your whole self into it otherwise what's the point? If you fail because you didn't put your all into it, well that's on you but if you fail because you did your best and did everything... well Kreese would say there's no failure allowed, but you can still be proud of your effort, right? And No mercy because some fucker will be pissed if you went all the way through those first two and then suddenly stepped back and then they'll get revenge. Some eye for an eye bullshit. So you gotta teach the bastard a lesson. It's what? The whole opposite of your own karate right? Yeah, it's dark as fuck. But it felt like Kreese actually cared you know? In his own fucked up way and wanted us to be badasses who would survive out in the real world when shit hit the fan. And when you feel like you're life is pretty awful already you take that shit to heart."

Daniel watched him. Dutch wasn't looking at him, just talking. And then Dutch's eyes slid over to Daniels and Daniel wondered if he could run. Seeming to sense this Dutch turned back to the game.

"I get some of it man. But the no mercy one always stuck wrong. Bobby never could get over it. Except like once. But if the first two make so much damn sense then why shouldn't the last one? We trusted Kreese. All of us. But most of all Johnny. Johnny's had it rough. He doesn't talk about it but he also can't hide from it. You've been to his house. Sid makes it as unwelcoming as possible. You come to my house or Jimmy's, Bobby's or Tommy's and it's a fucking house. Some parent welcoming you with a smile, some fucking cookies or some other bullshit somewhere to be had. I mean yeah Jimmy's got like three houses, a summer house on a lake, this stupid expensive lodge out in the mountains, and then the mansion in Encino but it's like night and day compared to that bullshit Johnny lives in, like the worlds crappiest Cinderella story. Hell Bobby's parents practically tucked us all in the first time we spent the night over and Johnny looked like he'd been stricken from an adult he didn't know showing him kindness that like we all realized that something was seriously wrong and vowed his fights were our fights and even if he could kick our asses into the ground we'd still help him up when he fell down because when Johnny's your friend he's all in. When he's on your team he puts his all into it. Hell, it was like he was so damned starved for something positive in his damn life that Kreese showed him the tiniest bit of praise and he climbed up the ranks so fast." Dutch sighed closing his eyes and hanging his head back. "To watch him fall like that and be unable to do anything. To see he'd still placed, better than the rest of us, to expect Kreese to clap him on the back and say you'll get them next time, like any other adult or any other normal person should've done and then to see him do that instead? To push him the rest of the way down. It's fucked up. Like what's your life man? So your Mom drove you on your date with Ali? So what? Your Mom cared to do that. Sid wouldn't have let Johnny's Mom do that. Bobby fucked up your knee? Your sensei rushed to your side kneeling beside you full of worry and concern like a good mentor is supposed to do. You made Johnny bleed? Kreese didn't even bat an eye just told him to fuck you up worse and like some fucked up monster ran his fingers through the blood."

"Where are you going with this?" Daniel asked uneasily.

Dutch looked at him and laughed.

"Okay, so let me give you an example of Johnny. Right? Like you know what went down so, whatever. So I just met Johnny right? We're in the same dojo, I'm not really that good but being mean like Kreese wants is easy right? Well, I get sick. So fucking sick. Ate some bad crabs or some shit and like I'm out on the street unable to move and think I'm going to fucking die and Johnny sees me, right? He's walking past with that Walkman of his and I don't say a word because the dojo is like show no weakness bullshit and I'd been there longer or whatever and like if it was Bobby or something Bobby'd help but this kid's new. But Johnny spots me right, leaning in an alleyway like some drunken bum and he stops and he takes off those headphones and he's listening to some rock band or something and he recognizes me from the dojo and he's like "Dutch right? What happened to you?" and is looking around like some ninja's had jumped out of thin air and kicked my ass and not some fried crab monstrosity that I thought sounded fine and was cheap as fuck was using my stomach as a trampoline. I wanted to tell him to fuck off but the dude was hauling me up, asking where I lived and I could just barely say. He dragged my ass home played nurse despite all my bitching, didn't fucking leave my side. Both my parents were out on a business trip so it was just me and he didn't even ask. Didn't look around and say where are your parents? Didn't try to call them. Just rolled up his sleeves and made me eat saltines and drink so much juice and water and kept my head from falling in the toilet when I was too tired to keep it up after being sick for hours. He didn't make fun of me for eating the dodgiest crab in California, he didn't leave, even though I cursed him out, even though despite all my posturing I was glad I wasn't alone, and dude if I liked men I would've fucking asked him to marry me. Like no dude does shit like that. We all got better stuff to do. But Johnny shows up, puts in the effort and the work when you let him. I crashed my bike and he was the first one to notice I wasn't with the group anymore and he's the one who went hunting down the hill I went down, searching to figure out where the hell I went, he's the one who carried me out of that and got me to a hospital. Like he's the leader of our group for a reason. Even if we never say it. And I'm sure the other guys think the same. Have their own stories. It's not just because he could kick our ass or because he won the All Valley twice or was Kreese's favorite." Dutch met Daniel's eyes for a moment then flicked them away again. "He's just, not as bad as you thought okay?"

Daniel looked at Dutch with a frown. Was he being serious? What was happening? Had Daniel fallen into the twilight zone or something? Dutch saw his frown and frowned back then rubbed his hands over his face as he pushed himself up muttering something to himself about maybe he was out of his depth because it was different. Maybe it was harder or something. No wonder Johnny was miserable.

And Daniel perked up at that. "What do you mean Johnny's miserable?"

"When is he not?" Dutch muttered. He sighed, "Listen man, let's not let our bullshit ruin your senior year okay? There's still time to do fun shit. And like we're not going hurt you or anything anymore. Okay? Like Ali, that was fucked up. And I'm sorry you got in the middle of it and we went too far. But she made the stupidest choice the smartest girl I ever met could possibly make. Not that like picking you or anything was stupid, just like acting like she was suddenly too good for Johnny was...hard. And you were just making everything worse man. Ugh, anyway like there's a party at Jimmy's house on Friday, Ali usually comes to those with all her friends, and I know you haven't been to one because well, we've been assholes, so like you can come to this one and have fun and you know be a normal senior or have a good time or whatever. We'll be there, but again, you're fine. And we'll have beer and pizza and shit. Jimmy's cousin works at this brewery or whatever so he drops kegs off all the fucking time. If you don't want to drink that's fine too, there's always soda and Jimmy's aunt brings back tea from all over the world while she's doing business shit and coffee though like drinking coffee at 8pm on a Friday night is stupid, er, but you do you man. We're just, going to try and make things better, make your senior year more fun, right? Like makeup for lost time," Dutch said with a grin before jumping up and running back down the bleachers towards the teacher.

Everything in Daniel screamed it was a trap. They were going to, as he remembered Tommy yelling from the side of the mat, put him in a body bag. But something in him hesitated. Ali was going. Ali apparently always went. She never mentioned it to Daniel, never asked him to tag along. If she went and was fine with Johnny and the cobras being there then why couldn't Daniel? Johnny apologized. What if they meant it? What if they were opening the door to the cool table, what kind of adventures could be in store for him if he said yes? He was mulling it over through the rest of class, through his other classes, and at lunch when before Ali arrived at their table Bobby and Tommy sunk down next to him, chatting about some test they'd taken in the math class they had with Daniel.

"Daniel, what'd you get for number 3?" Tommy asked picking up his grilled cheese and taking a bite like sitting next to Daniel was an everyday occurrence.

"Uh 47," Daniel said.

"Told you," Bobby said with a laugh as Tommy groaned. "You always forget to carry the one."

Before Daniel could ask what they were doing and try and figure out if he'd accidentally sat at the wrong table or not Jimmy was sitting down with Dutch and the table was filling up fast. They were talking about some show they'd seen last night on some channel Daniel didn't get. His heart pounded. What would he say to Ali? Sorry babe guess we're sitting with the school's gang of bullies and I guess that means your ex-boyfriend? They'd left a seat open to his left and he hoped Ali hurried up. Hoped she'd know what to do because Daniel wasn't sure what he'd do if Johnny sat down with them.

He spotted the blonde boy who seemed frozen as he scanned the cafeteria looking for his friends only for him to spot them in a different spot and scan the group only to meet Daniel's gaze. He walked off but Bobby grabbed the back of his red jacket, the cobra patches Daniel realized were gone, ripped off or something and because of age, there was discoloration from where they used to be. He wondered what could go there instead.

"Hold it, hotshot," Bobby was saying. "Where do you think you're going?"

"Our table."

"Who cares what table we sit at? Sit down," Bobby said.

There was a look between the two of them, a command in Bobby's tone, and the way he held onto Johnny's jacket. Johnny went to walk to the other side of the table but Bobby didn't let go and looked at him pointedly and pulled him back. Dutch grabbed Johnny's tray before it fell with practiced ease as if this was some common occurrence and not the most bizarre lunch of Daniel's life and suddenly Johnny was being shoved into the empty seat next to Daniel. Daniel tried to focus on his sandwich and soup and not the fact that at a crowded table Johnny's legs were pressed up against his again and it was warm and how his heart wouldn't calm down and what the hell was he going to say to Ali?

They already misunderstood each other so much and she'd made it this big deal where she was done with this specific group of people and yet here he was surrounded by them as they talked about sports games and laughed about their classes and bemoaned tests and just were...so fucking normal. His fingers curled around the edge of his tray, everything told him to run, but he stayed. Daniel was like his ma, stubborn as hell to the point of doing stupid shit, like poking bears with sticks because of curiosity. And it'd been so long since he'd been surrounded by people since he had to leave Newark that he wanted to know if it was real, if like, he could graduate with friends and more people to take photos with then his ma, Ali, and Mr. Miyagi. Because if he'd still been in Newark with all of his friends his life would've been so different. Though if he ever went back he'd have so many stories to tell they wouldn't believe him.

Louie thought he was lying about winning a karate tournament which had turned into a heated argument over the phone until his Ma took over and was like "yes, yes he did win. Kicked a boy in the face, never been so proud."

He spotted Ali who looked like she'd eaten something sour, face all pinched seeing Daniel sitting next to Johnny and Johnny just eating, not raising his blue eyes to see Ali. Ignoring her. They really were in a new world after all huh? Or maybe that punch Ali had apparently given Johnny had more power behind it than Daniel had thought. Her eyes were full of concern when she met his and he just smiled and shrugged, like I don't have a fucking clue what happened but I'm fine.

Susan who of course had been watching the proceeding stood up and called out Ali's name and Ali's eyes shot over to her old table, the table she sat at before Daniel and she looked back at Daniel, like I'm not sitting there, not with them. You okay if I go sit somewhere else? And Daniel nodded, somewhat relieved, having momentarily forgotten that unlike him, she had people to sit with, people who wanted her around.

He watched her not even come close to their table, quickly taking up her old seat with her friends like she'd never left and the laughter that filled the air. It kind of hurt. Yeah, it felt like a trap, but there was still a seat, she could've still sat across from him like always. She could've at least come over and said something, anything. She could've suffered through it with him.

He looked up from where he'd been stabbing at some stupid vegetable on his plate and saw that Bobby was breaking open some box out of his bag, and plopping lemon squares on everyone's tray, to the delight of most of the boys.

Johnny didn't look up, apparently greatly engrossed in his soup. He looked miserable. Was sitting next to Daniel that bad? Shouldn't he be the one who was miserable? Dutch had spent gym class talking about how they'd make his life better and they'd scared off his girlfriend. How was this better? Was it because of Ali that Johnny was upset? Or was their table one of those things Johnny was attached to? Daniel turned to him with a frown.

"What, did you fight off some bastard to win your old table or something and so you're bummed you're not there? This one not get enough light for you or something? Sorry there weren't a lot of options when I got here. Some people kept blocking me from other tables and I wasn't expecting guests at my pity table," Daniel said, he was teasing but also not.

It was a thin line and he wasn't sure which side this would fall on. No wonder Johnny was relieved his knee wasn't damaged, he was out here picking fights with Johnny when Johnny was miserable for no damn reason. A lemon square was on his tray and Daniel's eyes flickered up to Bobby. A momentary worry of if it was poisoned passed and he looked back at Johnny who hadn't responded.

"You fail a test or something? Get in trouble for skipping school yesterday?"

No response.

The rest of the table quieted and Daniel rolled his eyes. He bumped his leg against Johnny, no response. What the hell? He sighed, there were things he wanted to say but didn't want to say in front of the group and they were too damn quiet.

"Listen, Ma agreed with you okay? Like what you said," Daniel said, quietly trying a different angle, a different approach. He didn't want to explain what, it was embarrassing to admit that apparently, he flirted with danger more than he ought to. "Apparently it's like this thing I didn't realize. But like people back home were used to it or whatever so it didn't cause me trouble there."

This was stupid. Why should he apologize in front of an audience? This would be sappy and stupid and these were not sappy friendly dudes.

"Heard there's a party or something on Friday. Haven't been to a party in California," Daniel tried again.

Nope, that didn't seem safe either. Sure Dutch had extended the invitation, and yeah he wanted to go, but it sounded like he was fishing for a date and that was a bad idea. It's what he'd meant to say to Ali, not Johnny, he tried again.

"It's about around the time that we work on Mr. Miyagi's cars. Was thinking of doing that after school today, you know, if you want to come and help I'm sure he wouldn't mind."

That was more of an even path. More balanced, not too much in one direction or the other. He waited patiently and it seemed the others did too.

Bobby kicked Johnny and Johnny's head shot up with a glare, fingers curling into a fist until he saw the look Bobby gave him. His ears were red, his face was pink. Daniel watched as it spread picking up the lemon bar and taking a bite. Watching Johnny and his friends up close was fascinating, like watching animals in the wild or at the zoo. The dynamic was different. Different than when they were alone, or when they were chasing Daniel. It was like they were telling him to do something and he was struggling like he wanted to fight them about it for some reason, like he was too embarrassed or something which didn't make any sense.

Johnny's blue eyes finally met Daniel's as Daniel licked powdered sugar off his fingers, and suddenly they were gone, looking back down at his tray, ears bright red and Dutch was cackling and Bobby let out a groan and Daniel wondered if Johnny's ears were radiating heat and if he touched his ear if he'd feel it burning under his fingertips and he looked away because if he didn't he'd do it and if he did it he'd die.

There were posters on the walls that he never looked at before, reminders to wash hands and that prom was coming up and senior class photos and the senior field trip and a bunch of games. He wondered if there'd been one for the karate tournament that he'd never noticed before because he always kept his head down.

"Yeah," Johnny said softly after a long period of silence. It was like he was talking to his soup, not Daniel. "I'll help."

"Cool, I'll see you there," Daniel said.

He had to escape before he made a fool of himself. He was done eating, it was time to go.

"Uh, thanks for the lemon square. I'm going to get to class early. Enjoy the rest of your lunch," Daniel said hurrying and making his escape.

Not before he heard Tommy say, "Dude I've never seen someone strike out in such an abysmal way. That should've been easy. What the hell?"

"Shut up," Johnny said.

Invitations

Johnny drove to Mr. Miyagi's after school. Still replaying how tongue-tied and how much of a fool he'd made of himself at lunch. No matter how much he thought it over the guys were just moving too fast. He'd just realized his feelings and they were expecting too much from him.

He couldn't believe Bobby kicked him. Couldn't believe Dutch invited Daniel to Friday's party. They were laying the groundwork they said. He could still hear Dutch's cackle in his head.

At least there'd be work to do at Mr. Miyagi's, something to keep his mind off of it, off of Daniel and the way his tongue had dragged across his thumb while looking Johnny straight in the eyes.

"They're going to kill me," Johnny told the bonsai with a groan. "All of them."

He pulled his car into the parking lot. The yellow ford was there.

He could handle this. He'd just be working. When he worked last time he hadn't even realized Daniel was even there. Not until he finished with the roof.

Mr. Miyagi was setting supplies out and Johnny hurried over. No Daniel in sight. Just like he thought. Daniel might've said "We work on the cars" but Johnny had a feeling it was actually going to just be him. And that was fine. That was better.

"Let me help you, sir," Johnny offered, holding out his hands. He remembered Mr. Miyagi asked him to stop calling him sir. It would take a while to break that habit.

Mr. Miyagi smiled and nodded putting cans of car wax in his hands. "Welcome Johnny-san. Today wax cars, okay? Like showed Miyagi in store. But breathe, yes?"

"Yes, Mr. Miyagi," Johnny said turning to look at the cars in the lot, all in great condition.

He took off his jacket and set it carefully aside, rolling up his sleeves and getting to work. Like fixing the roof, it was nice to work with his hands. Nice to watch progress happen and that he'd done it. It was satisfying.

When he was little Sid had told him if he waxed all the cars in the garage he'd give Johnny a gift and Johnny had worked his ass off, thinking maybe that'd get some sort of common ground between the two, they both liked nice cars. But Sid forgot, asked why he was touching Sid's beautiful cars, even though he'd been doing what he'd been asked, but four or five drinks in Sid had forgotten. Johnny stayed the hell away from the garage and Sid's car collection after that, until he got the Avanti. The only gift he'd gotten was a black eye.

These cars though were loved. Not Mr. Miyagi showing off, not like Sid's cars. It wasn't some stuffy museum to showcase his wealth or status.

He breathed, waxed on, nice circular movements, and breathed and waxed off. The car sparkled beneath the cloth and he smiled, moving to the next spot.

He heard the crunch of feet on the dirt. It wasn't Mr. Miyagi's soft footsteps. Daniel leaned forward looking at Johnny.

"Didn't even bother coming in? Went straight to work? Mr. Miyagi makes this great iced green tea, you really should try it," Daniel said, holding two glasses in his hand, offering one out to Johnny.

"I just got started, but uh...thanks," Johnny said.

It was another heatwave, but he was used to it. He stood, carefully setting his supplies aside. Daniel had changed. No longer wearing what he had been in school. Johnny wondered if he'd had the clothes in his car, or if he left a change of clothes at Mr. Miyagi's for hot days. He was wearing cut-off jean shorts that someone cut off higher than almost any jeans Johnny had seen in the store and a short-sleeved crop top. The karate gods hated Johnny. He took the offered glass, reminding himself to focus.

"In Newark this time of year it's snowing, like up to here," Daniel said motioning to his hip. "How do you live like this? It's always so damn hot."

Johnny nodded, dragging his eyes away from the exposed tan skin and to his green drink. He took a sip. It wasn't like any tea he'd had before. He liked it.

"It's a heatwave. We get lots of those," Johnny said. "You get used to it."

"Is that why you've been wearing long pants?" Daniel asked toeing his shoe over against Johnny's ankle. "I'd suffocate in those."

"They... breathe," Johnny managed. He couldn't say it was because the scratches on his thigh were still healing and the guys kept giving him shit about it. That he didn't want to keep having that conversation with everyone who noticed.

Daniel dipped with a frown on his face to a crouch and felt the fabric at Johnny's shin, a jolt ran down Johnny's spine and he tried to remember like Mr. Miyagi said, breathe, just breathe. Don't forget to breathe.

"They don't feel like it."

"They're linen," Johnny said.

"Is this like some country club thing?" Daniel said standing up suddenly so close he nearly headbutted Johnny.

Johnny leaned back a little. Too close. Way too close. He was forgetting to breathe.

"No," Johnny said. "You can wear shorts at the country club. They impose a length thing, but really only with girls."

Daniel frowned. "That's stupid,"

"Yeah, Ali complained about it all the time. Skirts and shorts on girls have to be knee-length. You'd probably be fine with what you're wearing. They wouldn't really stop you."

Oh god, someone shut him up. Don't point out that everything was short. That if Daniel raised his arms it'd probably be like he wasn't even wearing a shirt. This was Mr. Miyagi's house, an old guy's house, did the guy not care? Or was this some test? Like how in some romantic action book he read the hero had to keep training despite the beautiful babe sunbathing nearby to show he was worthy.

Johnny was just supposed to be waxing cars, not suffering.

He breathed in slowly.

If this wasn't Daniel would he even have cared?

He breathed out.

No, he wouldn't have.

In the summer at Tommy's beach house he'd worn something similar and hadn't thought about it at all. The girls on the beach liked it. He got so many numbers. It was like the time Ali wore a miniskirt for the first time on one of their dates. Sent his mind spiraling and short-circuiting.

"That sucks," Daniel said. "Did Mr. Miyagi tell you how to wax the cars?"

"Yeah," Johnny said trying to find a safe spot to look, but after his dream, it was hard to find a safe spot to look. He tried Daniel's hand, which was holding the glass, but condensation was dripping down his fingers and they were glistening and wet and then he remembered Daniel looking at him while licking his fingers at lunch and Johnny looked down at the drink in his hand and took another sip and then out at the house. "Green tea huh? It's not uh, sweet."

Daniel laughed. "No, Mr. Miyagi says it's healthy. He usually drinks it hot, but on really hot days he makes it cold with ice. It's nice right?"

"It is."

"Hey, so Dutch mentioned a party on Friday. Is this like some more hazing? Am I going to wake up drunk on some stranger's lawn naked and covered in sharpie?" Daniel asked, a playful smile on his lips.

"No, it's a legit party," Johnny said. "And you're invited. Think you'll come?"

"Will you be there?" Daniel asked leaning closer.

"Yeah, I'll be there," Johnny said. "You should come."

Daniel turned back to the car and leaned against it folding his arms across his chest.

"I'm trying to figure out how to ask Ma, she worries, especially if it's full of cobras. But if you're there, she might be okay with it."

Johnny felt warmth flood his veins. He was good with parents, most parents, okay some parents. Just not Sid. Who wasn't really a parent. So he wasn't sure if it even counted. And to know he'd redeemed himself in Mrs. LaRusso's eyes was a relief.

"You can tell her what most people tell their parents."

"What?" Daniel asked quirking his eyebrow and tilting his head.

"Jimmy has a cover for the party, for parents, and I mean it's like actually useful. He invites college kids from different colleges around and promises them free beer and a gift bag if they come down and talk to us about the college experience. Like what to expect, what not to expect, tips for scholarships and passing classes and being on your own for the first time and stuff like that. Stuff to prepare. I think it's some football guys from UCLA this week," Johnny said.

"That sounds like the least cobra party I ever expected to hear about," Daniel said laughing.

"Everyone's drunk by the end of the night, usually the college kids are passed out in some of the guest rooms, but that way everyone's got like a cover if their parents ask. Some tidbit or two, like shower shoes in communal showers are a must, or figure out how to do your own laundry before you go and how to cook like a meal or two."

"Huh," Daniel said with a warm smile at Johnny. "Who'd have thought. California parties are useful."

"Just Jimmy's." He took a sip of his drink. Daniel was right. It was too hot. And yet for some reason, the boy was full of endless playful energy. He realized suddenly that he could make a small move and if he didn't the guys would kill him.

"Do you miss snow?" Johnny asked turning suddenly, apparently too suddenly because Daniel started but he didn't retreat. It was progress.

"Well yeah, this isn't winter. This is like summer part two revenge of the sun," Daniel said, recovering and tugging his shirt from his chest with a frown.

"Do you still have all your winter stuff?" Johnny asked. "From Newark?"

"Yeah. Why? Can Johnny Lawrence also make it snow?"

There was teasing in his eyes a playful smile tugging on his lips.

"No," Johnny said. "But there's stuff planned like through the rest of the year."

He scuffed his shoe through the dirt, looking down at it. He could do this. If Daniel was willing to go to a party. He might be up for this. The guys had said to make his year better. So he could do it.

"Figured after the tournament we'd just keep the party going, or...whatever, that was the plan. So this week is a college party. Next weekend we're driving out to Jimmy's family's lodge. It's out in the mountains near a ski resort with snow. You want to come with?" Johnny asked, trying to keep the hope out of his eyes and face, trying not to seem too desperate for Daniel to say yes.

Daniel's brown eyes were wide, looking up at him. He pushed off the car, suddenly close again. "Seriously?" Daniel asked.

"Seriously," Johnny repeated, softly. Trying not to retreat. To stand his ground.

"A lodge, with actual snow?"

"Yes."

"For a whole weekend?"

"We could pick you up from South Seas on that Friday, bring you back Sunday night."

Johnny's hands felt clammy. It sounded like a date. A date that was a sleepover. A date that couldn't be a date because Daniel was dating Ali, but they could still spend the weekend together, enjoy the snow. It could be fun. He'd make the guys promise to behave.

"Hell yes!" Daniel said like Johnny had just awarded his a thousand dollars.

His hand came to Johnny's arm, his forearm, and gave it a squeeze because Daniel as Johnny was realizing was like a cat, who for some reason needed to show he was okay by touching and kneading him like he was dough, for some reason it was pleasant.

Johnny smiled softly, he'd done that. He'd finally invited Daniel to something that made him happy, did something that made him happy, that smile was because of Johnny. And it wouldn't be a problem. The guys would've actually probably killed Johnny if he hadn't attempted to invite Daniel. That or they would've done it anyway. Scheming bastards.

"Great, pack your warm clothes, and a good winter jacket and boots. The snow usually comes up to my knees," Johnny said. "Not as deep as Newark, but, it's still snow."

"I can't wait," Daniel said and then he was pulling away, taking the empty glass from Johnny's hands, fingers brushing his. "Have fun waxing the cars."

Johnny nodded, turning back to the cars and the task at hand. They would be proud. This couldn't hurt Ali. Right? Like it was just normal. Going to a ski resort with friends. To a lodge.

He picked up his tools again and went back to work. He felt great. It wasn't a date date, it wasn't like going on trips with Ali or anything, but he'd get to spend the whole weekend with Daniel, and he'd see him at the party and Mr. Miyagi still had a lot of stuff to do around the house. And maybe that was enough. Maybe he didn't need to steal him away from Ali, maybe just being his friend would be enough for him. The guys wouldn't like it, but this, this was nice. A gift of snow for a homesick kid from Jersey.

It took a while because Johnny wanted to do a good job. And when Mr. Miyagi came out and said he'd done a good job Johnny felt pleased. The sun had set, and the low light hit just right so the cars practically sparkled.

Mr. Miyagi herded Johnny inside and to a table where Daniel was sitting on the floor and dinner was waiting. Johnny sat next to him, the food was delicious like last time and Daniel talked the whole time, animatedly moving his hands, talking about how his Ma was making him take his crutches everywhere and how sitting out at gym was awkward and how the gym teacher nearly fought him over it and Daniel had dared the teacher to call Dr. Fletcher and waste her time repeating what was already on his note. And how silly it felt to be on the sidelines and unable to play.

He mentioned the party on Friday and Mr. Miyagi perked up at that, asked about the party and then Daniel's hand slapped down on Johnny's thigh, as he explained it was one of the other cobra's parties and apparently it was some fancy college thing to like learn more about college culture but also fun and that Johnny would be there and it'd his first party this school year, other than the beach party that was really just soccer on the beach that ended badly. Johnny felt awful as he remembered that night on the beach, but Daniel didn't move his hand and Johnny did his best to ignore it.

He focused on using the chopsticks. He was getting better at it he thought, but it still wasn't easy.

Mr. Miyagi was nodding and saying it sounded fun and turned to Johnny.

"Johnny-san have parties often?"

"Oh, I don't. My home...it's not the best for parties... I can't really host them. But my friends can, so they do, and they're nice," Johnny said.

His Mom didn't care about the parties, just told him to be careful with his drinks and make sure everyone behaved themselves and didn't drink too much. But Johnny would never even think to have a party at Sid's. He had birthday parties there when he was younger, but he quickly learned they weren't for him, it was for Sid to show off, an excuse to have meetings and rub elbows with other people who had kids and try and get on their good side. It was all smoke and mirrors. One of the only useful things he'd found Johnny for as a kid was an excuse to have parents over who he hadn't otherwise found an in with.

"Ah, I see," Mr. Miyagi said with a nod, scooping more food onto Johnny's plate.

"We are having events for the rest of the year though," Johnny said. "Next week is a lodge at a ski resort that Daniel might join us on."

He didn't know why he was telling Mr. Miyagi, he was too excited, it wasn't a date, it really really wasn't a date.

Mr. Miyagi nodded, smiling softly.

"Daniel-san excited to see snow?"

"Very much so," Daniel said with a grin, the conversation turning to Newark like usual, telling about how much snow they generally got, how much he missed winter being actual winter, and all the fun things to do during winter.

Johnny listened, he felt odd. After a while of mulling over what was different, he realized it was because he felt relaxed. He didn't want this moment to ever end. He wanted to spend forever sitting on the floor around Mr. Miyagi's table with Daniel and Mr. Miyagi. Daniel could talk about whatever he wanted, Johnny didn't care. His continuous stream of conversation was comforting, the hand on his leg was comforting. The food Mr. Miyagi gave him was delicious, the way he always refilled Johnny's plate, the way he listened intently to anything Johnny said.

It was so nice. He felt so calm. Tears pricked at the corner of his eyes, he wanted to put his hand over Daniel's and give it a squeeze but was worried it'd be misconstrued somehow.

Johnny didn't want to leave, he didn't want to go home. Let him set up his tent in the yard and he'd be happy forever if he could just stay with these two.

The tears threatened to fall so he looked up, he didn't want to have to explain himself.

He breathed in and out, slow deep breaths.

Mr. Miyagi had given him a list, things to do throughout the rest of the week until Friday, things to do over the weekend, and it was such a relief that he was welcome back, that he could keep coming back. Painting was next, there were lights that needed to be replaced that Johnny could easily reach, Mr. Miyagi was going to show him some basic gardening, he had weeding to do, was going to prune some shrubs, sand the wooden boards outside, there were birdhouses and bat houses Mr. Miyagi wanted to make, was going to show him how to fix stuff around the South Seas apartment complex, was going to show Johnny how to fix some cars. They were going to rotate the tires, change the oil.

It was a long list and Johnny couldn't wait to come back, was so glad that the door was open to him to come back again and again. That he could be useful.

7 minutes in heaven

Chapter Notes

Moving some things around from the movie(s) timeline again.

As the week progressed Daniel found the ex-cobras at his table daily. They fell in around his table as if they'd always been there. They joked with him, they settled into their seats the same as before and Ali went to her old friends. Daniel didn't know why he found it a relief. He liked it more than he felt like he should've. Bobby brought treats every single day. Lemon bars turned into cookies which turned into brownies and cupcakes. It was like a never-ending pile of sugar.

"His family owns a bunch of bakeries, using his great grandmother's recipes and create their own. They're always experimenting," Tommy explained while they were digging into the cupcakes. "Trying to come up with new things to try, so their home is always bursting with sweets."

Bobby laughed. "I'm always sent to school with treats to try and get rid of some of them, but it's like trying to bail water out of a ship with a teaspoon."

Daniel was down for it. They were always delightful and it was nice to be a part of something, to share something. He wondered, what it'd be like to have them all in his tiny apartment, all these guys who lived in big houses, crammed around his kitchen table while he and his mother made one of her Italian dinners that was always too much food. They weren't there yet he knew. It'd been less than a week, but maybe, if their relationship started to heal the way it had been with Johnny then maybe, maybe he could cram them around his kitchen table and his mother would delight in feeding so many people.

Maybe they could start slow though, with Johnny. Johnny seemed to be in the need of home-cooked meals made with love and not from staff that were rude to him. He always looked so stunned and happy whenever Mr. Miyagi cooked for him that Daniel wanted to cook for him too. What would the look be on Johnny's face if Daniel made one of his mother's recipes and then set it down in front of Johnny? He wanted to see it.

Johnny he noticed didn't talk much at lunch, but when he did they all quieted and listened. It wasn't like he wasn't being a part of the conversation, he was just quiet. He listened intently.

Throughout the week despite not seeing Johnny on Monday Daniel saw a lot of him. After school, he was always at Mr. Miyagi's home. While embers of jealously still sparked when he realized Mr. Miyagi was training him the way he'd trained Daniel it was hard to be too mad for long because Johnny didn't know. Johnny hadn't asked to learn. He just thought he was helping and doing chores. And there were things Mr. Miyagi had Johnny do that he'd never asked Daniel to do, like weeding or changing the light bulbs, which made sense. Johnny could reach them without needing a ladder.

He wondered if Mr. Miyagi would ever tell Johnny he was training him slowly.

Plus there were some things he had them all do together like fix the cars. The way he popped the hood and went over the basics and showed them how to fix things. It felt nice, like something Daniel had dreamed of doing with his dad when he was older, if his dad hadn't died.

And Johnny was so attentive, like a sponge, soaking up everything. A month ago Daniel would've scoffed, why would a rich boy from Encino need to know how to fix a car when he probably had enough money that if he got a flat tire and could just buy a new car rather than replace the tire. But Daniel had seen how Johnny cared for the Avanti, how he'd never complained while he worked, and treated each of the cars Mr. Miyagi had him work on like they were precious.

Johnny had even waxed Daniel's Ford and Daniel had been so shocked. Mr. Miyagi had come out to see him off and smiled by his side.

"He waxed my car too!" Daniel said. "I didn't even notice!"

"Johnny-san has a good heart," Mr. Miyagi said. "Hard-working."

"Are you going to tell him you're training him?"

"Not yet. Still too much darkness, too much pain, too wounded. We pull him up out of the darkness first."

Daniel thought about that with a frown. It felt like Johnny was on the mend, but then he remembered at dinner the glassy look Johnny had gotten all of a sudden. He'd been about to cry but had held off.

Mr. Miyagi didn't want him to become obsessed. Didn't want Johnny to fall into old habits.

He'd watched Mr. Miyagi slowly and methodically adjust things. He was trying to get him out of the military habits Kreese had instilled. Johnny no longer stood, waiting with his hands behind his back. He still stood with his head held high and his shoulders back, but not with his arms locked behind him while he waited for Mr. Miyagi to give him orders. He was catching himself from calling Mr. Miyagi sir.

There were all sorts of things Daniel never realized were bad habits that Kreese had instilled and like with his bonsai Mr. Miyagi was carefully trimming the rotten parts. The parts that Kreese had poisoned. He was healing wounds and Daniel hadn't even realized that's what Mr. Miyagi was doing.

Mr. Miyagi had seen a glimmer of who Johnny could be and was working hard and patiently to help Johnny there like the way he'd helped Daniel all the time.

"So Daniel," Jimmy was saying and Daniel looked up from his tray. "You coming tonight?"

"Uh yeah," Daniel said.

"Awesome," Jimmy said pulling a piece of paper out of his notebook and scribbling something down on it and then handing it over to Daniel. "The address, time, and phone number, in case your mom gets worried or something so she can get a hold of us. The numbers for the office phone, so like if things get wild that room never is. It's off-limits, we make sure to check for parent calls just in case something happens."

"Do things happen?" Daniel asked taking the paper concerned.

"One of the girls, Susie I think it was, her younger brother had his appendix nearly burst so her parents tried to call and get ahold of us to let her know because they were at the hospital. Thankfully it's the only time we've had to use it."

"What did Susie do?"

"She was drunk but wanted to be with her family, so Johnny drove her to the hospital," Tommy said with a smile. "We try to keep a few designated drivers around in case of emergencies. But a lot of people just pass out around the house and drive home in the morning. Their parents don't care, but some people, their parents do care. So we drive them home or call them a taxi."

"Why didn't you send her in a taxi?" Daniel asked turning to Johnny.

"She was crying, freaking out... I didn't think she should've been alone," Johnny said quietly.

He had icing on his cheek, Daniel realized and reached out rubbing his thumb over Johnny's cheek before he could think of why that'd be a bad idea to do in front of the ex-cobras. His mom did it all the time, he'd done it for Louie, for Ali, it was just a habit and he acted before he thought about it. At least he stopped himself before licking the icing off of his thumb and wiped it on a napkin instead, at least he didn't lick a napkin and dab Johnny's cheek the way his mom did.

He breathed before anyone said anything. He gathered up his tray with the napkin.

"I'll see you all there," he said taking his tray and hurrying away before they could ask him what the hell? Before Johnny could react. Before he could deal with the fact that what he'd wanted to do had been to lick it directly off of Johnny's cheek and was so glad that he had at least that much impulse control.

He would've died. Johnny would've killed him. He was lucky Johnny hadn't hit him for babying him.

He could hear their laughter, the ex-cobras laughter and he glanced back, Johnny was as red as a tomato. He hurried to his classroom, heart-pounding, half expecting Johnny to bolt up and charge after him, but the footsteps never came.

Daniel drove up the long drive to Jimmy's house. He was on time. He didn't know if California had its own party rules. He'd heard that early was too early and to never be early, but he wondered if fashionably late was the time you were supposed to arrive.

But Daniel couldn't handle sticking around the house any longer. His mother was bursting with questions, hovering and reminding him to be careful, kept touching his hair. He couldn't handle it anymore. She wanted him to take the crutches and he told her he'd take care of himself. He wasn't going to like go for a run or something stupid. She asked if he planned to drink and he said he didn't know, if he felt safe, maybe. He got a lecture for that, but he didn't want to lie to her. She could always see straight through him when he did.

"You keep an eye on your drinks. Every drink you have you drink water too, lots of water. Alcohol is dehydrating, it's not like having a glass of wine at one of our family dinners. This is a party it'll be easy to forget. So drink water and eat. Eat lots of snacks or else you'll be too sick to enjoy your Saturday. I'll put a glass of water and some aspirin next to your bedside table. Take some money," she said pulling out her wallet and pushing some cash in his hand. "Don't you dare drive home if you do any drinking, take a taxi. Okay? Promise me you won't drink and drive, even if you think you'll feel up for it?"

He promised her, pocketing the cash. He wasn't planning to get blackout drunk. He just thought if he was offered a beer or something he wouldn't turn it down. Unless it was a trap. But he was starting to think it wasn't. Not with the way the ex-cobras talked at lunch. Not the way they interacted with him in class. Not with the way they sort of surrounded him, not ready to rip him apart or fight him, but like friends that wanted him included.

It didn't feel like pity. It didn't feel like how it was sitting at lunch with Ali even though every day her friends called her name. The way when they first started dating she'd hover for a moment torn, how the one time Daniel sat with them, how awkward it had felt. How clearly they hadn't wanted him there. Just Ali. But they were suffering his company on her behalf. How they clearly thought this was a phase, that he wasn't good enough. They never said it, but it was the atmosphere. They shared things, they talked to each other, but it never included him.

It wasn't like the treats Bobby put on his plate, not like the conversation that flowed easily, how they asked Daniel things about their shared classes, invited him to hang out.

The red Avanti was parked in the drive and Daniel parked his car next to it. He half expected to see the bonsai in the passenger seat and wondered where it was, would Johnny risk taking it into a house that was expected to be full of drunk high school kids and college football players? Daniel wanted to ask them about sports programs, were they harder to get into? Were there clubs he could join to do soccer that wasn't like a fancy scholarship league? If he was going to college he wanted to play soccer again, he figured he could start over and try again. He'd wanted so badly to be a part of a team when he'd moved to California and that dream had shattered early and he'd found something else, not a team, but karate. He doubted colleges had karate clubs, and he didn't really want to do karate in college. He didn't want to learn under anyone but Mr. Miyagi.

He stood on Jimmy's doorstep. It was as intimidating as Ali's when her parents had suddenly shown up and he'd knocked a brick loose. He took a deep breath and knocked. It was such a big house he wondered if the doorbell would've been better. There wasn't music pounding yet, but there were a few cars around the house, so it hadn't not started yet. The door swung open and Jimmy grinned.

"Hey Daniel! Come in man, usually, people just come in, but like, thanks for knocking," he said holding the door wide and stepping out of the way so Daniel could come in. "College kids are here if you want to ask them questions before the party gets rolling. They tend to come early and we chat with them to like break the ice or whatever. I'll...actually..." Jimmy stopped himself and turned his head. "JOHNNY!" he yelled and Daniel jumped.

"What?" Johnny called back.

Daniel caught sight of him, he was carrying a keg.

"You asked me to move the kegs, what do you want now?"

"Daniel's here, show him around will you?" Jimmy answered, voice carrying through the halls, his tone sweet and a grin on his lips.

There was a loud thunk of the keg being sat down heavily and then Johnny was coming to the door glaring at Jimmy. "I swear you host these parties so that you can get us all to do work for you so you can just flit around and flirt with girls."

Jimmy burst out laughing, and slapped Johnny's shoulder, pulling his hand away quickly when Johnny flinched.

"Dude, Daniel's never been here. It's a fucking maze, you know that," he said holding out his arms all at ease and motioning towards the rest of the house. "So yeah I'd rather start making moves on some hot babes, do you blame me?"

Daniel didn't think he'd ever seen Jimmy so at ease, he had the home advantage and he gave Daniel a wink. "Have fun Daniel, welcome, make yourself at home," he said before dipping off into another room with a big smile on his face. There was no malice in it but it was a side of Jimmy he had never seen.

Johnny sighed next to him and Daniel looked up at his blue eyes, he was rubbing the back of his neck.

"Yeah, okay," he said. "Follow me."

He turned and headed down the halls.

"So you're on time, which is cool, the college kids always arrive early to settle into the guest rooms or whatever and we spend the time up to now running errands for them because their guests. I think Dutch is still out trying to find some fancy Greek yogurt they need for breakfast. The amount of food they can eat was overwhelming. I thought we ate a lot. So this is where the kegs are," Johnny said opening a door to an outside patio where several kegs sat. There was a fire pit in the distance that Tommy was coaxing to life and a pool.

He continued on to a kitchen bigger than Daniel's apartment. Johnny opened the fridge and pulled out glass bottles of soda and twisted off the caps, passing one to Daniel. "Mexican Coca-cola," he explained tapping his bottle against Daniel's with a clink of cheers then motioned to the bowls set out. "Snacks, all help yourself. Did you eat dinner?"

"I did," Daniel said sipping from the soda wondering what the deal was, why Johnny hadn't offered and then had just foisted the drink upon him, but then he tasted it, it was different, better, he looked at Johnny, eyes wide and Johnny smirked,

"Good, yeah these go fast, so it's a plus of coming early. Jimmy's family has an in with drink manufacturers around the globe, so there are always fun drinks in their fridge to try. Next time they've got Japanese soda's I'll grab you and Mr. Miyagi some, but their latest shipment was from Mexico," Johnny said opening the fridge and pointing out the colorful sodas with labels in Spanish. "These are those, but these, are the best of the group," he said holding up his bottle. "There's also all like the regular sodas you can find at the store," he said motioning towards all the brands Daniel was familiar with, all the cans of soda.

"There's no food in this fridge," Daniel said in shock. It was the biggest fridge he'd ever seen and it was all soda and beer.

"Yeah, they've got four fridges in here."

"Seriously?" Daniel said studying the room, "Where?"

"They're hidden, they match with the cabinets," Johnny said pulling open a cabinet that Daniel thought was a pantry and revealed a fridge that when he opened it he saw was full of food. "It's good it's hidden because when people start smoking they get hungry and after all our running around for the college kids, we really don't want everyone to like demolish the fancy shit we had to hunt down for their breakfast. We're going to order a shit ton of pizzas so don't worry, there will be food," Johnny said heading to another end of the kitchen then turning and motioning with his head for Daniel to follow.

He unlocked a door from a set of keys he kept in his pocket and showed Daniel the office. The walls were covered from floor to ceiling with bookshelves crammed with books and a big desk with a big chair and a phone in the middle. "This is the phone Jimmy was talking about, the number you gave Mrs. LaRusso right?"

Daniel nodded. "Yeah, I left her the info Jimmy gave me."

"So this is where she'd call. There's a voice answering machine. We check it several times throughout the night. If for some reason you need to make a call and it needs to be quiet, use this phone. The walls are thicker here, so the party doesn't filter in as much. But come find one of us if you need to make a call. We keep it locked because any rooms that are unlocked end up being used and Jimmy's parents would murder us if teens made out or had sex in their office," Johnny said ushering Daniel out and locking the door behind him.

Daniel felt his face burn red. He hadn't thought of that. Johnny had said it so casually. He followed Johnny down the hall.

"Bathroom number one," Johnny said opening the door. "There are twelve bathrooms. But only four are going to be open. If we leave too many things open people end up in them and it requires more cleaning," he said, showing Daniel where all four of the bathrooms were before walking him to a living room where he could hear people talking, low male voices laughing.

Johnny opened the door and motioned for Daniel to grab a seat on one of the chairs. Daniel sunk into it and was surprised at how comfortable it was. Sitting around the room were college guys, a few college girls, and a few of Daniel's classmates. One of the guys was broad-shouldered and had an easy smile. He had green eyes and brown hair and was talking about the cafeteria food at UCLA.

"You need something, find one of us okay?" Johnny whispered quietly into Daniel's ear that sent a shiver down Daniel's spine before Johnny left.

Daniel wasn't worried about being alone at a party. He was a people person. He thrived around people. He liked talking. But this was his first real California party and if he was honest with himself he'd kind of hoped Johnny would stick around, stay by his side. Introduce him to people. But it was fine. Ali was supposed to come anyway, and maybe outside of school it'd be easier, maybe people wouldn't treat him like a pariah like they had after the first fight he'd gotten in on the beach.

A girl was asking the guys if classes were really as scary as they sounded. The green-eyed guy laughed.

"Oh no, like some classes are hard, but I had this teacher post on their door that they had a headache so our final was open book if we could promise to be quiet. Like if you actually study a little and drop out of classes that think you'll fail no matter how hard you try or study or if you think you'd be bored or would hate it before the cut off then you're fine."

Daniel leaned forward. "Are there casual sports clubs?"

Green eyes fell on him. "Yeah, there are clubs for everything and if they don't have it you only need like what, three or so other people to start a club. You want intermural sports. We play varsity football ball but sometimes we play with the intermural teams. It's less pressure and more fun, so we can test out things in a low-stakes environment."

Daniel took this with a smile, listening as they answered questions about Greek life, about events, and dealing with stress. Before Daniel knew it the room was filling up and he realized he heard music in the distance. He'd had his fill of listening to the college kids and stood, letting some girl take his seat and going off to explore, wondering where Ali was.

Dutch's arm found his shoulders almost immediately after leaving the room and Daniel stiffened but Dutch paid no mind steering him away.

"I heard you were around," Dutch said with a grin. "Of course Johnny stowed you away in there, he knew I wouldn't even check. Hate the college guys, they're so...annoying. I thought the football team at least would be cool, you know, it's a contact sport, but nah, they gotta eat diets that are all measured out like a prissy purebred rich ladies dog. Annoying as hell." Dutch was steering him through the halls.

There was a group hanging out in one of the large hallways, groups of girls and guys talking animatedly and Johnny listening.

"We're thinking of playing games, you wanna play some games Daniel?" Dutch asked, there was something mischievous in his smile that made Daniel uneasy but Daniel wasn't about to back down from a challenge.

"Sure," Daniel said.

"Sweet, told you guys, Daniel's down. Let's play."

He motioned for them to all follow him and he opened one of the doors and Daniel found himself in a rec room. There was a pool table in the corner and a dartboard on the wall. It reminded him of a bar and sure enough, there was a wet bar fully stocked in a corner. There was a ping pong table and a couple of chairs around a stack of board games, but Dutch led them to a couch. His hands went to Daniel's shoulders again, maneuvering him to sit down next to Johnny.

He picked up a hat, "So teams, right, teams of two? So let's do some charades yeah?" Dutch said with a grin hooking his arm with a girl.

"Want to be on my team?"

She nodded and carefully picked a piece of paper out of the hat.

Of all the games Daniel expected Dutch to go with he hadn't expected charades. He'd expected beer pong, or something cliché like spin the bottle. Having spent most of his dates with Ali at the theaters all the movies were fairly easy for Daniel to get. They'd seen Ghostbusters together, Footloose, The Terminator, Indiana Jones, and so many more. He and Johnny were winning and it was exciting. The losing team was pushed into a closet. Daniel didn't pay attention, too focused on their strategy, on winning that when they started to lose, he was shocked.

It'd switched over suddenly from movies to sports and Dutch was winning and the other teams knew more about California sports than Daniel did, and then they lost the round and Dutch was grinning and Johnny was glaring at Dutch like Dutch had planned this, but it was random. It was topics, they had no way of knowing that Daniel only paid attention to his home teams in New Jersey and didn't care about fancy California sports. No way of knowing that all the other teams would be better at it. Daniel was being led to a door and he noticed something he hadn't until that moment, all the other teams were one girl and one boy.

"Hey," Daniel said as Dutch opened the door wide with a grin pushing him into the linen closet. Daniel caught himself from falling, looking at Dutch, trying to figure out what was happening.

"Sorry man, this is the only way it works. The girls won't play with Johnny. Tried the whole damn party. No one would pair up with him. But they still wanted to play 7 minutes in heaven. It's the only way this will work. Besides you're dating Ali, so the girls wouldn't play with you either. So you know, thanks and have fun," Dutch said slamming his hand hard on Johnny's back and kicking his foot out so Johnny tripped into the closet. Dutch quickly slammed the door shut and locked it.

Daniel reached out and caught Johnny before he fell. After carrying so much stuff for Mr. Miyagi and training he could manage it. Johnny fell into his chest and arms pushing him back a bit, but Daniel changed his stance and kept them upright, so they wouldn't go tumbling and possibly knocking their heads into the shelves.

"So sneaky," Daniel said. "Or I'm so utterly oblivious. I didn't even realize what was going on."

Johnny's hand was on his arm and shoulder and his head was bowed and Daniel looked down at him as Johnny tried to figure out how to untwist his feet because there were bags of stuff on the floor that he'd gotten tangled up in. He grinned despite himself, catching Johnny, being able to look down at Johnny, at his soft-looking blonde hair was nice, to be so close he could smell his shampoo and that cologne. Johnny having to use him to stay upright, practically clinging to him like Daniel was sturdy the way he knew Johnny was, was such a change of roles that Daniel was delighted. Before Mr. Miyagi they both would've fallen to the ground, but the fact Daniel could catch him now and keep him steady was proof that Mr. Miyagi was making him stronger than he looked.

"7 minutes in heaven is a middle school game," Johnny said sourly. "Can't believe Dutch paired it up with charades, the bastard."

His ears were red Daniel noted and he filed that away with everything else, Johnny's breath, the hair that softly tickled his chin, the feeling of his hands, the way he was being held onto pressed up against while Johnny freed one trapped foot and then the other before standing upright.

"Sorry," Johnny said. "Dutch is an overgrown child."

Daniel laughed. "It's fine, I mean what he said makes sense. Anyone else and Ali would kill me. But why can't you play with some girl?"

Johnny looked away from him, there really wasn't a lot of space, so he couldn't retreat. "When Ali breaks up with someone apparently they're out of the dating pool. She's too popular."

"Seriously?" Daniel asked.

"Yeah, her family has too much pull. I'm like untouchable the rest of senior year."

"But she broke up with you."

"I think it makes it worse, somehow, like if I wasn't good enough for her, then I'm not good enough or worth the effort for anyone else," Johnny said looking up at the light bulb and the cord swinging.

Daniel watched him with a deep frown. He said it so casually, like he'd just given up on dating for the rest of the year. A year he was still determined to have fun during but solo, like a forever third wheel. No wonder they kept grabbing Daniel to hang out with Johnny. Daniel rose his hands to just above Johnny's elbows, testing to see where the flinching started, careful to not go up too far.

"That sucks, I'm sorry."

"It's fine, it's probably for the best if I don't date any other girls at our school."

"We're keeping you too busy anyway," Daniel said lightly trying to cheer him up."I mean Mr. Miyagi's got you working so hard."

Johnny looked down at him and those blue eyes looked so dark in this lighting he smiled so softly, such a small smile. He didn't smile a lot but he had been more recently and it always made Daniel's heart flutter.

"I like helping."

The thought of chores making someone happy was such a weird thought to Daniel, but he knew that feeling of making Mr. Miyagi proud. It was like winning something. He got it. Daniel had so many questions he wanted to ask Johnny. He wanted a book on Johnny, to read it from the beginning, wanted to know about his parents, wanted to know everything, wanted to collect all those smiles that made him feel warm inside. He wondered if he could make Johnny smile more. If he could, like Mr. Miyagi said help pull him out of the darkness, nurse his wounds and keep him by his side.

"Did you get your questions answered?" Johnny asked.

Daniel frowned, confused. He hadn't asked Johnny his questions yet. Had he said something aloud?

"The college guys?" Johnny asked again.

"Oh, yeah. It was interesting. If I go to college I think I'll try intermural sports, like soccer."

"Sorry about that," Johnny said softly.

Daniel smiled up at him gently giving his arms a squeeze. "I'll forgive you for that one," he said, teasingly. "If you help me find somewhere and some group to play with before the end of the year."

It was a joke, he was already too busy, but Johnny nodded thoughtfully.

"I'll ask around."

Right, Johnny took his requests seriously. He laughed softly, he could ask the guy to find him a piece of the moon and he'd probably bring him one. That was too much power to give Daniel and the possibilities were endless if he let his mind go down that route. He had to be careful with this power.

"Have you seen Ali yet?" Johnny asked after a while.

He was speaking so softly but Daniel was so close that he could hear everything if he tried, the sound of Johnny's heart-pounding, the gentle sound of his breath.

"I haven't. Where is she usually?"

Johnny tilted his head thoughtfully. "Her and her friends like to swim in the pool and then hang out in the jacuzzi. She also always brings a notebook full of questions, so she's usually like spending an hour or so with the college students, taking notes. She drinks some, by her third drink she's usually dancing. If she's on her fourth drink..." Johnny trailed off like he didn't want to say and then sighed. "Be near her if she's had her fourth drink."

"What happens then?"

"Dance with her. She gets... handsy," Johnny mumbled. "Flirty."

Daniel flushed, he'd never seen Ali drink, at least not much. He'd seen her have a beer once or twice, but the fact Johnny knew her habits reminded him that Johnny had been with her long enough to pick out the pattern, had seen every part of Ali, they'd probably had sex. They knew each other better than Daniel ever could guess. He probably knew what she liked. How to touch her, where to touch her. And she'd probably seen all the faces Daniel had been collecting, knew how he felt in her arms. What Johnny liked. It was too much and he couldn't get his mind off of it. He couldn't let go of Johnny and he had nowhere he could go. He was trapped with this knowledge, this realization he hadn't thought of. Was Johnny good in bed? Did they do it a lot? Did Ali miss it? They were going slow but was it too slow?

He looked away from Johnny down at the towels heart pounding. He didn't even have a condom on him. What if she wanted to? He wasn't prepared. Would she be prepared? Was Johnny the kind of guy who always had a condom on him? Should he have been carrying one with him all this time? Their relationship felt too volatile for it to happen suddenly at a party. Like they were constantly getting into fights. But maybe that was like a preamble and he just hadn't known. He thought maybe at prom he'd try to be prepared. It was far enough away that he didn't have to think about it. But Johnny had said people had sex or tried to in Jimmy's house during his parties. Did Johnny and Ali have sex in this house? Is that why Ali never invited him to come along? Because it'd be too difficult not to compare the two of them? Did he even want to have sex with Ali?

"Hey," Johnny said gently, arms breaking free from Daniel's hands. "You okay?"

"I didn't bring a condom," Daniel said, it burst out, it was embarrassing. But he was panicking. If she was ready he should be ready right? But he wasn't ready, or at least he didn't think he was ready. Not yet. He thought he'd have more time to figure it out, everything out.

Johnny flushed bright red, from his face to his ears, down his neck. It probably wasn't something to say to Johnny. To have this conversation with him, ever. But Daniel was freaking out. He breathed in and shut his eyes and breathed out, like how Mr. Miyagi taught him.

"I"

Daniel looked up at Johnny, he was struggling with something. It was probably just as hard to talk about. He lifted up one of his hands and ran it through his hair.

"There are...some..."

He seemed like he didn't want to say, like talking hurt him, he covered his eyes.

"In the bathrooms," he whispered.

He was pale, the redness had left, retreated somewhere and suddenly the door was opening and Dutch was there. He was grinning and Daniel watched his eyes travel between the two of them and fade and twist with a look of worry and concern. Daniel ducked past Johnny and Dutch and out of the closet and out of the room.

First he'd find Ali, he'd feel better when he found her. Maybe they could just dance today. Or have fun. He hurried through the halls.

The football players were gone, she wasn't in the kitchens, she wasn't dancing in the room where the music was coming from.

He found a window and yeah, there was her car, she was there.

He hurried to find her, going to the pool which was full and he watched the bodies moving in the water and she wasn't there.

He checked the fire pit, studying faces in the reflecting of the flames, he checked everywhere feeling panic well up in him again.

Why couldn't he find her?

He saw her friends.

They didn't even say hi to him.

He found the jacuzzi.

He spotted her hair and opened his mouth to say hello, ready to climb in with a joke on his lips about how hard she was to find or well long time no see or what's a girl like you doing in a place like this but as he stepped closer, quietly on the balls of his feet he saw her head was moving in a weird way.

She wasn't alone.

She was kissing someone, she was sitting in a guys lap, her fingers in his hair, his hands on the small of her back. She'd brought a bathing suit.

Daniel felt cold, took a step back, and another.

The guys eyes flicked open and he caught Daniel with a steady deep green gaze. He lifted a hand from her back and waved at Daniel. The college guy. The football player from UCLA.

Daniel turned and ran.

Bad at Beer Pong

Dutch wanted to know what happened, asked if Johnny was okay.

Johnny nodded, he wanted to be anywhere else.

Apparently, that wasn't enough, Dutch wanted more.

"I told him that after 4 drinks Ali gets...flirty, so he went off to find her," he said.

Dutch frowned.

"I think I'm going to just make rounds, enjoy the rest of the game," Johnny said pushing past and ducking into the hall.

He didn't want to hear what Dutch had to say.

He wandered around. He passed water to the ones too drunk, gave them snacks, aired out rooms that reeked of weed, cleaned up as he walked around. It helped to have something to do. Not thinking of how close Daniel had been to him, the concern of how panicked he'd looked, regretting what he'd said.

Of course, Ali and Daniel would have sex. Johnny just didn't want to know about it, didn't want to think about it.

Instead, he answered the door for the pizza and carried the heavy pile of boxes into the kitchen.

Bobby stumbled into the kitchen, hair mussed and lipstick on his lips like a smear, shirt a mess, and a different color of lipstick on his neck.

"Hey man, you okay?" Bobby asked.

"Yeah," Johnny said.

"Dutch said-"

"Damnit."

Bobby smiled slightly. "Listen, it's fine."

Johnny pushed at Bobby trying to direct him out of the room back to wherever he'd clearly been having a great night.

"Go do whatever, don't worry about me."

Bobby could stand his ground like a cement block when he wanted and he just grinned at Johnny. Clearly enjoying being an immovable object.

"Nah, dude we're sorry. We forgot that's how Ali gets when she drinks. Dutch said you looked like you'd seen a ghost, or some shit when he opened the door. What happened?"

Bobby pulled up a stool in the empty kitchen settling in like he wouldn't leave without an explanation.

Johnny sighed, no one else was around and Bobby was leaning forward, all ears, all active listening even though he looked ridiculous like Dutch had just pulled him out of an intense make-out session or probably, possibly something more.

"Dutch gave an excuse for why he shoved Daniel and me in the closet, the whole no girls going to touch me thing. So Daniel wanted to know why and so we started talking about Ali and that was such a bad idea and I-"

"Told him that after 4 drinks she starts making out with people and grabbing asses?"

"Not as crude, but yeah."

"So?"

"Well he panicked, he didn't have... a condom,"

"So not a problem," Bobby said leaning back with a shrug.

"So I told him where he could find some."

"YOU DUMBASS!" Bobby shouted, a look of horror on his face that looked so out of place.

He had lipstick on his ear Johnny realized and on his chest where the shirt was buttoned all wrong and showed the skin underneath. They were all different colors and Johnny wondered what sort of life Bobby lived when Johnny wasn't around.

Johnny ducked his head.

"I know."

"You fucker, you cockblocked yourself in like the worst possible way. You pushed them together, who fucking pushes the person they like into the arms of someone else?" Bobby asked burying his head in his hands.

"I know okay? Just, I'm fine okay. I'm fucking fine."

"Idiot," Bobby said shaking his head.

"Just go back to your orgy or whatever," Johnny said kicking at the stool Bobby was on. "I'm not in the mood for one of your lectures, okay?"

Bobby laughed. "Johnny, how do you always do this shit to yourself?"

"Bobby," Johnny growled. "Piss off okay?"

Bobby slipped off of the stool, hands up, and picked up one of the boxes. "Okay okay, but damn dude. Here we thought we were making some good progress and you just put us back so much."

Johnny threw one of the white plastic pieces that came with the pizzas at Bobby who quickly left the room. He buried his head in his hands with a groan.

He knew he messed up, but he also didn't know how to have avoided that situation. He couldn't think of a different way he would've talked to Daniel. He would've felt guilty holding that information in.

He went back on his rounds, letting people know pizza had arrived and where to find it. He tried not to think of Daniel, tried to not think of Ali.

The guys found him, slowly throughout the night, eyes full of concern. Bobby had apparently relayed his fuck up amongst them, so they kept checking on him.

It was pissing him off. He was fine.

Tommy asked if he wanted to drink, offering to swap out as designated sober person.

Johnny declined.

He'd rather not be drunk and upset, who knows what he'd do then? He feared he might hunt for them through the party, try to pull them apart, he might get into a fight, or make things worse.

No, it was better to be sober and miserable.

He cleaned up abandoned drinks, listened to people talk, moved around easily, and then he noticed something out of the corner of his eye, something that made him pause.

Daniel was sitting by himself on the steps to go upstairs and Johnny thought about passing him, ignoring him. He didn't want to hear about their time together. But he couldn't. He knelt down instead.

If he had to hear about their time together, well so be it. His heart was pounding. He didn't know what to say or what to do.

"Hey," Johnny said softly.

Daniel's head lulled a bit as he lifted his head up and Johnny got the smell of alcohol. Daniel reeked of it.

"Heeeeyyyyyyyy," Daniel said. "Guess what?"

"What?" Johnny asked.

"I learned how to play beer pong! And!"

"And?"

"I learned I suck at beer pong!" Daniel said with a laugh.

"Have you eaten?" Johnny asked.

Daniel shook his head.

Johnny carefully coaxed Daniel to his feet. Daniel swayed and leaned heavily against him. Johnny deposited him on a stool in the kitchen. The one Bobby had been in earlier.

Johnny filled a glass with water and a plate full of pizza and set it in front of Daniel. Daniel ate hurriedly.

"Slow down," Johnny said gently.

Daniel laughed. "I'm too slow."

His laugh was bitter and then into the third slice tears started rolling down his face.

"Hey," Johnny said sitting down next to him. "Hey, what's wrong?"

Daniel shook his head, shoving more pizza into his mouth, brushing tears away with the back of his hand, cheeks full of pizza like a chipmunk trying to save things for later. He inhaled more pizza, downed the water, and wiped his hands off on the napkins then looked around at the teens slowly coming in to grab more pizza, the laughter, and the conversation.

He grabbed Johnny's hand and pulled him along as he slid off the stool and away.

Johnny followed, unsure of where they were going. He followed Daniel down the hall and up the stairs.

Daniel kept trying doors, they were mostly locked. A closet opened and Daniel nodded, it seemed to be what he wanted and he pushed Johnny in and closed the door behind him.

It was one of the bigger closets, one that stored foldable chairs and Daniel used one to lock the door in place so no one could open it from the outside. He collapsed onto the floor of the closet pulling Johnny down with him.

Johnny sat with his legs crossed and Daniel sat across from him, sitting close and resting his knees over Johnny's. He buried his head in his hands and breathed, tried to breathe.

Johnny reached out and patted Daniel's shoulder, it always helped with sad drunken teens.

"It's okay," Johnny said softly. "Whatever happened, it's okay."

"I found Ali," Daniel said, head lowered.

"Yeah?" Johnny asked.

"Yeah," Daniel said quietly.

The only tell that he was crying again was the sparkle of tears falling, the brief moment the light hit them before they disappeared into the carpet.

"She was in the jacuzzi, the hot tub, with one of the UCLA guys."

Johnny felt his heart sink, a chill run up his spine.

"Oh," he said.

"Johnny," Daniel whispered looking up at him, tears streaming down his cheeks. "Am I just a fool? Was she using me? Just something to make you jealous? A pitstop between you and some other buff guy? Was it all some elaborate joke? A palette cleanser? A rebound? I feel like such an idiot," Daniel said rubbing his eyes.

Johnny gently cupped Daniel's face in his hands, brushing away tears. "No."

Daniel laughed, it was watery. "You don't know that."

Johnny let his hands drop, it had probably been too much. "Maybe not all of it, but your not an idiot or a fool. I'm sorry that this happened, that she-"

"Kissed another guy? Some football player? I mean, she had you for two years. How was I supposed to compete with someone as pretty as you?"

Johnny flushed, no one had ever called him pretty before. Anyone else and it would've been a fight.

Daniel surged forward hands coming to the side of Johnny's face. His lips pressed against Johnny's.

Surprised Johnny tried to speak but Daniel took it as an invitation and his tongue was suddenly in Johnny's mouth, filling it with a taste of beer and pizza, exploring, almost as hungry as when he'd demolished the plate Johnny had given him. Like Johnny was something else he needed.

His other hand was hitching Johnny's shirt up, trailing up his stomach.

Johnny tensed and Daniel's fingers trailed up abs to splay his palm against Johnny's pec and squeezed.

Johnny pushed Daniel away.

Daniel struggled towards him, practically crawling into his lap, his knee dangerously too close.

"Daniel," Johnny whispered. He tried cracking a smile, but his heart was pounding in his ears. "I normally don't let someone feel me up until like the 5th date."

Daniel frowned at this.

Johnny hurried to continue. It was a joke. He was trying to keep this light, to be focused. He wanted to let Daniel go, see what he did, but he also knew Daniel was drunk and hurt and this was a mistake and Daniel would regret it.

"I also don't let drunk people get too far. I'd rather people remember they kiss me, you know?"

Oh god. Daniel was practically pouting.

"Did you break up with Ali?" Johnny asked gently.

"No," Daniel said, surly like a toddler.

"Then this shop is closed," Johnny said.

He was scared that Daniel would get up and run, embarrassed over his mistake. He didn't want to not encourage it, the kiss, the warm hands on his skin that sent a shiver down his spine. But he had a rule, he didn't make out with drunk people unless they were already dating, and even then he pissed Ali off so many times because of it. He also didn't help people cheat. Even if it was in revenge. Even though he technically forced a kiss on Ali, as his own revenge on both of them. He'd regretted it almost immediately. Deserved the punch.

Johnny moved carefully, pulling Daniel into a hug and rubbing his back. He didn't want Daniel to think of him as a drunken mistake, didn't want to be a desperate response to a broken heart. Even if he wanted everything that was happening.

Daniel started crying again but buried his head in Johnny's shirt which he managed to pull back down.

"Have you ever had alcohol before?" Johnny asked quietly after a while. After the shaking of Daniel's shoulders stilled.

Daniel rolled his head slightly. "Wine."

"Yeah? What all did you have tonight?"

"Beer, just lots of beer."

"Mrs. LaRusso okay with you drinking?"

"Yeah, she gave me money for a taxi," Daniel murmured into Johnny's chest.

"I'll give you a ride home," Johnny said.

Daniel's fingers curled into Johnny's shirt, gripping it tightly into his fist. "I don't...I don't want to see her. I can't go home before her. I can't Johnny... I just can't."

Johnny lifted his hand to look at the watch on his wrist. He knew Ali well, knew her schedule, the way she worked. Her parents were strict about what time she had to be home. They had an hour until her curfew. If she drank one of her friends usually drove her car home and spent the night.

"Okay," Johnny said. "I'll take you home after her curfew."

Daniel nodded and his breathing calmed and slowed and Johnny looked down. Daniel's eyes were shut. He'd fallen asleep.

Johnny wanted to laugh. How ridiculous. How absolutely ridiculous. How was this Johnny's life? Stuck in a closet with Daniel, who was curled up in his arms fast asleep. There had to be a joke in there somewhere. If Dutch found out, he'd know the joke. He'd make it immediately and Johnny would have to hit him. Even if it was witty.

Johnny leaned his head back against the wall. It was nice, the weight of Daniel against him.

Johnny listened to the party dissipate. The music being turned off, the sound of cars leaving the drive, the loud sounds of conversation dwindling, of bedroom doors being opened as college kids made their way to the guest rooms.

He heard Jimmy outside of the closet talking to Tommy.

"Have you seen Johnny in a while?"

"No, not for a couple of hours."

"Think he's moping somewhere?"

"I don't know. I mean I didn't see Ali and Daniel. I kind of was expecting to find them making out in some corner somewhere but Ali's cars gone and that yellow banana boat is still in the drive."

"Huh, and the Avanti is still here?"

"Yeah."

"Hope they didn't get into a fight."

"Ali and Daniel or Johnny and Daniel?"

"Seriously? Which one do you think I'd actually care about?

"Just checking. You think they might've gotten into a fight?"

"If Johnny got too jealous, maybe. He's fucking hopeless man. Who cockblocks themselves like that? He's such a dumbass."

"Yeah well, he's our dumbass."

He heard Jimmy laugh and Tommy joined in. "Oh, I hope he's not in some corner totally broken-hearted. Why the hell is your house so big?"

"Yeah, right? The fact he has keys makes this a fucking nightmare. Like looking for a needle in a haystack. A sad blonde needle."

Johnny heard their footsteps retreat. Ali was gone. He gently patted Daniel's shoulder.

"Daniel, time to go home," he said softly.

Daniel didn't wake just tried to bury his face. Johnny frowned, trying to figure out logistics.

He slipped his arm under Daniel's legs and adjusted him, standing and taking Daniel with him, carrying him gently in his arms. He kicked the chair away from the door and then leaned against it, shifting Daniel in his arms. He managed to free a hand to push the door open and carefully readjusted his grip heading out into the hall.

Daniel was light, it was almost as easy as he thought it'd be. He walked down the stairs, moving carefully. Daniel's head was leaning against him, eyes still closed.

He managed to get to the front door without running into anyone.

Classmates were passed out around the open rooms, sleeping on the floor, on the couches.

He pushed the front door open and made his way to the Avanti, carefully lifting Daniel over the door and into the passenger seat, glad he'd kept the top down. He got into the driver's seat and then leaned over to buckle Daniel in.

The drive to Reseda and South Seas was peaceful, quiet. Daniel slept the whole way.

He carried Daniel through the gate and past the pool and up to the second floor and knocked gently on apartment 20 hoping it wasn't too late, hoping that Mrs. LaRusso was the type of mom he thought she was. The kind who stayed up waiting, worried but also ready to smile and welcome her son home.

Sure enough, the door swung open and a look of surprise and shock and concern quickly flooded her features.

"He's okay," Johnny said quickly, whispering. "Just asleep. He drank, played beer pong and I don't know how much he drank but he passed out. Where's his bed?"

Mrs. LaRusso quickly moved out of the way so Johnny could carry Daniel into the apartment.

"You know, his father wasn't able to hold his booze either. Started falling asleep on me at bars," she said with a soft laugh shutting the door behind Johnny and then hurrying to lead Johnny to Daniel's room.

Johnny set him down gently, noting the glass of water and the aspirin already set out. Mrs. LaRusso was ready for whatever came tomorrow.

He untied Daniel's shoes taking them off and setting them on the floor before carefully pulling the bedding aside and covering Daniel. After a moment he gently guided Daniel onto his side, just in case, and pulled a trash can closer before standing.

Mrs. LaRusso was watching him with a soft smile.

"Good party?" Mrs. LaRusso asked walking with Johnny into the kitchen.

"Kind of. I'm not sure if Daniel had a good time or not. I think, maybe... don't ask about Ali, there were... some problems," Johnny said softly.

Mrs. LaRusso frowned, worry etching into her brow. She looked like she was about to launch into a bunch of questions.

"It's not my place," Johnny said. "He's okay, physically, he ate pizza, drank water, and tomorrow if he calls the number he gave you then I can come back and get him so he can get his car. If he's not feeling well enough, we'll figure something out. I'm spending the night at Jimmy's so, just let him know okay?"

Mrs. LaRusso stepped close to Johnny and he stiffed but her arms wrapped around him in a hug. He'd expected a slap, he didn't know why he had. It felt silly after she hugged him to think that'd happen, but it was his instinct. To prepare to be hit.

"Thank you," Mrs. LaRusso said. "For taking such good care of him, for watching over him, bringing him home."

"Of course Mrs. LaRusso," Johnny said.

She pulled away from him and he moved towards the door. "Have a good evening Mrs. LaRusso."

He slipped out of the warm apartment and back out to his car. The ride back was quiet but lonelier without Daniel asleep next to him.

He parked and went into Jimmy's home. He beelined to the kitchen scooping up a piece of pizza and eating it.

He thought he'd eaten but now his stomach was growling. The pizza was cold, but it was still good.

"Where the hell have you been?" Bobby asked.

Johnny turned and saw them all. His friend's faces an array of emotion, relief, anger, worry, and concern.

"Took Daniel home," Johnny said around his pizza.

"Why do you hurt yourself like this?" Tommy asked taking a seat next to him.

Johnny shrugged. "He was drunk."

Bobby blinked in surprise, Jimmy's mouth hung open and Dutch burst into laughter.

"Daniel LaRusso, drunk? What did Mom LaRusso say?" Dutch asked.

"She expected it," Johnny said with a shrug. "Already had water and aspirin waiting on his bedside table."

"Wish my family was that cool," Tommy murmured.

"What'd he drink? I never saw him around the keg," Jimmy asked.

"Beer pong," Johnny said. "Apparently."

"Glad he had fun, but you didn't," Bobby said poking Johnny in the chest. "The whole point of all this is that we and I stress we all have a fucking fantastic rest of our senior year."

"Sorry we can't all win a seat in an orgy," Johnny said swatting his hand. "Not my type of thing anyway."

Bobby flushed lightly. "It wasn't an orgy, just a genius game the college girls brought, spin the bottle meets twister. It was amazing."

"How'd I miss that?" Dutch asked pouting.

Bobby laughed. "Did you seriously not notice what I was doing when you slammed the door all panicked calling my name?"

Dutch folded his arms across his chest. "Well damn."

"If you all don't mind, I'm going to crash," Johnny said pushing himself up. "I'm fine, don't worry."

He knew if he told them everything that happened that night they'd probably yell at him some more, probably would feel better, but it wasn't his place to tell them what Ali did, wasn't his place to tell them what Ali and Daniel didn't do, and he really didn't kiss and tell.

Besides he'd have to explain to them why he pushed Daniel off of him and they'd chew him out for it.

It wasn't any of their business.

He climbed the stairs up to the room that he always stayed in at Jimmy's and unlocked the door and pushed it open.

His bonsai sat safely on the bedside table. He closed the door behind him and locked it.

He kicked off his shoes and padded across the room to the en suite bathroom and stripped to shower. He paused catching sight of himself in the mirror.

Nothing about him gave away that Daniel had kissed him, there were no marks on his chest, just the memory of the feeling.

He stepped into the shower enjoying the warmth on his skin.

He hated that Ali had made Daniel cry, hurt him so bad that he'd turned straight to drinking. He hated that he was the one who told Daniel about where to find Ali and how Ali was when she drank. It wouldn't have changed that she cheated on Daniel with a UCLA football player, but maybe it would've saved him the heartache of stumbling upon it. Of having to see it with his own eyes.

He wanted to find Ali and demand to know what she was thinking, but she was still avoiding him, still refusing to talk to him.

It just wasn't fair to Daniel, after everything.

He took a deep breath breathing in steam and sighed.

What happened next was up to Daniel and Ali. As much as he wanted to interfere it wasn't his place. All he could do was be there for Daniel.

He stepped out and dried off and brushed his teeth.

His first kiss with Daniel was so bittersweet. He hadn't really expected it to ever happen, but for it to happen because Daniel was drunk and hurt felt worse. He'd keep it to himself. There was a chance Daniel wouldn't remember or would be too embarrassed to even talk about it, so Johnny wouldn't press it.

He changed and curled up in the bed with a sigh. It'd felt nice, Daniel gripping him tightly, kissing him like that, passionately a little desperate and needy.

It'd been such a Daniel kiss, seeing an opening and taking it.

Johnny picked up the other pillow on the bed and covered his face in it.

He was screwed. There was no hiding it from himself anymore. He really liked Daniel. Wanted to kiss him more, it was unfair to get a taste like that, a glimpse of what could be, or worse, hope. Hope that Daniel liked him, more than a friend which he wasn't even sure they were yet, enough to want to kiss Johnny and not just because he happened to be there when Daniel was drunk and upset.

Nothing but Breath

Daniel's mouth felt like something had crawled into it and died. His teeth felt fuzzy and his tongue was dry. His head was pounding and he thought he heard a sound when he opened his eyes, they hurt. He wondered where he was, then saw his stuff, his room.

He pushed himself up slowly. He didn't remember coming home. He took the water and the aspirin, threw the aspirin into his mouth, and drank the whole glass of water. It helped.

He made his way to the bathroom and looked in the mirror. He looked like hell, still wearing last night's clothes but they were all wrinkled and messed up from sleeping in them, hair was sticking up, eyes looking bruised, but not nearly as bad as when he'd gotten a black eye.

The light was too bright and he squinted. He looked miserable. He washed his hands and brushed his teeth then walked out into the kitchen.

"Hey! Good morning!" his mother said and he winced.

Her voice was too loud, too chipper. His hand went to his head with a groan.

She laughed, directing him to sit. She was making eggs and toast she set a plate with some orange juice in front of him and then poured him a cup of coffee.

He looked at the food and felt sick.

"I know, looks bad, but you got to eat," she said.

"How'd I get home?" Daniel asked.

"Johnny brought you home," she said.

Johnny.

Daniel cursed putting his head in his hands.

He'd kissed Johnny.

He'd ran stubbornly and drunkenly through first and second base. He hadn't kept his hands to himself, if Johnny hadn't pushed him off who knows what he would've tried to do.

He felt his face heat up, his heart pounding.

He probably would've tried to steal third.

He remembered seeing Johnny blush and he had just gone for it, he couldn't believe he'd done that. He was a menace to society.

Why hadn't Johnny hit him? Why hadn't Johnny pushed Daniel off and just left him alone in the closet to be miserable by himself?

He'd tasted like mint and it'd been so soothing, Daniel hadn't wanted to stop, even when Johnny had pushed him away.

He didn't remember leaving the closet and he looked up at his mother.

She was watching him curiously.

Daniel had to ask.

"Did he look...upset? Like pissed? Mad at me?"

"He said you played beer pong and fell asleep, so he carried you here. He tucked you in," she laughed softly. "No way he was mad at you."

Daniel flushed darker burying his face in his hands again. How was he going to face Johnny?

"Oh, he said he's at Jimmy's today, so when you want the Ford he can come get you and take you back so you can drive it back. If you're feeling up for it," she said motioning to the piece of paper Jimmy had given Daniel that was pinned to the fridge. "Did you have fun?" she asked quietly like she was worried.

"I," Daniel paused and sighed, he didn't want to worry her. "It was fun. I played charades with Johnny and some kids from school and then beer pong, which I'm not good at," he laughed softly.

It hadn't been a totally awful night. It had been fun. It'd just been overshadowed. He didn't want to cry more. He didn't want to feel the burn of shame at throwing himself at Johnny. Or on Johnny.

"Did Johnny say anything else?"

"Said you ate pizza and drank water, so not to be too worried," Mrs.

LaRusso smiled softly. "Despite being a terror for nearly six months, he's turned out to be a really nice kid."

"Yeah," Daniel said picking at his egg. It was runny, the way he liked it but watching the yolk spill onto his plate made him feel nauseous. He picked up his toast and took a bite of that instead.

"You know if I'd had a Johnny in my life when your Dad and I were out partying life would've been so much easier," she said with a laugh.

Daniel looked up surprised. He drank his juice and dipped his toast in the yolk. He didn't want to waste his mother's cooking even if it made his stomach turn. Maybe if he focused on her and not the food it'd help.

"Your Dad always fell asleep at the bar if we stayed out too late or if we drank too much. He'd just pass out. I'd have to drag him out." Her eyes were sparkling at the memory. "He was always so damn heavy, I always joked that I needed to work out more before we'd go out. Seems like you have similar drinking habits."

Daniel felt stinging in his eyes. It wasn't like they didn't talk about Dad, but it still always hurt. There was so much they didn't know. So much he'd never know.

He'd never know that Daniel won a karate tournament.

He'd never meet Mr. Miyagi, but he would've liked Mr. Miyagi.

He'd never meet Ali, he'd never give him advice about what to do next because Ali had kissed someone else and Daniel had kissed Johnny.

He'd never help Daniel untangle his feelings.

He'd never be at their kitchen table laughing at what Ma said, teasing her back about her drinking habits. He'd never know the similarities between the two of them. Between father and son.

Tears fell down Daniel's cheeks and Mrs. LaRusso smiled, tears running down her cheeks too.

She hugged him and he breathed in her perfume and hairspray.

After a while, he pulled away and she returned to her seat, brushing tears from his face. He turned to his breakfast, determined to eat it.

The coffee helped more than he expected. When he was done he smiled at her.

"Thanks Ma. I think I'm going to go see if Mr. Miyagi's around. And I'll uh decide what to do about the Ford."

She nodded but didn't press him about anything and he felt relieved. He loved his mother but telling her about Ali, about Johnny, it just felt wrong. She loved Ali or thought he did and had only just started liking Johnny. He didn't want to change any of that.

He needed to think and Mr. Miyagi's advice hadn't sent him down the wrong path yet. He found his shoes, shoved his feet in them, and then headed down to Mr. Miyagi's workshop.

The wooden chimes clanging as he pushed open the screen door. Mr. Miyagi was fixing something at his desk and Daniel felt relieved to see him.

Daniel sat down in one of the stools nearby. After a while, Mr. Miyagi set the thing down and looked at Daniel.

"Daniel-san okay?" he asked.

There was worry in his tone, concern in his eyes and Daniel felt stricken. He'd cried so much last night and this morning and it felt like the waterworks were too much and he needed to reign it in. He wanted this to be a smart conversation, a logical one, not filled with his tears.

"Yeah, kind of, sort of, I guess not," Daniel said softly with a frown.

"Party go bad? Boys start a fight?" Mr. Miyagi asked.

Daniel shook his head. "No, we played games and they were nice to me, welcoming."

He laughed, it sounded bizarre to say it out loud. Who'd have thought the ex-cobras would be in the same place as him without a fight or some torture happening.

"Have fun with Ali-san?"

Daniel looked away from Mr. Miyagi's searching eyes, trying to find the source of Daniel's pain and striking straight to the point.

He took a deep breath.

"She uh, I didn't get to talk to her. I found her, but she was kissing a UCLA football guy."

Saying it aloud switched something, saying it to Mr. Miyagi in the light of morning pissed him off. After everything, they'd been through. After all the shit Daniel had had to deal with. He laughed bitterly.

"I think I know why she never invited me to any of these parties before. Why her friends wouldn't talk to me. Why we sat on our own and not with them. They never made an effort. Heck, Johnny's friends, those ex-cobras have made more of an effort to make me feel welcome at school than my girlfriend's friends. I can't believe it. I'm just a detour, an experiment for her, she wanted to see what it was like dating someone who isn't built like a Greek or Roman statue made of marble, wanted to know what it was like to date a loser, someone without the fancy car or the big house. She wanted to date someone from the other side of the tracks, from Reseda just probably for points or something. It was probably pity, she probably didn't even like me. Maybe she dated me because I got my butt kicked my first night here and lost the friends I'd started to make almost straight out of the gate because of her. Felt like she owed me but didn't actually want to be with me, so she's probably been going to these parties and kissing other guys and-"

"Daniel-san!" Mr. Miyagi said stiffly.

And the words in Daniel's throat on his tongue died before they reached his lips.

"Breathe."

Daniel took a deep breath.

"Has Daniel-san talked to her?"

Daniel shook his head.

"Daniel-san must decide, whether the relationship can make it over this or not. Must decide whether it's worth it to Daniel-san or not. But now Daniel-san too upset. Too hurt. Like explosion will hurt both, will make things worse."

Mr. Miyagi turned and picked up one of the bonsai and set it down closer to Daniel. "This Bonsai nearly die. Take a while to figure out what the problem was. Very sick. No other bonsai sick."

"What was wrong with it?" Daniel asked, the bonsai looked fine, healthy.

"Roots were sick," Mr. Miyagi said nose wrinkling with a deep frown. "Making bonsai sick. Bonsai gets its strength from roots, when roots are sick, when something is attacking the roots, when its poisoned, tree can't survive. Have to cut loose the dead roots so tree could focus on what was healthy and heal and flourish. Daniel-san must decide what is unsalvageable. Or what is. What will help Daniel-san flourish. Daniel-san must know what he wants."

Daniel looked at the tree, studying it. If he'd been asked by someone which bonsai had nearly died he wouldn't have been able to pick this one out. But he thought of the roots, probably damaged, probably different than the other bonsais.

"Thanks Mr. Miyagi," Daniel said.

Mr. Miyagi turned and then paused."Daniel-san, remember, high school almost over. Soon will be in past. Soon will graduate and everyone will move on, change. Important to do things Daniel-san wants to do. High school not last forever."

Daniel smiled softly. It was weird to realize that Mr. Miyagi and the ex-cobra's had the same thought process. The same belief.

Now though he just had to figure out how to go get his car.

Mr. Miyagi looked back at him and raised an eyebrow, waiting.

"Johnny brought me home, I..."

His mother was okay with him drinking, he'd had sake with Mr. Miyagi, but admitting he'd drank until he passed out felt embarrassing to admit to him. But he also didn't lie to Mr. Miyagi.

"drank a bit much. So I have to go back to get the Ford. Feels a little awkward to call Johnny to come back and get me."

Not just because he'd have to figure out what to say after trying to steal as many bases as Johnny would let him.

He felt his face warm and he turned to the bonsai.

"Johnny-san offer?"

"Yes, but-"

"Johnny-san not offer if not want to do."

Mr. Miyagi made it sound so easy, so simple. Talking about Ali was one thing. Talking about Johnny was another. He couldn't tell Mr. Miyagi what he did.

So he just said, "Yeah, I guess I'll go make a call then."

"Tell Johnny-san if he want, have plenty to do here," Mr. Miyagi said with a smile.

Daniel laughed. "Okay, Mr. Miyagi."

He pushed himself off the stool and left. He'd have to face Johnny eventually and maybe being stuck in the Avanti with him would give him enough time to think of something, and it'd be better than running into him awkwardly at school.

He'd also have to talk to Ali.

He didn't know how to handle that.

Jimmy answered the phone all professional-like, a voice that took Daniel half a second to place even despite introducing itself as Jimmy.

"Uh...it's Daniel, Daniel LaRusso," he felt like an idiot.

He'd been so nervous that Johnny would answer, thought for sure Johnny would.

"I left my car there. Ma told me Johnny said to call..." Daniel swallowed, his fingers curling up in the phone cord.

What if Johnny had told them?

"Oh yeah, the banana boat's still in the drive. Did you leave your keys?" Jimmy asked.

Daniel frowned and patted his pockets, his keys were still there, along with his wallet.

"Uh, no I've got them here."

"Okay, I'll go tell Johnny and see if he'll drive out to get you and bring you back. Got a number for me to call you back at?" Jimmy asked.

Daniel listed off the numbers for the apartment number and he listened to Jimmy repeat it back.

"Yeah that's right."

"Cool, talk to you later," Jimmy said and hung up.

Daniel hung the phone up feeling queasy. He wondered if he should call Ali and set something up. To meet her somewhere. Talk about it. But he felt a flash of anger and sighed. Thinking about Ali made him angry, frustrated, hurt. He wasn't ready to confront her about it yet. To try and figure out what he needed to do, to thrive like Mr. Miyagi said.

The phone rang and he jumped, scrambling to grab it.

"LaRusso household, Daniel speaking," he squeaked.

"Hey."

It was Johnny and his voice sounded different on the phone, deeper. Daniel's heart sputtered in his chest.

"You want me to come get you? Take about 20 minutes. That good?"

"Yeah...yes, that'd be good...great...uh...see you then?"

Daniel's tongue felt heavy in his mouth, unwieldy. The words didn't come out as smoothly as he wanted.

"Okay. See you then. Bye."

There was a click and Daniel held the phone to his chest. Fuck. That was just a damn phone call. His heart was racing. The sound of Johnny's voice in his ear had made the hair on the back of his neck raise and Daniel didn't know what to do with that. Twenty minutes. He didn't know if he could calm down in twenty minutes.

"You okay?" his mother asked.

"Yes," he squeaked putting the phone back.

He cleared his throat, tried to calm down.

"Johnny's coming in twenty minutes to take me."

Oh god, that sounded wrong, why did everything sound wrong, like some euphemism?

"Uh...back to...get my car."

"Okay, well drive carefully. I'm going to the store. Need anything?" she asked hoisting her purse over her shoulder and setting some sunglasses on her face.

"No, thank you," Daniel managed.

She went to the door and paused. "Your taxi money, offer it to him as gas money or something for coming out of his way so much. Or buy him lunch."

"Yes Ma," Daniel said.

She nodded, pleased, and left.

Daniel sunk to the floor. He needed to think. He had twenty minutes. What would he say to Johnny?

Hey there, sorry I jumped you, I was drunk.

No. Made it seem like he jumped anyone when he was drunk...maybe he did, he didn't know he didn't drink that much usually. He felt horror run through him. What if that was who he was when he was drunk? Someone who jumped people until he got tired and just passed out? What if he was like Ali?

No drinking with strangers. Not until he knew for sure.

Part of him whispered that it was because it was Johnny and it was ridiculous to think otherwise. The way his ears turned pink, how it all contrasted with his blue eyes, the way he'd looked at Daniel, shocked enough that his lips had parted.

All that focus on Daniel, listening to everything he had to say, not paying attention to anything else. Daniel wanted more of that.

He groaned, this was not going where it needed to. He needed a plan, not to just explore his memories and actions. He figured he needed to apologize.

Step one, apologize.

For what though?

Sorry, you had to come all the way out here again. Sorry, I'm a messy drunk, thank you for everything.

That felt safer.

He'd skip past the drunken kiss and fondling, the assault and groping.

Daniel frowned. Johnny was coming to get him.

If he was pissed he'd say so. If he was upset he'd say so. Right?

Johnny hadn't when Daniel had pushed him down into the sand and tried to start a fight.

He hadn't when Daniel had scratched him. Hadn't when he was mean to him.

Why would Johnny make his feelings known now? He held it all in.

He let Daniel get away with too much.

But he had stopped Daniel. Had put distance between them, and then held him while he cried.

So there were boundaries.

If Daniel kissed him today would he push him away again? Did Daniel want to kiss him again? Yes. Very much so. Damn.

He'd have to deal with Ali first.

Step 1 apologize to Johnny, thank Johnny, buy him lunch or pay for gas, tell him Mr. Miyagi is at South Seas Apartment and working this weekend if he wants to come by.

Step 2 Ali.

Daniel wanted to call Ali and break up with her over the phone.

He wanted to ask her why she wasted both of their time, why she'd even bothered with him if she hadn't been interested.

Maybe he should blame Freddy instead. Freddy who knew Ali was from the hills, who had told him to make a move. Pushed him to make a move on Ali.

Freddy and his friends who he thought would be his friends only for them to ditch him as soon as Johnny kicked his ass. Who avoided him at school because of it. He remembered that night so clearly, teaching her how to juggle the ball, and then when she was done with him kicking the ball and brushing her hands against one another like she'd had enough, like she was brushing him off.

Why hadn't he taken that hint and just let it go, left her alone?

Why'd he come back like a moth to the flame when the bikes came roaring in? Was it because he saw his new friends walking over? That he felt like it was safe because they all seemed to know each other?

He remembered every time he hit the sand Freddy hauling him back up, pushing him back towards Johnny like he and his friends were ready to watch a fight.

He remembered being spurred on, furious that Johnny was making him look like a fool.

If he'd known that for Ali that radio was probably one of fifty, that she could've replaced it so easily with her allowance that her cries of "You broke my radio" wasn't the same as when Daniel's bike was broken.

He remembered breathing in sand, coughing it off of his lips, and the way his new friends just ditched him because he wasn't strong enough? Because a kid like him, new into town couldn't take on a two-time karate champion? It was unfair. It'd been so stupid, and the fact they all knew made him furious.

Was it because he'd done a karate kick on the entrance door that Freddy thought Daniel was some karate master and could take Johnny? And then what? Was disappointed he couldn't? He'd come to play soccer and hang out, not get into fights.

Daniel's hands curled into fists.

Those six months were all unfair. Unfair that he'd been friendless, bullied, harrassed all because of a misunderstanding. Because Daniel and Johnny's tempers had flared and they'd been pushed into a fight for no reason.

Maybe it wasn't all Ali's fault. She just hadn't helped.

There was a knock at the door and Daniel got up, walking over and pulling the door open. Johnny stood there in his red jacket and jeans, a white shirt underneath, and sunglasses. He looked at ease. Seeing him there pissed him off.

This could've been a friendship earlier. They didn't have to fight. They didn't have to start off on such an abysmally wrong foot.

Maybe Johnny still would've been a dick, but maybe it wouldn't have been so bad. Maybe things could've been better.

"You okay?" Johnny asked.

Daniel sighed, coming out and pulling the door shut behind him.

"Just thinking. Pissed everyone seemed to egg us on to fight from the start. You know?"

"Yeah," Johnny said softly, following him down the steps, past the old lady and her dog. Daniel stopped, turning, and saw that Johnny had stopped to give the dog a treat. The dog licked his hand and he smiled softly.

"You boys hang out a lot now huh?" the older woman asked. "Glad you've got some friends Jersey."

Daniel frowned.

"The other ones you had," she continued, and shook her head, "Weren't so good. That other punk and his friends."

"Uh, yeah," Daniel said. "We were friends for like a day."

"Good," she said nodding and looking at Johnny. "You've upgraded. He always brings treats when he's here. Such a good kid."

Johnny stood looking a little uneasy, caught off guard by the praise.

Daniel grinned and hooked his arm through Johnny's, "Have a good day ma'am," he said pulling Johnny along and out the gate to the red Avanti that glistened in the sunlight.

He let go of Johnny immediately even though he didn't want to.

Rock blasted from the radio and Johnny quickly turned down the volume as Daniel sank into the seat he was beginning to think of as his. He liked being in the Avanti. He liked how comforting it had become. Like he was safe here in Johnny's car.

Something cold was pressed into his chest and Daniel looked down.

Johnny was offering him a bottle of water. He took it and looked at Johnny, his expression unreadable behind the sunglasses.

"How's your head?" Johnny asked pulling away from the curb, hands dancing over the steering wheel and Daniel had to stomp down his thoughts about those hands.

"Better than I when I woke up," Daniel said twisting the cap and drinking, touched that Johnny had brought him water, had thought of him.

Daniel looked out at the city as they passed then sighed. He couldn't put it off forever, even though he wanted to, even though just being in the Avanti had relaxed some of the tension. Seeing Johnny at ease, or as at ease as he'd ever seen him, seeing him in person again just helped. He turned his head, watching the wind whip blonde hair from Johnny's forehead.

"Thank you, for coming to get me, I know it's out of the way," Daniel began.

"It's okay, I wouldn't have offered if it wasn't," Johnny said. "Besides, gets me out of cleaning duty."

"Is it bad?" Daniel asked.

He hadn't thought about the mess a high school party could cause, but he remembered seeing all the trash, remembered seeing how often people spilled their drinks, dropped snacks, and cringed. He was pretty sure he'd seen pizza floating in the pool.

"They were trying to wake people up and get them out the door when I left. Bobby was trying to stop Dutch from sweeping them out with a broom. I think Bobby wrested the broom away from Dutch and told him to go vacuum somewhere but knowing Dutch he's going to stick the vacuum to people's faces to wake them up. I'm sure a fight broke out."

Daniel laughed. "I'm glad you took me home then. Wouldn't want to wake up to Dutch wielding a vacuum."

"I didn't want your mother to worry," Johnny said.

Daniel looked at him, studying him.

"I didn't have your number with me so I couldn't call."

"If you had, would you have left me to be woken up by Dutch?" Daniel asked amused.

"No," Johnny said. "I would've put you in one of the guest rooms."

Daniel was grateful Johnny wasn't looking because his face was probably too obvious. His face felt hot and he looked out at the palm trees towering along the sides of the street. He drank the water. He was touched. He thought only special guests got guest rooms. He thought his classmates just passed out where they fell down. Which would've meant Johnny would've left him in the closet, but no, Johnny would've tucked him in in some bedroom to be woken up with a headache when the cleaning began. But instead, he took Daniel home.

"I'm sorry," Daniel said, hands tightening around the water bottle. "You spent so much time taking care of me, running me home and back, did you get to have any fun?"

"I had fun," Johnny said slowly, carefully. "And it's fine. You're not that much trouble." He paused and his lip quirked into a smirk. "Most of the time."

He was being playful. Daniel relaxed a bit. He was teasing, but there wasn't any malice in it. The music floated up and Daniel sunk his head into the headrest and listened on the way back to the hills, to Jimmy's mansion. Most of the cars were gone, except for the yellow Ford and a few others. The door burst open and Tommy came running up to the Avanti.

"Everything okay?" Johnny asked.

"Dude, people are disgusting," Tommy said. "It's totally unfair that you got to go get LaRusso. You should've seen the shit we've found. LaRusso, take me with you when you leave."

Daniel laughed and Johnny shook his head pushing the door open. "I've helped clean up before, there's no way it's worse. Someone vomited in the Ming vase at one of these, remember?"

Tommy wrinkled his nose with a frown. "Don't remind me. But do remind me why we clean the place rather than let the staff do it?"

"Because we're Jimmy's friends, and you had fun last night right?" Johnny asked.

Tommy frowned. "Not as much fun as Bobby, but yeah."

"Bobby wins the award for best night, hands down. It was like he channeled Dionysus."

"What did Bobby do?" Daniel asked.

"He played almost naked twister with a bunch of college girls, that apparently was combo'd with spin the bottle. He's so fucking smug about it too because the rest of us didn't see him most of the night," Tommy said. "Lucky bastard. Him and every other asshole who got laid last night."

"Weren't you bragging at breakfast?" Johnny asked, they were walking towards the front door.

Daniel thought about taking his car and leaving, he should, he should get in the Ford and drive home, but he remembered his mother telling him to buy Johnny lunch or to pay for gas, so he hurried after the two. Tommy stepped aside to let him walk between them and threw an arm around Daniel's shoulders.

"Man, Johnny just doesn't get it does he? Yes, found a hot babe, had some fun, but she didn't so much as want my number. I feel used man. It doesn't compare to Bobby. Johnny wasn't here when the girls left. They all crowded him at the door. They all gave him a fucking kiss before they left. The last one wrote her name on his hand in sharpie and said to look them up if he's thinking of going to UCLA. And you know what Dutch said? Bet you don't even remember any of their names. And then Bobby went to the door and waved his arm all big and said goodbye to each of the girls by name. The look on Dutch's face was fucking priceless. Bobby's been an insufferable asshole the rest of the morning," Tommy said pushing the door open.

Bobby was fixing flowers in one of the vases at the entrance and looked up when they came in. His lips were a bright color from lipstick and his hair was messy.

"Hey welcome back."

"Johnny says you must be channeling, oh who the hell was that again Johnny?" Tommy asked.

"Dionysus," Johnny said. "Greek god of wine and a bunch of other stuff like ecstasy."

"The party god," Bobby said with a grin. "I think that fit for last night." He nodded his approval and then frowned. "Well for everyone but you Johnny."

"What do you mean?" Johnny asked with a deep frown.

Bobby's smile was smug, Tommy was right Daniel realized, only Tommy had disappeared, his arm had left Daniel's shoulder. Bobby turned to Daniel and gave an exaggerated sigh, like a disappointed parent.

"Feels like everyone at least got at least a kiss last night except Johnny."

Before Daniel could process what he said Bobby was running, laughter echoing the halls, Johnny's hand was in a fist.

"You didn't-?" Daniel didn't know what he wanted to say, they hadn't talked about it. He didn't know whether he was relieved Johnny hadn't said anything or worried. "Wait, he said except you, who do they think I kissed?"

Johnny glanced down at him, his cheeks pink. "They think you and Ali got uh...far."

"Why? We didn't?" Daniel said confused, stalking off in the direction Bobby had run in.

There was no reason for them to believe he and Ali had done anything. He was done with her. It was over. It'd be harder to get through everything if there was a rumor going around that they'd had sex at the party.

"They just assumed," Johnny said, walking next to him, taking off his sunglasses and hooking them in his shirt. It tugged the fabric down a bit revealing his collarbone and Daniel had to drag his eyes away, he was on a mission, he couldn't be distracted.

He found the ex-cobra's in the kitchen. Large trash bags were sitting around. Jimmy was sitting at the island, head on the marble looking like he had the world's worst hangover. Dutch was making coffee and Bobby and Tommy were wrapping leftover pizza in foil. They looked up at the sound of footsteps.

"Want to take some pizza home with you LaRusso?" Tommy asked. "We've still got too much."

Daniel breathed. He felt his skin flush red, there was no way to get through this without embarrassing himself.

"Hey man, have fun last night?" Jimmy asked pulling away from the counter.

"Of course he did," Dutch said with a laugh. "Ali was here."

"I didn't do anything with Ali," Daniel blurted out. He dropped his gaze. "So don't go spreading that shit like a rumor. I didn't even get to talk to her. Okay? She-we're," he couldn't do it. He'd buy Johnny lunch some other day. He was so angry thinking about Ali. Yeah, he also kissed someone else. But it didn't feel the same. He hadn't done it in the open as if he didn't care who saw him. Everything about it felt like a slap in the face.

"But Ali was here, her car-" Tommy said, Daniel could hear the confusion in his voice. "The girls said she was here."

The floor was so clean, it shined, and Daniel could see himself in it, his hands in useless fists at his sides. "Yeah, well she wasn't here with me."

Silence filled the kitchen.

"Thanks for the invite," Daniel said. "But just don't go assuming, don't go talking like that, because it didn't happen. I don't think she even knew I was here. I don't think she would've cared."

His eyes were burning, he did not want to cry in front of the ex-cobras, not in this kitchen. They weren't his friends. They were Johnny's friends. They felt bad and they were dealing with their guilt. They knew Ali longer than they knew Daniel. There was no reason for them to pick him if it came to it.

He ran a hand through his hair and laughed, it was all so ridiculous, so stupid, all this over a girl, and no wonder Helen of Troy started a war. He'd never understood the story, but now he got it. His pride was severely damaged and it pissed him off.

He glanced up at Johnny. "Ma wants me to buy you lunch or something sometime, or to pay for gas. Just let me know okay. Miyagi's got stuff to do if you get bored. But I got to go."

He turned and walked fast away from the ex-cobras, out of their fancy nest, past the remnants of revelry, and out to the car. He kept waiting, tense to hear laughter echo the halls after him, to hear their voices follow him out, taunting, but there was nothing.

He settled into the Ford, hands shaking as he put the keys in the ignition and he drove off.

He breathed, tried to calm himself down, driving with nowhere in mind.

He had enough gas.

He found a road that went along the ocean and drove along with it for a while before parking and he got out.

The section of the beach was empty. He sat down by the beach, crossing his legs, and closed his eyes. He breathed in with the tide and out as it left, focusing on the waves breathing with the ebb and flow of the water until his heart no longer was pounding in his ears.

Until his veins no longer felt like they were on fire, until his shoulders relaxed, until his mind was blank, and he was nothing but his breath and the waves and the feeling of the sand beneath him.

Absolute Power Corrupts Absolutely

The door shut and the sound was louder than any other sound in the mansion. Johnny half turned, debating whether he should go after Daniel, but that look was begging to be left alone. He sighed and turned back.

"What the fuck happened last night?" Dutch asked. "I saw LaRusso run out of the room, thought that little punk was going to get some."

Johnny sighed opening the fridge and pulling out a pineapple soda twisting off the cap.

"Daniel stumbled upon Ali with someone else," he said quietly.

"Seriously?" Bobby asked, all his smugness seeming to collapse, eyes filled with shock sitting down as well.

"Don't go blabbing about it, let them figure out their own shit. Who knows what will happen," Johnny said with a shrug. "It's not our business," he said pointedly.

"Not our business!" Jimmy repeated, loudly and then winced. "We spent two years listening to you talk about Ali like she was the hottest thing in the Valley and then she dumped you. We watched you fall apart. Watched you wrestle with her moving on, not wanting to talk to you, ignoring you, and then what, now Daniel's not good enough for her either? It's fucked up man."

"However," Dutch said raising his finger.

"However?" Tommy asked.

"If they break up Johnny can help LaRusso back onto his feet."

"I don't want to be a rebound," Johnny said with a pointed glare.

"You think Daniel would do that?" Bobby asked gently.

"I don't know, but clearly Ali must've. I never thought she'd do something like that," Johnny said with a frown. He sighed. "But I didn't see what happened, I didn't talk to Ali. So it's all secondhand, and it's again, none of our business, so you all keep your mouths shut."

"Then take these out will you?" Bobby asked kicking one of the trash bags.

Johnny sighed, setting his soda down. He didn't trust them, but he had dipped while they were working so he'd do it. He paused though to listen from outside the room.

"Spill Bobby," Jimmy sounded tired.

"If Daniel and Ali call it quits, like soon, then we need to make sure Daniel comes to the lodge next weekend."

"Easy," Dutch said.

Johnny shook his head, without karate they all had too much time on their hands to scheme. He didn't care.

He carried the bags out to the trash can and threw them in. It smelled foul. He backed away with disgust. He didn't want to know what they'd found, just hoped it wasn't something dead because it smelled rotten. He walked back to gather the rest that he knew were sitting at the doors around the house.

Going to the lodge would take Daniel's mind off of everything, and he could have fun in the snow. He'd been looking forward to it so much. With luck, it'd help. Plus Ali wasn't invited to that. She was banned from anything not open to the whole grade because the guys had decided he didn't need to be tortured like that. Plus she had her own friends to hang out with. So they could easily take Daniel out into the mountains and have a good time. He wanted to see Daniel's face when he saw the snow.

This brought some ease to Johnny, thinking warmly about the future, of how things could be better, how he could help.

He cleared out trash from most of the rooms then went up to the bedrooms. All the doors were unlocked now and Johnny collected towels and bedding and shoved them into the laundry chute in the middle of the hall, dragging them out of the rooms.

He wondered what Mr. Miyagi needed help with.

The guys had gotten a lot of work done already. Most of the clean-up.

All the trash was taken care of, vacuuming, mopping. From a glance out the window, they'd cleaned up outside too. He could finish up soon and make his way back to Seven Seas to help out Mr. Miyagi.

It was a little exhausting clearing out the rooms but he finished quickly and went to his room, cleaning up and gathering his things, and hooking the bonsai under his arm.

He made his way back down to the kitchen and picked up his pineapple soda that was sweating on the counter.

"I'm going to head out. Bedrooms are done, trash is taken out," Johnny said.

"Where are you going?" Bobby asked, curious.

"Daniel said Mr. Miyagi had stuff for me to do, so I'm going to go see what he needs help with."

Jimmy picked up some foil-wrapped pizza and shoved it in Johnny's bag. "Take some lunch man."

"Thanks. Later," he said raising the soda in a wave and heading out.

He settled the bonsai in the passenger seat and his pineapple soda in the cupholder. He wondered if it was ridiculous to keep going back to Reseda, back to seeing Daniel or Mr. Miyagi. But it was better than going home. It was a welcome distraction.

As he drove, as he listened to his music, he thought about Ali. Thought about her parents.

He'd always wondered if they'd known he'd been homeless before Sid if they would've praised him so much. If they would've told Ali he was a nice boy she should date, if they would've let him dance with her after they'd broken up at the country club.

Without Sid, without the fancy car, when it came to class Johnny was lower than Daniel on the ladder.

He wondered if having access to it, a taste of it had made him a worse person. He thought it probably did, like that quote he'd heard in history class.

"Power tends to corrupt, and absolute power corrupts absolutely."

It'd been something their history teacher had written on the board in class, some British politician had said it he thought. Made them write an essay about it. Johnny had struggled with it. He hadn't felt like he had any power. He'd written out of his ass. A bunch of bullshit that sounded nice, like how he talked at country clubs, he knew how to sound smart without putting his mind to it.

But now, now he'd have a different essay to turn in. He was pretty sure the power of living in the hills, in Encino in a big mansion gave him status even if he still felt like the kid he'd been. The power of being a karate champion made him feel strong. It all made him feel bigger than he was and no one had tried to tell him he wasn't as much of a badass as he'd felt.

It wasn't until he'd lost, until he woke up and realized how corrupted everything had gotten that he deserved every hit Daniel landed. It was a wake-up call.

He pulled to a stop at a stop light and picked up his soda and took a sip and pulled the pizza out of his bag and unwrapped the foil, eating it before continuing on.

Things could be better, things could be worse.

He wanted to see Ali. Not to yell at her, she was in the same trap he had been.

Not to explain himself.

But he owed her an apology.

He shouldn't have kissed her at the country club. He'd thought it was funny. But had regretted it even before she hit him.

He broke his code. He'd taken advantage of the moment.

He burned with shame now when he thought of it. When he thought of how he'd joined in on the laughter when Daniel fell covered in food.

He pulled into his usual spot at the Seven Seas apartment complex, there wasn't a Ford anywhere but he recognized Mr. Miyagi's truck and made his way to the workshop. The wooden chimes clattered.

"Mr. Miyagi?" Johnny called softly. "Daniel said you had some things for me to do?"

"Ah Johnny-san, welcome," Mr. Miyagi said with a smile. "Come, much to do."

Johnny took the offered toolbox and followed Mr. Miyagi around the apartment complex. He wore gloves and cleaned out drains which was disgusting and he felt like probably some karma for not helping the guys through the grosser section of clean up. He cleaned the gutters, unstuck windows, and fixed leaky faucets. When they reached the end of the list Mr. Miyagi patted Johnny on the shoulder.

"Tomorrow come to house."

"Okay," Johnny said with a smile.

He didn't want to go home, but he did.

Sid's car wasn't in the garage and the tension released from Johnny's shoulders.

He found his mother in the kitchen alone. His dinner was waiting under a little dome to keep it warm and he sat next to her.

It'd been a while since they had a quiet Saturday night in the tiny kitchen.

The one Sid hated.

"Sid's on set, will be till Wednesday, they're on location," Laura said with a smile, pouring herself some wine. "How was the party?"

"It was good, I think," Johnny said lifting the lid to salmon and greens.

"You think?" she asked eyebrow quirked. "Were you designated sober person again?"

"Yeah," Johnny said. "Which was for the best. I had to drive Daniel home."

"Daniel came? Daniel LaRusso? Wait back up. Did he accept your apology?"

Johnny frowned thinking about it. "He said he needed time, but I've been helping Mr. Miyagi out so we see a lot of each other outside of school. I also took him to the doctor and got his knee looked at."

"How bad is it?" Laura asked, voice a hushed whisper.

"He's okay, just has to be careful. He's on the sidelines for gym the rest of the year at least. They gave him crutches, but he's stubborn."

Laura laughed. "Sounds like someone else I know."

Johnny rolled his eyes, taking a bite of his fish.

"You paid?" she asked.

"Yeah."

"How much?" she whispered.

"A lot," Johnny said softly.

"Your-" she trailed off eyebrows knit in worry, the rest left unsaid.

Johnny shrugged. "I'm fine. I'm just relieved he's okay."

"Oh honey," she whispered reaching out and patting his hand giving it a gentle squeeze. "So he came to the party?"

"Yeah, and I think he had a good time, up until uh, he saw Ali," Johnny's voice dropped low, "Kissing a college football player."

"It never ends does it? That poor boy," Laura said with a sigh. "I stopped trusting her after she dumped you without so much as a howdy-do. How are you holding up?"

"Better than Daniel, I mean I'm over Ali. I think I owe her an apology if she'll ever listen to me long enough to hear it. But, I'm pissed she got that drunk."

"And Daniel?"

"Broken-hearted," Johnny said softly.

"Well of course!" Laura said draining her glass of wine. "Boy goes to a party to see his girl and finds her with someone else he's bound to be upset."

Johnny remembered when he'd been the someone else.

"Maybe it was a misunderstanding."

She shook her head. "How'd the boys do?"

"Had a good time," Johnny said.

"So just you and Daniel didn't?"

Johnny sighed digging at his fish. He was destroying it. It wasn't as good as the fish Mr. Miyagi made. But he shouldn't complain. Not in front of his mother.

There was a time when she did everything she could to make sure he had food, so he promised himself he'd always eat everything he was given in front of her.

"You need to have some fun Johnny, find someone new to like. Anyone you got your eye on?" Laura asked. "There's a party coming up at the country club you can meet the other kids your age there. There's supposed to be new members and their families."

Johnny scooped up his fish and ate it.

He felt like he should tell her.

He didn't tell his mother all the details of his relationship with Ali, but she knew the highs and lows, knew the basics.

And she knew he also liked guys.

He hadn't mentioned the lifeguard, but she knew he'd been meeting someone to go on dates, that it was a guy.

He couldn't hide it forever. Especially if he was going to keep hanging out with Daniel, she'd wonder why when she thought he'd paid off his debt.

He knew she'd considered it done with covering the medical expenses. Johnny felt like there was more he had to do, more to apologize, to make things right.

"I do like someone," he said softly spearing his greens.

It was like the staff always made all of his least favorite foods even though he never complained.

Her eyes were suddenly very sharp and focused on him. He felt nervous.

Unlike the lifeguard, she'd met Daniel. She knew Daniel. She knew their history, and he knew it was fucked up that he suddenly liked him after being such as asshole.

He drank the water at the table, taking big gulps. It'd have to be like a Band-Aid.

"I like Daniel," he whispered not meeting her gaze.

She leaned back heavily, arms crossed across her chest, head tilted, thinking.

"He kicked you in the face," she said.

"I know."

"Sucker punched you on the beach."

"Yeah."

"You nearly killed him."

"..."

"You nearly broke his leg."

"I-"

"Johnny," she said. "You think this is wise?"

Her tone was as if Johnny had just told her he was trying to make toast while in the bath. Disappointed and panicked, worried and tired.

"I didn't choose to feel this way," Johnny said, voice a little steelier than he meant.

"But it's hopeless, he's...he's-"

"He listens. He's kind, he's sweet, he's a loudmouth who gets himself into trouble, but he's so fucking graceful when he fights when he practices karate. He has a great relationship with Mr. Miyagi and his mother. He works hard, he's funny, he's in the progress of forgiving me, and yeah maybe we're not going to become anything more than neutral parties, but maybe we'll be allies. He's only been training seriously for six months and kicked my ass while injured. He kept getting up no matter how much we knocked him down. He just bounces back up. He's resilient and he's smart and listening to him talk calms me down. I like just being near him, and I get it's messed up.

The fact he wouldn't stay down pissed me off, the fact he kept coming after me pissed me off. He wouldn't just leave me alone, and he just wouldn't shut up. But I see how hard he works now, that all that energy he has comes out wrong sometimes and it misses the mark and it pisses people off and he doesn't mean it. And I want to keep him safe. I want to stay by his side for as long as he's okay with it. And I get it's hopeless and one-sided and I'm so screwed. It would've been fine. I'd be okay but I know it's going to be so much worse now because I didn't do anything. I didn't. I swear I didn't. But he was drunk and upset and Ali had kissed someone else and and he kissed me and it was nice, it was perfect, it was probably a mistake and it hurts knowing that, knowing I just happened to be a warm person nearby when he was upset. And it was a drunken kiss, but...but...it's all so confusing, but I like him and I want to be near him, stay by him, help him however I can because I hate everything I did. How out of control I was. It makes me sick to think of all the stuff I did. That people cheered me on, that my friends kept me going, joined in, and that I let myself go so far. So if this is the torture I get, if this is my karma so be it. I deserve it."

Laura's eyes were filled with concern. She got up and hugged him tight, she smelled like the fancy perfume Sid bought her and he missed the way she used to smell, like shampoo and soap and coffee.

Her sleeve was wet and it took him a while to realize he was crying.

He turned his head burying it into her shoulder.

"I like him so much," Johnny whispered.

She rubbed his back and slid her fingers through his hair, soothingly.

"So what you're telling me," she said quietly, "was that despite everything you got a kiss last night from someone you like?"

He laughed.

She sighed and rested her chin on top of his head. "So what's the plan?"

He breathed, it was less shaky than he feared. "The guys are inviting him to everything we have planned for the rest of the year."

"Oooh smart," she said. "So let's see, so does that mean he's going to the lodge?"

"Yeah, if he still wants to."

She pulled away and cupped his face in her hands and gave his cheeks a pinch the way she used to when he was little.

"Good luck Johnny," she said quietly a warm smile on her lips.

"Thanks, Mom," he whispered.

"Be careful with him okay? I don't want you two fighting. It's dangerous when you fight."

He laughed. "I'm trying to not fight anymore."

"Good," she said sinking back into her seat.

She sounded so relieved.

He finished his food and she turned on the radio and he listened to her hum along to it and sing along with the songs she knew.

It reminded him of when he was little, she used to sing and dance while he ate.

She always told him she'd already eaten, but he knew now it'd been a lie.

She'd given him all they had. She ate whatever leftovers he left behind. Which wasn't always much.

She'd dance around in their kitchen, throwing her hair, full of delight distracting him from the meager meal, pulling him along to dance with her, to sing with her.

No matter how much Johnny hated Sid, the fact his mother had food to eat, and they weren't struggling made him keep his opinions to himself.

Whenever he forgot it was moments like this where the stark contrast was so clear and killed all the words, all the complaints before he even thought of voicing them. Drowning out all the dissent.

His mother deserved happiness after everything.

Chapter End Notes

The quote is from a 19th-century politician named John Emerich

Edward Dalberg Acton, first Baron Acton (1834–1902). The other half of the quote is "Great men are almost always bad men." And he might've been inspired by this quote from William Pitt the Elder, Earl of Chatham "Unlimited power is apt to corrupt the minds of those who possess it"

Could write an essay about that and how that idea is played with in Karate Kid/Cobra Kai. But I'm going to work on the next chapter instead. Thanks for reading (and all the comments and kudos ❤)

So sorry buddy

Chapter Notes

Moving movie things around again. Changing things.

Haruka Spiegel made Fanart (Thank you! I love it): https://harukaspiegel.tumblr.com/post/657469841757880320/johhny-lawrence-from-the-fanfic-root-beer-floats

Daniel called Ali and invited her out. She agreed readily for Sunday brunch. She asked if she could drive the Ford and he let her.

He thought he'd make it simple. We both clearly like different people. This isn't working. You should be free. I should be free.

Let's just be friends.

But he just couldn't bring it up. It kept twisting around. Dark and murky. The calm Mr. Miyagi recommended kept getting destroyed. He thought he'd botch it up. And she looked so happy. Like nothing had happened. Like she hadn't kissed someone else. Like he hadn't. Like everything was the same. When it wasn't. And he'd become too hot. Too angry. He tried to focus on what she was saying. Tried listening to her talk about college and the country club. But he just felt ill. Brunch ended and he hadn't said anything.

He let her drive more, he didn't trust himself behind the wheel, his hands kept shaking.

He kept trying to bring it up. But he was hoping she'd bring it up. Shouldn't she bring it up? She was the one who was seeing someone else. She was the one who had kissed someone out in the open like that.

"Why are you dating me?" Daniel asked.

It wasn't what he wanted to say. It wasn't how he wanted to start this.

"I like you, of course silly," Ali said with a laugh, but there was a bit of confusion in her voice.

"Your friends don't like me."

"They don't know you that well."

"We've had nearly 6 months for them to get to know me. They don't talk to me. They ignore me."

"Don't worry about them."

"Your parents don't like me."

"Of course they do."

"They don't. They don't like that I'm not rich or well connected. They were barely impressed that I won the All-Valley."

"They just take a while to get used to."

"You don't invite me to any of the parties."

"I didn't know you wanted to go. I mean the cobra's throw them."

"They invited me," Daniel said softly.

Surely she knew. Had to know. Could connect the dots.

"Oh, well, we should go to one together."

Why couldn't they have gone together before now? Before it was over.

"I went to the one over the weekend. I looked for you."

"I didn't see you."

"I saw you."

Her mouth became a flat line as she drove. This felt like a bad idea all of a sudden. She was speeding. Her foot getting heavier on the gas.

"Okay," she said tersely.

"I saw you kissing the football player."

"What do you want Daniel?" her voice was tight but rising.

"Why did you kiss him?"

"We've met a couple of times. He's nice, smart, going to a great school, and has his life together. He listens and has interesting things to say. He's not some high school kid getting into karate fights. He doesn't have some childish rivalry and I was drunk okay?"

"I think we should break up," Daniel said.

It was too fast. Too sudden. He'd been trying to hold it back but it burst through. He'd wanted to say other things before that.

"Yeah, I think you're right. You've been half out of this relationship since the beginning. Any sign of trouble and you're gone. Like when Johnny kissed me. You didn't even try to see what happened, you ran. You are always shrugging me off, ever since we met on the beach," Ali said, hands tight on the wheel.

Daniel watched the needle of the speedometer slowly rise.

"Ali," he said softly.

"Then you win the tournament and I thought, finally, smooth sailing, but then you started hanging out with Johnny, forgave him for all his shit. He isn't entitled to your time, isn't entitled to mine, and yet you keep hanging out with him like he's cool. Johnny ruined my relationship with him and now he's ruined this one."

A ball rolled out into the road and Ali cursed spinning the wheel to try and avoid it and spinning out.

They spun towards the guard rail, there was a loud crunch.

"You okay?" Daniel asked, reaching out, hoping she hadn't hurt anything.

She shrugged him off.

"Don't touch me," she said. "You know." She turned to him eyes full of venom, "That guy's been asking me out for months. Asked me if I wanted to have dinner tonight, and I turned him down. But now... now I think I'll call him back. I think I might be in love with him, so I might as well."

"Fine! You do that," Daniel said.

She pushed the door open and got out.

"I'm going to walk the rest of the way home. Enjoy being around those entitled assholes, you and your stupid big mouth are going to end up in the hospital and you're going to find yourself all alone because you push everyone away."

She slammed the door and Daniel winced.

He fucked up. He unbuckled his seatbelt and climbed over into the driver's seat. He watched her make her way to the sidewalk, walking absolutely pissed off. He'd been coming so close to saying that he'd kissed Johnny. He wanted to throw it in her face. He'd been drunk too. But he didn't kiss Johnny just because he'd been there. He kissed Johnny because he liked him and wanted to and the alcohol just made it seem like a good idea. And if that had happened to Ali then she must really like the guy. Because he really liked Johnny. And it was for the best.

He leaned his head against the back of the headrest and groaned. He'd practiced their conversation a bunch of times, trying to get it to be a balanced breakup.

A hey, you seem to like this other guy and you don't seem to like me, and I...I seem to like this other guy too and honestly panicked at the thought of having sex with you, no offense, but like we probably should break up, right?

But it had spiraled out of control. The balance had caught on fire and turned into absolute chaos.

He was hurt, but mostly because she kept telling him she liked him but he realized she probably didn't.

Maybe as a friend.

They kept trying to mash themselves into a relationship and it hurt. And it hurt that she just couldn't be honest with him.

Months, he thought. The college guy had been making moves for months.

He sighed and gently put his hands on the wheel

. What would he say to Mr. Miyagi? He gave him the car for his birthday.

He felt tears well in his eyes. It'd been the best birthday gift he'd ever been given.

"I'm so sorry Mr. Miyagi," he whispered, coaxing the car away from the side of the road and making his way to Mr. Miyagi's house. The car creaked and groaned the entire way. It rattled and sounded like it was on death's door and he pleaded with it the entire way.

"I'm so sorry buddy, I should never have let Ali drive you. I shouldn't have tried to have that conversation while she was driving. I was just so damn nervous. Oh fuck, hang in there buddy. I'm going to get you home. Is that smoke? Oh god, what are you supposed to do when your car starts smoking? Are you supposed to get out? Keep going buddy. We're going to get there. Even if I have to jump out and push you the way we do with Ma's car. Come on, see buddy, almost home, almost to Mr. Miyagi's. Oh, I'm such an idiot. I saw how she was all along, she's got a temper, like me. I should've thought Daniel, what the hell would you do if you were driving her car and she broke up with you while you were driving?

"Ugh, it's not her fault, not really. They always tell you if you see a ball in the road because there's usually some dumb kid half a second behind it who's going to come running out, it could've been so much worse. We could've been hurt, but she didn't look hurt now did she buddy? No, she didn't. She looked fighting mad, but fine. And me, not a scratch on me. Thank god. Ma's going to kill me. Hey Ma, broke up with Ali and totaled my car, how's your day been? Ha. Oh what am I going to say to Mr. Miyagi. He's going to kill me. No. Mr. Miyagi won't kill me. He'll just be so disappointed. This was his big gift for me on my birthday. When I went after Ali because he told me all that balance stuff. I should've let her go.

"But buddy she was the prettiest girl I ever saw. And Freddy said she probably liked me, she kept looking at me and I thought, well maybe. Maybe this time I'll fall in love with the girl. Ha. Ha! Leaves me for a football player. Ha! Who wouldn't?

"Oh I'm so sorry, you were my favorite car, best birthday gift I've ever gotten. I had all these dreams for us you know? I mean I really thought Ali and I would last till prom at least. Figured we'd pick her up and take her and I'd wear this powder blue tux with ruffles that was my dad's that Ma's saved for me and it just needs some alterations. I mean I guess I could still wear it but, I guess we won't be picking up Ali. Maybe that's for the best, she's out in the hills anyway. It's so far away.

"I was also thinking a road trip somewhere after I graduated. You, me, and the desert. Or we could go up into the mountains. There are all these state parks around. Johnny took Ma and I to that cool carhop, there's got to be all sorts of other cool stuff if I just looked around. Thought we'd take Mr. Miyagi fishing a couple of times, thought I'd take Ma somewhere nice. If I went to college I thought I'd take you. You know? Pack up the car with all sorts of stuff and head out to that new chapter.

"Oh why don't they fix the damn roads? That bump could've popped a tire! Come on, look! Look! There's Mr. Miyagi's house, oh god that sound. I swear I've never heard a car make this sound before. It's like a death rattle. Come on, let me get you in park. Oh buddy you did it, rest now. I'm so sorry."

Daniel parked the car and got out, the car was smoking. Mr. Miyagi was coming out to see what the rattle was.

"Daniel-san, what happened?"

"You mean what didn't happen? I let Ali drive and she redesigns the fender, drove us into a guard rail. I don't know how she totaled it but the engine isn't running right either," Daniel said hoping out and past him, shutting the door while Mr. Miyagi looked at the car.

He walked into the house, grabbed a drink from the fridge, and came back.

"And I tried it Mr. Miyagi, worked out our whole conversation to be as peaceful as possible and it crashed worse than the car. She's going on a date with that UCLA football player she met tonight. So that's over. Says she thinks she might be in love with him."

Daniel opened the can and scoffed.

"In love! Seriously? We went from a drunken party mistake to being in love with the guy in less than twenty minutes. I don't know what's the truth. She should've just picked whatever and stuck to it. Saved the confusion. I had this whole speech planned and it went out the window. I think our friendship jumped out the window when we spun too. I don't think we're going to recover. Which apparently is like a social death sentence if Johnny's friends are right. High school is over for me and there are months left Mr. Miyagi, months! I thought it was bad before, but I just can't win can I? I tried not to put my foot in my mouth and before I knew it she was pissed. The car was in ruins and she was storming off. I just wanted to understand her better is all. I didn't understand what happened, what we should do.

"I have the worst luck with girls. Worst luck. And this one, I don't know if it was worth the trouble, you know? What do I get for sticking my neck out because I thought she was pretty? Well some guy told me she was looking at me and told me to go up to her and talk to her? And then what happens? A gang of karate dudes crash down around me, after my neck for half the school year and my knee all banged up. Do I get to go to prom with her? Nope. I win the tournament and she bails in less than a month after. Ridiculous. Just my luck."

He shook his head and sighed walking over to him.

"The car's totaled isn't it Mr. Miyagi. I'm so sorry, I shouldn't have let her drive."

Mr. Miyagi was leaning over the hood fiddling with the engine and Daniel sipped on his drink with a deep frown. Mr. Miyagi moved something and the sputtering came to an end and the engine roared to life like normal. He grinned at Daniel.

"How'd you do that?" Daniel asked with a gasp.

"I tell you later. I get Johnny-san, we fix up your fender and the rest, you feel better," Mr. Miyagi said with a chuckle walking off towards the house.

"Wait, Johnny is here?" Daniel asked following after him.

"Yes, have many jobs for Johnny-san. He learn many things. Become regular handyman. Good useful skills for life, yes?"

"And training?" Daniel asked softly.

"With time, yes. Today sanding floors."

Daniel nodded, they made their way to the back of the house. Johnny was on his hands and knees working on the wooden platforms. Mr. Miyagi had added more and Daniel wondered when he'd done so. But he was having Johnny do all of them. The movement was familiar, he was doing it the way Mr. Miyagi had taught Daniel, but it was different watching Johnny do it, utterly focused on what he was doing, breathing.

He had a flannel wrapped around his waist, he was wearing shorts today and a tight shirt with the sleeves rolled up, showing off arm muscles, or to stay cool. Daniel lifted his drink to his forehead for a sense of coolness because he felt too hot. The muscles at work, flexed and more prominent were distracting.

He almost didn't hear Mr. Miyagi talking and he had to scramble to get his face under order as Johnny leaned back on his heels, the way Daniel had seen in the Cobra Kai dojo.

"-accident," Mr. Miyagi was saying.

Johnny hopped up in the way Daniel had seen at the dojo and hadn't seen much since. He spun to face Daniel.

"Are you okay?" he asked.

"Yeah," Daniel said waving his hand.

"Did you hit your head?" Johnny asked.

His blue eyes were too intense, too full of worry. Daniel couldn't hold his gaze without giving something away.

"Yeah, no I'm fine. The car hit the guard rail, but I'm fine. Drove straight here. Didn't hit anything in the car. The car makes it look worse than it was, really," Daniel said.

Johnny's eyes rose to the drink Daniel was pressing against his head.

"Yeah, this, uh, it's hot out," Daniel said awkwardly dropping the drink and his hand down from his forehead and to his side.

Mr. Miyagi called for Johnny to follow him and he hesitated just a moment, looking Daniel over as if trying to look for injuries Daniel was hiding. But then he was hurrying after where Mr. Miyagi was waiting. Daniel wandered back into the kitchen and watched from the window. They went to work on putting the headlight that had started to fall out back in and then on the bumper that had been hanging off. Other than a few scratches Daniel had to admit that it could've been worse.

It looked good, better, and he felt relieved.

He found the green tea, filled some glasses, and hurried out to thank them.

"See," Mr. Miyagi said. "Car looked worse than was."

"Thank you."

"What happened?" Johnny asked taking the green tea, flicking one of the towels they'd been using on the car over his shoulder.

"A ball rolled out into the street, slammed the breaks, spun out, and hit the guard rail," Daniel said.

He couldn't bring himself to tell Johnny that Ali had been driving, couldn't bring up to him that he and Ali had broken up. What would happen if he did?

Would Johnny change his mind and try to go after her again? Ali was with the UCLA guy, but maybe she'd pick Johnny again and Daniel didn't think he could handle that.

He needed more time to come up with a plan.

"Glad you're okay," Johnny said then turned to Mr. Miyagi. "I'm going to go back to the sanding, okay?"

"Hai," Mr. Miyagi nodded, taking the tea Daniel handed him. When Johnny left Mr. Miyagi turned to Daniel and looked up at him quizzically. "Why not tell Johnny-san?"

Daniel sighed.

"He and Ali used to date. It feels like we finally are getting somewhere good and if... if I tell him...he doesn't need it on his plate. It makes the whole last 6 months absolutely worthless."

Mr. Miyagi shook his head. "Daniel-san grow much over six months, learn much, become different than when first move here."

"You think?"

Mr. Miyagi nodded. "Just like Johnny-san, change is possible and good things can come from it."

Daniel nodded. "Well do you have anything for me to do Mr. Miyagi?"

Mr. Miyagi smiled. "You should go see mother. After big event it's important."

Daniel looked out at the house, part of him wanted to stay, wanted to look at Johnny again. But Mr. Miyagi was right.

"Yeah, yeah she's making chicken cacciatore, tonight."

"Go, go," Mr. Miyagi said shooing at him and Daniel hopped in his car and started the engine. It sounded a million times better.

He grinned at Mr. Miyagi. "You fixed it perfectly!"

Daniel had the drive to the apartment to think of what he was going to tell his mother, his hands were all clammy. His mother liked Ali.

"It just didn't work out Ma, we're two different people. We wanted different things, so we figured rather than be miserable the rest of the year we'd go our separate ways. No, uh, we're not going to still be friends, Ma. I think uh, well she wrecked my car and nearly killed us. Okay that wasn't fully her fault. Uh, she kissed someone else and I also kissed someone else. Yeah Ma, you actually do know them. You like them. Maybe that's too obvious. She never met any girls from school. Okay, let's try again. Hey Ma, how was your day? Have a nice day? Yeah, brunch was okay. It was good. The food was great. Ali and I broke up though. I think it was mutual you know? We just kept drifting apart and wanted different things you know? It's okay Ma, I'm okay. I was hurt at first, but I mean we got into a car accident, and that kind of put things in perspective. Oh, everyone's fine Ma. And Mr. Miyagi already fixed the car. No big deal. Minor accident really. We realized how unhappy we really were with each other and so, well that's over. I think it's still a little soon to see if we'll be friends in the long run, but that's okay."

He sighed parking the Ford and made his way up to the apartment.

"Hey, Ma! I'm home!" he called.

"Hey! How was brunch?" Mrs. LaRusso asked from where she sat on the couch watching TV.

She muted it and turned to look at him.

"It was good. The place was great, we should go some time."

"Yeah? How's Ali?"

Daniel took a deep breath and walked over, sitting down next to her.

"We broke up."

"Oh, honey."

"I'm okay though," he said quickly. "Also we got into a minor car accident, both of us are okay. Mr. Miyagi already fixed it."

She reached out and pulled him into her chest.

"Oh what a rough day," she said smoothing his hair. "You know it's okay, there's going to be so many other great people in your life you know?"

Daniel pulled away and looked at his mother suspiciously. "You're taking this rather well."

She laughed. "Oh honey I dated so many guys before I met your father. It takes a while, and you're young."

"But you liked Ali and...wait, you did like Ali right?"

"Yes! She was a sweet girl," Mrs. LaRusso said.

"But?"

She sighed. "When Johnny dropped you off he asked me not to mention Ali, said he wouldn't tell me what happened but it hadn't been good. And it got me thinking. You know how we picked her up from that big mansion and she was all game to drive while we pushed? I thought it was sweet, but honey you were absolutely mortified. You were so uncomfortable. And then Johnny and his friends were talking to you when I came to pick you up and you also were suddenly so upset. You were snarky and upset with her. You were uncomfortable like the entire time you two were dating."

"Ma!"

She shrugged. "You gotta make these discoveries yourself. I figured she wasn't going to become my daughter-in-law, sweet girl, but you just weren't all in, you know?"

Daniel threw his head back with a groan, it was exactly what Ali said. "Seriously?"

She patted him on the shoulder.

"Daniel you are a people person honey, you'll bounce back. You'll charm someone else and you'll be comfortable with them and comfortable with all of this you know?" she said motioning around her.

He looked at her.

"We don't have a big place and maybe this isn't the coolest neighborhood, but it's nice honey and it's working and you've got food and clothes and you have a very nice car and Mr. Miyagi. I think we've got it good kiddo," she said gently patting his face. "And you'll find someone who doesn't care whether you're rich or poor and will like you for you and you'll feel comfortable letting them in, you did not let her in honey. You kept her at arm's length. Now, want to watch Murder She Wrote with me?"

"No Ma, it's okay. I actually got some homework I should probably get to," Daniel said standing and heading to his room.

He shut the door and flopped face down onto his bed.

He tried to think about what she'd said. He wanted so desperately to be cool, for Ali to think he was cool, to follow her into a life that wasn't real. He wanted her to think he fit in easily around her fancy friends and family when he didn't and then he got bitter about it when reality set in.

He got embarrassed about his mother, the apartment complex he lived in, where he lived, that he had a crummy bike to get around with and couldn't pick her up on a date, and he didn't like that they had to give the car a running start. It was embarrassing.

Everything about Ali's life seemed perfect, picture-perfect. He felt awkward and awful by her side, clumsy and like nothing he did turned out right.

He'd never invited her over. They always went somewhere else, he tried to limit her exposure to his life, pretending to be cooler than he was. No wonder he crashed and burned.

He'd already not wanted to be in California, he hadn't wanted to leave Newark. He'd whined the whole way, complained the whole trip, despite how much his mother tried to warm him up to it, tried to cheer him up. He was just constantly miserable and he took everything as a result of his mother moving him there, as someone else's fault.

He blamed everyone but himself.

But maybe his mother was right. Maybe he wasn't letting anyone in. So they didn't get to know each other well. Just a surface glance.

He knew more about Johnny than he did about Ali. He'd tried to find out more. He wanted to know more.

With Ali it was all just fun dates and the bond of people with a common enemy. Those weren't good bases for a relationship. Not if he hadn't tried to add more, not if he kept jumping up and down on what they'd built until it started to crack.

Their relationship, the roots were already fragile, and rather than treat it or make it better he ignored it. He didn't tend to it and it rotted.

He just kept his feelings, a lot of resentment, to himself, blamed her for everything.

How could he be better?

Johnny had already been over more than Ali had and that desire to hide away how he lived wasn't there.

Maybe because of their history, maybe because Daniel had seen the inside of Johnny's home, heard the staff, heard his stepfather, and knew that as nice as the outside was it wasn't as nice on the inside. It was a fancy cage and it was poisoning Johnny.

He saw things differently with Johnny. He wasn't embarrassed to show his home. The apartment felt more sturdy, homier, and Daniel wanted Johnny to get a chance to enjoy that. Wanted Johnny to try his mothers cooking. He liked the way his mother and Johnny interacted, minus the occasional hiccup. But she was impressed by him and he seemed to like her.

He'd even seen the inside of Daniel's room, Ali never got that far.

He'd also never been in her house, never ate at her table either. He never saw her room.

Daniel had been into Johnny's room twice now. He knew how to get in without dealing with the staff now. And his friends sat with them. Descended upon Daniel like he was a welcome addition, like water under the bridge, even though Daniel was still nervous.

He chewed on his thumbnail.

His mother made it sound like he was actively sabotaging his relationship with Ali, and Ali made it sound like he hadn't really been in the relationship.

He needed to move slow, make sure the foundation was sturdy before attempting anything else because when he rushed he clearly crashed and burned and built a wall amongst the flames.

He couldn't do that with Johnny.

He ran his hands through his hair frustrated. He didn't even know if Johnny liked him that way, if you could. Okay, too far ahead. Friendship first. Make the sturdiest floor of friendship first and then see if he's willing to keep building if he wanted more. Focus, one step at a time. Like a dance. If Daniel was lucky they'd make their way from karate, a dance opposed, to waltzing, and if Daniel was even luckier, maybe a tango.

First up he was still invited to things, he had been invited to the lodge.

He jumped off his bed and to the door.

"Ma!" he called.

"Yeah?"

"Next weekend, Johnny and his friends invited me to a ski resort, to stay at their lodge. I still want to go. Where's our winter stuff?"

"You're going to pack now? I thought you were going to do homework?" she called back, laughing.

"I want to see if I need anything."

"Closet, the box at the top."

He walked to the closet and pulled out a few boxes marked winter and carried them to his room.

He popped open one and the smell of their home in Newark hit him like a ton of bricks. He'd forgotten how it smelled, but here it was.

He pulled out a winter jacket, snow pants, boots, a hat, gloves, and scarf.

The other box was full of sweaters, sweatpants, and other warm winter clothes. He tried them on in the mirror, trying to decide what to wear, setting things out and aside. It took a while and before he knew it he smelled dinner cooking and cursed. He grabbed his homework out of his bag, hurrying to try and get some of it done so he wouldn't have to lie to his mother.

He didn't want to have to explain to her that no he didn't do his homework, he spent all afternoon trying to decide which sweater looked the nicest on him and still didn't know.

The week went by incredibly slow. The buzz of the weekend trip on the horizon made every class of lessons torture. It always hit around lunch when the ex-cobras took over their new table full of complaints about this teacher or that teacher who just didn't seem to get it. They were so close to graduating, what was the point of learning anything else? Just stamp graduated on their forehead and let them out to play before the world would come knocking on their door with reality.

Johnny noticed a lot of things throughout the week. That they were trying to figure out cars and logistics in a way they normally didn't. He couldn't take the Avanti even though he wanted to. He didn't trust it on the snowy mountain roads, which meant he had to carpool.

Usually, he could just jump in with Bobby and the two would blast music the whole ride up. But it looked like they were trying to figure out who had the biggest car with 4 wheel drive and Johnny couldn't figure out what the point was because any time they crammed everyone in the same car for extended periods of time they drove each other nuts. And most of their cars held five, not six which was the number of people they had.

Currently, the debate was between one of Tommy's cars, a Ford bronco that he argued they could just take two cars, mostly excited because the car was new and he wanted to drive or Dutch's Volkswagen Vanagon, which was practically a bus.

They were leaning towards Dutch's nightmarish van because it had room for 7.

"With how small LaRusso is he's going to only take up like half a seat so we can fill the rest of the space with beer," Dutch argued and they couldn't really find fault in his opinion, though Daniel bristled a bit.

But Dutch was all smiles and teasing in a friendly way that he calmed down a bit but his mouth was still in a hard line.

The other thing Johnny noticed was that Daniel didn't talk to Ali anymore.

They avoided each other in the halls, didn't say hello, didn't wave, didn't acknowledge one another. It was like they stopped existing to one another.

He didn't know if they'd broken up if they were just in a fight, or on a break, but the cutesy hand-holding and sweet kisses they snuck were gone.

The guys noticed as well but had the decency not to say anything, just pulled in ranks closer, pulling Daniel into more conversations at lunch. When Johnny was out with a hall pass he noticed that Jimmy had swapped seats in one of his classes he shared with Daniel and now was sitting next to him and Daniel didn't look too freaked out about it.

It was one of the classes Ali was in and Jimmy had moved in such a way, putting himself between the two.

They'd done that for him. When Ali broke up with him they fell in, hanging on to him even though he kept trying to shake them off and charge after her, they did their best to distract him, swapping to be partners with him in science and home ec since Ali refused to talk to him.

Their breakup had been a little more explosive. The whole school knew about it.

The guys in his other classes his friends weren't in, were suddenly sitting with him to replace the empty seat that once would've been Ali's. He never mentioned it, never thanked them, never knew whether they did it on their own or whether his friends told them to.

The ex-cobras had other friends, but Johnny didn't.

It was just those four.

He was determined to go find Ali and apologize to her.

Halfway through the week was some stupid fancy country club dinner. Sid was adamant that even though he was still on set that Laura had to make an appearance. Wanted her to make a good impression with the new people so that later Sid had an in.

It was the same as always. Laura would charm them and Sid would filter through the new guests to see which ones were actually worthwhile.

He knew the Mills, they were like Sid just slightly less so. They needed to be seen and to see and they wouldn't go without Ali. So when the night came Johnny dressed up nicely and led his mother to the country club. He held out his arm to her.

Laura dressed in one of the stunning dresses she loved that Sid hated because well Sid wasn't there so who cared?

And he did the rounds, shoulders back, head held high, charming.

Ali was there, wearing a poufy dress and looking miserable, but smiling when people talked to her.

They talked to the Mills, her parents lowered their voice and whispered to Johnny and his mother.

"She finally ended it with that punk from Reseda," Mr. Mills said.

"We're so relieved, Johnny, you should go talk to her," Mrs. Mills said.

There was a hopeful tone in her voice. Like Johnny had a chance with Ali still. If they just made up, if he just tried harder, if he just said the right things Ali and he could be together again and that's all the Mills wanted.

But it wasn't what Johnny wanted.

Johnny nodded and looked at his mother who was trying very hard to keep a diplomatic look on her face but he knew she was worried. It was in her eyes for a mere second. She thought it was a terrible idea. She knew Ali was as likely to fight Johnny, to punch him in the face or kick him the way Daniel had been. In her eyes, Ali had a policy of beat the shit out of Johnny on sight.

He smiled and kissed her gently on the cheek. "I'll go say hello, will you be okay Mother?"

"Of course, extend my well wishes," she said patting him on the forearm.

He unhooked their arms and made his way over to Ali who turned her head as he approached, nose in the air, arms crossed.

"Good evening Miss Mills," Johnny said in the most polite but formal way he could. "May I sit for a moment?"

She looked at him suspiciously, then looked past him, beyond his shoulder, and let her arms fall to her lap, sitting up straight.

"Sure, Mr. Lawrence," she said sarcastically but with a smile that was full of venom, it was a show, for her parents.

Johnny sat down.

"I suppose you're here because Daniel and I broke up," she said eyes narrowing on him, her hands in her lap were curled into fists.

"No," Johnny said shaking his head.

"Because he told you I'm seeing a nice UCLA football player? Who I love?" Ali asked bitterly but it was wavering.

"No," Johnny said.

"Because of our parents?"

"Only as an excuse."

"Then what the hell do you want Johnny Lawrence?" she hissed.

"To tell you I'm sorry."

Her eyes widened in surprise just for a second before narrowing.

"What sort of trick is this?"

"Not a trick. I'm trying to be better, trying to learn and I've been doing a lot of thinking," Johnny said.

She was actually listening to him, he had to move fast, he didn't know how long she'd suffer his company.

"I knew I owed Daniel an apology, a thousand of them, and his sensei, and his mother. But I overlooked you because I was hurt and confused. Because I let all of this," Johnny motioned around him. "Make me forget who I am. I let other people tell me who I was and I believed them. It wasn't until...well until everything truly fell apart that I realized how badly I'd fucked up and I've been sifting through it and Ali, I'm sorry. I shouldn't have kissed you last time we were here together. I shouldn't have tried to force you to talk to me. I thought you owed me that, owed me an explanation, and couldn't understand why. I mean I loved you," he laughed dryly.

"Sid even had me picking out rings, kept telling me to ask you to marry me when we graduated. But that would have been such a bad idea in retrospect. You need your freedom to explore the world, to know other people. I mean I was your first serious boyfriend, you're still figuring out life like I'm still trying to figure it out. Neither of us are adult enough to get married, and shouldn't let other people try to pressure us into it. I do miss being friends with you, but I've realized that if someone doesn't want to be around me they've got their reasons and I gotta respect that. So again, I'm sorry. I'm sorry for breaking your radio, and if you want me to replace it, just let me know. And that if something happens and you need some muscle you give me a call okay? No strings. I'm not doing karate anymore, but I've realized I can still intimidate people into behaving without throwing punches and I can still fight without taking cheap shots. Not that you can't handle yourself. Your right hook is impressive. And thank you, for being with me for two years and putting up with my bullshit. I just wanted to let you know that I'm going to cheer you on. I know you want to be a doctor and I know you're going to be great at it. I wish you nothing but happiness. Uh, thanks for listening to me," Johnny said.

He stood and turned to disappear in the crowd.

He couldn't believe she'd listened for so long.

He half expected to just get up and leave, he had planned to let her go if she did.

But she watched him with those eyes he'd known so well, facial expression unreadable. He figured he'd give her her space from now on. He'd been fairly good about it since she hit him.

He found his mother and quietly returned to her side, she hooked her arm through his and gave it a squeeze. She radiated worry and concern but he gave her arm a squeeze back.

He met the people around him, walking with his mother, dancing with her, eating fancy food, things like seafood lobster, and crab with champagne.

Johnny didn't drink even though his mother said it was okay, he figured he'd drive them home, otherwise, they'd have to take a cab and if Sid knew they wasted money on a cab they'd both get yelled at.

There was no guarantee that the people here wouldn't talk to Sid about them.

It was like being on display constantly, they couldn't relax, couldn't be themselves, but at this point, it was second nature.

On the ride home his mother was sinking into the Avanti's passenger seat, slinking lower, shoulders drooping, and relaxing out of sight of the country club, kicking off her heels let out a sigh. "At least the food is nice," she said patting her stomach.

Johnny smiled and she pushed herself back up pushing hair back behind her ear. "You okay honey?" she asked.

"Yeah."

"Ali?" She left the rest question hang in the air between them. Did she hurt you this time? Did you get into another fight? What happened?

"I apologized, thanked her, and wished her well, she listened, and then I left her alone," Johnny said, he glanced over at her at a stoplight. "I feel better."

"Good," she said smiling back at him. "Now you can focus on Daniel."

Johnny turned bright red and quickly turned his face back to the road, shoulders going up to his ears.

She laughed. "Honey, now that you're cleaning up your act you're a catch. You might as well give it a go, right?"

"I'm still working on myself," Johnny whispered, he couldn't believe they were talking about this. She made it sound so easy.

"I know I was against the idea, at first anyway, but I'm warming up to it," she said shifting in her seat. "He's a cute kid, I mean I'd like to see him more, get to know your dynamic, meet his mother. It's just him and his mother right?"

"Uh, yeah. His dad died," Johnny said softly. "But he has Mr. Miyagi."

"I want to meet him too," she said sitting up again. "I like that he's putting you to work." She laughed.

Johnny refused to meet her gaze, knowing he was probably bright red. "We'll see, I'll uh, if there's a good time...I'll bring it up."

"Great!" she said clapping him on the shoulder and he winced because he'd been so good about not flinching around his mother but he did, he flinched. Thankfully she seemed too buzzed to notice. "It'll have to be their house, Sid will not have it. Which sucks," she said bitterly, chewing on her painted nails.

"Yeah," Johnny said.

"Oh! Your trip! Are you excited? Daniel's going, right? It's all guys right?"

"Yes."

"You got all your winter stuff out?"

"I did."

"Your board?"

"It's gone," Johnny said shaking his head. He'd didn't tell his mother when Sid broke stuff, his board had gotten totaled the year before.

"I'll give you some money to rent something, for you and Daniel," she said with a smile.

"You shouldn't Mom," Johnny said.

Sid was remarkably aware of finances, kept a close eye on every cent his mother spent. A lot of their fights broke out because she bought things for Johnny. Any money she wanted Johnny to have had to go through him and he had to approve it first. He rarely did.

She grinned. "I figured a way around it this time. I liked what you did to get an appointment with that doctor for Daniel. The trading? Yeah. I found this expensive purse for sale and I traded for it, but I took out cash for how much it was, and if Sid asks I paid in cash."

"Mom!" Johnny said looking at her in surprise.

Sid didn't care if she bought stuff for herself, things to make her prettier, it was worth it to him. She could waste thousands on purses and shoes and designer clothes and make-up. As long as she showed it off. The last time Johnny needed money she'd sold one of her purses. She donated them periodically when she felt like it was too much when she felt like she was drowning in luxury.

Sid never understood it, but he liked that it made him look good.

She laughed delightedly. "I still have several tricks up my sleeves darling. Don't you worry about me."

At school for the rest of the week, Johnny noticed another change. The girls weren't avoiding him like the plague anymore. A couple crowded up next to him at his locker and he'd been so confused that he'd been a little more dismissive than he'd meant.

His eyes found Ali across the hall and she just gave him a nod before shutting her locker and continuing on to her classes.

The guys noticed.

Tommy told him that the ban on Johnny had apparently disappeared.

Jimmy said he heard the girls arguing like it was open season.

Dutch burst out laughing. "You put your eyes on a guy and all the girls come running."

Bobby just gave him a sympathetic look. No matter how intimidating Johnny tried to look they didn't leave him alone. They wanted to walk with him to his classes. They wanted to hang out after school. He had to tell them he had work to do and they'd complain and whine. They wanted to talk to him in class and the teachers were getting frustrated.

Ali had destroyed whatever dam she'd built and he was going to drown in the sudden attention. She was going to have him murdered and he didn't know how to politely tell her to put him back on the blacklist because he wasn't going to date. He didn't want the attention. The girls were wasting their time.

It hit suddenly on Friday as he slammed his locker door shut as to why there was a sudden feeding frenzy, why it was like blood in the water. Valentine's Day was coming up. They were trying to lay the groundwork. They knew how he celebrated the holiday.

"You want us to start a rumor?" Bobby asked quietly as they hid in one of the boy's bathrooms.

"What kind of rumor?" Johnny asked, hating that he was desperate enough to even entertain the idea. He hated rumors.

"I mean it's not really a rumor, but it'll just be missing some facts," Bobby said. "We'd just let the girls know you already have feelings for someone, so you're not actually free to date them. You know, you're already attached. We just won't tell them who."

"That's not going to start some fight is it?" Johnny asked uneasily.

Bobby wrinkled his nose at Johnny. "I clearly am spending too much time with Dutch if my first thought to that statement was that you're a fucking idiot if you're upset at the idea of girls fighting over you."

Johnny rolled his eyes. "I just want to be left alone and for them to stop getting their hopes up."

"What did you do anyway?" Bobby asked.

"Apologized," Johnny said.

Bobby whirled on Johnny, eyes wide, "You did not apologize to Ali. She owes you an apology! She was-she was-" He dropped his voice low. "a bitch to you at the end."

Johnny sighed. "Well, I was a dick right back."

"Who the hell are you?" Bobby whispered. "Even I wouldn't have apologized to her."

"I'm trying to be better, I figured you'd be proud of me, out of everyone."

Bobby folded an arm across his chest and leaned his elbow of his other hand against it and sunk his cheek into his palm shaking his head.

"I mean I am, I just, damn Johnny. Ali wasn't even on my list of people you'd apologize to. I figured you two would be bitter enemies until the end of time."

"I'm trying to let go, you know? Mr. Miyagi just lets things go, he was telling me about how vines, you know vines right? Like grapevines and what not? That they will pull themselves onto a tree and other plants, will use them to climb up to get more sun and then start choking them, killing the plant that helped them and I thought shit, am I that fucking vine?" his hand went to his neck ever so gently. "He said the vines aren't inherently bad, and if they can get help or find something else to climb up that's more sturdy, like the way they do orchards in wine country, then they don't choke out other plants. They're sturdy and self-reliant, but they still need help. They just got to pick something that can handle it, and Bobby man I can't be that vine that chokes everything around me out. I can't be like Kreese."

His voice dropped low towards the end. He hadn't talked about it. He didn't want to talk about it. But he couldn't stop thinking about it.

Bobby's hand came to his back and rubbed gently. He shook his head. "I don't think that's what he meant man. I don't think he meant you were the vine. It's a good analogy. But I think he meant you gotta find the parts of your life where things are stopping you from breathing, right? He's always talking about breathing right?"

"Yeah," Johnny said.

"He probably meant that you have to find the stuff that's keeping you from growing, keeping you from breathing and move it so you don't suffocate, relocate it someplace safer. Which I mean, you kinda did with Ali right? You apologized and relocated her from enemy to like neutral party. The horde of girls ready to jump you and rip your clothes off though," Bobby said with a laugh. "That's a fucking vine you need help relocating, so let us get the rumor mill going. You know Tommy is so fucking good at it, the girls listen to him."

"You think so?" Johnny asked looking at Bobby and regretting it. Bobby's face was full of concern, worry. He looked away. This is why they usually didn't talk about shit. "Yeah, go ahead, start up that rumor mill but carefully yeah?"

"On it," Bobby said, slapping his back, he turned towards the door and then paused. "You gonna be okay?"

"Of course you fucking bastard, piss off," Johnny said, trying to sound tougher than he felt.

Bobby laughed. "Hey, just remember this weekend starts soon, a couple of hours are all that stand between us and the mountains and snow."

"And Dutch's creepy van," Johnny said bitterly.

"Yeah, so creepy. You're the last one we're picking up in the hills, you gotta give directions to go get Daniel," Bobby said before waving and ducking out of the bathroom.

Johnny sighed and sunk against the sinks. He washed his hands just to do something, an excuse to not have to leave with Bobby, to try and settle his features because his eyes looked haunted when he caught sight of himself in the mirror.

The girls around his locker dwindled as the day went on, enough so that he was sure Tommy had the rumor mill going at breakneck speeds.

He didn't want to know what they thought.

It just helped that they weren't hovering, that they weren't trying to touch him. All the hands-on his arms, trying to lean in close and flirt had sent his heart panicking.

He hadn't been able to breathe when a couple of girls had chased after him and slammed their hands on his shoulders trying to walk with him and talk about classes.

He didn't want to salt the earth around him, but he needed his space.

He'd gotten so used to it, that he'd forgotten how things had been before Ali. How he'd once reveled in the attention. He'd been putting on muscle from karate and it drew everyone to him like moths. He got drunk on it. It inflated his ego.

But now, now he couldn't handle it.

When school was over he checked the time and hurried to Mr. Miyagi's. The man was home and looked surprised to see Johnny jogging towards him, bonsai in hand.

"Johnny-san, thought you had trip. Going skiing?" Mr. Miyagi asked with a frown.

"I am, but I didn't think it'd be good to take the bonsai up, right? Plus with the guys I thought it might get hurt. They're planning to fill all of the van full of ...uh...stuff. Could you...can I...leave the bonsai here with you while I'm gone? I'll come to pick it up as soon as we get back...if that's okay?" Johnny asked, heart in his throat.

He didn't want to leave the bonsai but he didn't have anyone else to watch it. He held it carefully between his hands.

Mr. Miyagi studied him for a moment then nodded and held out his hands to take the bonsai.

"Okay, Miyagi will watch," Mr. Miyagi said and relief flooded over Johnny.

"Thank you Mr. Miyagi," Johnny said bowing to him.

"Now, Johnny-san, go have fun," Mr. Miyagi said waving Johnny off and towards his car.

Johnny nodded rushing back to the Avanti.

"Thank you Mr. Miyagi!" he called again.

Mr. Miyagi just shook his head, chuckling softly to himself, carrying the bonsai back to his home and Johnny hurried home.

He parked the Avanti somewhere safe and hurried to his room, he'd mostly packed already, but he knew Dutch.

Dutch was impatient.

The other guys probably were already fully packed and hadn't gone to Reseda after school.

Heck, he was pretty sure he'd seen Tommy and Jimmy throw their shit in the back of Dutch's van that morning, planning to leave their cars safely in the school parking lot over the weekend.

Which just left picking up Bobby.

He threw a couple of books in his bag, his favorite cassettes, and his Walkman.

He had all his winter stuff ready and he turned to find his mother leaning against the door.

He'd nearly jumped out of his skin, she'd been so quiet. She walked in, shut the door, and pulled a wad of cash out of her bra that she slid into the bottom of his bag.

She kissed him on the cheek. "Have fun, be careful okay?"

"Thanks, Mom," he said softly, hugging her back. Jolting when he heard a horn blast from the front.

He zipped his bag and ran, pausing to run back and kiss her on the cheek.

"Love you," he said and she smiled and he ran down the halls ignoring the staff who wished him goodbye with a string of curses because he was leaving through the front door.

Dutch was hanging out of the van, out of the driver's seat with a smirk on his face.

"Run lover boy, run, we got places to be! That snow ain't gonna wait forever."

"Isn't it partially fake!" Johnny called, putting his stuff in the trunk and then hopping into the back when the door slid open.

The two seats in the middle of the van were taken up by Tommy and Bobby. Jimmy was in the other front seat, leaving Johnny in the back in the long seat with Daniel.

Oh, it all made sense now, he thought as he moved to the back.

Why they made them all ride together.

Why they'd been so adamant about picking Johnny up last even though he was closest to Dutch.

Why Jimmy and Tommy had brought their shit to school.

He wondered with a frown what other things they had planned.

Music played on the radio and the van reeked of stale weed. There were air fresheners hanging from the rearview mirror and Johnny belted himself in.

"Alright," Dutch said turning the van around and pointing it towards Reseda. "So how do we get to LaRusso? He's in Reseda right? Give me directions Johnny and speak up," he called, as Jimmy leaned over to turn down the music. He had a map unfurled in his hands.

Johnny sighed and leaned forward, ducking his head so he could watch the road, giving directions towards the South Seas apartment complex.

It took about twenty minutes but was thankfully along the way so the excuse for why they were getting Daniel last held, though Johnny was pretty sure they'd have done it that way anyway. Even if they were heading south or something rather to Mountain High.

He waited to hear Dutch lean on the horn when they arrived at South

Seas, but Dutch just let the van idle.

Bobby opened the sliding door.

"Well," Dutch said looking back at Johnny. "Go get him."

Johnny flushed and let out a string of curses as he unhooked his seatbelt and pushed himself up and ducked his head as he slipped out past Bobby.

"Hey man, you don't honk when you pick up a girl. So we're not going to honk when you pick up LaRusso," Dutch said looking too smug from the driver's seat.

Johnny flicked the side of his head as he passed.

"Fuck you man," Dutch said but there was no menace in it. "We're trying to remind you to be a fucking gentleman."

"Hey," Jimmy said rolling his window down and passing him a piece of paper. "The lodge's address and number for his mother."

Johnny took it with a nod and pushed through the gate. He nodded to the elderly woman sitting out, glad he'd brought treats in case and fed the dog one before jogging past and up the stairs to room twenty.

He knew if he waited too long the guys would kill him. They wanted to get in before dark and it was a two-hour drive. The goal was to not take breaks, to not stop until they got there.

He felt like a bundle of nerves.

He and Daniel would be stuck together in the back seat for two hours, with the guys. Who knew what they had planned.

A weekend, of the six of them, and his friends knew.

They knew he liked Daniel.

Without karate, they had all the time in the world to scheme and plan.

He raised his fist to knock on the door.

"Coming!" Mrs. LaRusso's voice called. The door opened and she stood there all smiles. "Hey Johnny!" she said moving out of the way. It was night and day from the first time he'd come by. "Daniel's just finishing packing."

Johnny handed the paper over to her that Jimmy gave her. "The address and number for the place we're staying."

"Oh perfect! Thank you, Johnny," she said taking it and tacking it onto the fridge under a tourist magnet of the grand canyon. "So you excited? A trip out in the mountains with friends just sounds like so much fun."

"Yeah," Johnny said.

"Daniel's so excited. He loves snow. He's been complaining all winter," she laughed. "So thank you, I thought I was about to lose it. Which mountain are you going to?"

"Mountain High, it's about two hours, a little less, it depends on traffic," Johnny said.

"Do you ski?"

"I know how to, and board," Johnny said.

Sid took them a lot when he was a kid because some executive or something liked to go. He made Johnny do all the classes, bought him the nicest equipment, and then when Johnny got into it, liked it and things went south with the executive Sid broke it all and threw it in the trash.

Johnny had bought a board a year or two ago with his allowance and Sid got pissed about something and the board was broken. He hadn't bothered to replace it.

"Oh!" she said putting her hands on his forearms. "I nearly forgot!" she turned and opened the fridge and pulled out a large container covered in foil and pressed it into Johnny's hands. "This should keep, my best lasagna," she said with a grin. "350 for 30 minutes okay?"

"Ma!" Daniel said, his voice a whine, he had his bag over his shoulder. "I told you you didn't have to bake lasagna."

She laughed. "You guys are going to be so busy you won't even think of food until you are all starving and cranky. A good home-cooked meal already in the car will curb some bickering. I remember being young once you know."

"Thanks, Mrs. LaRusso," Johnny said turning to the door and opening it, carefully holding the lasagna under his arm.

She stopped Daniel at the door. "You promise me you'll be careful with your knee, right? I don't want you doing anything to hurt that knee worse, you promise me." Her voice was full of fear and worry and there was steel in it, her fingers were digging into his arms.

"Yeah Ma, I'm not going to ski or anything. I'm just going to enjoy the snow okay? Don't worry."

"You'll keep him out of trouble?" she asked turning her gaze on Johnny.

Johnny nodded. "Yes ma'am."

She nodded, and then her hands rose off of Daniel's arms and cupped his face kissing his forehead in the most embarrassing and loud motherly way possible and Johnny smirked as Daniel let out a scandalized sound.

"Ma!" he cried, pulling away.

"I love you," she called.

"Yeah, Love you too," he mumbled, rubbing his forehead with the back of his hand sourly hurrying down the steps. When they reached the gate he turned back to Johnny so suddenly he nearly bumped into him.

"Did she leave lipstick?" he whispered.

"No," Johnny said.

Daniel relaxed relieved and then pushed the gate open.

Bobby hauled the door open again and Jimmy was resting against the window, hand hanging out tapping the side of the van. He grinned at the two of them. "Hey, what's that?" he called pointing at what was in Johnny's hands.

"Mrs. LaRusso made us homemade lasagna," Johnny called back.

"Oh hell yeah!" Dutch yelled from the driver's seat. "Throw your stuff in the trunk. There's a cooler, see if the lasagna fits."

Johnny nodded popping the back.

Daniel found a spot amongst their bags to set his and Johnny opened the cooler full of melting ice, beer, and soda. There were a couple of sealed packets of marinated steak at the bottom and Johnny set the lasagna carefully on top. Daniel had stepped back and seemed to be waiting to follow Johnny, so he shut the cooler and the trunk, making sure it latched properly before heading around to the side that Bobby had open and waiting for them.

Bobby hadn't curled his feet under him this time so they had to climb over him, he looked too pleased with himself.

"Bastard," Johnny muttered to him before flopping into the back.

Daniel sank down next to him and Johnny glanced over. They'd moved some cooler onto the seat so that the only open space was next to each other. He shot a glare to the front where Dutch was watching with a grin on his face.

"Alright, we've got everybody right? No one forgot anything? We're doing a straight shot into the mountains, any of you get sick I'll murder you. But if you let me know before you do I'll pull over and you can empty your guts on the side of the road. But I will take it as an affront to my driving," Dutch called as Bobby slide the door shut. "Some van rules, no drinking in here, no eating, it's like a 2-hour drive, you'll live, no complaining about the music, suck it up dolls. No complaining about my driving. No back seat driving. Just mind your pretty heads. The only one who can argue with me is in the navigator's seat and even this bastard has to be careful because he's in reach. If you piss me off I will pull over and we will tussle. It's a long ride all together, so try to be chill. Do not complain about the van. Do not diss the van. Or you can walk home. Got it?"

Johnny sighed sinking into his seat, he caught Daniel nodding beside him, taking Dutch seriously.

The music went up and Johnny wrinkled his nose but bit back a comment as ABBA started to play. Dutch was grinning widely. His van, his rules, he could torture them with his music choices all he wanted and Johnny knew he collected everything.

Who knew what tapes he had upfront, jazz, country, disco, polka. Dutch would listen to anything and if he had two hours of them at his mercy he would show none. It was going to be a long ride.

He propped his elbow against the window and looked out at Reseda and the rest of LA, the palm trees as they made their way through the busy Friday night traffic.

Tommy shifted in the seat in front of him and turned, he caught a look out of the corner of his eye like a roll of his eyes before he put a smile on his face.

"How much snow does Jersey get?" Tommy asked.

"Like 28 inches every winter," Daniel said.

"Shit," Tommy said eyes wide. "Seriously?"

"Yeah, I don't know how you guys can call this winter."

Bobby laughed turning as well. "How did you not freeze every year? How cold does it get?"

"Between mid-twenties and like from October to May it usually is barely ever up to 70."

"Damn," Bobby said. "Fucking freezing man. So what, do you not get hot summers?"

"Anything above 94 is rare," Daniel said.

"So you died last summer. You ready this year?" Tommy asked.

"No, but I also miss the rain. It like never rains here," Daniel said. "You guys get like nothing from the sky. No snow, no rain."

"Clear skies almost all the time," Bobby said.

Johnny turned to look at him, he was grinning. "Smooth sailing."

"I mean we get the Santa Ana winds," Tommy said.

"What's that?"

"You haven't noticed how windy it's been?" Bobby asked amused.

Daniel frowned. "Is this like snipe hunting?"

"The winds come from autumn until spring bringing heat and messing with the weather and the humidity. They also spread fires. It's a California weather thing," Bobby said.

"What's a snipe?" Johnny asked turning to Daniel whose face broke out in a grin.

Jimmy had turned down the volume of the radio.

Daniel shifted in his seat, bringing his left ankle under his right knee and it pushed his knee against Johnny's. He looked absolutely deviously delighted and Johnny worried that he'd just asked something stupid and he quickly flicked his gaze to Bobby and Tommy who were listening just as carefully. They didn't know either. Dutch was looking back occasionally curiously.

"A snipe is this small rodent that lives in the woods and is nocturnal," Daniel said voice loud enough to be heard through the van. "They're incredibly rare, so it's hard to find them, but we'd go out at summer camps to try and catch them. You break up into groups, someone in the group with a bag of some kind, low to the ground, and then everyone else tries to make enough of a ruckus in the woods to send it running in the direction of the people waiting to catch it."

"Are they worth a lot?" Jimmy called from the front.

"Well they are rare," Daniel said with a shrug.

"You ever catch one?" Bobby asked.

"No, they're too fast," Daniel said.

"So if we went to Jersey, in the woods, we could try to catch one?"

"I think they're in most of the woods in North America," Daniel said thoughtfully.

"Huh, my uncle hunts, he's never mentioned snipes."

"Probably too small for him to be worth it."

Johnny watched Daniel curiously. His eyes were sparkling with delight.

"You gonna take us snipe hunting this summer, LaRusso?" Dutch called from the front.

"I mean if you really want, but you won't like it," he called back.

"That boring? Like fishing?" Dutch called back.

"Worse," Daniel said.

"Worse," Dutch repeated. "What the hell is worse than fishing?"

Daniel looked like he was holding in laughter, absolutely too pleased.

"It's fake isn't it?" Johnny asked suspiciously.

Daniel turned to him and dissolved into a fit of giggles.

"Wait, it's fake?" Bobby asked. "Do people not actually go snipe hunting?"

Daniel brushed tears of mirth from his eyes. "No they do, but it's like a joke," he breathed. "The people who are supposed to chase the snipe usually just go home."

"Damn," Jimmy said.

He'd pulled out a book and was passing it back to Bobby who studied the open page then turned to Daniel. "Okay so a snipe hunt is a joke, and it's a rodent? What about this thing?" he opened a book of birds at a spotted brown bird with a long beak, "This thing is real though right?"

Daniel took the book and studied the bird. "I mean I didn't know about it but yeah same name. If you're hunting the bird it's real, if you find yourself in the woods holding a bag at night, then uh no, you've been tricked."

Bobby sighed. "Damn, Jersey's tricky."

"Really it's like a summer camp thing," Daniel said with a grin. "Or scouts. My cousin got tricked about it in the scouts when he was little and they went camping. He turned to Johnny. "How'd you know?"

"You looked like you were hiding something," Johnny said softly.

Daniel laughed at this hand coming down to Johnny's knee. "I'm going to have to work on that. I didn't know I had a tell."

"Yeah maybe don't play poker," Johnny said amused, the hand stayed.

He caught the look that was exchanged between Tommy and Bobby and flushed. He didn't know how to tell them that this was just how Daniel was. Touchy. He invaded your personal space and set up camp there.

They fought him, they should've known. But they were going to take it out of context. He was sure if either of them were in the back seat instead, Daniel would do the same thing. He wasn't special. He just was there.

"So your Mom made us lasagna," Bobby offered as a change of subject.

"Yeah," Daniel said awkwardly. "She likes to cook, especially for groups. I guess it's an Italian thing."

"350 for thirty minutes," Johnny said, mostly in case he forgot so he wasn't the only one who knew what she'd told him.

Bobby nodded.

"That's great, I'm excited to try it," Bobby said. "My parents sent me with a ton of sweets."

Daniel smiled.

Jimmy rose his hand. "Yeah and mine sent me with drinks. Which reminds me, Johnny those sodas you asked about are coming in next week 'kay?"

"Thanks," Johnny called back.

"I brought steak," Tommy said with a grin. "My uncle got this deal on a bunch and my aunt marinated it and sealed it, so it should be good. I think Johnny's the only one who didn't bring anything."

"Hey," Johnny said sourly. "No one said to bring anything."

"You just brought your pretty self," Dutch laughed from the front. "And Daniel, so you get a pass this time."

Johnny frowned, he didn't have anything to bring with him. He couldn't take food from the fridges, the staff would notice and tell Sid. He didn't have time to buy anything. His mom gave him money to pay for Daniel if he wanted to do something, but all the things she mentioned were things he'd promised Mrs. LaRusso he wouldn't let Daniel do.

He brought cassettes but Dutch would get offended if he offered those. His van his music. He got that, he had the same rule with the Avanti.

Daniel gave his leg a squeeze and he glanced over.

Daniel had moved, was leaning against him.

Johnny turned back to look out the window as they passed the start of the mountains, and along the Santa Clara River, crossing it and up towards Palmdale.

He was doing his very hardest not to sling his arm around Daniel's shoulder, to not move, not wanting to scare him off, not wanting to see the looks he was sure the guys were making.

Snipe hunting is a practical joke in North America. It's kind of hazing (a kind of mean practical joke). I've been tricked into doing it when I was little and went camping with classmates. You can read more about it here: https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Snipe_hunt

Snipes however are also the name of a bird which is a different thing. You can read about the bird and see what it looks like here: https://www.britannica.com/animal/snipe

Not Ready Yet

The mountains rose and Daniel couldn't take his eyes off of them, they were stunning. The weather changed the higher they went, it got cooler, he could see snow on the peaks.

The guys were talking about the things they could do, skiing was on their list, and snowboarding.

He felt Johnny tense beside him again and puzzled over it.

Then he remembered Johnny promising that he'd keep Daniel out of trouble, which meant keeping him from doing anything dangerous related to his knee.

"Hey Bobby," Johnny said.

Bobby paused mid-sentence and turned back to Johnny. It was weird to see it in action, the way they listened when Johnny spoke. The way the van fell quiet.

"You got that pamphlet of things to do at the resort?" Johnny asked.

"Uh yeah," Bobby said digging through a bag at his feet and pulling out a brochure, and passing it back.

Johnny took it and Daniel scooted closer to take a look.

Johnny flicked it open, skipping past the glossy photos of people skiing and snowboarding and the lessons and prices and trails.

"Snowmobile," Johnny said quietly, tapping on the image of a lime green machine, "Kawasaki invader could rent those."

Daniel glanced at the price but Johnny had put his thumb over it.

"How expensive is it?" he asked uneasily.

"I got it," Johnny said, flicking the page and Daniel frowned and pulled away a little.

Johnny glanced over. "My mother wanted to cover it since it's your first trip out with us. If I go home and tell her I didn't treat you to anything she'll be pissed at me."

"We've also booked thermal pools," Tommy said. "My family's got this season pass for that, so that's covered."

Bobby turned, he made eye contact with Johnny and Daniel caught Johnny out of the corner of his eye, tilting his head pointedly and the look on Bobby's face was stricken but he quickly recovered.

"We should do that for sure. I heard it's great for injuries and whatnot."

"Smooth," Johnny muttered shaking his head.

"I'll be okay," Daniel said quickly. "Don't worry about me. Enjoy your skiing and snowboarding."

"Huh?" Dutch asked.

"His knee, remember dumbass?" Jimmy asked with a sigh. "We fucking forgot."

"Fuck," Dutch said. "Well hey man, we're still going to have great food and the lodge has this bar that doesn't card. You can get a boozy hot chocolate, it's amazing."

"Don't worry," Daniel said again with a small smile. "I'm just excited to see snow again."

"Easy to please," Dutch said. "I like that."

He didn't sound quite convinced but Daniel couldn't keep saying it. It sucked, but his mother would kill him if she found out that he made his knee more messed up by skiing or snowboarding.

He also couldn't let them change all their plans because of him.

The snowmobile sounded like fun though even if he felt bad because it would probably be expensive. Everything was always expensive.

He watched them enter a wooded road and leave the main road, the road cleared but snow piled up along the edges. They made their way up to a large wooden building. Cabin came to Daniel's mind but it was bigger than any cabin he'd ever seen. It had to be a lodge. There weren't any other cars even though it looked like it could fill many.

"Already gentlemen, we're here, la tercera casa de Jimmy," Dutch said parking. "Everyone out, grab your shit, and let's get in. Jimmy go unlock the place will ya?"

The passenger seat opened and a cold wind filled the van followed by shouts of complaints and curses from the other guys.

Daniel grinned, he couldn't wait to feel the crunch of snow beneath his feet.

Jimmy had run, bolting up to the front door, bouncing from one foot to the other while he unlocked the door.

"Oh god I'm not ready," Bobby complained. "Brace yourselves." He pushed the door open and the bit of cold from earlier hit like a wall as he slid the door open and stepped out, letting out a string of curses and shoving his hands under his arms.

Johnny undid his seatbelt and Daniel hurried to get out, moving ahead of him and hopping out of the van, making sure he landed on his good knee, before hurrying to the trunk to gather his bag.

Johnny had the cooler from the seat under his arms with a frown on his face. His face started turning pink from the cold and it was like when he blushed.

Daniel tried to grab the other cooler but his momentary distraction of taking in Johnny made him too slow and Tommy had it and was jogging towards the lodge, shouting the whole way about who liked this shit, why'd they do this to themselves, why'd they pack all their jackets like idiots.

Johnny's bag was the only one left and he bent down to retrieve it.

Daniel hooked his other hand through his own bag to keep his hands to himself. He'd promised himself he'd be good on this trip. And he'd already failed. He'd already put his hands on Johnny's leg like he did when they were at Mr. Miyagi's or alone. It'd become a habit before he even realized it. He couldn't touch Johnny's arm. He hadn't figured out how high on his arm made him flinch. But it just wasn't worth the attempt. His leg was safe, if not a little weird.

Johnny shut the trunk.

"You really like the cold this much? Let's go inside before we freeze huh?" Johnny asked.

Daniel turned and hurried towards the lodge. They'd all moved so fast and he kept getting stuck, eyes glued to Johnny.

It was just that he couldn't believe they were actually here, together. He'd been invited to this and he'd been so excited all week. His mother had been excited all week. Relieved he was getting out and having fun. Though he knew she was nervous. He'd survived the party, but his relationship with Ali had exploded so his mother was worried about what sort of fallout would happen with six teenage boys alone in a lodge in the mountains.

She'd whispered quietly to him over dinner that it sounded like "lord of the flies" waiting to happen.

He was pretty sure if Johnny hadn't won her over, if he hadn't kept showing up and helping out and proving himself reliable then she wouldn't have let him go.

He wondered if he was subconsciously sticking to Johnny's side specifically because of that. As if her concern was infectious.

He'd been so relieved that the seat in the van available was next to Johnny. More relieved than excited. He'd gotten worried about the snipe hunting, that they'd get pissed at him for the joke. But being next to Johnny made him feel safe.

He wondered when that switch had flipped.

He knew his mother had the same feeling, it was why she'd asked Johnny to keep an eye on him like Johnny was taking him out on a date.

He blushed.

There was no way his mother would let him out on a date like this, alone in the mountains. But that was part of the excitement. He'd get to see Johnny first thing in the morning, late in the evening. They'd be around each other outside of school, away from Mr. Miyagi or their parents, or the kids from school. Just Johnny and his friends and Daniel. It was the perfect place for Daniel to work on the foundation of their relationship, charm Johnny's friends, work on settling roots, find a place for himself.

The inside of the lodge was stunning. High ceilings and chandeliers with a large stone fireplace next to a bunch of seating. There were a couple of couches and chairs around it with a low table, large glass doors that looked out at the mountains and the snow and the trees. The kitchen was where the guys were carefully unpacking the coolers.

Johnny set the cooler he'd been carrying a little heavily down on the counter and the other guys looked at him with grins, Dutch took it and carried it away.

It was empty Daniel realized as Dutch stored it in a cabinet.

Bobby was turning on the oven to 350 and he was holding the lasagna carefully. He turned and looked around the room, eyes catching Daniel's.

"Hey, do I remove the foil or does it stay on?"

"Leave it on," Daniel said.

Bobby nodded, turning and setting the dish gently on the countertop. Sodas and beer were being added to the empty fridge along with the steak. Cookies and containers of other sweets were being set onto another counter then Jimmy leaned back and sighed, clapping his hands together.

"So I was thinking," he said slowly. "Tomorrow the resort, which we've got passes for, offers a buffet breakfast, so let's say we head out at 8?"

Dutch let out a groan. "Seriously? 8?"

"What you wanna go at 7?" Jimmy asked, teasing.

"Hell no, 8 is fine," Dutch grumbled.

"Do I need-" Daniel began wondering about the passes and logistics but Jimmy shook his head.

"Nah you're covered, the pass is for everyone in the van. They go by car."

"Oh, thanks," Daniel said.

Bobby turned from the stove and looked at Tommy whose hands were free. "How about you put our shit in our rooms while we're unpacking the food?"

"Oh, right," Tommy said scooping up the bags that had been discarded on the floor and over his shoulder.

Johnny quickly picked up his bag before Tommy got it. "I'll carry my own, just tell me what you guys decided on."

Tommy didn't respond and Johnny followed him stiffly down the hall. Daniel looked between groups and turned following the two out into the hall.

"So," Tommy began. "Bathroom here," he said tapping a door with his foot.

He pushed open a door next to him and opened it throwing a bag in. "And Dutch is in that one."

He continued down the hall and pushed the door next open. "And Bobby will be here." The bag was slung in.

He climbed up the stairs and tapped another door. "Bathroom," he said.

He pushed open the next door. "Jimmy" he said throwing the bag in.

Daniel noticed Johnny stiffened at that, like that room choice had been a surprise. It had looked like a nice room from the glimpse Daniel had gotten.

Tommy went down to the end of the hall and shoved another door open and threw in the last bag, "Me," he said.

Tommy brushed past them and then hopped back down the stairs, they followed and out past the kitchen and the large glass doors to the patio. He opened a door, "Office, where one of the phones is. Other is in the kitchen. Same number, same line."

He opened another door "Rec room," there was a pool table and another wet bar, it reminded Daniel of the one he'd played charades in with Dutch and Johnny.

Next door opened. "Linen closet, clean towels, toilet paper, you know, stuff." He shut it.

The next set of doors were a double set and his hands fell onto the doorknobs heavily before pushing them open with a flourish.

"You two are here," he said.

The room was big, with a large window overlooking the mountains, the view was stunning and Daniel was so distracted by it that what Tommy had said didn't register.

"What about the room in the basement?" Johnny was saying.

"They're remodeling, it's not habitable at the moment," Tommy said, he sounded apologetic.

There was a big bed along one of the walls.

"We figured this way Daniel didn't have to take the stairs. You know Dutch can't work stairs when he's drunk and Bobby has to keep him in check. And you've slept with like all of us in your bed before, so like it's not a big deal, right Johnny?"

There was something in his tone that Daniel couldn't place. He had a million questions bubbling up as he came back to reality and pulled his gaze away from the view. As the words settled in as a reality.

This was the room he was staying in. And he was staying in it with Johnny. Tommy was expecting them to share the bed like it was nothing, a non-issue. Apparently, it was an ex-cobra sleepover thing to share beds. Completely platonically. Johnny was used to it. Which meant it meant nothing and the rapid way his heart was beating in his chest meant it was only a big deal for Daniel.

It meant that he'd not just see Johnny early in the morning and late at night, but that he'd be right next to him all through the night.

He'd see what Johnny looked like when he slept if it was that same peaceful look he had in the doctor's office's waiting room.

He never would've dreamed they'd put them in a room together unless it was bunk beds or something like that.

But this was, different. This was intimate, even if it wasn't.

He breathed and set his bag down gently at the foot of the bed.

He was going to remain calm, if he wasn't calm about it then they'd move someone, Johnny would offer to sleep somewhere else, he'd get scared off and Daniel wanted this.

Now that he knew it was an option he refused to let it slip through his fingers.

Screw being unable to ski or snowboard, he'd get to be alone, utterly alone with Johnny.

He needed to not look too excited, he needed to act like this wasn't a big deal. Because he had to calm the fuck down because this wasn't a big deal. Heck, his grandparents made him and Louie share a bed until they were like 13 whenever they visited. It was the same. Okay, it wasn't the same, but the thought helped.

He turned and Tommy was waiting, leaning against the door.

"Okay," Daniel said with a shrug. "The view is stunning," he said jerking a thumb over his shoulder.

Tommy grinned. "Right? Okay, so there's an ensuite bathroom in here," he said crossing the room quickly and throwing open a door that revealed a pretty decent-sized bathroom. "So yeah, unpack and what not. You said it's thirty minutes right? So like thirty minutes until dinner probably," Tommy said with a shrug. "I mean you got problems or need anything Johnny will be here, so yeah," he said, "So ask him." and then he was gone, leaving one of the doors open and slipping out down the hall.

Daniel stared at the doors. "Two doors is kind of weird for a bedroom right?"

"Yeah, I think they just liked how it opened. You gotta do the thing Tommy did. It's like the whole point."

"So does Jimmy usually take this room?" Daniel asked scooping up his bag and unzipping it to carefully unpack his jacket and boots and set them in the closet, hanging his jacket up.

"Yeah," Johnny said turning to his own bag. He paused and then turned to Daniel. "You really okay with this?"

"Sure," Daniel said. "I mean it makes sense right? Logically? What else would they do? Put Dutch and Bobby in here?" He was taking a shot in the dark based on what Tommy had said and apparently it hit because Johnny smirked and shook his head.

"Well, you got a side you gotta sleep on?" Johnny asked motioning to the bed.

"Nope, I'm flexible," Daniel said carefully setting out his sweaters, everything smelled like the old apartment, like Newark and it was a little overwhelming.

Made him a little homesick. They'd lived there his whole life, it's where they'd lived with his dad. He understood why they'd moved, but it felt like they'd left Dad behind and he hated it. But he couldn't tell his mother that, it'd just hurt her.

"You okay?" Johnny asked and Daniel looked at him, he was crouched next to where Daniel was.

His fingers were digging into the sweater, holding it tightly. His mother had set a couple of his fathers aside for him, and he'd brought one because it looked nice and now he regretted it. The smell was fading.

He shook his head and tried to crack a smile. "It's silly," he said.

Johnny shifted back and sat down on the ground, like he wasn't going anywhere, was all ears. Daniel sighed and looked back at his sweater, running his fingers over it.

"Ma kept a bunch of Dad's stuff for me, and, well they've been in storage for so long, that it wasn't until I opened them that I realized how much they've retained the smell. It smells like him still. I'm kind of regretting bringing it, because if I wear it, everything will smell like my Dad, and then the smell will go away. It's already kind of fading."

"We can put it in a plastic bag or something," Johnny said. "I'm sure there's something around here."

"I think I'm not ready yet."

Johnny nodded and was up, opening drawers and then heading out into the hall, Daniel heard doors open and close, the soft sound of Johnny talking. He felt like he should get up and move, help find something to put his Dad's sweater in. But he couldn't move.

If he moved he'd cry and he couldn't kick off this trip with tears. He refused.

He ducked his head and breathed in his Dad's cologne. He remembered his mother kept a bottle of it in her room. He'd always thought it was strange, but he got it now.

He tried to remember the good times when his Dad was healthy when they gone out as a family, before he got sick. He'd avoided looking at his Dad's stuff because it always made him think of being in the hospital, of the smells of the hospital, how frail his hand had gotten when Daniel had tried to hold it.

Footsteps approached and Johnny held out a big clothing bag and some duck tape. Daniel turned and carefully slipped the sweater into the plastic Johnny held open to him. Johnny ripped the duck tape off with his teeth and quickly sealed the rest of it off. He checked it for openings, then once it was completely sealed looked up at Daniel.

"If you need an extra sweater, I brought extras, you can borrow one of mine, it might be too big," he said unsure.

Daniel smiled softly, reaching out and covering Johnny's hand in his.

"Thanks." he said.

He closed his eyes and breathed.

Johnny didn't move. Johnny stayed just like he thought Johnny would.

The smell of his mother's lasagna filled the lodge and that mixed with his father's cologne brought tears to his eyes but he blinked them back.

"Yeah, one of your sweaters would be great if that's okay."

Johnny leaned over rather than remove his hand from under Daniel's and hooked his duffle bag and dragged it over. With his free hand he dug around past his walkman and cassettes and Daniel spotted a few books, a beginners guide to Japanese, a beginners guide to mechanics, and a book on piloting. He pulled a few sweaters to the top.

"I'll..uh..just set them out, grab whichever one you want," he said after a while.

"Dinner kids!" Came Dutch's yell down the hall.

Daniel pulled his hand back and stood carefully, putting his hand out to the edge of the wardrobe to help pull himself up off the floor, to keep his weight off his knee.

Johnny scooped up his bag and quickly set out the sweaters on the top of a chest nearby and Daniel gently nudged his own bag out of the way and along the wall. His father's sweater safely tucked away.

Johnny turned the light back off and shut the doors before following Daniel.

The guys were around a kitchen table with two seats saved for Johnny and Daniel, it was a round table and the chairs were cramped next to each other.

The lasagna was sitting in the center, cut carefully and Bobby was filling plates.

"What do you want to drink?" Johnny asked softly as Daniel sunk into one of the empty seats next to Jimmy.

"Soda, uh surprise me?" Daniel said remembering that Jimmy had brought a bunch of sodas he probably wouldn't recognize.

"Let him try the pineapple one," Jimmy recommended.

Johnny wrinkled his nose at that. "Your pairing recommendations need work, lasagna and pineapple?"

Jimmy shrugged. "The pineapple is good though."

"Yeah, no," Johnny said turning to walk to the fridge.

"LaRusso this smells amazing," Dutch said.

"It's probably molten hot, so be careful," Daniel warned.

He'd been burned so many times by his mother's lasagna, getting too excited to wait to dig in.

Johnny returned with a look of triumph setting a yellow bottles in front of himself and twisted off a cap handing it over to Daniel. Daniel started to grin thinking Johnny had caved and gone for pineapple, but he looked at the bottle in his hands, it had a lemon on it and the writing was in Italian.

"Hey! This is from Italy!" he said excitedly.

"Oh I totally forgot we had those," Jimmy said, an appraising look falling on Johnny.

The others were drinking beers and Daniel didn't care.

He turned to Johnny, "My grandmother used to have these."

He hadn't seen them outside of her house, like ever.

"Yeah, they good?" Johnny asked, bottle hovering to his lips.

"They are. I haven't seen them in a long time."

"I can get you some if you want," Jimmy offered.

"Really?" Daniel asked.

"Yeah, it's easy. Plus, does your mom like them?"

"She does," Daniel said.

"Then I gotta, this lasagna is delicious," Jimmy said around a mouthful.

Daniel grinned, pleased on his mother's behalf. She'd be delighted.

Conversation bubbled up around the table, about their favorite sodas, talking about the weirdest ones they'd found in Jimmy's fridge. Apparently pickle was the winning odd one.

They were so close that Daniel found himself brushing against Johnny frequently, their arms kept touching, their thighs were pressed against each other and it was comforting. To know he was there without having to look at him.

They finished the entire lasagna and Daniel filed that away to tell his mother, not a scrap was left behind.

Bobby hopped up to set it in the sink to soak before returning with a plate of cookies. Just like every other sweet Bobby had handed to Daniel it was delightful.

The conversation was easy and friendly and full of laughter and Daniel felt a lot of the tension fade from his shoulders. He'd been so worried, about everything. That he'd just be tagging along and pitied, but they seemed to constantly pull him into the conversation, curious about what he had to say, teasing but not roughly. After awhile Daniel's hand fell to Johnny's knee again while they talked, reassuring himself that he was there even though he was quiet by his side, wanting to remind him that Daniel was there too, and it wasn't a dream that he could sit with the ex-cobras without teachers or parents around and for it to go okay, for them to just talk.

After a while when the cookies dwindled Jimmy hopped up and into the living room, opening a cabinet and pulling out a box, that he came back with.

He popped it open and set down a board. "We've got six pieces and six people, how about a game of Monopoly?"

"You always lose, you remember that right?" Johnny asked leaning forward.

Daniel looked at him, there was a competitive spark in his eyes and a smirk on his lips, it made his stomach do a flip flop, that look usually had meant danger, but this was monopoly, not a fight. It'd been a while since he'd seen that look.

"Every day is a new day, with new chances to win, and for one of us to take you down Johnny," Jimmy said with a grin, setting up the board.

"The usual?" Johnny asked.

"Always," Jimmy said.

Daniel looked between the two of them confused.

"Loser does the dishes," Tommy explained.

"Winner gets a free drink at the bar," Dutch added.

"Johnny always wins," Bobby said with a sigh, "every single time. We thought he cheated, but we've searched him multiple times and came up with nothing."

"Because I don't cheat," Johnny said stiffly.

"Yeah, yeah, we know," Jimmy said. "Just prepare to lose Lawrence."

It'd been a while since Daniel had played Monopoly. But there was something fun about the competitive nature in the air that wasn't venomous or directed at him. Everyone was so focused on Johnny that before Daniel knew it, half the table was bankrupt and out.

Dutch lost first, groaning and getting up to wash the dishes, complaining the whole time.

Then Bobby and Tommy shortly one after another.

"Yo, Daniel, got a number? I'm gonna call parents who want called to let them know we made it here okay before it gets too late," Bobby said grabbing the phone from the kitchen.

"Thank you," Daniel said, and scribbled his number on a scrap of paper that was offered to him. "Ma would like that."

"Awesome," Bobby said taking it and settling down at a seat next to the phone. "Hi, yeah, it's me. Yeah. Tell Mom and Dad we made it. Cookies were demolished already. So tell them the recipe is good. Uh huh, of course. Yup, you too. Night."

Jimmy went bankrupt on the next turn and put his head in his hands. Groaning and getting up to go to the phone.

"Give me that I'll call my own parents, thank you."

"Fine, fine," Bobby said backing off and returning to the table to watch as Johnny and Daniel played.

"Huh," he said.

"Huh, what huh?" Dutch called.

"Daniel's going to win," Bobby responded.

"What? No, Mom, not talking to you, yeah sorry, I didn't mean to yell. I know. I know. Yes, thank you. We made it. Yes, okay. Sorry again. Good night," Jimmy said hanging up and hurrying back over. "What do you mean?"

"Well look," Bobby said as Johnny rolled the dice and moved his piece onto one of Daniel's properties and forked over most of his cash. "Johnny's losing."

"Oh fuck yeah, finally," Jimmy said. "I'm tired of buying that bastard drinks."

It took four more rounds but Johnny was bankrupt. Johnny leaned back against his chair hard and it teetered but didn't fall and he hung his head over the back.

"I should've known," he muttered, "He was too quiet."

The sound of cheering was shocking to Daniel but he grinned. He didn't particularly care about the drink. But it was kind of fun how into it they got. And Johnny reached over and put his hand on his shoulder.

"You're alright LaRusso," he said with a smirk.

And Daniel felt his heart pound suddenly in his ears until he heard Tommy on the phone.

"Hi, yes Mrs. LaRusso. This is Tommy. Wanted to let you know we made it safely. The lasagna was great ma'am. Daniel just won a game of monopoly so that's the hubbub, one moment. Daniel, want to talk to your Mom?" Tommy called.

Daniel jumped up and hurried over, taking the phone from Tommy and curling away from the group as far as the cord could let him. He hadn't thought about it when Bobby asked, had been so engrossed by the game, but after hearing it, hearing Tommy talk to his mother made him panic. She'd think they'd killed him and stuffed his body somewhere to not be found until the summer.

"Hey Ma, sorry," Daniel said quickly. "There's one line so they started calling families to let them know we got here safely to get through it all before people went to bed."

He heard her let out a deep breath.

"Sorry Ma," he repeated. "I wasn't even thinking."

"So they liked the lasagna huh?" she asked.

"They did, plates all clean, not smidge left. Popped it in the oven as soon as we stepped foot in the lodge."

"You're safe right?" she asked. "Like they're being nice?"

"Yeah. And the snow is real pretty."

"Good. It sounded like Monopoly was a big deal."

"Uh yeah, apparently Johnny's never lost," Daniel said.

He heard his mother laughing. "I guess this time you didn't kick him in the face. I like this better. Are there competitive monopoly tournaments?"

Daniel laughed. "No, no I don't think so. Listen Ma, I think the other guys have to call home too. I think they only got through half, so I gotta go. I'm fine, really. Love you, good night."

"I love you too. Sleep well."

He listened for the click and then turned and hung the phone up. It was picked up by Tommy again who moved on to his own call.

"So, looks like we owe Daniel a drink tomorrow. What a relief," Dutch said stretching. "Y'all I'm beat, we played for like 4 hours and some bastard wants us out the door at 8, so I'm going to bed."

"Yeah, that's probably for the best," Jimmy said with a smug grin when Dutch punched him on the shoulder on his way out.

"Sleep well," Dutch said waving and dipping into his room.

The group dissipated and Daniel headed down the separate hall to their room, listening to Johnny walk behind him.

Johnny stopped and waited and Daniel wondered why and then Daniel put his hands on the doorknobs and pushed them open.

"Okay, yeah that is kind of fun." he said walking into the room. "uh, where can I find the lights?" Daniel asked, it was pitch dark.

He felt a hand reach out and find his shoulder.

"Don't move, I'll get it," Johnny said and Daniel heard him move past him and into the room.

It was so dark but his eyes adjusted and he watched the shadowy movement of Johnny as he moved towards the bed.

"Brace yourself," Johnny warned and Daniel closed his eyes.

The light turned on and he winced then slowly opened them.

"Are you a morning or night shower person?" Johnny asked.

"Morning," Daniel said.

"You can use the bathroom first then," Johnny said moving towards where his bag was and crouching next to it to go through his things, carefully picking out the cassette tapes and setting them out.

Daniel grabbed his bag and darted into the bathroom. Getting ready for bed felt strange in such a big bathroom. The house was so quiet, everything was too quiet. No sounds of the city, no neighbors. It felt like they were cut off from the world.

He shook his head to dislodge the thoughts. He wasn't by himself. Johnny was in the other room.

He brushed his teeth and washed his face, changing quickly into sleeping clothes, and pushed the door open to throw his bag back in the corner he'd claimed as his.

"All yours," Daniel said.

Johnny nodded strolling past him and into the bathroom and shutting the door.

Daniel looked around, took in the paintings on the wall, they were abstract and no matter how much he stared he couldn't make heads or tails of them. He looked out the window but he couldn't make out anything anymore, not with the light on.

He plopped down on the bed. The bedding beneath his fingers was incredibly soft. He liked his sheets at home, his own bed, but this was fancy, he pulled back the bedding and curled up on his side, feeling the weight of the day. They'd had school that day, a day full of classes. It felt like a different time. A time where Ali was avoiding him.

Even if he was still mad at her, it hurt. She'd been his only friend at school for his entire time there and the void she left was larger than he'd expected.

For some reason, Johnny had won over the entire female student body. He'd thought he was blacklisted or something weird like that. Something so totally bizarre but sad.

Yet all of sudden Johnny was swarmed every time Daniel saw him except at lunch. He couldn't remember ever seeing so many girls hang around Johnny. He'd never seen it before he realized and he wondered what had happened.

Was there only allowed to be one guy on the blacklist? Was it now Daniel?

Daniel stretched his hands behind his head and looked at the ceiling. It was fine if he was on the list he didn't care. But even before he was on the list the girls at school paid him no mind. Even before he and Ali were a sure thing. They ignored him. But he kind of got why they went after Johnny. Johnny was rich, or at least from a family in the hills. He drove a cool car, he was athletic, he was pretty. He was like a model for what people usually thought of as a Californian teenage boy. It was what he'd expected when they moved to California.

The karate had been a surprise though. He'd expected more surfers.

He could hear the water running and looked at the alarm clock. He needed fifteen minutes to shower and time to get dressed, if they were to be out the door by 8, he needed to be up at 7:30 at least. But he wanted to talk to Johnny before setting an alarm. Make sure he was okay with that, or who knows, maybe to keep all that muscle Johnny got up earlier and did sit-ups or push-ups or something.

Daniel remembered seeing a guy in a gym in Jersey through the window, flirting with girls. He did push-ups but would ask the women to sit on his back while he did them. The girls giggled but obliged and the guy made it look easy.

He'd gone home and tried to do push-ups and he did a few but didn't manage to put on much muscle. Not enough that he could let someone sit on his back while he did it.

Louie once found a cat and dropped it on his back and that collapsed Daniel and he'd gotten a bunch of scratches all over his back to boot. But Johnny might be able to manage it.

The door opened and Daniel startled, sitting up as if he'd been caught as if the thought was something he needed to hide. Johnny was drying his hair with a towel that he hung up on the door before he let it hang ajar and then his eyes met Daniels.

"You didn't have to stay up," Johnny said.

"I didn't know what was polite," Daniel said with a shrug. "I mean apparently you all share beds all the time."

Oh god, why'd he said that? He'd been trying not to think about that.

Johnny sunk into the other side of the bed but didn't say anything.

"I mean this room is big enough for everyone to fit in it."

Stop Daniel, just stop, don't suggest stupid things or you might just get them.

"They just show up," Johnny said, lifting the covers and slipping his feet under them. "Usually when they're drunk and don't want their parents to know, they stumble in and pass out. There's no politeness to it. And believe me, you don't want them all in here."

"I was thinking of setting an alarm," Daniel said. "7:30 okay?"

"Yeah, that works," Johnny said.

Daniel picked up the alarm and fiddled with it setting one for 7:30am. He set it on the nightstand and then Johnny leaned over to his side and flicked off the light. Daniel settled back down on his pillow.

"You okay?" Johnny asked.

"Yeah," Daniel said.

"You've been quiet."

Daniel frowned, had he? He hadn't felt like he was too quiet. Or quieter than normal. He heard Johnny shift, rolling onto his side facing him.

"Mrs. LaRusso okay?" he asked.

"Uh..yeah," Daniel said.

He sighed, Ali got upset because he held shit in until he just started snapping at her about stuff, for being half out and not facing things head-on.

"She's just concerned. I mean we both were worried. She's a Mom you know...and I should've been the one who called her, because I think someone calling her for me, scared her a little."

Johnny was quiet, listening.

"She uh...got worried, you know? 6 guys going out in the mountains, she only knows you, and last semester...I mean I couldn't hide all the bruises from her you know? And she was at the tournament. She heard everything, saw everything. She was worried about this going "lord of the flies" and I guess, I guess I got a little... a little....scared too. I don't know when that will stop, I mean I don't have nightmares anymore, and like when I see Bobby I don't immediately panic anymore and try to move so my knee is away from him. And I don't freeze up when Tommy comes near or Dutch starts laughing. There's progress but last semester wasn't easy. Ma probably won't really breathe easy until I'm home again. This was like a big deal, probably bigger than I thought, like much bigger. I mean Mr. Miyagi's not here if something happens you know, not like Halloween. So I guess I'm not talking because....part of me is still waiting for something bad to happen. For it to be a trick. To get hurt again."

Daniel held the comforter tightly between his hands, hugging it to his chest.

"What can I do to help?" Johnny asked.

He sounded so sincere. And 99% of Daniel believed him, but there was that 1% that had been burned so badly that it held out stubbornly. He liked Johnny. He liked Johnny a lot, probably more than anyone else, but that was when it was just him and Johnny, when the odds were more even. When they weren't stacked with Johnny and his friends. Because almost always it had been Johnny with his friends.

"I don't know," Daniel said softly shaking his head. "I wish I knew."

Johnny was quiet next to him and he wondered why he'd even admitted it. Admitted he was scared or worried. But Johnny wasn't making fun of him. He wondered for a moment if Johnny had fallen asleep but he looked over and could make out that his eyes were open.

"Hey, Johnny?"

"Yeah?"

"Where's the bonsai?" Daniel asked.

"Oh...Mr. Miyagi's babysitting it," Johnny said, his tone uneasy.

Daniel felt a familiar sting of jealousy. It'd been a constant companion lately. Jealous of seeing Johnny surrounded by girls and the confusion of whether it was jealousy over his popularity or a desire for the girls to go away, not wanting to share the attention. Jealous that Johnny had friends, that always had his back and that apparently just showed up whenever they wanted and he didn't push them out of his bed. It made this feel less special, or more one-sided in importance and he kept wrestling with that.

And now, much to his shame, he felt jealous over the bonsai that Johnny cared for so much, protected so much, because it was that same uneasy tone he recognized, the one that matched the look he'd given Daniel the first time he'd gone over, where Johnny had put himself between Daniel and the bonsai as if scared Daniel would try to take it back.

He had to say something, something to stop Johnny from going down that route again.

"That was smart, I don't know how bonsai do in the cold," Daniel said easily, smiling in the dark. "Hey, are you okay with me winning at monopoly? Everyone made it seem like it was a big deal."

Some of the tension left Johnny's shoulders. "Yeah I'd rather you win than Jimmy. Jimmy can be insufferable if he wins."

"Really?"

"Yeah, he always wins at battleship. But that's a two-person game so not something we'll end up playing during this trip," Johnny said.

"You play every night?"

"Yeah, probably Uno tomorrow."

There was so much Daniel wanted to say, he didn't want to stop talking, but he was tired. He yawned and Johnny shifted over onto his back.

"Sleep well Daniel, just think of all the snow you'll get to see tomorrow," Johnny said.

"Good night," Daniel said.

He wanted to hold off a little longer, wanted to take in the sound of Johnny's soft breathing next to him, the rise and fall of his chest, the smell of him freshly out of the shower, but his eyes grew heavy and before long he was asleep.

Fancy Snowmen? Sure I guess.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Johnny was in the dojo again, on his knees in front of the mirrors staring straight ahead without seeing.

Kreese was yelling at him.

He was being made an example of.

He knew something bad was coming but he dared not meet Kreese's eyes or move. If he did it'd be seen as a challenge and that would make things worse.

His friends weren't there.

He didn't recognize any of the students who were eating the lesson out of Kreese's hands. They wouldn't help him.

He could take the students, probably, if he wanted to make a run for it. But he couldn't take them and Kreese. Kreese would block the door while he fought the others. Until he was too tired and then it'd be over.

He heard something moving on the mats. It was coming towards him, shifting along the way.

Johnny glanced at it in the mirrors.

It was a snake, an anaconda. He was out of time.

It wrapped itself around him, the weight of it keeping him pinned to the mat as it curled around his torso, pinning his arms to his sides.

He looked up finally at Kreese who just looked smug. Challenge or no challenge, he couldn't fight or move. It didn't matter anymore.

"You see students, what happens when someone loses?" he asked. "You think you've choked before? Thought you were unable to breathe? That's nothing compared to having an anaconda crush your bones to dust. And a fallen star of a student, one who thought they were the best? One who is nothing but a disappointment? Who wasted my time? Really there is nothing else to do, so watch students, watch what happens when you fail."

The snake continued to wrap around his chest and neck until Johnny couldn't move, couldn't breathe.

The students were watching, they were bloodthirsty, they believed everything Kreese said, they believed themselves better than Johnny, that they wouldn't make the same mistakes.

"What's our creedo?" Kreese asked.

"Strike first! Strike hard! No Mercy!" the students shouted and it was like thunder.

The snake's head rose up and Johnny met its eyes. Its tongue flicked out and brushed against Johnny's nose and then it opened its mouth.

Right before it struck Johnny's eyes flicked open, his heart was pounding and he waited.

He was at Jimmy's lodge.

It was Saturday.

He wasn't at the dojo.

He hadn't seen Kreese in nearly a month. He hadn't been near the dojo in about the same amount of time.

It was dark but there was some light, it was probably just pre-dawn.

He glanced at the clock. It was five in the morning.

There were arms around him, thin arms that had a tight grip around his chest. There was a gentle breath on the back of his neck, a warm body pressed tight against his back, and a leg was thrown over his hip.

Daniel.

He tried to shift, to see if he could slip out of the grip. But Daniel just moved his head in his sleep, making a small noise of complaint, and pressed his nose against the back of his neck.

He had spooned occasionally with Ali, but he'd always been the big spoon. The thought of switching it up had never occurred to him. It wasn't bad. But he'd never admit that. Not even to the bonsai.

Maybe to the bonsai.

But Daniel, despite being asleep, despite being smaller than Johnny, was doing his absolute best to just completely cover him.

The leg not thrown over his hip was pressed up against Johnny's. He really couldn't go anywhere. Completely stuck.

He had no way of moving without jostling Daniel, without possibly waking him up.

He wondered if he should wake up Daniel, try to pry him off of him.

He didn't want to.

He wondered how Daniel had managed it without waking him up until they'd reached this point.

How bad had the nightmare been that this hadn't woken him up?

Johnny could feel Daniel's heartbeat, steady against his back.

It was fine. He wasn't alone. Not like at the mansion.

Johnny's eyes felt heavy.

It didn't have to be dealt with now.

His eyes slid shut, it was nice.

He was too tired to even think about what to do.

So why bother?

Before he knew it he was asleep again.

Johnny woke up to the alarm.

Daniel let out a groan when he heard it, which was against his ear. Johnny squeezed his eyes again and bit the inside of his cheek.

Daniel rolled off of him slowly, like it wasn't a big deal, like he didn't want to get up, or stop holding onto Johnny.

Was it an Italian thing?

Was it because it was cold?

It was probably just a Daniel thing.

But the warmth left. Daniel was turning off the alarm and getting up. He heard the click of the bathroom light, the door shut, and then the sound of the shower.

Johnny sat up slowly and rubbed at his face. Grateful Daniel had just gone straight to shower. He had time to collect himself.

He got dressed, picking something warm to wear, and wondered whether he should wait for Daniel or head out to the kitchen.

He remembered what Daniel had said the night before, how he was still nervous around Johnny's friends, around the ex-cobras.

He remade the bed then sunk down on his side and put his headphones over his ears, listening to music and waiting.

He wondered if Daniel had nightmares about him, the way he had them about Kreese, he shuddered.

He hoped Daniel didn't. He hoped Daniel still slept soundly and safely in his dreams, not haunted by Johnny.

But Johnny had tormented Daniel for a long time.

It made him feel sick thinking that Johnny might be tormenting Daniel still in his subconscious, that his friends were.

He closed his eyes and tried to focus on the music, trying to calm down again.

He could still feel Daniel's breath on his neck, the way his lips had grazed his skin.

He tried to focus on his breathing.

Mr. Miyagi was always telling him to breathe.

Paint like this Johnny-san, up, down, breathe in, breathe out, good Johny-san. Sand like this, circular motions, remember to breathe. Always must remember to breathe.

With how touchy Daniel was while he was conscious he shouldn't have been surprised that Daniel was touchy in his sleep.

It wasn't like he was special.

He should probably curb stomp the feelings that were rising up like weeds.

He was sure, if Daniel wasn't still scared of his friends it would've been the same with them.

He felt footsteps and looked up, steam poured out of the bathroom.

Daniel had found a hairdryer and had plugged it in their room. He was drying his hair.

Daniel motioned towards the bathroom with an "It's free," hand motion.

Johnny took off his headphones and headed into the bathroom to finish getting ready.

They walked together into the kitchen, coats under their arms and boots on their feet.

Dutch was grumbling to himself about vacations and sleeping in, Jimmy looked wide awake and Tommy had fallen asleep again on the couch.

"Bobby's on his way," Jimmy said. "He grabbed the wrong jacket."

Sure enough, the door at the other end of the hall opened and Bobby came running, shoving his arms into his puffy jacket.

Daniel was putting his on, slipping his arms through.

Now that Johnny knew he was nervous he noticed that Daniel stood a little behind him.

It was strange to realize Daniel was scared.

He'd never thought of Daniel as scared in all of their fights.

Daniel always popped right back up again, fists and feet flying.

He'd thought Daniel was a little bit annoying but brave. But he also knew you could be brave and only handle so much. That some things just chipped away at you.

"Sorry to make you wait," Bobby said.

Dutch slammed his hand down on Tommy's chest and he woke up with a yelp. Dutch grinned, looking a little more awake, pleased.

"Time to go buttercup. Breakfast and coffee await."

They piled into the van, Jimmy locking up after them. He always locked up the lodge. He didn't always do so with the mansion, but he said one time when he was little they left it unlocked and a bear roamed in. He refused to ever make that mistake again.

Johnny let Daniel go first into the van, hand going out to stop Bobby, giving him a pointed look. Bobby just waited with a frown shivering.

Johnny followed, then Bobby.

Daniel sat in the middle of the backseat again, despite there being no empty cooler taking up space.

Johnny took the seat he'd been in. With their puffy jackets, it felt a little claustrophobic.

Daniel was putting on gloves and working on a scarf. He kept pulling more things out of his pockets.

His jacket was bright orange, he'd be so easy to spot, so hard to lose track of.

He wondered if that was the point. Daniel liked weird clothing. He'd chalked it up to New Jersey fashion.

"If there wasn't food promised," Dutch was saying from the front. "I would not be up right now. So you better all be grateful."

The resort wasn't a long drive.

Dutch flashed a season pass at the gate and a smile that seemed predatorial rather than charming at the guard.

Dutch didn't do charming, he wasn't good at it. He always came off too wild. Got him into trouble in lots of places. But the guard was tired and didn't care and waved them through.

The resort was busy on the inside, mostly with elderly people out to enjoy the snow for the weekend. Only Jimmy and the elderly wanted to make sure they got an early start on the day and he knew Dutch was itching to complain, but they didn't have breakfast at the lodge. Just dinners.

It was this or breaking into the cupcakes Bobby brought.

They'd already done that once and ended up sick from eating nothing but sugar. The lesson was learned. No one wanted to repeat it.

They grabbed a table by the windows so they could see part of the slopes and took off their jackets to throw around the back of chairs. Claiming it as theirs, before some other group took it. Not that there was another group interested from the looks of it.

"Just grab a plate, fill it up and come back here. It's a buffet, so go up as much as you want," Jimmy said, mostly for Daniel.

They came here every year, usually several times a year.

Daniel nodded beside him and peeled off from Johnny's side.

Johnny watched him grab a plate. There was an elderly woman next to him and they started talking immediately.

He shook his head, but felt a bit of relief, Daniel was okay, he was still Daniel.

"So?" Bobby asked arms crossed beside him.

"So?" Johnny asked.

"Tommy said Daniel's conversation with his mom last night was a little weird. Like he kept apologizing and telling her he was okay? And then you had him go in the van first? What's the deal?"

Johnny ran a hand through his hair and sighed. "His mom's a little on edge okay? I mean yours would be too right?"

Bobby stared at him blankly. His brain usually required a little coffee to get going these days.

"Last semester," Johnny said softly.

Something clicked and Bobby's frown deepened. "She thinks we're going to hurt him? Like what this is an elaborate trap? Johnny we're not, like collectively, smart enough to pull something like that off."

Johnny didn't know whether to laugh or be offended. "We were assholes."

"So he's not sticking to your side like glue because-"

"No."

"Damnit. I thought things were going so well, but we keep forgetting. I keep forgetting. How could I forget about his knee man? What the hell is wrong with me? I did it. I-"

"Bobby," Johnny said. "Drink some coffee. You all go skiing or something today and I'll see what Daniel wants to do. Don't make it a big deal, okay?"

Bobby sighed and nodded wandering over to the coffee machine grabbing a mug.

Daniel and the lady were still talking. Daniel had a big smile on his face, more alive than he'd seen their entire trip so far, except when he was telling his practical joke.

Johnny sighed and grabbed a tray.

Maybe Daniel would just want to hang out with old people. It seemed his M.O. People over 50 seemed to really like him. He wondered if it was because they lived longer and just had more patience. Liked his boundless energy.

He grabbed eggs and bacon, some crepe a guy made for him with fruit and cream in it, and made himself a coffee.

Their table was filling up and Daniel was still hanging around with the grandma, holding his tray and chatting excitedly. He wondered if Daniel was waiting for Johnny, intimidated to return to the table alone.

Or maybe he'd ditch Johnny and go sit with the old folks.

"Morning ma'am," Johnny said plastering a charming smile on his face and nodding to her.

"Johnny!" Daniel said looking back at him, that smile, utterly too bright for so early in the morning directed to him like someone with their brights on the road at 1am. "Muriel was telling me about this spot by a lake."

"Absolutely lovely dear," Muriel said. "They do snow sculptures."

Snow sculptures? Did she mean snowmen? What was so exciting about snowmen? They could make one themselves.

"Oh cool!" Johnny said, hoping it didn't come off sarcastically.

"Muriel used to make some when she was younger, made this gigantic recreation of the Taj Mahal and it took what?"

"Three days, can't anymore with my arthritis," Muriel said. "Not anything that big anymore anyway."

"Wow," Johnny said because three days to make a snow version of the Taj Mahal seemed like such a waste of time but Daniel was clearly into it and this woman clearly worked hard. It'd be rude to say it. "We'll have to check it out, thank you."

She smiled. "Have a great day dears. Enjoy your breakfast and welcome to Mountain High Daniel."

As she walked off Johnny turned to Daniel.

"Do you want to check out the sculptures today?"

It sounded boring, but it'd give them something to do other than sit by the fire drinking hot chocolate all day while the guys were out on the slopes.

"Seriously?" Daniel asked, his eyes were practically sparkling.

Johnny felt his heart try to rise up to his throat to escape.

"Sure, why not?" Johnny said with a shrug heading towards the table. "I'll check out some fancy snowmen with you."

Daniel looked delighted by this and was still practically beaming when they got to their table, though he noticed it went down several notches the closer they got.

The guys were talking about the slopes, which ones they were taking, arguing about which ones were better. Their goals and plans.

Johnny had been looking forward to it, the adrenaline, the rush of boarding down the mountain, how he always managed to beat Bobby even though Bobby set off earlier, the joy of at least once coming to a stop sending a wave of powdery snow on his friends and their cries of complaint. They'd get him back eventually. Being alone in the cold, rushing past trees, and the feeling of almost flying during jumps.

But Daniel wanted to see snowmen and Daniel couldn't enjoy the slopes and he wouldn't dare leave Daniel by himself.

One he didn't want to.

Two Daniel was likely to get in trouble.

Three the guys would have his head, his mother would be furious, and he'd disappoint Mrs. LaRusso.

So snowmen it was.

He listened to the guys chat while he ate. Daniel was quiet at his side. Johnny had to keep checking to make sure he was there. He was. But he wasn't as touchy and Johnny realized that that made him worried. A combination of silence and not touching was so utterly uncharacteristic from the Daniel he'd gotten to know. There was no hand on his knee, no arm brushing his, no thigh pressed into his, no shoulder bumping against him.

He looked tired, which didn't make any sense.

Daniel had slept. Johnny knew Daniel had been asleep. But it was like he was curling in on himself, which Daniel hadn't even done when they were fighting him and tormenting him. He always snapped back.

Johnny wondered if he should reach out, but he worried Daniel would push him off and how much that would sting.

Daniel had cleared his plate.

He was fiddling with the hem of his sweater and Johnny picked up his coffee to drink, puzzling over everything, trying to figure out what was wrong.

Daniel didn't hold things in, he always said what he was feeling, he was always talking, always saying how he was feeling.

His eyes met Tommy's across the table and Tommy had a look of amusement on his face and Johnny wanted to demand what was so damn entertaining.

With breakfast finished he downed the rest of the coffee in one go and grabbed his jacket.

Jimmy was leading them to the reception desk and Tommy grabbed his elbow, pulling him from the group as Jimmy and the receptionist got wristbands sorted so they could come back for lunch despite not being together, and explaining everything to Daniel.

"What?" Johnny hissed.

"Why are you so uptight right now?" Tommy asked, there was a demand in there, like Johnny was making a scene. He wasn't.

"Daniel's never this quiet, and he's acting weird okay. Why do you look so delighted huh?"

"Johnny, you're an idiot," Tommy said.

"You wanna go?" Johnny asked, bristling.

Tommy stepped aside and motioned to Daniel. "What do you see? Like actually look man."

Daniel was standing next to the reception desk with his orange jacket stuffed under one arm pushing his sleeve up so the receptionist could stick a colorful band around his wrist. The receptionist was explaining that he just had to show it when he came back for lunch and the hours for lunch.

He frowned looking at Tommy.

He didn't get it.

Tommy hit him.

Slapped the back of his head and then realizing his mistake quickly darted away, back into the crowd of their friends by the receptionist knowing Johnny wouldn't make a scene to get them kicked out.

But his days were numbered.

He was fucking lucky he was going on the slopes and he and Daniel were visiting snowman village or whatever.

Call Johnny an idiot to his face and then slap him upside the head was a punch at least.

Tommy was whispering something to Bobby and Bobby turned slightly to Johnny and gave him a look.

A don't murder our friend look.

You look like you're going to go berserk, calm the fuck down look.

"Johnny, get your wrist band," Jimmy called oblivious to the tension that was quickly filling the air.

Johnny walked over and thrust his hand out in front of the receptionist, not taking his eyes off of Tommy who was hiding behind Bobby.

"So," Jimmy said to the receptionist. "Put a drink credit on Daniel's wristband. You've got my card on file right?"

"We can do that of course, sir," the receptionist said putting the little brightly colored banded on Johnny's wrist and Johnny pulled his hand back.

"Daniel, since you won the game. You get whatever you want from the bar, any time okay? One freebie."

"Thank you," Daniel said.

Johnny's eyes flicked from Tommy to Daniel. Daniel was studying the wrist band, he had a brochure in his hand and a thoughtful look on his face.

When Johnny looked up to meet Tommy's eyes he saw the boy running. He was out the door and bolting towards the lifts, throwing his jacket on.

Johnny could see the brightly colored wrist band on the wrist of the arm he had in his jacket.

Everything in Johnny screamed to chase him down. He could overtake Tommy. Tommy wouldn't make it to the ski lift, he'd find himself in the snow on the receiving end of a knuckle sandwich.

Suddenly there was movement, suspicious movement closer, and he saw Dutch lean over to cover his mouth and whisper something in Daniel's ear. Daniel's eyes widened and Dutch grinned in response, giving him a little salute before sauntering off, opening the door, and calling out.

"Tommy, what the hell man? Thought we were all going together, you scared of something?"

Daniel walked up to Johnny, putting his jacket on, and held up the brochure.

"Ready for the snow sculptures?"

Johnny glanced down at Daniel. "Yeah, of course," he said.

They'd live for now. But their days were numbered. He'd get Dutch to tell him what he whispered in Daniel's ear and he'd demand Tommy tell him why exactly he thought he was an idiot this morning and then he'd pummel them both into the dirt, so deep he wouldn't have to bother digging a grave.

That was what Kreese would've told him to do. And it was tempting. Really really tempting.

Daniel was flicking the brochure open and walking.

With more effort than he expected, Johnny pulled himself away and followed Daniel out a different set of doors.

The cold hit him like a slap to the face and he hurried to put his jacket on.

Daniel beelined straight to a little white shuttle bus and then turned to wait for Johnny.

Johnny picked up his pace, jogging the rest of the way over and Daniel ducked onto the bus.

He plopped into a seat near the front and Johnny felt the dilemma of where to sit. What if Daniel didn't want him to sit next to him? Would it be better to sit across the aisle, in front or behind him?

Daniel reached out, took Johnny's hand, and pulled him down into the seat next to him.

He didn't take his hand back.

Johnny could feel his ears burning.

He didn't know what to say or do.

Should he ask Daniel what was wrong? Say nothing? Take his hand back? What did Dutch say? What stupid thing did Johnny not notice? Why did Tommy call him an idiot?

After awhile a few other people got on the bus and the driver set off.

Daniel still didn't take his hand back. He was holding onto Johnny's like he was worried Johnny would wander off, like a child or something. Johnny felt like if he tried to take his hand back now Daniel wouldn't let him. That his gentle grip would tighten.

Daniel was looking out the window at the trees and snow as they passed, making their way down the road. Between the trees, Johnny could make out a big frozen lake and people milling around in the distance. Daniel gave his hand a squeeze.

He wasn't curling in on himself anymore and seemed excited again, like seeing the lake brought up a wealth of energy that breakfast had scared off.

Had it been breakfast? Had the food been bad?

Johnny thought it'd been decent. He liked the resort's food and their drinks.

The bus parked and Daniel let go of his hand.

Everyone piled off of the bus and Johnny got off, hopping into the snow with a satisfying crunch.

Daniel was going to like this.

There was a lot more snow than almost anywhere else.

He turned back as Daniel made his way off the bus, hat on his head, scarf bundled around his neck, gloves on his hands.

He was prepared. Ready for the cold.

Johnny wanted to push him into a snowdrift but instead shoved his hands in his pockets.

He thought Daniel would turtle if he did that, sink and be unable to get up.

Daniel would probably get pissed, angry that Johnny had pushed him and wouldn't talk to him anymore, but then would need Johnny's help getting out. He'd probably be bitter and slap away Johnny's hand.

Daniel stepped into the snow and his face lit up. He hooked his arm in Johnny's and pulled, towards the path towards the lake.

"You okay now?" Johnny asked.

Daniel glanced up at him, confusion on his face. "What do you mean?"

"At breakfast..." Johnny said. "You were quieter than normal, withdrawn...I thought..."

Daniel looked away from him, the cold was turning his nose pink and he quickly brought up his scarf to cover his face with his free hand. "I'm was fine. Just...thinking."

Johnny frowned, Daniel's body language hadn't seemed okay. But maybe that was what Tommy had called him an idiot about.

He'd overreacted.

Maybe he just didn't see Daniel lost in thought enough to be able to tell it apart from everything else. Saying that aloud would for sure piss Daniel off.

When they reached the grounds of the snow sculptures Johnny froze.

"Holy shit," Johnny said.

Daniel laughed beside him.

The sculptures were massive.

He'd been expecting some creative snowmen, but these were actual sculptures made out of snow, towering above them.

He'd seen sand sculptures on the beach before, there were festivals and contests a couple of times a year but he just hadn't thought this was what Muriel had meant.

Daniel tugged at him towards the first one which was a vast castle. Inside the castle was a woman, a princess, Johnny guessed and below was a knight holding a sword, his horse standing nearby, but the part that Johnny couldn't take his eyes off of was the gigantic menacing dragon, curling around the castle tower.

He couldn't believe it was made out of snow.

They moved along the path looking from sculpture to sculpture, of lions with their mouths open mid roar, of penguins playing hockey, fantasy creatures like mermaids singing on rocks, a Pegasus that looked about to fly off, a medusa with her hair full of snakes that were hissing, and then a pirate ship.

Each statue was massive and detailed and they moved slowly from one to the other.

Daniel spoke softly from his side, reading to him from the brochure about the art, the artists, how long each piece took, how much snow it took.

Johnny could only stare with amazement as they walked their way around the lake, taking each of them in, surprised by each new one.

Johnny spotted a small wooden shack with staff milling about.

He looked at Daniel, who was staring up at a snow sculpture of a couple dancing, and carefully unhooked his arm from Daniel's.

Daniel turned to him, the scarf made his expression difficult to read.

Johnny pointed with his thumb to the building.

"I'll be right back, okay? Don't move...please?" Johnny asked.

Daniel's eyes widened slightly but he nodded.

Johnny hurried over. He'd been to the resort multiple times over the years, before he was friends with Jimmy, Sid took them out, so he knew that throughout the resort there were little places like this that offered a variety of things. Always run by staff in neon excited to help and let guests borrow things.

He bought some postcards, pictures of the year's snow sculptures, borrowed a polaroid, and promised when he returned it to take them up on their offer of free hot chocolate.

He jogged back to Daniel, putting the postcards in his pocket.

Daniel had let the scarf fall from his face and was looking up at the sculpture of the couple dancing.

Johnny looked through the viewfinder and snapped the shot.

The sound drew Daniel's attention and he turned startled as Johnny caught the picture as the camera spit it out.

He smiled and Daniel looked at him then turned abruptly to walk towards a woman heading towards them down the path.

They talked and Johnny frowned.

She was pretty he guessed and if he wanted a picture with a pretty lady to make Ali jealous or something he could oblige, even if he didn't like it.

But Daniel came back and took off his gloves and his hand wrapped around Johnny's wrist and pulled him over in front of the statue.

Brown eyes studied Johnny's face closely, then Daniel reached up and smoothed some of Johnny's hair.

Satisfied after another look over, Daniel pried the camera from Johnny's fingers and handed it over to the woman. Daniel stood by his side, seemed unsure for a moment, and then Johnny felt Daniel's arm wrap around him, reaching for his hip.

Johnny glanced at him. Daniel was looking ahead, smiling at the woman and the camera.

Johnny turned back to her as she started counting down.

He tried to smile but it felt weird, he could fall on the charming smile he wore so easily but it felt wrong. He had a different option if he hurried and he put his hand gently on Daniel's shoulder, thinking once again that the snowdrifts were perfect for just throwing Daniel in and he smirked at the thought of the indignation Daniel would have, but that he wouldn't lose track of Daniel with his bright orange jacket.

Maybe one day they could come back, and he could do it when Daniel's knee was feeling better.

Her finger pressed the button and the machine whirred. She rushed forward.

Johnny took his hand from Daniel's shoulder and held his hands out to receive both the machine and the polaroid's while Daniel thanked her. Johnny waited for Daniel to let go of his hip, to pull away, but he didn't. He stayed glued to Johnny's side long after the woman walked away, and while they waited for the photo to develop. The only difference was that Daniel's hand had moved, that his fingers had slid under his jacket and found a bit of bare skin. He was pressing his cold fingers firmly into Johnny's hip.

Johnny swallowed.

He was probably just cold.

Daniel was touchy, he reminded himself. It was who he was.

Conscious or unconscious, it just happened automatically without any thought to it.

The picture developed.

Daniel took it gently in his fingers and studied it closely before smiling. He slipping it into his pocket and zipped it before slipping his gloves back on.

"Do you want some hot chocolate?" Johnny asked.

Chapter End Notes

> Mountain High is an actual resort in California nearish Reseda/ the Enchino Hills in LA. But everything about it and the area is fiction because I haven't been.
> Though I have gone to look at snow sculptures before but not there, and am always amazed.

Rivals, past tense

The hot chocolate was wonderfully warm in Daniel's gloved hands.

He held it carefully, thanking the staff again for the use of their camera and the hot chocolate. They laughed and told him it was all complimentary because of the band on his wrist.

He was pleased. It felt like a date, four more.

He pulled his scarf up closer around his face again, chastising himself.

He was supposed to be building a solid foundation before thinking of what Johnny told him, what he'd said at the party. But it kept coming back, surfacing like a whispered promise. That Johnny hadn't explicitly told him no, that there wasn't a chance.

He kept taking things off the table and then changing his mind and putting them back. He thought he had to clear the table to make everything organized and focus on things one at a time, to tell himself he'd get to everything eventually.

But then he'd do something like wake up all over Johnny to the sound of the alarm clock and curse the alarm with every fiber of his being because Johnny felt nice and was warm and solid in his arms and he didn't want to let go.

Or at breakfast he struck up a conversation with Muriel and she complimented his sweater and he said it was his friends and he was borrowing it and the fact he'd called Johnny his friend out loud had shocked him. The fact he'd said it so easily.

Tommy on the other side of the buffet had smiled at him when Daniel had panicked because he'd been caught.

He was borrowing Johnny's soft sweater and someone else knew.

The worse part was that they were alone now and Daniel kept wanting to touch Johnny.

He wanted to take his gloves off, let his hands get cold, and slip them under Johnny's shirt. He wanted to reach up and touch the back of his neck with cold fingers. He hadn't wanted to let go of him but they couldn't just stand around forever and Daniel didn't know what he would've said when Johnny's patience ran out.

They stopped to look at another statue, this one of a whale. Daniel took it in, then, like every other one let his eyes fall on Johnny.

He knew Johnny hadn't wanted to come. He was keeping his promise to his mother, to keep him safe and to look out for him. And even though Daniel didn't like it, hadn't liked the look on Johnny's face during breakfast while the ex-cobras talked about skiing and snowboarding. This was their thing and Daniel couldn't go, he was holding Johnny back, keeping him from hanging out, from doing all the things he'd had planned, but he didn't complain.

But the sound Johnny had made when they'd arrived, the awe in his voice when he cursed, the ways his eyes widened as he took everything in drew Daniel in like a moth to a flame.

He was suddenly so relieved they were alone, that he didn't have to share Johnny with anyone else.

He was so relieved that it was as cool as Muriel had explained, and a little smug about the fact he'd been right to pick it.

He was surprised at how long Johnny wanted to stay at each one, like he was at an art museum studying the brush strokes of a masterpiece.

Daniel got bored quickly, he liked them, each new one was amazing but he'd be ready to move on earlier than Johnny was.

So he figured out a system.

He'd realized elbows and below didn't make Johnny flinch, so hooking his arm through Johnny's or holding his hand was fine.

He stayed with his arm hooked through Johnny's and he'd look at the sculpture, would read from the brochure, and then would study Johnny. He would wait for the shift, for Johnny to change his stance, it was subtle but he took it as time to move on to the next one.

He had plenty to think about while they walked.

While he studied the sunlight that made Johnny's blonde hair looking brighter, made it look like gold, the way his blue eyes roamed the sculptures, the pink of his nose and cheeks.

Johnny was wearing a warmly lined dark brown leather jacket and jeans and boots but he didn't have a scarf, or a hat, or gloves. His hands were shoved into his pockets.

Daniel thought he must be freezing, but like always he didn't complain.

Daniel took a sip of his hot chocolate, he wanted it to last, the warmth and sweetness.

They were almost to the end, having walked the entire lake and Daniel could see the shuttle waiting to take them back to the lodge.

His knee didn't hurt, they were moving too slowly, so carefully from one to the other that it barely felt like he was moving and when they stopped Daniel put his weight on his other leg and leaned into Johnny.

He wondered what they'd do the rest of the day.

He knew they could eat lunch at the lodge, that he could drink at the bar, but he doubted the ex-cobras would get back until the evening.

He didn't want them to get back until the evening.

He didn't want to have to share Johnny again yet. But the thought of going back early, of figuring out how to get back to Jimmy's and having the whole place to themselves seemed too tempting for Daniel to misbehave.

He had a hard enough time keeping his hands to himself in public.

He finished off his hot chocolate and threw the cup out in the nearby trash can before they made their way back up to the bus.

Daniel let Johnny go in first, letting go of his arm.

He liked sitting near the front, but Johnny headed further back, paused halfway, and turned back to Daniel, a question on his lips like suddenly he wasn't sure if sitting in the back was a good idea.

"Sit where you want," Daniel said.

He didn't mind sitting in the back. But he liked being near the front. In case the driver was willing to talk.

Johnny grabbed a seat, sitting by the window and Daniel sat down next to him. No one else was sitting in the back, so Daniel put his hand on Johnny's leg, a little higher up his thigh than he usually put it.

He'd try to behave, but Johnny didn't seem to mind this so he'd push it, just a little bit.

If this was fine, then he'd try it again when they were off the mountain, when Johnny was back in shorts so he could touch his skin.

As expected Johnny didn't say anything and Daniel frowned into his scarf.

He wondered if it was because of the ex-cobras, to have a group of friends so close that they shared a bed with Johnny, maybe they touched him like this sometimes. Jealousy pricked at his skin. He took a breath.

"What do you want to do now?" Daniel asked.

Johnny lifted his arm and looked at his watch. "It's afternoon, are you hungry?" he asked.

"A little," Daniel said. "Is there a grocery store or something nearby?"

"We get a free lunch...did you not like breakfast?"

"No, breakfast was good but dinner is just marinated meat, right? That's not going to be enough. We could buy sides, vegetables, or something."

Johnny's laugh was practically a snort of amusement.

"Vegetables aren't that bad. There's a lot of options," he said. "mushrooms, asparagus, carrots, potatoes, brussels sprouts, broccoli."

"You definitely are hungry," Johnny said. "Hang in there LaRusso, almost back at the lodge, you're talking like a teen who likes vegetables."

Daniel frowned and gave Johnny's thigh a gentle but firm squeeze.

"Daniel," he said trying for the same tone Mr. Miyagi had used to correct Johnny from calling him sir.

They were not going to backslide. Daniel liked hearing Johnny say his name. He was not going to let that change without a fight. He was looking at Johnny sternly and Johnny looked surprised but nodded.

"Sorry," Johnny said softly.

Daniel waited. There were some things he really liked hearing Johnny say. That he was sorry, that he'd do whatever Daniel wanted, please, and Daniel's name.

He knew Johnny had been teasing, but it felt like a slippery slope. Too easy for Johnny to fall back into his old ways, not that Daniel had seen him slip up yet. But they were spending time alone with the ex-cobras and Daniel was worried things would fall apart.

Johnny hadn't looked away yet, trying to figure out what Daniel wanted. Daniel could wait, he would wait.

Pink suddenly spread across his cheeks to his ears and Johnny looked away.

Daniel nearly reached out to grab his chin. This wasn't over, but then Johnny said his name so softly that Daniel barely heard it, but it sent a thrill down his spine.

Daniel grinned, pleased, and turned back in his seat.

He slid his hand up Johnny's leg to his knee and felt the boy next to him shiver.

Daniel paused and turned back to look at Johnny who was looking out the window. His hands were pink from the cold.

Daniel took both of Johnny's hands in his own. Sure enough, they were freezing. He lifted them up to his face and he breathed on them, rubbing his fingers over them, trying to get some warmth back into them.

"You really should be wearing gloves," Daniel said.

He sounded like his mother, no wonder Johnny had made fun of him over vegetables.

He pushed through. "And a hat. All your heat is going to escape. So what if you look cool? You won't look cool anymore if you get frostbite, or get sick."

It was the same tone his mother used when he refused to use his crutches. He was only 18 and he was already becoming his mother. He was doomed.

He focused on Johnny's hands, the calluses and scars. A long time of hard work at karate.

There were a couple of new ones though, parts of his skin that were an angry red, scabbed.

Daniel furrowed his brows. "When did you get hurt? I thought you stopped karate. You stopped fighting."

"I.." Johnny always seemed to struggle to share things, like he had to climb a mountain to do so and most of the time just decided it wasn't worth the attempt.

Daniel didn't know how to make it easier, how to coax it out of him. Was it because it was Daniel? If he was one of the ex-cobras would it have been easier?

Daniel frowned and breathed on Johnny's fingertips again, they were starting to warm up. He glanced up at Johnny who was looking at him oddly. It was clearly Daniel then he thought with a frown.

The foundation Daniel was building wasn't as sturdy as he'd thought.

He had to work harder.

Maybe it was because he'd insinuated Johnny was being like a naughty kid, out fighting and doing karate despite telling Daniel he wasn't, even though Daniel knew Mr. Miyagi was planning to train him. He knew karate was in Johnny's future again and Daniel wasn't against it anymore.

He was learning to share Mr. Miyagi, he could do it.

"I didn't mean to seem accusatory," Daniel said. "Just curious."

Johnny took in a deep shaky breath and Daniel wondered if he'd hurt his feelings. He still couldn't tell. He ran his thumb over Johnny's knuckles.

"I.." Johnny was trying again. His voice was low, deeper.

He shifted in his seat, turning towards Daniel, and he pulled his hands out of Daniel's grip.

Daniel started to reach for him again but Johnny was looking down at his hands.

He pointed to a scratch along the side of his hand. He took a deep breath, cleared his throat, and said, "Fixing a screen at South Seas apartment complex."

He turned his hand over, there was a thin cut between the webbing of his fingers between the index and middle finger.

"Girl at school pulled a paper out of my hand too quickly, it's a paper cut."

He pointed to one on the back of his thumb.

"Cut myself on the ladder, there was a nail loose, I fixed it."

He moved on to his other hand. There were aset of scratches. "One of your neighbor's cats got out when we went in to fix something. I caught it but it wasn't happy."

He continued moving his hands and pointing out new scratches.

"Dutch was screwing around when we were trying to help put a poster up. One of the beakers in science class broke and I tried to help clean up with my bare hands. Got chewed out for that one. Fucked up and sanded my hand rather than Mr. Miyagi's deck. One of the lights bulbs in the box of replacements was broken and I didn't realize until I shoved my hand in. Was biking with the guys and had to turn suddenly and landed in a bush. It had some thorns. Didn't realize we had thorny bushes around here. Tommy pulled them all out. But that's what those are."

Johnny had the worse luck. He didn't seem to be upset about any of it, just as if it was his lot in life.

The bus pulled to a stop in front of the resort and Johnny was looking at him, waiting.

He realized he had to get up and move. He hurried, grabbing onto the back of the seat in front of him and heading towards the door.

Every time Daniel got hurt Mr. Miyagi or his mother patched him up. He healed quickly under Mr. Miyagi's watchful eye and help. The worst damage Johnny and his friends caused dulled to mere aches once Mr. Miyagi went to work.

But Daniel couldn't get the image of Johnny not telling anyone, just patching himself up with a first aid kit in his bedroom.

Except, Johnny said Tommy pulled out the thorns.

Maybe he did get help. He stopped and turned.

Johnny was right on his heels and quickly jumping back and to the side, moving on the balls of his feet with grace so he didn't crash into Daniel. He caught a look of frustration, a spark of annoyance on Johnny's face. Daniel knew that face and he grinned.

"Why didn't you tell Mr. Miyagi when you got hurt?"

"It was never a big deal," Johnny said walking on, around Daniel and past him, hands shoved back into his pockets.

Daniel followed him into the resort. The rush of warm air as they walked through the doors was shocking. They found a small table in the dining room and Daniel carefully took off his hat, gloves, and scarf and put them in his pockets and put the jacket on the back of one of the chairs. Johnny just took his hands out of his pockets.

"Did you make it to the lake?"

Daniel turned, Muriel was standing with her jacket in her arms and a warm smile on her face. Daniel was delighted to see her again.

"We did, just got back," he said smiling.

Muriel's eyes went to Johnny.

"We're about to order lunch," Johnny said.

All fake charm in his smile.

Daniel wanted to roll his eyes.

"Have you eaten? Want to join us?" Daniel asked.

"Oh, that'd be lovely! I'd like to hear what you thought," Muriel said setting her jacket down on the back of a chair. "If it's not too much trouble, it looked like you were a part of a big group this morning."

"They're out on the slopes, so they probably won't be joining us," Daniel said pulling his chair out. He glanced around.

"We order for lunch," Johnny said tapping a menu in front of him.

"Oh," Daniel said and sat down picking up the menu.

"So, how do you all know each other?" Muriel asked flicking her menu open.

Johnny took the pitcher of water from the center of the table and poured her and Daniel a glass of water.

"Karate rivals," Daniel said. "or used to be. We go to school together in the Valley."

Muriel laughed and Daniel looked up at her.

"Sorry," she said. "That's just how my husband answers that question too. But he says archery rivals."

"Archery?" Johnny asked, interest finally piqued, leaning forward.

He wasn't touching his menu. Probably already knew what he wanted.

Daniel quickly glanced at his menu.

The waiter was walking over.

He flipped the page.

The waiter stopped at their table and he caught Johnny motioning to Muriel first. Muriel ordered and Daniel scrambled waving for Johnny to order before him.

"And you sir?"

"Fish and chips," Daniel said.

"To drink?"

"Iced tea."

The man nodded, collected their menus, and left.

Daniel sighed and turned his attention back to Muriel.

"So archery?"

"When I was younger I practiced archery, competed in it actually. And this guy was being annoying all the time, and it really got under my skin. Before the end of the day of the competition, I accidentally shot him in the shoulder. In the moment it was horrifying. There was all this blood and we had to snap off the end before he was put in an ambulance. I thought I killed him. I panicked. I stole my Dad's truck and drove to the hospital to see him. He was fine.

"They patched him up, but he milked it. Complained like I really messed up his shoulder. Every day after school I was there helping him with homework, helping him eat. I felt so bad. When he was released I went to his house. His sister told me he was fine, that he was pretending it was worse than it was. I chewed him out. Stopped talking to him. But he found me again, like ten years later, and apologized and asked me out dancing. I was so mad at him, but I agreed. We ended up having a great time.

"But every time we met anyone and they asked how we met he'd say "Archery rivals" and then he'd have a long pause and say "or used to be. She shot me in the shoulder." Now, after 40 years he's finally learned to tack on "And now we're married." So tell me about your karate rivalry."

"I nearly broke his knee," Johnny said quietly. "Which is why we're not on the slopes with the others."

"I kicked him in the face," Daniel said with a grin. "I won."

"How does a kick to the face not beat out a kick to the knee?" Muriel asked with a frown. "Couldn't you have damaged something worse?"

Daniel frowned, he hadn't really thought of that.

"You can kill someone," Johnny said softly fingers trailing through the condensation on his glass. "But it wasn't like that. I'm fine."

"Sounds like karate is pretty dangerous," Muriel said.

"Can be," Johnny agreed. "But it's also where I made friends for the first time. So I...even though I don't do it anymore, it still means a lot to me."

Daniel blinked, Johnny was popular. He always had people around him. The thought that before Cobra Kai Johnny hadn't any friends sounded unbelievable.

"You quit?" Muriel asked gently.

"Kind of had to," Johnny said. "My dojo...sensei...wouldn't have let me come back after I lost. And I didn't want to, I realized they hadn't different values than I did."

"That's ridiculous," Muriel said turning to Daniel. "And you? Still doing karate?"

"Uh yeah," Daniel said. It looked bad from the outside, without the context. He looked bad. He swallowed. He wasn't going to explain that Johnny had tormented him all through the year. "It's all complex. But I'm being taught a different style than Johnny was being taught. Our sensei's have different approaches. Mine...he...doesn't believe in fighting. It's for defense only. So it's more for meditation and defense. Balance," Daniel said.

He worried his lip with his teeth looking at Johnny. Johnny hadn't had friends. He thought those four were it.

Daniel had had tons of friends he left behind in Newark. People he could hang out with after school, this year had been his first time without friends and he'd still had had Ali.

Johnny seemed uneasy like he'd said too much, and regretted it.

The waiter came back with their drinks and food and Daniel was so relieved to see him.

Mentally thanked him for saving him as his food was set in front of him.

"Which were your favorite sculptures?" Muriel asked.

Daniel thought about it while he ate. He'd liked a lot of them.

"The dancing couple," he said.

"That's a good one," Muriel said.

Daniel looked at Johnny. Johnny had turned in his seat and was fiddling with his jacket. He pulled out a packet and Muriel leaned forward a smile dawning on her face.

"You bought them!" she said.

"Uh, yeah," Johnny said awkwardly opening a packet and flipping through it. He pulled out a postcard. "This one."

Daniel looked at the postcard. It was a glossy photo of the first one. The fairytale piece. That was the one that clued Daniel in that Johnny was stunned by the sculptures. He'd gone to move on and Johnny hadn't budged. His lips were parted with his breath visible in the cold.

Looking up at it in awe like a child. It'd made Daniel's heart flutter and he remembered smiling.

He carefully passed the packet of postcards over to Muriel.

"Which one was your favorite?" he asked.

She flicked through them and pulled out the lion with its mouth open mid roar.

"I know the artist who did this one, so I gotta say this one," she said with a smile before passing them back to Johnny.

"I thought we could show the guys when they get back, and there's a special post office with fancy stamps. I thought you might want to send one to your Mom and Mr. Miyagi," Johnny said, putting them away and back into his jacket pocket.

"Well if you're not hitting the slopes what are you planning to do with the rest of your day?" Muriel asked.

"Johnny said we could grab a taxi to the store. One of the guys brought marinated steak for dinner, but I want to get stuff for the sides," Daniel said.

"I could take you," Muriel said. "My husband doesn't get here until tonight, so I'm just hanging around. I should buy stuff before he gets here anyway."

"Really?" Daniel asked.

"Sure, not a problem. Do you have any ideas on what you want to make?"

"It depends on what they've got available, but some potatoes and vegetables."

Muriel smiled. "We can go after lunch if that works with both of you."

Daniel turned to meet Johnny's gaze and he looked up from his sandwich and nodded.

"Perfect," Muriel said.

Daniel felt more at ease again.

He talked to Muriel about where she'd been and the things she liked in the area. She wanted to know about New Jersey so he talked about the winters there, told her about skiing as a kid with his parents at some cheap place. They talked for long enough that the lunch crowd left.

They put on their jackets again when the waiter cleared their table and followed her to her small car. She talked more about her husband, how they came up every year, and Daniel thought it must be nice to have traditions like that.

Johnny sat in the back of her car quietly and he glanced back at him through the mirror.

Johnny had that kind of tradition, with his friends.

He'd probably had traditions with Ali.

Daniel hadn't really thought about starting traditions with Ali. He'd wanted to go on the slide with her, or swimming, but they always found themselves at the movies.

He wondered if that was a tradition, or if they had just been avoiding talking to each other. He wondered if sitting next to each other in the dark made it easier to pretend everything was okay.

He thought it must be nice, he wondered if he could start some. What did he want to start?

Muriel parked the car and Johnny climbed out and opened her door for her. She laughed and patted his hand. They walked into the store. It was small and empty of people.

Muriel grabbed a cart and Johnny grabbed a basket.

"I'll meet you up here," Muriel said motioning towards a bench on the other side of check out.

"Thank you," Johnny said.

Daniel followed Johnny through the aisles.

He studied his broad shoulders, his hips, the way he walked, basket on his arm.

Johnny who Daniel had spent a semester hating, wondering how no one saw what a monster he was.

But he was so damn polite, so easy to like.

Daniel had met Muriel first, but Johnny was charming her with almost zero effort.

He hadn't had any friends before karate. He hadn't even been doing karate his whole life.

Which meant child Johnny, preteen Johnny had been friendless.

Daniel frowned into his scarf, was it like when a girl grew up over the summer and everyone took notice? Did Johnny suddenly bulk up after a summer of karate and everyone was drawn in?

But he only counted those four ex-cobras as friends.

Johnny stepped to the side and turned and Daniel was glad he'd thrown the scarf around half his face again because he felt like he'd been caught staring at Johnny's ass. He panicked that Johnny had realized why he'd been quietly walking behind him.

"What do you want to get?" Johnny asked. "Your the one with the ideas."

Daniel felt his shoulders relax. He hadn't been caught. He walked forward. He had to focus.

"Where's the produce section?"

Johnny pointed in a direction and they walked there. Daniel trying to stay by his side, trying not to slow down. He kept catching himself slowing down because he wasn't done looking, appreciating he corrected. Was it so wrong to appreciate? Probably. Vegetables. Think about vegetables. They wandered through the aisles of produce, Johnny stepping aside and waiting.

Daniel stopped as well then remembered, this was his idea, his plan. Right.

"At the lodge, is there anything like oil and spices?" Daniel asked.

"Yeah," Johnny said. "Jimmy's parents have a bunch of that stuff in the cabinets."

Daniel nodded and hooked his fingers in the edge of the basket, to pull Johnny along with him. He dug through the potatoes, eyeing them and feeling them the way his mother trained him to. He picked out tomatoes, gathered up asparagus, and noted Johnny's wrinkled nose at the asparagus. He clapped his hand to Johnny's chest twice.

"Trust me," he said with a grin before moving on grabbing a lemon and adding it to the basket.

He studied the cheese selection and grabbed a hunk of parmesan and put it in the basket. He didn't even check to see Johnny was beside him and he didn't realize until he dropped the cheese next to him that he just knew Johnny was there, just expected him to be there and trusted he would be.

That was new.

He moved on, grabbed butter, green onions, and shredded cheese. Then turned to look in the basket, checking over everything with the recipe in his head. He nodded and then grinned up at Johnny.

"Okay, we're good. As long as we've got oil, foil, and decent seasonings at the lodge."

Johnny nodded and headed off to the checkout. Daniel worked his way through his pockets trying to remember where his wallet was, which pocket. There were too many of them.

The worker was almost done with their stuff and Daniel pulled out his wallet but Johnny was already paying.

"I could've-"

"You brought Lasagna," Johnny said gathering up the bags and walking over to the bench, and sitting down.

Daniel remembered the guys teasing Johnny for not pitching in the day before.

"Right," Daniel said quietly, before sitting down next to him.

"If you want help..."

"Sure."

They fell into silence.

"What are you going to even make?"

Daniel grinned, turning to look at Johnny. He explained the baked potatoes, the asparagus with tomatoes and cheese and Johnny listened, nodding thoughtfully as Daniel explained the progress. "It'll be good," Daniel promised.

"All done?" Muriel asked.

Johnny was up and Daniel's hand which had unconsciously been on Johnny's thigh again brushed up to his hip when Johnny had slid forward before standing up. The tips of Johnny's ears were red and Daniel felt his heart pounding.

Johnny offered to help carry Muriel's bags and she let him.

Daniel moved to grab their bags but before he could Johnny had picked them up in his other hand.

"Is all of that too heavy?" Muriel asked concerned.

"No ma'am," Johnny said with a shake of his head.

Muriel smiled. "Karate that good at building muscle? You both do karate? And Daniel won?"

"Different teachers," Johnny said.

"I'm stronger than I look," Daniel said.

She played music while she drove and asked Daniel about school, about his plans after school.

"I don't know. Ma wants me to go to college, but I'm still unsure."

"There's so much you can do, you've got time," Muriel said.

She sounded so sure.

It was comforting.

He glanced back at Johnny who was holding their groceries in his lap.

He was so still.

When they got back to the resort it was much later in the afternoon. She parked and they thanked her. Johnny holding their groceries and walking off through the parking lot. Daniel had to hurry to follow after him.

"Where are you going?" Daniel asked.

"I'm going to put this in Dutch's van. He's always got a cooler. And he leaves the keys in there," Johnny called over his shoulder. "I can meet you in the resort, you've still got a free drink on your wristband. I can meet you around the bar."

Daniel stopped.

A car honked at him and he hurried towards the resort.

It made sense he told himself, that Johnny didn't want him following him to the van.

It was better for his knee to not walk all the way through the parking lot again.

But it stung a little.

He turned and walked into the resort and towards the bar. There were comfortable chairs near a roaring fire and he sunk into it. He prodded at the stinging. He felt like he was being shaken off. Like Johnny had pushed him away. He wanted to stay next to Johnny, even if that meant walking with him to the van for no other reason than to just be near him.

There was a menu on the table between him and an empty chair and he picked it up. A free drink seemed nice.

He tried to remember what the drink Dutch said was good. He didn't have a clue which one to get.

He was sure Johnny knew.

He read the descriptions slowly, working his way through each of them before he started getting too hot in front of the fire.

He set the menu down, found another comfortable chair, and moved there shrugging out of his jacket, gloves, hat, and scarf.

He sunk into the chair and got a whiff of Johnny and looked around for the boy.

He didn't see him.

It was the sweater.

He lifted it to his nose.

It still smelled a little like Johnny's room.

It had captured his attention during breakfast, he'd not cared about much of anything else, distracted by how soft it was against his skin, how warm and cozy, and trying to figure out what it was made out of.

He wanted to keep it.

He didn't think Johnny would let him keep his sweater.

He doubted most friends let their friends keep their clothes.

He'd borrow it at least, say he'd get it cleaned.

But Daniel had a feeling if he got far enough to take the sweater back to Reseda he'd never let it out of his hands again. He hadn't wanted to return the shirt after he'd gotten his hands on it.

This was going to be harder. He'd gotten a chance to wear it. To feel how soft it was against his skin.

"Pick something?" Johnny asked sitting across from him in the other comfortable seat.

"Not yet," Daniel said startled and sitting up. "I was thinking of what Dutch said, a hot chocolate? What do you always get?"

Johnny looked at him with mischief glittering in his eyes. "The fanciest expensive cocktail they'll make."

Daniel laughed. "Is that why they hate that you win?"

"Yeah."

"What is it?" Daniel asked looking over the menu again, checking the prices.

"A pink Cadillac. It's bright pink and they put gold in it and this fancy cotton candy on top to make it more expensive than it normally is. The guys fucking hate it. I get it to piss them off."

"Is it any good?"

Johnny shrugged. "It's got tequila in it and they don't hold back on it. So usually they have to catch my ass when I get up because no matter how many years I've gotten it. It knocks my legs out from under me when I get up. They're supposed to put it in a cocktail glass but my first year I asked them for a pint of it. It's a monstrous concoction they made me. They found this stupid fancy glass that held a pint's worth but didn't look like a beer glass and made it for me. Stuck a little umbrella in it, some fresh fruit, a couple of cherries, and a damn twisty straw. Don't ever tell the guys this," he lowered his voice and leaned forward. "It's fucking awful. I've gotten used to it, but it knocks me on my ass on Sunday and I barely can function. It's just a stupid tradition. Get something that actually tastes good. You do not want the hangover that comes with it. Believe me."

Daniel felt his competitive spirit rise up but he doused it quickly with his memory of his hangover from attending the party.

"Do you know which one Dutch was talking about?"

Johnny moved closer, his knees touching Daniel's as he looked at the menu in his hands. He scanned the menu and then stabbed his finger down.

"That one. Peppermint dream."

"So now what do I do?"

"Show them your band and tell them your friend put a free drink on your tab," Johnny said sinking back into the seat, then glanced up at Daniel when he stood. "You want me to come with you?"

"No," Daniel said. Yes.

He walked to the bar feeling nervous, he hadn't ever ordered a drink before at a bar. Never had tried. His Ma always told him he looked young. His cousin teased him. There was no way they'd give him a drink with alcohol in it. They'd laugh in his face.

The bartender looked young and bored.

"Hi, my friend put a free drink for me on their tab? How do I use that?" Daniel asked.

"Band," she asked holding out her hand. Daniel held out his wrist and she flipped it over, looking at a number printed on the corner, and then picked up a piece of paper from behind her desk and looked between the two. "Yup, what do you want?" She asked opening a pen and holding it next to the number, waiting.

"A peppermint dream."

She nodded and scribbled it down. Daniel sat on one of the bar stools and watched her work. It took a couple of minutes, several ingredients but soon she placed a mug of hot chocolate down in front of him with fresh mint sticking out of whip cream drizzled in chocolate syrup and chocolate shavings. Sticking out of the corner was a candy cane.

"Thank you," Daniel said carefully taking the mug and slipping off the stool, and heading to the corner where Johnny was.

He took a sip.

He didn't taste any alcohol but he watched her add some. It was warm and tasted of chocolate and mint.

He set it carefully on the table and sat down across from Johnny.

"What do you think?" Johnny asked.

"I can't taste the alcohol."

"Those are the most dangerous."

"I like it," Daniel said picking it up and holding it as he curled up into the chair.

"Want to write to Mr. Miyagi and your Mom?" Johnny asked pulling out the packet of postcards and a pen.

"Sure," Daniel said leaning forward to set the drink back down after a sip and taking the items from Johnny.

He flicked through the postcards.

He picked one of a tree for Mr. Miyagi and one of the mermaids for his mother. He set the packet down on the other side of the table and flipped the two he picked over, scribbling down Mr. Miyagi's address and his home address before thinking about what to write.

He had so much to say.

It took a while and Johnny was silent the whole time.

When he looked up Johnny was gone and he felt a momentary panic, then saw him at the bar.

The woman working was talking to him and Daniel felt a surge of jealousy.

She was laughing.

Johnny looked at ease, not as awkward as Daniel had felt.

He sunk back in his seat, postcards finished. He held his mug in his hands and drank.

He wondered if this was how Johnny felt every time he saw Daniel and Ali together.

To see someone you like with someone else, even if it might be nothing. He didn't like the feeling. He didn't want to see the girls at school hanging around him, or him leaning casually against the bar chatting up the lady behind it with that charming fake smile of his. He wanted Johnny to look at Daniel, to just keep looking at him. It probably wasn't healthy.

He sighed and ran his tongue through the whipped cream that hadn't fully melted yet. Johnny probably didn't even like him much.

Daniel thought they were becoming friends, but they'd hurt each other so much.

Johnny walked back a piece of paper in his hands and Daniel wants to roll his eyes. Of course, he'd gotten her number.

"Here," Johnny said.

Daniel looked up at him.

He was holding out the piece of paper. Daniel blushed, mortified.

He did not need Johnny of all people getting women's numbers for him.

He just broke up with Ali, he didn't need or want someone else's number... Johnny's number perhaps.

He carefully reached out and took the paper.

"Thanks?"

"You said you liked it," Johnny said.

Daniel opened the piece of paper.

It was a recipe, the recipe for the drink he was holding.

His heart skipped a beat.

Everything washed away and he looked at Johnny and then down at the paper.

Maybe Ali didn't want Johnny but Daniel did. He really really did.

He just had to figure out how to get things moving, how to not scare him off, how to get him to let Daniel in.

With a friend like this...

"If I ask you questions, will you answer them?" Daniel asked.

Johnny looked at him surprised. "It depends, but I guess. I'll try."

Daniel nodded then looked thoughtfully. "You can ask me questions, to make it fair."

"Okay."

Daniel looked into his drink like he was expecting a question to bubble up. His dark hair falling and casting shadows on his face.

He looked up.

"Did you really not have any friends before you started Cobra Kai?"

Oh.

This wasn't going to be easy.

This wasn't going to be fun.

He'd let his guard down around Muriel and let Daniel see some of his past, some of his wounds.

Never let the enemy see your weaknesses.

"I didn't. Let me guess, you were super popular in Newark?"

Daniel laughed. "I had friends, but it was easier because I had my cousin with me. Not popular though. I'd say you're pretty popular. You were surrounded by girls the last couple of days."

It wasn't a question but Johnny didn't know what to say. He didn't know how Daniel would take him apologizing to Ali.

Hell Bobby hadn't taken it well.

Daniel looked down at his drink again then up at Johnny. His eyes were dark, glittering in the firelight.

"Are we friends?" he asked softly.

Johnny didn't know how to answer that. He wanted to be more.

"Do you want to be friends?" His voice was practically a whisper.

Friends were better than enemies. Friends were better than wishing Johnny would disappear. Friends were something rather than an absence.

Daniel pushed the table to the side and pulled his chair closer to Johnny. There was no escape. Like being on the bus again, like being between Daniel and Mr. Miyagi, like waking up trapped in Daniel's grip in his sleep.

Maybe, despite no matter how much Kreese made Johnny think he was a predator, big, strong, smart, and fast, he was still just prey.

His heart pounded in his chest as Daniel's legs slid between his like it didn't mean anything, his hand coming to one of Johnny's knees because that was what Daniel did.

"I don't want us to be rivals anymore, enemies, whatever," Daniel said. "We're not strangers. I think that leaves the only direction we can go..."

"Friends," Johnny said softly.

Daniel tilted his head thoughtfully and nodded. He picked up his drink and took a sip. He had whipped cream on his nose.

"You got, uh..." Johnny said.

He motioned and Daniel just stared at him.

Cute.

Johnny remembered Daniel just usually cleaned people up around him at lunch.

He hooked his finger and dragged it down Daniel's nose, scooping up the whipped cream. He glanced over at the table Daniel had pushed aside. There were always napkins with the drinks, though Johnny never fully understood why.

For a drink like this yeah, but a glass of wine? Champagne? Anything without foam or whipped cream seemed like a waste.

He found the napkin and leaned over to grab it when he felt a warm hand grab his wrist and something warm and wet envelope his finger.

He looked back at Daniel who had Johnny's finger in his mouth and was licking it clean.

He pulled away with a wet pop and Johnny flushed bright red.

He didn't know what to do.

Was this how Daniel interacted with friends?

Was this what it meant to be friends with Daniel?

He was going to die.

Daniel was going to kill him.

He was going to look at the officers and say something like I don't know what happened sir, he was fine like five seconds ago.

And they'd have nothing to convict him on but it'd be all Daniel's fault.

He couldn't escape.

He couldn't get away.

His finger was wet.

He wanted to kiss Daniel.

How much alcohol was in that hot chocolate?

Daniel shifted in his chair, leaning back. He looked relaxed all of a sudden, at ease. He lifted his legs and brought them back down gently on top of Johnny's.

Johnny took the napkin, drying off his hand and sat back, adjusting to better balance the weight.

"Regretting it?" Daniel asked, amused.

"What?"

"Agreeing to be friends?"

"Do your worst."

Maybe he shouldn't bait him.

But he needed to seem like he could handle it. He wasn't sure if he could.

There was no turning back. He didn't want to.

Daniel grinned. "Okay then. Was Ali your first kiss?"

"No. Yours?"

"No. Girl from camp. Who was yours?"

"I don't kiss and tell. Skip."

Daniel frowned at this but Johnny wasn't going to tell him about the lifeguard. Not yet. Maybe not ever.

"Why do the staff say what they say? Why can't anyone ask for you?"

"Sid thinks I'm too full of myself and says my ego needs to be taken down a notch. I'm to be neither seen nor heard unless he's got something that requires a "family"."

Daniel's eyes had held a challenge, a challenge to keep meeting them, to stare at one another while they bared their souls, but Johnny had looked away at that question.

He said it casually.

No one asked, he didn't want them to ask.

There were a lot of things the guys didn't ask and he was realizing Daniel might.

Only his mom knew about the lifeguard and Johnny's summer beach fling.

But everyone he cared about knew about Daniel.

He realized it was his turn. He needed to flip things onto something lighter.

"What did Dutch whisper to you?"

Johnny caught the hard look in Daniel's eyes, the spark of a fight brewing, the way his hands were in fists against his chair.

But it cleared like blown away clear by a gust of wind.

"Told me that sometimes in big open spaces or crowds you get lost so it's better to keep a good hold on you because you disappear easily. He told me not to worry about you getting punchy, you won't start a fight in public," Daniel said.

Johnny wondered if that was why Daniel had held his hand, why he'd hung onto his arm.

Dutch would be pleased.

Dutch was also going to get hit.

He'd made Daniel think he was one of those toddlers that wore a leash backpack.

"What were you like pre-cobra kai?"

Johnny frowned.

"I went to a bunch of different schools. I moved around a lot. Without moving around a lot. I..."

Before Cobra Kai Johnny had several parts.

There was with his mom in the first apartment, the one they moved to when she lost her job, the one she had when she was working three jobs and still couldn't afford it, when they were living in the car, and then Sid.

And time living in Encino hills was broken up by different schools too.

His mother could only handle so much of the nice prep schools Sid tried to stick Johnny in only for Johnny to come home bloody day in and day out before Sid relented to his mother's tears and moved him to a different fancy prep school.

"There's a lot," he said.

"Ali said you all didn't go to school together before high school," Daniel said.

"Didn't. I went to fancy prep schools and private schools."

Daniel was quiet, then spoke softly.

"You make that sound bad."

Johnny glanced at him then looked away.

"It was."

His turn.

Daniel was an open book. He didn't have a lot to really ask. Not that he was willing to ask.

"Do you still hate California?"

Daniel was looking at his hands, they were fists again and he looked up.

"No. I miss things, but Mr. Miyagi..."

"Makes it worth it?"

"Yeah."

"Even after all of the shit we did?"

"Yeah."

"WELL LOOK WHAT WE HAVE HERE!"

Dutch slung his arms over the back of Daniel's chair and the other guys threw their jackets over the backs of other chairs and sunk in with a look of exhaustion but happiness.

Dutch was leaning over looking at the table they'd pushed aside and he was too close into Daniel's space and his fingers were still curled tight into fists and Johnny wondered if Daniel would hit him.

He kind of wanted to see it.

He'd expected Daniel to move his feet off of Johnny's lap but he didn't.

He didn't look like he wanted to move.

He looked annoyed, that flicker of anger still there, flaring.

"Oh hell yeah LaRusso! How was it?" Dutch asked stepping back and turning to the other guys. "He got the drink I recommended." He sounded pleased. Like his ego had been boosted.

"Thank god," Jimmy said. "Not another one of those pink monstrosities."

Johnny felt an urge to go up and order one, but the weight of Daniel's legs kept him still.

"It was good," Daniel said softly.

"How were the slopes?" Johnny asked.

"So good," Bobby said with a satisfied sigh.

"Shall we go?" Tommy asked and Johnny saw that he hadn't sat.

He was standing behind the others, ready to run if need be.

Johnny smirked.

He'd nearly forgotten.

He turned to Daniel.

"Your knee okay?" Johnny asked softly. "Need to have it propped up longer?"

Daniel had been looking at his hands and then seemed startled by hearing Johnny ask. He quickly looked up again.

"Huh? Oh, no, it's fine."

Daniel lifted his legs up and swung them over and to the ground before standing up and Johnny got up quickly prepared to catch him if he swayed.

But Daniel was fine.

He wasn't like Johnny.

He didn't hit the floor every time he was in this room and stood up after his drink.

Johnny gathered their things and started to follow, but then remembered what Daniel said and walked beside him out of the resort and to the van.

Daniel pushed the door open and then waited for Johnny to go through first, motioning with his arm, before ducking after him.

Daniel sat next to him again even though there was space.

The warmth was nice.

He listened to the other guys get in the van with curses over the cold and Johnny slipped forward a little after Tommy sat down and he flicked his ear.

Tommy nearly jumped out of his seat and Johnny sank back in his seat amused.

Bobby turned and pointed him with a glare and Johnny shrugged.

The ride was full of the guys talking about their day, the times they wiped out, the fun they had.

When they got out at the lodge Daniel beelined straight to the trunk, grabbing the groceries.

"I can get those," Johnny said.

"You can help carry this..." Daniel said looking at the bags.

Johnny held out his hand.

Daniel put his hand in Johnny's, looking at him with a big mischievous grin.

Johnny looked down at their hands.

It was a bad joke.

It was a nice result.

He liked holding Daniel's hand and he'd laced their fingers together so he couldn't let go.

But the urge to pick Daniel up and dump him in a snowdrift in response to the joke was rising by the second.

The guys had all run for the warmth of the lodge, so instead, he closed the trunk and latched it with his free hand, and walked towards the lodge.

"You've been up all day, are you sure you're okay?" Johnny asked softly.

"I've been leaning against you all day," Daniel said. "Leaving almost no pressure on my other leg. I'm sure it's fine."

"We'll go to a thermal pool tomorrow. The guys will be black and blue."

"I didn't bring-"

"They have bathing suits for rent for free for members, which we are."

They opened the door and Johnny expected Daniel to pull away and let go but he didn't, beelining straight for the kitchen and pulling Johnny along.

The guys were grinning at him and he glared them down.

Daniel only let go of his hand once Johnny was firmly in the kitchen, setting down their groceries and going through the cabinets.

He pulled things out, then paused.

"Wash your hands," he told Johnny and went back to looking around.

Johnny didn't need to be ordered twice.

He was trained to act on the first command.

He washed his hands and waited for what Daniel wanted him to do.

"Rinse then dry all of the produce."

"Slice these."

"Grate this."

Daniel moved about the kitchen like he knew what he was doing and Johnny struggled to do what he was told. The tomatoes he sliced just sort of turned to mush under his hands.

"Like this," Daniel said and returned to his side, swapped out his knife to a serrated one, turning the tomato and making a quick slice.

"Never grated? Okay."

Daniel held the cheese and showed him what to do, hands over Johnny's.

"Careful you don't grate your fingers," he said softly in Johnny's ear before dropping from tiptoe at his side to go back to whatever he was doing.

It took a while and by the time Johnny was done the room smelled like dinner.

All the ingredients looked like real food.

It was impressive, especially when Daniel finished and started plating the steaks and everything else.

He grabbed some plates, then motioned with his head for Johnny to grab a few.

Johnny hurried and followed Daniel to the table, setting the plates out at the places around the table. Johnny turned to grab the rest and when he turned Jimmy was there.

"Leave Tommy alone," Jimmy said softly. "I know you still haven't noticed. He was trying to point out that Daniel's wearing your sweater and seems to like it okay? You're just so damn blind sometimes. Don't start a fight."

Johnny frowned as Jimmy turned. He followed. He put the food down in front of the last two. Then took his seat next to Daniel who pressed his leg against his and he looked over.

It took a moment.

That really was his sweater.

He'd offered but he hadn't thought about it.

He remembered Daniel at breakfast, quiet, concerning the way he kept fiddling with his sweater.

His, Johnny's sweater.

No wonder Tommy had smacked him.

He blushed lightly and looked away.

It looked good on Daniel, a bit too big. But nicer than it looked on Johnny.

"Damn LaRusso, your mother teach you to cook?" Dutch asked.

"Yeah."

"Dinners at your house must be amazing," Tommy said.

"They're pretty good."

"Wait so Johnny bought this and helped make it? And the lodge didn't burn down?" Jimmy asked.

Daniel laughed and Johnny glared.

"I had to show him how to cut a tomato, but he did alright."

"It's delicious," Bobby said, his tone pointed, his gaze pointed.

Johnny chill.

It was delicious. And Johnny was proud.

He'd helped, maybe not much but he really only knew how to make simple stuff.

If he was on his own he didn't think he'd starve. But he couldn't make this.

He could make sandwiches, and salads, and stuff out of a can, or frozen, a couple of box mixes.

But this was a different level.

He wondered if Daniel would teach him, but he also remembered the way Daniel moved his hands, guiding him had sent goosebumps along his flesh.

It'd be torture.

Delicious, fun to learn, but he'd probably get distracted by the fact Daniel would push himself on tiptoes and press up against him to get a better view over his shoulder. Not touching his shoulder but pressed against his back.

After dinner, everything was cleared away and Bobby brought out their next dessert, it looked like brownies.

Dutch looked delighted.

Bobby had to let him down easy.

Uno was retrieved from one of the drawers by Jimmy.

He passed the deck to Tommy who shuffled the cards with the precision of someone who worked in a casino but with the flair of a Las Vegas magician.

He passed out the cards.

"We're thinking snowmobiles in the morning. We could rent them after breakfast and go for a ride through the trails, then head back for lunch and after like an hour or so then hit the thermal pools," Bobby said setting his card down.

"Sounds good," Daniel said studying his cards, ordering them in his hand, and looking back to watch the cards the others played.

It wasn't a long game.

Not nearly as long as Monopoly the day before.

Tommy won.

Then Dutch, and Daniel.

It was between Jimmy, Bobby, and Johnny for a long time.

Then Johnny barely made it out safe and sighed, leaning back with relief, surprised when he bumped into something other than his chair.

Something fleshy.

Daniel's arm was thrown over the back of his chair, watching the game with amusement on his face as the guys bickered.

Jimmy and Bobby were taunting each other, trash-talking.

Bobby wasn't going to back down.

He was quick to shout Uno, stopping Jimmy from getting out.

And Jimmy was quick to make sure Bobby was drowning in cards.

Daniel was laughing at their antics.

Johnny sat up, not leaning against Daniel's arm.

He couldn't handle it.

He didn't want to have to explain it.

If Daniel didn't move it might be okay.

But he'd have to move.

The brush of an arm against the back of his neck would freeze Johnny in place.

He knew it'd make him forget how to breathe.

He'd tested it accidentally when his mother had gone to give him a half hug, arm around his neck, and the next thing he realized he was out past the pool house and she was cupping his face in her hands, saying his name over and over again.

He'd panicked.

He'd run.

Bobby whittled his cards down to one and it was like watching a western movie where it was high noon and someone was going to lose.

Johnny pushed his chair back and went to the fridge, grabbing sodas and passing them out before sitting back down.

It went around and around and around until finally Bobby got his card down on the pile and said "Uno" before Jimmy could open his mouth.

Jimmy groaned head in his hands flicking his card onto the table in frustration.

Johnny stretched. "I'm going to shower and sleep." He yawned. "8 again?"

"Yeah," Jimmy said. "Pack tonight guys, so when we come back from the thermal springs we can just grab our shit and go."

"I wanna get all of you home so I can get home before 10," Dutch said.

"Got a hot date?" Bobby asked.

"We got school the next day. I'm running out of days I can skip if I wanna graduate, smartass," Dutch said. "I gotta save those, for you know, other emergencies."

Johnny got up, gave Tommy a nod so he'd stop panicking, and headed back to the room.

He flicked on the lights and grabbed his stuff out of his bag.

Daniel stepped in and shut the doors behind him.

"Want to jump in first?" Johnny asked motioning to the bathroom.

Daniel stared at him for a moment before nodding, grabbing his bag, and hurrying in.

Johnny emptied out the pockets of his jacket.

He held the polaroid of Daniel and smiled softly.

He thought about showing it to Daniel, about telling him to give it to his Mom.

But he wanted to keep it.

He stuck it in one of his books and reorganized his stuff.

Setting out his stuff for Sunday and for the night and packing away everything else, including his cassettes that he wasn't going to get around to.

He heard the soft click of the door and Daniel flopped onto the bed.

"You should prop your leg up," Johnny said.

He grabbed his stuff for the night and made his way to the bathroom.

He shut the door and stripped on his way to the shower.

The hot water on his skin was a delight after being out and about in the cold all day.

He was tired.

He wondered what Daniel would've asked if the guys hadn't come back.

What Daniel had been thinking, why he'd seemed so wound up.

Then he laughed, a short laugh.

It was Daniel.

Daniel had a short temper around Johnny.

Fiesty was what Dutch called him and he hated agreeing with Dutch but he was right.

He'd been surprised they hadn't actually fought in so long.

It'd take time, like Daniel said.

But they were friends now.

Or at least that was what Daniel wanted.

He finished his shower and getting ready for bed.

Daniel still had the light on when he came out, was sitting in bed like he was waiting.

"If we're cleaning up before we leave, packing, what time should I set the alarm? 7?" Daniel asked.

Johnny looked over at the clock, it was after midnight.

He sighed, "Yeah."

He pulled back the blankets and slid into his side of the bed.

He waited until Daniel finished setting the alarm before turning off the light.

He sunk into the pillows.

"I don't want to go back to school," Daniel said.

"Because of Ali?" Johnny asked.

Daniel laughed, there wasn't mirth in it.

"I thought it'd be fine, but I miss her. I thought...I just...I guess I just wish this was a longer weekend."

He understood the desire.

He'd been lucky he supposed.

Ali had dumped him over break.

"I..." Daniel rolled over looking at him and Johnny turned his head.

"will wash your sweater and return it."

"You can keep it if you want," Johnny said softly. "It looks better on you anyway. Plus you might have more chances to wear it if you visit family in Newark."

He hoped it didn't sound like because Daniel had borrowed it he didn't want it back.

That wasn't the reason.

It wasn't an excuse.

Daniel did look better.

But this was probably his last year coming up here.

The guys hadn't talked about it but they probably wouldn't be seeing a lot of each other after graduation, maybe after summer.

They'd split up, go separate ways and Johnny didn't think Sid would take them here again. He'd take his mother, maybe. But not Johnny.

The road was coming to a dead-end ahead of him, soon he'd have to pick a direction before he was pushed off the cliff.

"Thanks," Daniel said.

Johnny nodded. He didn't have anything else to say. He was too tired.

The thought of going home was like being tied to a boulder and someone shoving it off a ship and trying to scramble to hold off the inevitable.

He wonders what nightmare awaited him tonight.

"Good night," Johnny said. He shuts his eyes.

"Good night Johnny."

Daniel stayed up late. He hadn't meant to, but he had more energy.

He watched Johnny fall asleep in the dark. The tension in his shoulders fading, the sound of his soft breath.

He determined to stay on his side of the bed.

Moving as far to his end of the bed as he possibly could when he felt sleep becoming inevitable.

When he woke up in the moments before the alarm went off he could feel Johnny's steady breathing against his chest, his arm was wrapped around his waist.

It wasn't like the room was that cold that Daniel sought Johnny out in his sleep for warmth, though if asked, if confronted, that would be his excuse.

His mother told him that as a kid when he had nightmares and would crawl into the bed between his parents they'd have to wake him up in the morning before they left for work because they couldn't pry him off.

His grip was too strong.

It's why they went through such in-depth night routines with him.

Every night was a story night, every night was soothing lavender that the lady down the block recommended, warm milk, lullabies, a thorough check for monsters.

It worked 90% of the time, the other 10% sent Daniel running into their bed. He didn't have a lot of nightmares, didn't get scared of the night too often. But he had always thought it was amusing. This child version of him that latched on.

It explained why he always felt bruised when sharing a bed with Louie at his grandparent's house. Louie was a light sleeper and probably woke up and would kick Daniel away.

He thought he'd grown out of it.

Johnny was warm in his arms, solid but stiff.

Daniel carefully untangled himself from Johnny and looked at the clock. It was six-thirty.

He rolled back, Johnny was too stiff.

It wasn't like how he'd been when Daniel had seen him the day before when he woke up, or the night before.

Daniel sat up.

There was tension through his whole body.

Daniel wondered if he woke Johnny up if he'd get socked in the face.

It looked like it. Johnny looked ready to fight.

Daniel puzzled on what to do, then reached a hand up to Johnny's hair. He slid his fingers through the golden locks he'd touched the day before ever so briefly.

"It's okay Johnny," Daniel said softly. "Whatever it is, it's a dream."

His breathing wasn't as deep, wasn't as slow and steady. When Daniel had nightmares he woke up suddenly, sitting up with a gasp.

He tried to be as soothing as possible. "Just a dream, you can change it, or escape it. Or come back to me."

They were supposed to go to the thermal pools. It was starting to look like Johnny might need those more than Daniel.

His hair was as soft as Daniel had thought. Daniel shifted, moving back to where he'd been, curled up behind Johnny hugging him close. Maybe that would help? He found one of Johnny's hands and took it in his.

Maybe it'd better to try something else.

"Breathe Johnny, like Mr. Miyagi says. Find your breath."

Daniel shut his eyes and breathed in deeply, wondering if he pressed close and breathed deeply, if Johnny's body would recognize it and calm down.

Daniel could feel Johnny's pulse racing.

He kept breathing, the breath Mr. Miyagi taught him that was deep.

A deep breath in.

Holding it for a couple of seconds.

And then a deep breath out.

It took a while but Johnny relaxed in his arms, his breathing settled, the pulse slowed.

Daniel kept at it, breathing purposefully, still soothingly rubbing circles around Johnny's hand.

To say he was proud of himself was an understatement.

He'd tell Mr. Miyagi if he didn't want to explain that they were sharing a bed and how it was fine and not weird and how much Daniel wanted it to be a normal occurrence.

"Good Johnny, keep breathing. I got you," Daniel whispered.

The room was slowly filling with light and Daniel watched Johnny sleep, face relaxed and calm, Daniel had never noticed his eyelashes before.

They were so light in color, and usually, his attention was drawn to his eyes. He looked so peaceful, so beautiful and Daniel's heart ached.

Johnny kept so much in.

He fought Daniel, he terrorized him, but now...Daniel wanted to kiss him.

He remembered the drunken kiss. The way he'd lunged forward, the feeling of Johnny's tongue, wanting to taste, memorizing everything like he was about to be quizzed on it.

Rushed, unsure if he'd get another chance so he went for it.

He wanted to know what was tormenting Johnny. There seemed to be a lot. A lot of things he didn't talk about. A lot of things that he had buried deep.

His hands were full and Daniel wanted to help take some of it away.

It was better than thinking about the previous semester, about Ali dating a college guy, how she claimed to love him but never said she loved Daniel.

How part of him was jealous even though he knew he didn't love Ali the same way.

The alarm went off and Johnny's eyes flicked open and he seemed to take stock of where he was. Daniel carefully took his hand back, rolling away and turning off the alarm.

It was better not to mention it. To not talk about it yet.

He stood and headed to the bathroom with his clothes.

He showered, got ready for the day.

He wanted to take Johnny home with him. Ask his mother if they could keep him. Wake up next to him every morning.

He grabbed the hairdryer and pushed the door open and stepped out. Johnny was sitting on the bed lost in thought. He was dressed, all packed, ready to go. He glanced up when Daniel opened the door. Daniel sunk down onto a chair in the corner and plugged in the hairdryer and blow-dried his hair.

In Newark, one of his classmates had come to school with wet hair. Their hair had frozen. One of the kids reached out to touch it, fascinated and a lock had broken off.

Daniel liked his hair. There was no way in hell he'd let that happen.

Johnny walked off to the bathroom. Daniel yawned.

He ran his fingers through his hair, making sure he'd gotten it all dry before turning off the hairdryer and setting it aside, unplugging it. He packed his bag, carefully running his fingers over the sweater Johnny said he could keep. He set it on top of the plastic bag that held his dad's sweater and zipped up his bag.

He looked around. Johnny had already made their bed. There wasn't much else to do. He grabbed his bag and headed out to the living room.

He'd have to spend time with them alone eventually.

He had questions he wanted to ask them.

He felt confident. He'd managed to use his breathing techniques to get Johnny to sleep. He did that. He could handle some punks who weren't morning people that used to torment him.

He dropped his bag and sunk onto the couch. Jimmy was awake and staring into the fridge. Tommy was gathering up trash in a black plastic bag.

"Hey, LaRusso."

"Hey."

"Johnny up?"

"Yup."

The other two boys exchanged glances and walked over, sitting across from Daniel in a couple of chairs.

Daniel would start with something easy.

"Did you all seriously not go to school together before high school?"

"Yeah," Jimmy said. "Met at Cobra Kai. Transferred to the same high school. A public one."

"I was already going to the connected elementary and middle school. Everyone else transferred to my school," Tommy said.

"Which is why all the girls talk to him. I think I got a photo somewhere here from our first year of karate," Jimmy said standing up and walking over to a bookshelf.

"Seriously?" Tommy asked with a laugh.

"What? My parents like photos. They liked the gi's. Thought it was cool," Jimmy said studying the collection of photos before grabbing one in a frame and then blowing on it, dusting it off with his sleeve. He walked back and handed the photo to Daniel.

It was like every other sports team photo he'd ever seen. Everyone crowded into two lines. Tallest in the back standing with their shoulders back and heads held high and with their arms behind their back the way Daniel had seen, the others on their knees in front. That waiting position, ready to jump to their feet on command. The belt colors were all different. The kids at the front were white and yellow and orange. The kids in the back were black and brown belts. Kreese stood stiffly next to them, no smile on his face. No smile on the students' faces. Just stiff and attentive. They were in their white gi's.

Daniel studied the faces, looking in the back for Johnny, expecting him there, but then his eyes trailed to a blonde in the front. A small blonde with bright blue eyes.

"Oh," Daniel said surprised. "He's so small."

Jimmy laughed, "Johnny? Yeah, he got a huge growth spurt that summer. Shot up like a fucking tree. He got a workout regimen from Kreese. He was constantly working out."

Tommy leaned over, finger touching the glass over the frame, pointing each of them out.

They were babies practically.

Kids.

Soft features, messy hair, not yet ready to show no mercy, the steely gaze the black belts and brown belts had hadn't filtered in through their eyes yet.

Still learning.

Jimmy sunk back into his seat with a sigh. "Ah man, those days were weird. It was fun, you know all being in this class and getting to know one another. Johnny always came to class with new bruises. I thought it was because he was training extra on his own or picking fights."

Tommy looked up but nodded. "But it was like fights always found him. He never told us who was fighting him. Kreese wanted us to show up. Something about if someone attacks one of us they attack all of us. But Johnny would say something like he fell down while training on that extra workout Kreese gave him. It was total bullshit."

"I always wondered how they caught him. He's always had long legs, he can move so damn fast."

"I thought it was Sid," Tommy whispered.

Jimmy looked at him. "Yeah, sometimes I think it was. But sometimes he'd get more when Sid was out of town. It definitely wasn't his mom. She's as sweet as honey."

"I think it's why he trained so hard. Was so desperate for Kreese's approval but also he was already at war and desperately needed help."

They heard footsteps and Jimmy jumped up taking the photo with him and returning it to the shelf.

Johnny set his bag gently down on the floor next to Daniel's and sunk down next to him on the couch.

"You okay?" Johnny asked.

"I am," Daniel said with a soft smile.

They waited in silence as Dutch wandered in then Bobby.

"So breakfast time," Dutch said with a yawn. "Alright, out. Let's go. Your poorly paid chauffer is up."

Dutch motioned for them to go.

Daniel scooped up his bag, placing it in the trunk, Johnny setting his in as well.

"You guys are all packed? Perfect," Dutch said as they piled in and the doors shut. "That'll make leaving easier. Why can't the rest of you be as organized?"

"Some of us, were woken up because some idiot had some idea he had to share at 3 am," Bobby grumbled as they headed to the resort.

"Hey," Dutch said. "You said it was a good idea."

"Just write it down next time. Share it at a normal time. Like a normal person. I thought you'd like hurt yourself or something. Thought I was going to have to drive you to the ER."

Dutch laughed. "You've only had to do that once."

"Once is too much."

Dutch parked at the resort and they climbed out, heading to the dining room.

They threw their jackets at the same big table from the day before and Daniel turned to head to the buffet when Johnny's hand grabbed his wrist and then let go suddenly as if he'd burned himself on Daniel's skin.

Daniel looked at him confused.

The other guys hadn't left.

"We're...I was thinking...we've got postcards to send," Johnny said holding the two Daniel had filled out yesterday and forgotten about.

"Oh, right," Daniel said.

"Okay, we'll see you when you get back," Jimmy said.

He was smiling.

Daniel wondered why he looked pleased.

Maybe the ex-cobras worried about Johnny knew that they were all Johnny had. That table of four teens was it, all Johnny had left and maybe Johnny was trying to move forward. Trying to heal and maybe this was working.

Maybe spending time with Daniel was helping.

Maybe making a new friend out of an old enemy could help.

Maybe they liked having Daniel around.

It was curious. Strange.

He followed Johnny through the resort. Johnny passed back the two postcards and Daniel took them, walking beside him through the halls towards a large wooden desk where an old man in uniform stood.

"Good morning gentleman," the man said with a warm smile.

"We'd like to send some postcards," Johnny said pulling out his wallet.

He was always so damn fast with that thing.

Daniel handed over the postcards.

"Local," the man said with a smile pulling out a booklet and carefully removing some stamps, running them over a wet sponge and sticking them in the corner.

Johnny set some cash on the counter.

The man smiled and quickly stamped both of them with an ink stamp, then handing them to Daniel.

He leaned on the counter and pointed towards the wall. "Send them down the chute."

Daniel carried them over to the wall.

There was a long glass part of the wall, a chute going through the floor, and a metal piece that said "Outgoing Mail" with a slot.

Daniel flipped the postcards over in his hands. The stamp was of the mountain, the additional ink had the date in a circle with snowflakes coming down. It was elegant.

His mother and Mr. Miyagi would appreciate it.

He slipped them through the slot and watched them flutter their way down, gone in an instant to start their journey.

He turned.

Johnny was collecting his change, putting it into his wallet, and then turning and walking back.

"Breakfast?" Johnny asked.

"Starving."

After breakfast, they all stood bundled up at the start of a trail through the mountains. An instructor was explaining how to use the snowmobiles. They were brightly colored with brightly colored helmets.

They'd managed to rent the last five.

Apparently, they were popular and they had to keep some on hand for emergency services so they couldn't rent out all that they had.

No one put up much of a fight over it, which Daniel found amusing.

He'd expected the guys to demand, to stomp their feet like the spoiled rich kids they were.

But they just nodded with understanding.

"I'll share since you were going to pay for me anyway, this way it's cheaper," Daniel told Johnny.

"You sure?" Johnny asked.

"Yeah, but I wanna drive."

Johnny frowned but slowly nodded.

No one said anything about it.

Just heading off down the trail.

Daniel put on his helmet, took one more look at the map, and slid his legs over the lime green snowmobile.

He looked back.

He'd expected Johnny's arms around his waist, had been looking forward to it.

He'd felt Johnny sit down but he wasn't touching him.

Johnny's hands were holding onto the seat. Daniel rolled his eyes.

"If you sit like that I might not notice if you fly off," Daniel said. He watched as Johnny didn't move. "Put your arms around me. We're not going anywhere until you do."

That worked.

Johnny let go of the seat and put his hands gently on Daniel's hips.

Daniel let go of the handles, put his hands over Johnny's, and wrapped them around himself. "You're not going to break me, or whatever you're worried about. So like actually hold on, okay?"

Daniel shifted, assured Johnny wasn't going to let go he pressed the handle the way the instructor had said and they started forward.

It was fun Daniel thought as they shot down the path.

He remembered the guys talking.

Some sort of race to the end of the trail.

He could do that.

He could speed along, fly along the path, through the snow, warm because Johnny was pressed up to his back.

He wondered if riding bikes like the ex-cobras had was as fun, as exhilarating.

He turned along the path, he could see them.

They hadn't lost too much time.

The pines were covered in snow and it smelled like winter. It smelled like cold and snow and pine trees.

He turned the other way and felt Johnny tense, as Daniel took a different path, away from his friends, like one of the paintings of Greek monsters carrying off women that Daniel had seen in a museum.

Centaurs unusually he thought he remembered.

He wanted to laugh.

Johnny would see.

Daniel wasn't carrying him off.

Not this time at least.

He was going to win.

The path went round and round, swerving one way then the other, and Johnny held on tight, tighter than before. His legs pressed closely to Daniel's. Daniel wondered if he was scared.

That made him want to laugh more. Johnny, scared of him? Ha! Never. Not in a million years.

The path broke through to the end of the trail, to where it settled into a large clearing and Daniel slowed to a stop. He turned the engine off and leaned back against Johnny, lowering his hands down to Johnny's thighs.

"We win," he said laughing with delight.

Johnny sat back a bit looking and Daniel followed his gaze, hearing the sounds of the others coming along down the path.

"See?" Daniel asked giving Johnny's thighs a squeeze.

It was a habit now. He'd never be able to break it and Daniel didn't want to even try. He liked it.

Johnny carefully slid off the back of the snowmobile.

Daniel took off his helmet and got up as well, leaning smugly against the snowmobile, helmet in his arms as the other four came to a stop.

"How?" Bobby asked eyes wide.

"Took a different path," Daniel said with a grin.

He liked the stunned looks on their faces.

"You've never been here before," Jimmy said.

"I looked at the map," Daniel said.

"Smart," Tommy said in awe.

"Thank you," Daniel said still grinning. "So now what?"

He spotted Dutch with an eyebrow raised behind the others, holding up a snowball in his hand and Daniel nodded, ducking and scooping up his own and sending it flying.

Chaos erupted as the guys scattered.

Daniel burst out laughing, ducking behind the snowmobile.

He got hit a couple of times, but it was the least painful hit he'd ever gotten from the ex-cobras. And like every time before he gave his best in response. He couldn't run. He knew he shouldn't. So he just used the snowmobile as cover and lobbed his snowballs over.

Johnny took his hits, not hiding, pummeling those ahead of him.

He was too easy a target, too big.

They all threw snow at Johnny and then suddenly Johnny took off running.

He was fast Daniel realized.

The way he shot off across the clearing.

The snowball fight continued, shrieks as the ex-cobras turned on one another.

Daniel slipped onto the back of the snowmobile, sticking his helmet back on and chasing after Johnny.

It didn't take long to catch up on the snowmobile but Johnny was still running.

Daniel cut him off, slowing down, turning it off, and trying to lean nonchalantly.

"You okay?"

"Yeah," Johnny said slowing to a stop, it sounds automatic and shaky.

Daniel didn't believe it.

He wasn't out of breath, running through snow at such a fast pace. But his eyes were wide, panicked.

Daniel saw snow melting near his neck and shuddered.

"Want to build a snowman instead?" Daniel asked, sliding off the back and taking his helmet off again.

He reached out and took Johnny's hands, scared he'd bolt again.

"I haven't built one in a long time, might be fun. We could try to make a giant one."

It took a bit of coaxing but soon Johnny was helping him roll snow, they started with a little ball and then kept adding to it.

Eventually, they could roll it and Daniel didn't think he'd ever gotten snow to roll in his life.

He'd always given up and just piled it all together, pushed it, and packing it together until it grew bigger.

But they get it to roll and continued, pushing it together until it was up to Daniel's hip.

The largest ball of snow he'd ever made, and then they made another.

Daniel's eyes kept shifting to Johnny, checking in on him.

The look was gone, the look of a frightened animal on the run.

His cheek were flushed from the cold making his blue eyes just so much brighter, focused at the task on hand.

Daniel found himself talking about Newark, about winters there, about attempting to build snowmen on the sidewalk, going to a park to build snowmen, snow angels, the one time he went ice fishing.

He mentioned his neighbor, someone he didn't talk about much, the neighbor who Daniel missed, the one he wanted to ask for advice now more than ever before.

He talked about hot chocolate and how there was a shop he went to after school that made it the French way, all thick and practically a pudding and how he got sick one year from drinking it almost daily, how one day he drank five in a row and had to miss school the next day. And Johnny listened.

Johnny helped roll the second ball of snow and together they lifted it onto the first ball of snow, very carefully and they stood around it, arms out, waiting for it to collapse but it held.

Spurred on by success they went to work on the next one, the last one.

"Do you feel like you've gotten to do at least some things you wanted to do?" Daniel asked.

Daniel felt bad, like he came on Johnny's trip and took over.

Johnny spent his trip babysitting Daniel. Doing things Daniel wanted to do because he couldn't do other things. Daniel agreed to a snowball fight which sent Johnny running.

Not as a joke, but actually running.

Johnny glanced over at him, the ball was practically perfect and he lifted it up and set it atop the other two. It was almost the same height as Daniel.

"I liked looking at the snow sculptures," Johnny said stepping back and studying their snowman. "I liked eating dinner with everyone, playing games, watching them lose. I'm sure we'll have a good time in the thermal pools..."

Daniel stepped closer to him. "But did you get to do anything you wanted to do?"

"I'm having fun," Johnny said.

"Are you sure?"

"Yes. Are you?"

Daniel looked at their snowman and nodded. "I haven't made a snowman this nice my whole life."

"This was it?" Johnny asked, a gentle teasing tone. "All you wanted was to make a snowman?"

"Driving is fun too. Thought I scared you," Daniel said teasing back.

"You did," Johnny said. "Thought you were going to drive us into something."

The teasing felt a little awkward. Like they were trying to find their footing again. But Daniel appreciated the effort, it was better then an hour ago, chasing Johnny down and swearing he looked like he was going to try and jump, try and soar over Daniel and the snowmobile and continue on through the woods.

"You gotta trust me," Daniel said with a teasing grin. "I will not steer us wrong."

Johnny frowned, he was thinking.

Daniel started to laugh. "Are you seriously trying to think of a time I've steered us wrong?"

"There's got to be one," Johnny said, brows furrowed.

Oh, Daniel was going to jump him.

Daniel pushed, hands flat out on Johnny's chest, and shoved.

Johnny reached out snagging Daniel's jacket and they went tumbling into the snow with a satisfying fwump.

Daniel laughed, delighted until Johnny adjusted his grip and he found himself lifted up and off of Johnny and thrown into the nearest snowdrift.

Daniel blinked up at the bright blue sky and popped up out of the snow, annoyed.

He caught Johnny, a bright smile on his face, delight in his eyes, and his heart melted.

He hadn't seen that smile. Ever.

If throwing Daniel into a snowbank caused that, a safe playful game, then Johnny could do it whenever he wanted.

He wanted to capture that look.

He wanted that smile directed at him forever.

"You okay?" Johnny asked, pulling himself out of the snow and walking over.

Daniel watched him, the way he moved, shaking snow off of himself and leaning over, the smile was slipping, concern, a twinge of regret.

Johnny held out his hand to Daniel and Daniel took it, yanking Johnny down into the snow with him.

He stuck his gloved hand to his mouth, bit the tip of the index finger glove, and yanked his hand free, letting the glove drop.

He stuck his hand in the snow, waited for a second, and then slid it up under Johnny's jacket, under his sweater, pressing his hand onto his warm skin. He cackled when Johnny yelped, jumping up, that quick well-trained movement, his arms wrapping around himself.

Daniel grinned standing up and waiting.

When Mr. Miyagi said he'd train Johnny Daniel had been tentative, fearful, jealous.

What if he asked them to spar?

Johnny always took things far, he'd been trained to take things too far, to end them.

But now Daniel wanted to go home and tell Mr. Miyagi to get the training started, teach him, so we can play. I want to spar with him.

Sparing with Mr. Miyagi was always quiet and soft, it was training, learning, but Daniel always held back his punches, his kicks. Even though he knew Mr. Miyagi was strong, he still didn't want to hurt him.

With Johnny he wouldn't have to pull his actions.

Johnny could take it and Daniel was pretty sure if it was sparring Daniel could take what Johnny dished out. If it was one on one.

Johnny had snow in his hair.

Daniel walked to him and brushed it out of his hair with his bare hand.

He couldn't stop smiling.

He heard the sound of the snowmobiles, the sounds of their motors getting louder.

He looked back, blowing warmth into his hand before putting the glove back on.

"We were thinking of taking the long way back, supposed to be a good view of the mountains," Tommy said.

"Nice snowman," Dutch said and Daniel was pretty sure he wasn't being sarcastic.

Daniel looked up at Johnny who nodded.

"We'll follow," Daniel said going to their snowmobile and grabbing their helmets.

He passed one to Johnny. He straddled the snowmobile and waited for Johnny who looked at their snowman one last time, then around at the clearing.

The guys were already pulling away.

Johnny finally turned after taking in a deep breath of the cold air and letting it out in a cloud.

He put his helmet on and looked at the snowmobile and Daniel.

He didn't immediately wrap his arms around Daniel, he was slow, tentative, but he found the same position as before without needing to be ordered or moved to do so.

Progress.

"Ready?"

"Yeah."

Daniel squeezed the handle and they shot off across the clearing.

He wondered if his mother would kill him if he told her he wanted to ride on a bike.

Maybe.

But he wanted to try it, he doubted Johnny would let him drive his bike, but he could show Johnny how someone would hold on properly without needing prompting. Plus there would be a chance he could shift his grip, move his hands.

The other snowmobiles were ahead of them again, but Daniel didn't take any shortcuts.

He wanted to see the view they promised. It was so peaceful on the paths through the woods.

He slowed down, he wasn't going to lose them.

He wanted to savor it.

The trees full of snow, the air.

"Everything okay?" Johnny asked softly.

"Everything's perfect," Daniel breathed.

The snowmobiles up the hill were slowing down as they turned and when they got there they'd stopped and Daniel could see why.

There was a break in the trees. They could see for miles, the other white-covered mountain peaks, the trees covered in snow. They could see the roads, little lines with tiny cars moving on them, it looked like kid's toys. It was all breathtaking, the way the sun hit the snow and it sparkled. There were a few low clouds working their way along the mountains and past it, past the other peaks was the valley, were the cities.

Daniel wondered if that was the direction of their valley, if somewhere down there was his mother and Mr. Miyagi.

"Damn," Johnny breathed so close to Daniel it sent a shiver down his spine.

"Yeah."

After a while, Dutch turned. "Lunch?" he asked.

The guys agreed and Daniel followed them back to the start of the path.

They returned the bikes and walking back to the resort felt a little weird.

Daniel needed to stretch out his legs.

Lunch was different from the day before, with them all at the table, the guys talking about their snowball fight, of the view, of how cool the snowmobiles were and how it was a good idea.

Daniel ate, pressing his leg up against Johnny's.

He never pulled away and if Daniel didn't know better it'd give him hope.

But he'd seen the way the ex-cobras used to hang around Johnny. Before the tournament, at the tournament, they always had their arms slung around him, touching him.

He was used to it.

This was probably normal to him and while it had started out as a way to try and extend some sort of comfort, Daniel now wanted a response out of Johnny.

Some acknowledgment that Daniel was different or could be different.

Daniel bit into his sandwich.

Technically they'd become friends the day before, trying to grab Johnny's hand and rush him past friendship seemed like a bad move.

Mr. Miyagi had talked about moving slowly with Johnny. Not telling him he was training him because he needed help, needed to heal.

Mr. Miyagi probably would frown at the idea of Daniel trying to start a relationship so soon after ending his last one, especially with someone who got hit with a snowball and it triggered a fight or flight response.

He needed time to recover.

Daniel drank his soda sourly.

He wanted things to be easy, but they were never easy.

He was sure Mr. Miyagi had some saying or lesson about how it made life better, about the importance of it.

If anyone hadn't had an easy life it was Mr. Miyagi and complaining that what? He couldn't just spin Johnny, dip him and kiss him in front of everyone?

It just wouldn't seem like a big deal to Mr. Miyagi, who'd been to war, who'd fought people, who'd lost his wife and son.

Their struggles weren't even on the same level.

Everything that'd gone wrong in Daniel's life, a hellish semester that turned into whatever this was now, felt so small in comparison, and yet Mr. Miyagi still listened and took his concerns seriously, worried over every bruise seen or unseen.

He was feeling homesick he realized all of a sudden.

He wanted to see Mr. Miyagi.

He needed advice, even if he didn't know how to ask for it.

After lunch they headed to the thermal pools, there was a gift shop along the way and Daniel walked in with Johnny, looking around.

He found some swim trunks and again before Daniel could pull out his own wallet, distracted by the snow globes and the snowboards on the walls Johnny had paid and the tags were cut off and the bag was pushed into Daniel's hands.

So much for renting.

He'd have to tell his mother how fast Johnny was at paying.

He knew she'd rise to the challenge, it was like her favorite past time with her friends and his uncle, and she'd probably be upset to learn that Daniel hadn't paid for a single thing the whole trip because Johnny was too fast and when Johnny wasn't fast he was adamant because his mother gave him money specifically to pay for Daniel.

It seemed weird to Daniel that Mrs. Lawrence offered to pay for him.

Daniel had gotten the opinion when they met that she didn't like Daniel.

She knew everything, her eyes were too sharp and Daniel was pretty sure if she saw him now, saw how he touched her son, the way his fingers lingered she'd see straight through him.

He'd have to avoid her.

But his mother wouldn't allow it. His mother would make him invite her to dinner as a thank you and the thought of the glamorous Mrs. Lawrence in their apartment felt daunting. She'd see him under a microscope, see how he lived and would judge before Daniel even got to start building other floors on the foundation.

She had the ability to keep them apart.

Johnny told her everything.

He wondered, flushing in embarrassment if he told her that Daniel had scratched up his leg, if she knew he'd pushed him into the sand like a kid having a tantrum, if she knew that Daniel had kissed him, touched as much as Johnny would let him touch.

If she spoke openly, if she came over, would she tell his mother?

Oh he'd die.

She'd murder him.

Not because it was Johnny, though they hadn't talked about that, he was trying to think about how to tell her, but he didn't think she'd care, but because he'd gotten drunk and he hadn't been polite and sweet. He hadn't been good.

"You okay Daniel?" Bobby asked shutting his locker door.

Daniel blinked. "Uh, yeah."

He finished changing quickly, there were other people in the locker room for the thermal pools, kids chatting and laughing, it was busy.

He shoved his things in the locker, locked it and slipped the wrist coil with the key around his wrist, and followed Bobby who was waiting patiently out to the thermal pools.

It was like a regular pool but vast.

There were different sections, separated around a large enclosed space with a high ceiling and the echoing sound of people talking. There were men and women laying out on poolside chairs and Bobby waved to the group sitting at a table and Daniel followed him over.

"I know it looks like a pool," Bobby said. "But they pump it full of minerals and stuff, and it's hotter than a normal pool. So you gotta be careful. This isn't a pool for playing. You get too hot you get out, otherwise there's a chance you'll get overheated and faint. But there is a cooling pool." Bobby pointed out a sign that said Cold Pool. "So you dip between the different warming pools and then into the cold pool and then back and forth as much as you want. Should be good...uh...for your knee."

Daniel tried very hard to keep his eyes on Johnny's face.

Johnny was listening to Tommy who was sitting at the table. He glanced up as they approached and the blue eyes fell on Daniel.

Daniel swallowed hard, he could do this, he could focus, he could behave.

He took the proffered towel and glanced around.

Dutch had a nasty bruise on his torso he grinned at Daniel.

"Fell off my board," he laughed.

They were actually pretty beaten up as Daniel looked around.

"We usually come here on the second day, but usually first thing," Jimmy said stretching, his shoulder was bruised. "It's the only thing that gets us out of the lodge. It helps."

"Food usually also motivates," Tommy said clapping Jimmy on the shoulder and then heading off to the pools.

They headed to the water and sunk in with sighs.

Daniel followed watching as Johnny sat down.

It was like a vast jacuzzi and Daniel thought of Ali at the party making out with a college guy and shuddered.

He didn't want to get in.

He hugged his chest and looked around, then breathed deeply.

This wasn't the same.

He stepped down the little steps into the warm water. It felt like one of the fancy baths his mother sometimes made after his old soccer practices. Full of oils and bath salts, where the water was softer than normal, comforting his injuries. Though he was pretty sure bruises were supposed to be cold water or ice.

He sat somewhere in the only available space next, between Johnny and Bobby. It was like they had their own private one, just enough space for the six of them.

It was quiet.

It was weird.

They did this every year.

Probably hungover.

Johnny definitely hungover after his what was it? Expensive pink Cadillac that always knocked him on his ass?

"So, every year you drag Johnny here while he's hungover?" Daniel asked.

"He fought every time," Jimmy said, tilting his head back. "This is so much better than every other year. We'd try to wake him up and he'd swat at us. You don't try to wake up hungover Johnny. He wakes up in fight mode."

"He also whined every single time, didn't want to get out of bed, like a cat that sinks their claws into the bedding. Took at least two of us, every year to drag him out of his bed," Tommy said. "The other two who lost the game the night before would have to do it. Night one game meant who was going to get plastered, and it was always Johnny. Night two was whoever was stuck dealing with hungover Johnny."

"First-year was easier. He was scrawny. But after he had his growth spurt it was hell," Dutch said. "But after eating, and sitting in this pool he'd stop his bitching."

Daniel glanced at Johnny. He looked pissed.

Daniel could help but laugh, he wasn't going to start a fight here.

What Dutch had said was real. No matter how much they tormented him, if there were adults around Johnny didn't make a move.

Johnny's eyes pulled from where they were glaring daggers at his friends and to Daniel next to him.

"Sounds like you put up with a lot," he said teasing.

Bobby moved with a sigh on the other side of Daniel and Daniel glanced at him. "Well he's a mess, but our mess. We wouldn't put up with it if he wasn't our friend. If we didn't care."

He spoke fondly and Daniel watched some of the tension in Johnny dissipate. He calmed down a little.

"Disgusting," Dutch said but he was smiling.

The silence was more comfortable and Daniel relaxed. The tightness in his knee was fading a bit from the warmth. He leaned his head back and relaxed. After a while Johnny stood.

"I'm going to the cold pool," he said and stepped out of the water and walking away.

"He can only handle so much heat," Jimmy explained. "Has a low tolerance for it. Also burns easy."

Tommy laughed. "He's so fucking sensitive, like a flower."

It was a weird image but he liked the thought. The questions that had been slowly rumbling around were now burning.

It felt wrong to ask while Johnny wasn't there but also while he was.

But he wanted to know.

"Tommy said you all sleepover at Johnny's..."

"Yeah, so?" Dutch said stiffly.

"How often does he have nightmares?" Daniel asked.

Bobby sat forward studying Daniel's face. "Did he have nightmares?"

"Yeah. I think so. He just was all stiff and...not breathing right."

"We don't....or I haven't ever...noticed," Dutch said with a frown looking at the others. "When I spend the night he wakes up but..."

"Fuck," Bobby whispered, he turned bodily towards Daniel, "We didn't fucking notice. Like he's always awake. We spent the night recently and he woke up before we got up, was all dressed, and listening to his Walkman. He didn't sleep, he didn't go back to sleep. He's done that...several times. Always says it's because we're too loud."

"Says we snore, but I asked my aunt and uncle and I don't snore," Tommy said.

"They could just be being nice," Jimmy said.

"The girl I was seeing said I didn't snore either," Tommy said stiffly.

"It's probably because of Kreese," Dutch said with a frown. "I mean he might've always been...but now? That's all Kreese. It's gotta be."

Bobby put his face in his hands. "I don't know what to do to help him. It's fucking Kreese. That's a fucking huge wound. I keep thinking, maybe Johnny will just bounce back, he always bounces back. But now I'm wondering if he ever really does, or if it's just pretend."

"He keeps flinching. Johnny never used to flinch. He'd get that obnoxious look in his eye but wouldn't flinch," Tommy said.

"I keep forgetting, I keep touching him and he flinches and it's so not Johnny that it scares the shit out of me," Dutch said.

"I think I figured out where," Daniel said slowly. "I've been testing it." Their eyes were on him. He held his hand up to his shoulder, where a short-sleeved shirt sleeve would fall. "You can't touch him here. He'll flinch....and if you touch his neck, anywhere...just don't, I think it's worse."

"That makes sense. That's where Kreese had him," Jimmy said softly.

The air was tense, dangerous. The looks in the ex-cobra's eyes sent a shiver down Daniel's spine. It was like when they would corner him as a group when they'd laugh, that atmosphere right before they'd fight him. There wasn't the same dark delight in their faces though, that it was fun to fight, it was much harder, colder now.

"Kreese should pay," Dutch said coldly.

"We couldn't do anything last time."

"We didn't have a plan."

"He always said you hurt one of us you hurt all of us."

"Maybe we should show him everything he taught us?"

Daniel swallowed hard.

"I-I'm going to go to the cooling pool," he said.

He was panicking.

He knew it wasn't directed at him, but the rage, the feeding frenzy that was starting, he had to leave before it switched something on in him.

He stood shakily and made his way to the cold pool, towards Johnny who glanced up at him as he sunk into the refreshingly cold water by his side.

He breathed, he was safe, it wasn't him they were after.

Not this time.

The water was soothing, calming. Johnny stretched out in the cool pool, letting the water cover him and he breathed. He heard familiar footsteps and cracked an eye open as a pale Daniel came over. He sat up quickly.

"You okay?"

Daniel sunk down into the cold water next to him. "Yeah."

He didn't believe Daniel, but Johnny also sometimes lied about how he felt. Tried to make things seem less like a big deal.

"They mess with you?" Johnny asked starting to get up but Daniel grabbed his wrist.

"No. Just, got too hot," Daniel said.

Johnny frowned. When he got too hot he turned pink all over.

He'd never seen someone turn pale.

But he settled back into the pool.

Daniel shut his eyes and breathed, he sat close, his fingertips brushing against Johnny's.

Johnny didn't want to go home.

He was glad he wasn't hungover.

Glad he'd be able to enjoy small moments like this, even if they meant nothing.

They dried off, ate dinner at the resort, and then made their way back to the lodge.

Everyone cleaned up.

Trash was thrown in the dumpster, all the soda and beer that wasn't consumed was repacked up in the cooler along with the leftover desserts.

The guys ran around repacking the explosions of their room and Daniel and Johnny just sat on the couch together, their stuff already packed and in the van.

Johnny was smirking, the guys were complaining.

Daniel kept yawning and Johnny wondered how much sleep he got.

If he had like a kid's bedtime and all the excitement and keeping him up late just drained him.

It was dark when they finally left to head home in the van and the guys talked in their warm murmur of conversation.

Trying to plan out their next outing.

Daniel's head kept lowering and he'd snap it back up when he realized he was drifting off.

He looked startled but then his eyes would shut and his head would lower again.

His head bumped against Johnny's shoulder, but then after a moment, he sat up again.

When they got out of the mountains Daniel moved, closer, and closer, and down.

Johnny sat stiffly unsure what was happening until the weight of Daniel's head made its way onto Johnny's lap. He didn't say anything but curled his arm around Johnny's leg, his own legs curled up on the rest of the bench, and promptly fell asleep.

Dutch met Johnny's eyes on a rearview mirror. Then at a red light he looked back and broke out into a big grin, smiling and humming the rest of the drive, fingers tapping at the steering wheel along with the soft old music he was playing on the radio.

They stopped too suddenly as they got back into the outskirts of the city.

Dutch cursed softly.

Johnny's hand went to Daniel, holding him carefully, so he wouldn't slide.

He hesitated, to pull his hand away, but Daniel didn't wake up, he didn't move.

It might happen again, so he left his hand where it was.

He looked out the window at the roads, the streetlights, and the start of the familiar city.

He was going to miss this.

He knew they had more stuff planned, more outings, more things, but there weren't going to be a lot of sleepovers and he was going to miss having Daniel next to him.

When the school year came to an end this, like everything else would probably also end.

Daniel might go off to college, might move somewhere new with his mother, might return to Newark, might go on some adventure with Mr. Miyagi, and leave Johnny in California, like everyone else was going to.

He'd just be a memory, a boy once an enemy turned friend.

A boy who liked him but would never tell him.

They pulled up in front of the South Seas Apartment complex and Johnny blinked, surprised.

Dutch had a good memory.

He gently shook Daniel's shoulder.

"Daniel, you're home," Johnny said softly, aware of how quiet the van was.

Daniel grumbled a little but pushed himself up, all his weight on his hands, pressure on Johnny's thighs, blinking and looking around, staring blearily at Johnny.

"Huh?"

"Home," Johnny said again.

Daniel sat the rest of the way up rubbing his eyes and getting his feet off the rest of the seat. He headed slowly towards the front and out the open door Bobby had opened.

"Make sure he gets in okay," Tommy said turning back to look at Johnny.

Johnny unbuckled his seatbelt and followed.

Daniel was standing on the sidewalk stretching and yawning.

Johnny opened the trunk, got Daniel's bag, Mrs. LaRusso's lasagna pan, and shut it again, returning to Daniel.

"Through the gate Daniel, you can't sleep out here," Johnny said softly.

He shifting the bag on his shoulder and gently pressed on Daniel's back, herding him through the gate and up the stairs.

Johnny knocked on room twenty and Daniel leaned back against him while they waited.

"See you at school tomorrow. Get some sleep," Johnny said softly as he heard the footsteps approach.

"Mmm," Daniel said, he was barely awake.

They'd worn him out even though it wasn't as intense a retreat as it normally was.

The door opened and Mrs. LaRusso looked out, warm light spilling out into the dark hallway.

She took in Daniel who yawned, his whole body stretching as he did so, and Johnny.

Johnny gently nudged Daniel who took the movement to start walking into his apartment. He automatically kissed his mother's cheek and disappeared into the back of the apartment, into his room.

"I think he had fun," Johnny said setting the bag on the ground on the inside of the apartment but not coming in. He handed the pan to Mrs. LaRusso. "It was delicious. Thank you."

"I'm glad you liked it. You'll have to come by for dinner sometime. I'll make something else for you."

Johnny smiled softly. "I'd like that. Have a good evening Mrs. LaRusso."

"Thank you Johnny, you too."

Johnny waved and hurried down the steps and back past the pool and through the gate to the van.

He slumped into the back.

"So, did you get a goodnight's kiss?" Tommy asked.

Johnny kicked the back of his seat. "No, and shut up."

"Any progress?" Jimmy called from the front.

"We're friends," Johnny said softly, warmly.

"Friends," Dutch said. "Seriously?"

"I'm happy with it," Johnny said. "It's better than Daniel hating me or being scared of me. Even if it was deserved."

Bobby turned in his seat looking at Johnny in the dim light. "Seriously? He kept touching you. And you're going to stick with friends?"

"It's how he is," Johnny said with a frown. "Clingy."

"To you!" Dutch said.

"Well, you are all still a little intimidating. I'm like a couple of steps above you all," Johnny said a little smugly.

"You better be a couple of damn steps above the rest of us, the rest of us don't want to fuck him," Dutch said. "Be pretty pathetic if you were lower than us."

"I didn't say I wanted-"

"Make love to him, whatever makes you feel better," Dutch said rolling his eyes and pulling away from the curb. "Dude, either he likes you or he's the clingiest mother fucker I've ever seen. Like hell, I like the kid, he's easy to please, easy to talk with, can cook and kick-ass, but if he laid his head on my lap like that I'd be expecting a fucking blow job, not some peaceful nap. If this is fucking friendship then Johnny you're in hell and I'm so fucking sorry."

"I think you gotta make a move," Jimmy said. "Test the waters."

"I'm not going to make a move," Johnny said.

"Why the hell not?"

"I don't even know if he is over Ali."

"So?"

"You saw how I was when she dumped me? I was not in a good space to have a relationship. And even if Daniel has forgiven me for all my shit...I doubt he'd immediately be ready to date me even if they mutually broke up."

Dutch groaned. "I'm giving you till prom."

"What does that mean?"

"Test the waters, and if he's still fucking clingy and full of lingering touches and you're still being a wimp then I'm going to point-blank ask him if he likes you enough to touch dicks or whatever with you at prom."

"You can't rush stuff like this," Bobby said softly. "There's too much history, there's..."

"Shut up Bobby," Dutch said. "Maybe I don't get it, but it looks like he likes you and we know you like him. And I sure as hell am not going to sit here and watch you two shyly looking at each other like some stupid regency-era romance until we graduate because you're chickenshit."

Johnny sighed, Dutch made it sound so easy.

But it was the way Dutch was, and this was him trying, showing he cared.

It was better than anything Johnny ever could have hoped for from Dutch. He'd been so sure that if Dutch ever found out he'd just never talk to him, would walk the other way and their years of friendship would crumble.

He thought the other guys would go with him.

That it'd just be him and Bobby.

If it was anyone other than Daniel then Johnny would understand.

He agreed with Dutch half the time when they were out and one of the guys talked about a girl he liked.The "oh for the love of god, just go talk to her, I'm tired of listening to you torture yourself. Just find out."

He'd said it too. Had pushed Jimmy or Tommy or Bobby to go make a move, strike first.

Dutch was doing the same thing. As if this was any other relationship, any of the other guys. Treating him like normal.

When they parked in front of his home he patted Dutch on the shoulder.

"Thanks man," he said before hopping out and grabbing his stuff. Dutch leaned out of the window.

"You need anything..." he said. "If shit gets..."

Johnny knew what he meant, that unspoken thing they all knew. He knew the hesitation Dutch had to leave him here. The concern.

"I know," Johnny said waving to them and heading through the gates up to home.

There were some things Johnny had become that childhood him would be disappointed in.

Beating up Daniel was the big one.

His younger self would never understand that. Would never forgive him for that.

But having friends, his younger self would've clung onto that, that someday he'd walk into a karate dojo and make four friends who would have his back no matter what. Even on things he never would've thought they would've. Things he would've thought they'd leave him over.

If he could go back, he'd give himself a hug, and tell himself,

"You'll grow up, big and strong, able to defend yourself and you'll make friends. You'll finally move to a school where you'll have people who'll have your back and they won't leave. You'll do shit to try and shake them off. You'll be annoying. You'll get pissy. You'll have them buy you the stupidest pink expensive drink in a joint and you'll get yourself so drunk you can't stand and they won't leave. They'll take your temper, they'll hold you up when you sway on your feet, they'll stick with you. And one day, without meaning to you'll tell them you also sometimes like guys and they won't leave.

"They won't abandon you.

"And even if you don't ever take them up on it, they'll offer, in quiet moments for you to come stay with them. They'll give you places to run and hide when things get too bad, and just knowing that that's an option will get you through so much.

"And you'll survive.

"You'll make it.

"So just hang in there.

"Because one day you'll beat the shit out of a boy, and he'll fight you back, all fury and desperation and like an absolute idiot strung along by fate, you'll find yourself in love with him and those friends will cheer you on as you struggle with it.

"And it's enough. Enough to get you through to wherever the road ends."

He got to his car, looking at the time wondering if it was too late to go to Mr. Miyagi's and get his bonsai. It wasn't ten yet. So he set his bag in the back and drove off.

He'd missed driving.

He'd missed the Avanti.

He'd missed the warm air on his skin instead of the cold bite of the winter air.

It had been fun, it'd been worth it, but there was something about coming home after a long trip, of traveling the roads he always traveled, that he knew so well and taking in the familiar sounds and smells.

He didn't understand why Daniel talked about Newark all the time when this, when California was so nice, when the Valley had everything you needed.

But then he'd come home and remember what it was like for everything to be familiar and he thought he understood it.

He wondered what it'd be like to see Daniel's old stomping grounds, to walk with him around New York City.

Johnny had looked Newark up on a map, thinking it was some tiny town in New Jersey but it was across the river from New York City, practically was New York City in Johnny's mind.

He wondered what it was like to grow up so close to the Statue of Liberty, to wander around Times Square, to eat at bodegas and go ice skating in Central Park.

Johnny wanted to go.

He wanted to ask Daniel to take him to New Jersey, show him around, wanted to see what it was like to sit around with the LaRusso's, all chatterboxes, and see how Daniel fit in amongst them.

To see where he grew up, his favorite places to eat, all the stuff he always talked about.

He wanted to go, and he wanted to hold Daniel's hand, and he wanted to ride on one of the rides he'd mentioned was at Coney Island, together.

Johnny shook his head.

He hoped the older man was still awake.

He remembered that Sid's parents used to go to bed before 8, ate their dinners at 4 pm.

Mr. Miyagi seemed old but not nearly as old as them.

He also hoped he hadn't left the man waiting too long, hoped he wasn't waiting up, holding the bonsai because Johnny had promised he come and get it.

The lights were on at Mr. Miyagi's and his head popped out when he heard the crunch of the Avanti's wheels on the dirt.

Johnny felt relieved.

Hopping out of the car in a hurry to meet him.

"Sorry, I'm so late Mr. Miyagi. Thank you for waiting."

"Johnny-san have good trip?"

"Yes," Johnny said. "It was nice."

Mr. Miyagi smiled then waved his hand. "Come in. Miyagi's friends send gift. Maybe Johnny-san help Miyagi."

Johnny nodded, following Mr. Miyagi in. Sitting on at the table in the dining room was a pile of round objects that looked like they were dusted in powder. Mr. Miyagi sat down and Johnny sat down across from him.

"Friends send new years gift, it came late, but still very good," Mr. Miyagi said pouring Johnny some tea. "Eat."

Johnny picked up one of the balls off the table and it squished softly between his fingers, the outside was softer than he expected but there was a weight to it. He took a bite, the center was dark, it was sweet but not too sweet.

Mr. Miyagi popped one in his mouth and smiled. "Miyagi's friends make many, and send to friends to share with family, always send Miyagi too many."

"Can you freeze them?" Johnny asked.

Miyagi nodded. "Always do."

"What are they?" Johnny asked.

"Mochi."

"Mochi," Johnny said finishing his. "I am sure Daniel will help you eat these."

Mr. Miyagi laughed. "I am very sure Daniel-san will help."

Johnny smiled, understanding the laugh. Every time Johnny visited Mr. Miyagi Daniel was eating something, digging around in his fridge like it was his own home. Mr. Miyagi seemed to enjoy it, the familiarity of having Daniel around.

They sat in companionable silence for a while and Johnny ate a few more and drank the tea Mr. Miyagi made him. "Do you need help with anything Mr. Miyagi?"

Mr. Miyagi smiled and shook his head. "Not right now."

Johnny glanced at the clock, he should go soon.

He didn't want to leave.

He didn't want to go home.

"Something wrong?"

Johnny looked at Mr. Miyagi, surprised but also not surprised. "No. Just the usual end of vacation blues."

Mr. Miyagi nodded. "Understandable. Tomorrow school?"

"Yes."

Mr. Miyagi set down his tea and looked at Johnny with a steady gaze. "Johnny-san do Miyagi favor?"

"Of course."

"Keep eye on Daniel-san?"

Johnny opened his mouth but Mr. Miyagi held up his hand.

"Daniel-san come to California unhappy. Make only two friends. Ali-san and Miyagi." Mr. Miyagi held up two fingers then dropped one. "Now Daniel-san only have Miyagi. Miyagi not teenager. No school. Daniel-san now alone. Johnny-san make sure Daniel-san enjoy end of high school. Very important. Making amends but also good for here." Mr. Miyagi said tapping at his chest. "Friendship very important. Good for Daniel-san, good for Johnny-san."

Johnny looked down at his tea and frowned. "Mr. Miyagi, my friends and I, we're not being altruistic, inviting Daniel along is for really selfish reasons."

"To clear conscious? Results the same. Johnny-san likes Daniel-san yes?"

Johnny looked up startled feeling his ears burn, wondering if Mr. Miyagi saw through him. He swallowed hard and nodded.

"Miyagi meet Daniel-san early, know of interest in karate but not teach Daniel-san. One night, Daniel-san come home upset. Yelling with mother, throw bike in trash, almost in tears, outside Miyagi's shop. Miyagi worry. Bike not problem, fix bike easy, think nothing of it. Then one day Daniel-san take Miyagi to Johnny-san's dojo and Miyagi almost laugh. Johnny-san, what is cobra's natural enemy?"

"A mongoose," Johnny said softly, remembering the night they sent Daniel down the ravine with a shudder.

"Miyagi think, why these boys fight so much? Why seem so hard to stop? Then Miyagi walk into cobra dojo with Daniel-san and understand. See how teacher teach. Hear his lessons. Teaching cobras. Remember Daniel-san's bike. Remember fixing bike. Johnny-san know what type of bike Daniel-san bring all the way from Newark?"

Johnny shook his head.

Mr. Miyagi leaned forward.

"Daniel-san's bike a Mongoose. Feel like fate. Mongoose cannot stop fighting cobra, cobra cannot stop fighting mongoose. Cycle only end when one steps out. When one learns. Johnny-san stepped out. End cycle."

"I didn't beat up Daniel because his bike was a Mongoose and I was a cobra," Johnny said. "I didn't have any fated reason or any good reason to start fights with him. I thought I was entitled to a specific life and he disrupted it. He kept making me angry and none of it is a good excuse, there is no good reason. It's awful no matter what."

Mr. Miyagi nodded. "Johnny-san growing, learning, taking responsibility. So, do Miyagi favor, take responsibility for Daniel-san."

Johnny blinked at Mr. Miyagi. "I-I don't know what else I can be doing."

"See something to do, do it. Keep Daniel-san out of trouble. Be friend, yes?"

"Mr. Miyagi, Daniel is..."

Johnny looked back down at his tea.

He knew if someone asked one of his old bullies to be his friend, he'd be furious and betrayed.

He knew Mr. Miyagi was trying to be kind, trying to help and they were friends, now anyway.

"he's very kind. He's chatty, he can be annoying, but he's observant and keeps an eye on me. He won't let me run off on my own and even though everyone tells me to protect him, he'll still chase after me and make sure I'm okay. You trained him well in karate and he did amazing. I know tournaments aren't really your thing, right? Peaceful karate for defense is sort of what yours is, so a tournament isn't really a place you'd send a student unless you had to.

"Which you did, but Daniel did amazing. I've won the All-Valley twice, I've won other tournaments. I had the home-field advantage, and he was hurt, and he practically flew Mr. Miyagi. I don't think he actually needs me to defend him. He can defend himself fairly well. But he does talk a lot and sometimes it rubs people the wrong way. I know this first hand, but I've also listened to him. A lot. All about Newark and what he thinks of the cafeteria food and cars and anything he rambles on about, and I don't know, I find it kind of peaceful to listen to him talk. I've gotten to know him, and while I don't really feel like I've redeemed myself or fulfilled my responsibilities to Daniel I don't think I've earned his friendship either, but that's not for me to say.

"It's up to Daniel and he moved us there. To friendship and I...friends mean a great deal to me Mr. Miyagi. I...didn't have any for a long time so the ones I do have, even though together we make mistakes and act stupid and get into fights and cause trouble, they're still there for me when I need it. When no one else is. And I do my best by them. Daniel is...important to me, I never would've realized I was on the wrong path if he hadn't come here. I was too stupid. Too entrenched. Too full of myself. Too lost. I probably would've stayed at that dojo with Kreese if he hadn't...if you hadn't..."

Johnny struggled, looking down at the tea. He took a deep breath. "

What I mean to say is you don't need to ask me to be Daniel's friend or to keep an eye on him. He's already honored me with that title," Johnny smiled softly. "So I will do everything I can to be someone worthy of it."

Mr. Miyagi nodded, then stood and walked away then came back with a small box that he set in front of Johnny.

Johnny looked at it.

It was clear on top and full to the brim with mochi.

He looked up at Mr. Miyagi who was holding the bonsai in his arms.

"Like Miyagi say, send too many. Take home."

"Thank you Mr. Miyagi." Johnny said standing and taking the bonsai and the box of mochi.

"No," Mr. Miyagi said shaking his head, "Thank you Johnny-san."

Chapter End Notes

> His bike is a mongoose. And Johnny is a cobra in the movies. Natural enemies. Like dang, the things I never noticed. To be fair though I never ever would've caught that because I know nothing about bikes or that there even was a brand called a mongoose.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

His mother had waited a long time, had been very patient, but she'd reached the end of her rope and it took a while for Daniel to realize it. The LaRusso's were social. They were used to large gatherings in tiny homes, crammed around busy tables, talking away, balancing several conversations at once, so loud the neighbors complained.

Not having that, being away from everyone they had always known, everyone they loved, was like the ghost they still couldn't talk about without getting teary-eyed.

It left a hole in their hearts that ate away.

"How was the trip?" Lucielle asked when Daniel came out of his room Monday morning.

"Great," Daniel said bursting with tales about the snow, about the snow sculptures, the snowmobiles, the fascinating woman he'd met, and the thermal pools.

"When's your next trip?" Lucille asked quickly when he took a breath.

Her words were careful and her eyes watched him like a hawk as he ate his breakfast.

"I don't know," Daniel said uneasily.

The ex-cobra's promised fun for the rest of the semester, but he doubted it would actually be every weekend.

It seemed impossible to have 24 unique adventures lined up.

They had their own lives and family matters to attend to.

"You'll find out for me, won't you? Especially what Johnny is up to, find a weekend, a Saturday he's free."

Daniel nearly poured orange juice into his eggs, staring at his mother.

"Ma?"

She gave him a stern look. "I'm going to cook that boy something nice. Find out if his mother's free too. We can even invite Mr. Miyagi."

Daniel felt his stomach flop.

There were things he was avoiding. He'd nearly brought up how he felt to his mother several times now but kept chickening out.

He didn't think she'd particularly care, but now it'd feel more like a date, a get to know the parent's date, which was way too much pressure. But he hadn't told her.

Unless he said something in his sleep. But he didn't talk in his sleep. She used to joke that it was the only time she got any peace and quiet.

"Why?" it came out whinier than he meant it.

She hadn't pressed with Ali. She seemed pretty okay with just picking her up for their first date and chauffeuring them around, or meeting up to go out to dinner. She had that look in her eyes. The mother look. That I'm not going to budge about this air was about her.

"I wanna cook and I got questions," she said with a shrug, like it was the most common reason to invite not only his ex-rival, but his mother and his own sensei into their tiny apartment.

"I don't know..."

He couldn't think of any good excuses.

There was no exit strategy.

He prayed the guys had adventures set up for every weekend until they graduated.

That Johnny and his mother weren't free.

Not because he was embarrassed of his home, not anymore. He liked it, compared to the mansion Johnny lived in.

But because his mother had that look in her eyes, that desire to take someone apart in conversation while smiling and loading more pasta on their plate.

It was a trap. Daniel didn't know how much he could hide under that microscopic gaze. Not with Johnny there, not with Mr. Miyagi, and especially not with Mrs. Lawrence who Daniel already was on bad footing with.

"That's why you ask Daniel."

It was the end of the conversation. She'd hear no argument, no plea. His only hope was that they all had plans. Excuses, something.

He wished her a good day and headed to school.

He wondered if he should just tell her. Ma, I think I like Johnny. More than a friend, and more I think than I liked Ali.

But it seemed pointless. Why tell her that when he kept hesitating to see how Johnny felt?

Why open the can of worms when there wasn't a relationship happening or on the horizon?

They just made it onto the step entitled friendship and Daniel wasn't even sure if Johnny would climb up to the next step with him. He'd just sit on that step looking down at Johnny wondering why he wasn't up there with him, wishing he'd take his offered hand, or figure it out himself.

If Mr. Miyagi was going to give him relationship advice pertaining to Johnny he was pretty sure it'd be something along the lines of Johnny-san needs to heal heart first before giving it to Daniel-san.

And then Daniel would protest he'd take good care of it.

He didn't always break stuff. Just his bike, which wasn't his fault, his car which also wasn't his fault, and the brickwork of the Mill's house which Mr. and Mrs. Mills said was already loose so it couldn't really all be Daniel's fault.

He didn't want to ask.

He didn't think he was ready.

But he knew to his mother it was nothing, not a big deal, but also so very dearly important to her.

He rubbed his face after he parked in the school lot and groaned.

He'd have to ask. He'd have to find a moment alone with Johnny so it didn't seem weird. But Johnny was popular again. Flocked by girls, swarms of them, and they wouldn't budge for Daniel.

He was pretty sure if he tried to get around them or past them they'd elbow him in the stomach.

He spotted the Avanti in the parking lot, took a deep breath, and headed in.

Johnny was alone at his locker.

He glanced around.

There were girls, but they hadn't flocked to him. They were going about their business like normal.

He didn't see the ex-cobras either, he hurried to Johnny's locker. He leaned against the one next to it, not thinking, thinking would trip him up. He'd just do what he normally did, what he used to do, when he'd talk to Ali at her locker.

"When's a Saturday you're free?" Daniel asked quickly.

Johnny looked a little startled to see him. Blue eyes widening ever so slightly. His ears were red again, just a light blush of his cheeks. He'd probably scared him. Coming up so suddenly.

He grinned trying to seem as nonchalant as possible.

"Ma wants to invite you and your mother to dinner. She likes to cook. Like a lot. And she likes hosting and, well...it's been too long. She'd really appreciate it. Said she'd make you dinner and your mother and Miyagi. Some Saturday when you're free."

Johnny seemed to still be a little shocked, his folder was upside down and homework was starting to slide out.

Daniel leaned forward catching the falling papers, taking the folder from Johnny's hand, fixing it, and pressing it to Johnny's chest.

"Think about it, let me know okay?" Daniel said tapping a knuckle on the folder and walking off.

Daniel opened his own locker and let out a breath.

His duty to his mother was done and over with and it wasn't that bad and he was fine, it'd gone okay, oh god what sort of weirdo invites someone to a dinner with both their mothers and sensei? What sort of weird mom puts their kid up to it? Did his mother hate him? Was it some sort of revenge for complaining the whole way to California? An awkward dinner with his mother, Johnny's mother, and Mr. Miyagi. Like some weird parent-teacher conference all gone wrong.

Maybe Johnny wouldn't be free. Maybe he'd have things to do. Maybe his mother wouldn't be free.

Daniel had a sinking feeling that if Johnny's mother wasn't free she'd still expect Daniel to drag Johnny over at some point.

It was because he hadn't bought Johnny lunch yet, wasn't it? Well, it wasn't his fault Johnny was so fast to pay. He always forgot and the next thing Daniel knew he'd missed his opportunity.

At lunch, Tommy said, "Because it was a full weekend trip last weekend I've got family stuff, most of us do I think, but we're thinking of all going to the movies Sunday night if you want to join us, Daniel."

"Thank you, I'll uh think about it," Daniel said.

Daniel looked at Johnny, heart sinking.

It'd be this weekend.

There'd be no prep.

He'd have to scrub the whole apartment. His mother would ask why he was scrubbing the apartment, but she'd also never met Johnny's glamourous mother.

Johnny's mother might be in his apartment with Johnny on Saturday. Mr. Miyagi might be there.

He'd have to hide the photo albums. Bury them. Maybe he could run them down to Mr. Miyagi's workshop and hide them there. His mother would never look in the workshop.

"You going to be okay on your own Johnny?" Jimmy asked.

Johnny was playing with his mashed potatoes on his plate. He didn't lookup.

"I might have plans on Saturday. I have to talk to my mother."

Oh fuck. That was his invite. That was him. Johnny's plans were with Daniel. This was happening. His mother would be over the moon.

Daniel was going to die of embarrassment. He'd have to make a list of things they couldn't talk about.

No talking about baby Daniel and giving him baths.

Those pictures were disappearing.

He didn't understand why mothers took those photos.

They were not going to talk about camp or the time when Daniel was little and got sick after eating too many corn dogs before going on one of the rides at Coney Island and then after he was sick he'd started crying because he was hungry and wanted a corn dog again.

Oh god, this was going to be his worst nightmare.

He loved his mother. Very much.

They were going to do this and she would understand the sacrifice he was making.

Because the coolest kid in school was coming to his apartment and was going to sit at his table and he was going to freak out and lunch was over, all the guys were gone but Johnny was standing.

"I'll let you know tomorrow okay?"

"Thanks," Daniel said, practically a squeak.

Before Daniel knew it everything was snowballing.

The Lawrence's were free to attend according to Johnny.

Just the two.

It went unsaid between all parties that Sid wasn't invited.

Mr. Miyagi also said he'd come and his mother was over the moon, flipping through her old family recipes delighted, singing.

It was happening.

And she was keeping a close eye on him out of the corner of her eyes. He tried to sneak the photo albums out but she caught him, without even looking up. Just a click of her tongue and "Put it back Daniel."

So he cleaned.

She couldn't really complain about his cleaning as long as he avoided the kitchen. Scrubbing everything until it shone.

He set the bonsai's out.

Debated about moving his trophy which his mother demanded should be out somewhere they could enjoy it after he'd won.

Daniel didn't know if it was a bad idea to leave it out.

Mrs. Lawrence believed it wasn't rightfully Daniel's and that would easily spark a fight between the two women.

He swallowed his panic and vacuumed the couches.

If it'd just been Johnny it'd have been fine. Johnny and his mother got along. He thought they did anyway. They both liked having him around. Wanted to have him over for dinner multiple times a week.

But he knew how his mother got at dinner parties. He knew how quickly the photo albums came out. How she gushed. How she raised the hackles of other mothers who also thought their children were the brightest stars in the skies and it was embarrassing.

And Mrs. Lawrence didn't seem to like Daniel.

They were going to fight, and then...then what?

The Mills hadn't liked Daniel and that had just been for fun, dating Ali had just been something to do. Oh, that was mean.

Daniel frowned, pausing in his vacuuming.

Dating Ali had been fun, but it hadn't been serious.

Which meant, the panic bubbling up, that this was more serious.

That he cared more about what Johnny's mother thought of him. He wanted her to like him. Needed it. Needed a stamp of approval from her.

He'd seen parents who didn't approve of their in-laws. And the fights that broke up. Happened all the time. It was a constant conversation between the adults at all the dinners his mother hosted. One of the top complaints along with job complaints.

Johnny loved his mother. Clearly told her everything, that or she was the scariest mother he'd ever met who knew things her son didn't tell her.

Maybe she had spies everywhere who watched him. She was rich. She could afford it.

Daniel shuddered.

No, Johnny spoke gently with love about his mother. He told her things. Cared about her and loved her. Her opinion mattered.

Daniel needed her to like him. Or at least show that they could get there. Away from whatever awkwardness it had been, because if Johnny's mother hated him he'd have no chance. It'd be dead in the water before it even got off the ground.

On Friday Johnny asked him, "What does your mother drink?"

"Drink?" Daniel asked.

"Like alcohol? Or I guess tea or coffee."

"Wine, she likes red wines. And uh coffee."

Johnny nodded. "I'll see you at 6 o'clock on Saturday." Then he walked away.

Daniel thought maybe his mother had the right idea. Johnny was coming to his house. Not to pick him up or drop him off but to sit in the chairs around their table, the way he sat on the floor at Mr. Miyagi's.

He'd be close.

He'd get to see what a real nice Italian dinner was like. Not the fake stuff. The home-cooked mother's food. The stuff Daniel knew how to make. And Daniel could make it for Johnny.

Then he remembered his mother was coming as well and Mr. Miyagi and it felt like too many people.

What if it was disappointing? What if his mother put all this work in and Mrs. Lawrence wouldn't eat it because it wasn't fancy?

Saturday Daniel thought he'd go mad.

He practiced his breathing. But he kept watching the clock. Kept hovering over his mother until she smacked his hand and told him to go away.

His palms were sweaty.

He'd changed five times.

His mother told him he looked nice in each of them, in the same tone that told him he didn't. She told him to just pick something and he argued back that he'd done this for her the night before when she came out while he was watching TV, trying to pick something nice to wear for the dinner.

She laughed. She put on music while she cooked. She was going above and beyond. Making pasta and sauces from scratch. It was soothing he knew. He'd done it. There was something peaceful about it. Satisfying. It took forever. But he got it.

He messed with his hair. He studied the living room. The kitchen. Wandered around their apartment picking things up and moving them. Then put them back where they'd been.

Mr. Miyagi arrived first. Early. He brought mochi, offered to help. His mother refused the help in that polite way and Daniel talked and talked and talked, too nervous for there to be any point to it, not knowing where he was going with his stories. Grateful that Mr. Miyagi was there. A familiar and warm face.

His mother finished all her prep and dipped into her room to change and set out the antipasto.

The knock on the door came exactly at 6 o'clock.

I could set my clock to him. Ali said in his head and Daniel rushed to the door opening it before his mother could.

Johnny stood on his doorstep, a light green button-up that made his eyes a more impossibly blue, and pale slacks. He looked like he'd stepped off the country club. Next to him was his mother, elegant in a silk-looking blue dress that came off the shoulders. She looked like she'd stepped out of one of his mother's fashion magazines. She had her arm through Johnny's and took off her sunglasses and smiled.

"Good evening Daniel," she said.

"Good evening Mrs. Lawrence," Daniel said stepping out of the way in a hurry.

He felt like a mouse. A mouse who'd just let a cat into his house. She was going to crush his dreams.

He watched her look around as Johnny seemed to wait. When her appraisal seemed to be over he walked with her to Mr. Miyagi and introduced the two. Mr. Miyagi stood and bowed and Daniel saw her bow back, her lips pulled into a warm smile. Then to his mother who had stood as well.

Mrs. Lawrence was still all warm soft smiles, taking his mother's hand in hers and shook it, complimenting the apartment.

She pulled a bag out of her purse and gave it to his mother. His mother looked in and gasped.

There was a sparkle of delight in Mrs. Lawrence's eyes.

"I asked around, I hope they're good. Tried to find the best Italian wines in the Valley."

"Oh, these are great. Thank you! Shall I pop one open? Oh! Mr. Miyagi would you like some wine?" his mother asked.

Mr. Miyagi looked thoughtful for a moment.

"Hai," he said with a nod.

"I'll pour," Daniel offered.

He needed something to do.

He felt like he was drowning.

The smells of the house reminded him of Newark, of home and he wanted to hug Johnny the way he hugged everyone who used to walk through the door at home. But he kept his hands to himself and walked to the kitchen.

He took out three wine glasses and set them on the counter and carefully took the wine bottles from Mrs. Lawrence. He'd never felt like he'd been under such an intense microscope before. She was watching him. Every move he made.

He swallowed. He found the corkscrew and opened the bottles.

His mother was asking Johnny about school.

Daniel had watched his family pour wine before. Heck, he'd poured wine before. His grandparents showed him the proper way. The correct amount. Even though he had a great aunt who argued with them about it, said what was the point of the glass being so big if you didn't fill it to the brim? And he spent most of his life agreeing with her. Until he tried one summer with Louie to drink a glass full and got sick, turning everything purply red.

He tried to stand tall. This was his house, home turf. Wine, pasta, Italian stuff was in his DNA. He couldn't fuck up. His family would disown him.

He gently passed a wine glass to Mrs. Lawrence and he thought he got a glint of approval, a small motion, and his heart soared. He walked the other to Mr. Miyagi who thanked him and watched as his mother clinked her glass gently against Mrs. Lawrence's, and Mr. Miyagi's with a warm "Saluti" and took a sip.

Daniel turned to Johnny.

"What can I get you?"

Johnny was looking at the books his mother had brought with her from Newark, looking at the titles, as the photos on the wall, and he turned.

"Oh, I brought that soda you liked. Jimmy gave me some. Damn, I forgot it in the trunk. I'll be right back," he said and then hurried to the door.

Daniel wanted to stop him. He didn't have to leave. The sodas could wait.

He just got there.

Daniel was just adjusting to how nice he looked in his home. How easy he made it look. Like he belonged.

He looked at ease in a way Ali never did in his mother's car. Her shoulders just a little too stiff, her laugh a little on edge.

But then he was gone out the door and down the steps. Daniel could hear his feet on those steps and he curled his fingers into his palm.

It was thoughtful, it was sweet. It made his heart ache.

Daniel made his way to the kitchen and poured glasses of water.

He heard the footsteps of Johnny return as he put the water at each spot. His mother was talking about their trip from Newark, her job. Mrs. Lawrence was listening. Mr. Miyagi was listening. He moved to the door. He could hear Johnny shifting at their doorstep and opened it.

He smiled warmly at Johnny who had two cases of already sweating soda bottles in his hands. He shifted them in his arms and passed one to Daniel and Daniel held it to his chest as he shut the door while Johnny put the rest in their fridge, next to their milk and juice, eggs, and all the other things Johnny had never seen before. Different then his own fridge in the mansion at home, different than the multiple fridges at Jimmy's house or probably at his other friend's homes.

Daniel ran his fingers through the condensation of his drink. It was the Italian drink. The one they'd had on their trip.

He'd remembered.

He twisted off the cap and took his seat between his mother and Mr. Miyagi. Johnny sat down between his own mother and Mr. Miyagi.

It looked right. So absolutely perfect. His mother was right. He'd forgotten how much he missed it. To have people they liked in their home. People they cared for at their table.

Mrs. Lawrence was talking about places nearby she liked. Giving his mother recommendations on places to eat at. Asking if they were still around. Her favorite sandwich shop, a restaurant that gave out day-old bread.

Johnny was studying the antipasto plater, trying the meat and cheese, popping an olive into his mouth, fingers lingering on his lips listening to his mother talk.

After a while Lucile stood up and got the gnocchi. Daniel smiled getting up to help her carry the dishes. They were set out in front of everyone and Daniel sat, watching the way his mother's eyes sparkled. Delighted.

He felt warm. He'd been awful. She'd move them far, and she'd lost as much as he had. Her whole family, her roots. He'd been a brat. She'd had so much hope in their move. She was probably keeping upbeat the whole way not just to try and win him over but for herself.

His eyes turned to Johnny watching him eat. He seemed to like it.

Mrs. Lawrence was full of compliments for his mother and he felt some of the tension leave. They were getting along.

He ate, it was a familiar recipe, but delicious. Everything she made was delicious.

They were prying conversation out of Mr. Miyagi now, asking him about karate, it was slow but they were working together and he seemed embarrassed by all the attention but indulged in talking about how he'd learned it from his father as his father had learned it from his. He talked about how his karate was for defense only. Both women nodded their approval. They liked this.

The gnocci finished, wine glasses refilled, Daniel helped his mother get the next dish pollo alla 'Ncip 'Nciap with salad and bread.

Johnny looked surprised and Daniel grinned.

"This is delightful Lucille," Mrs. Lawrence said.

She gently elbowed Johnny and smiled at him and he smiled back. There was a look that passed, a look Daniel didn't understand. She looked sad just for an instant and then it was gone.

Daniel got comfortable as they ate, he let his foot slide out and gently pressed it against Johnny's. They hadn't ever really eaten across from one another and he missed having Johnny beside him.

They were talking about classes and Daniel talked about how he was doing, while they ate. He compared California schools with New Jersey, laughing jokingly about feeling a little lost in a sea of tan blondes. His mother looked amused.

"Daniel's been doing rather well in his classes from what his teachers have told me. Which is such a relief. I worried so much last semester."

Daniel's head shot up. "Ma," he hissed.

Johnny had finished eating and he looked suddenly uncomfortable.

"Oh, I'm sure. Between moving and..." Mrs. Lawrence trailed off then her eyes got hard. "Johnny's actions, I'm sure it was very worrisome."

She'd said it.

The air felt cold.

Tense.

Everything he'd worried about was happening.

Mrs. Lawrence's eyes swept over Johnny. "Johnny dear, could you go pick up the other gift?"

Johnny looked at her, searching her eyes for a second before nodding, excusing himself, and quickly heading out the door. Mrs. Lawrence's head tilted slightly, listening to Johnny's retreating footsteps down the steps then.

Her eyes fell on Daniel's mother an eyebrow arched.

"You have something you want to say? Ask?"

Daniel's mother looked startled.

Surprised.

She fiddled with her napkin in her lap and then she sat forward. Daniel wanted to stop her. Didn't know what she was going to say, or ask but didn't want it to happen. Somethings couldn't ever be taken back and he wasn't sure his mother understood that sometimes.

"I worried about Daniel a lot, but he had Mr. Miyagi, a great teacher to watch his back and train him. But I saw Johnny after Kreese tried to kill him when he came to visit and apologize. Aren't you worried? Aren't you- I don't know what I'd do if someone did that to Daniel. Someone I trusted."

The ice melted ever so slightly and Daniel looked between the two of them.

Mr. Miyagi nodded. "Teacher should never harm student. Kreese very bad teacher."

Mrs. Lawrence smiled coldly, all ice. "Don't worry," she said, picking up her piece of bread and running it through the sauce on her plate with perfectly manicured nails. "He will never have any students ever again for as long as I live. I'm taking care of it."

Daniel looked at her in surprise.

"How?" his mother asked leaning forward, curious.

"By telling people the truth. Who wants to send their kids to a man who will attempt to kill them if they fail? I've talked to other parents. I've cornered Johnny's friends. I know all the awful training he put them through that he never told me about. I now understand how he broke his arm in some balancing exercise. I've also talked to the All-Valley Under 18 board. I took every story, every piece of evidence. He's banned. He can't be headteacher for his dojo in the tournament. There's some wiggle room that I can't figure out how to close, Cobra Kai has damn good lawyers. I don't know how, because Kreese doesn't seem to have the means." Her fingers were curled tightly around the wine glass stem. "But I will not allow him to be near students and will destroy anything he tries to do if I hear so much as a peep for as long as I live, for as long as I can. He will go nowhere near my Johnny ever again."

Daniel knew first hand how scary Johnny was when he was pissed, when he held a grudge. He saw now where he got it. But unlike with himself, with the misunderstandings with Johnny, he understood Mrs. Lawrence.

Still, he expected Mr. Miyagi to protest. To say something. To tell her to let it go. About how anger just eats someone up.

She turned suddenly to Mr. Miyagi and took his hands in hers, there were tears in her eyes.

"Thank you for saving him."

"Right thing to do. Johnny-san good boy, just misguided. Wrong Teacher."

Mrs. Lawrence laughed, a watery laugh, and brushed tears from her eyes. "Unlucky," she said softly.

She turned to look at Daniel and he felt trapped.

"I'm sorry he tormented you, hurt you. That boy you met, is not the boy I raised. And I appreciate you letting him apologize, letting him try to make amends."

She fanned at her face, trying to stop more tears from falling. "I told myself I wasn't going to cry at this dinner." She laughed another watery laugh. "Thank you Lucille for inviting us. I wanted to talk to you too. I wanted to meet Mr. Miyagi. It's been so hard, but I'm so relieved you're doing okay. That you're all doing okay."

Daniel didn't know what she meant but his mother reached out and took her hand in both of hers and smiled. "You're doing your best."

"My best would be not crying so I don't worry Johnny when he gets back," she said picking up her napkin and sniffing and dabbing. "You'll let me know if I failed and look like a raccoon right?"

Daniel's mother laughed. "Of course."

"Did you have anything else you wanted to say? Questions?"

"Just that Johnny is proving himself very reliable. Quite the gentleman."

"That's a relief. To be fair, I'm not surprised he had a streak of anger that hurt someone, hurt Daniel. He buries so much. I know Kreese fanned the flames he'd been burying until it turned into a bonfire. I'm so sorry you became the person he took it out on Daniel. I'm so sorry I didn't notice and stop him earlier. He's just always gotten into fights. But I'm...I'm used to him being in your position, not in the one he found himself in."

"Wait?" his mother said. "Johnny used to get bullied? You're joking. He's so tall and muscular."

"Growth spurt before high school and Kreese's karate regimen," Mrs. Lawrence said shaking her head. "He used to be quite small and thin. Practically every day he came home bloody and bruised. I was sending him to new schools almost every other month hoping to find one where he wouldn't get beaten up. One where he'd finally make friends. So it made it harder to realize how bad Cobra Kai was. Because that's where he found friends. Which led to the school he goes to now, which led to him dating Ali. It gave him confidence in himself, pulled him out of his shell. Which he's just sinking back into now. And I don't blame him. I just wish he'd had a better teacher."

Daniel's eyes went to Mr. Miyagi who was just listening. He opened his mouth to mention that Mr. Miyagi was training Johnny, was teaching him, but then Mr. Miyagi met his eyes and did the subtlest shake of his head.

Daniel didn't understand.

It'd make Mrs. Lawrence overjoyed. He already was doing it. Already was working on it.

But he hadn't told Johnny yet. Daniel thought Johnny was ready.

He picked up his soda and looked at Mrs. Lawrence and then frowned, maybe he didn't actually know if Johnny was ready, just wanted him to be. It was becoming a habit. A habit of wanting things to go faster, move faster than they were already going, forcing things.

He wanted to spar with Johnny, wanted to practice in Mr. Miyagi's garden together. He wanted Mr. Miyagi to pull back the curtain and tell him he'd been training Johnny everything already. And see the look on Johnny's face.

It was all about Daniel, not Johnny.

He sighed. Mr. Miyagi had his reasons, and he was being selfish.

His mother was speaking gently to Mrs. Lawrence who nodded and was going for her purse. She pulled out her wallet and with a little click was flipping through something and then a photo was sat on the table.

Daniel leaned forward. It was Johnny but it wasn't Johnny. It was a scrawny kid with the same big blue eyes and blonde hair.

"That growth spurt really did things for him," Daniel's mother said and Daniel blushed.

He agreed.

"Oh!" his mother said clapping her hands together delighted and then got up and Daniel felt panic run through him.

Oh fuck no. No no no no. Not the photo albums. They were not doing this. Oh god, he could hear footsteps coming up the steps.

His mother was opening the photo album and setting it down on the table. Mrs. Lawrence was smiling. This was happening.

He wondered if he could run out of the apartment and hide, take Johnny with him.

He had no good excuse.

Johnny wouldn't just leave his mother behind and run away with him.

There was a knock and Daniel went to go get it, thinking he'd just set whatever Johnny had gone to get down on the floor, grab his hand and run.

They could leave the Avanti, leave the Ford. They could run down the streets of Reseda on foot, he could pull Johnny along.

"Welcome back Johnny-san," Mr. Miyagi said opening the door.

Too slow. Damnit.

Johnny was holding a basket. Mrs. Lawrence turned and smiled at him motioning for Johnny to come over. Johnny did so and handed the basket to Daniel's mother who took it with a sound of surprise.

"You already got us wine, this is too much!"

"I didn't get a chance to welcome you to California or the Valley," Mrs. Lawrence said warmly. "Wine is for dinner, this is a welcome to the neighborhood."

Johnny's eyes were on his photo on the table, eyes wide, a light pink on his cheeks. His hand reached for the photo and Mrs. Lawrence smacked his hand away, a gentle smack.

Daniel stifled a laugh.

"It's all local goods. Local beauty company stuff, local fruits, and honey, candies, all my favorites. I hope you like it."

Daniel looked at his mother, her eyes were as wide as saucers, touched. He smiled softly. His mother carried it gently to the coffee table in the living room. "It's wonderful Laura, thank you. I can't wait to try it all."

Mrs. Lawrence smiled, there was a mischievous glint in her eye. "You were saying something about photos?"

"Right!"

Damnit.

The table was cleared and the photo albums were set out.

His mother showed them pictures of Daniel as a kid in Newark. Field trips to New York City. All the cliché tourist spots. Daniel felt his eyes sting. His father had been his chaperone for that one. A photo of the two of them at the Statue of Liberty. Of him sitting on his father's shoulders while walking around downtown, his Dad pointing things out, at the zoo, at Central Park, walking down Broadway, the Empire State Building. Halloween costumes, hand-made by his grandmother, standing with Louie with big grins on their faces. Talent shows and school plays.

It was a wave of nostalgia for a life Daniel wouldn't ever return to, a time before, a time where they were all together. A big family holiday, everyone crowded in together, sitting between both parents.

His mother was talking, little tidbits behind each photo and Mrs. Lawrence was nodding warmly, listening.

Daniel's eyes fell on Johnny's. His face was soft. Daniel had expected him to be laughing. Laughing at how gangly Daniel had been, to make fun of his homemade costumes, the cake on his face on his birthday. But there wasn't anything dark in his features, just soft.

"Daniel-san, very cute," Mr. Miyagi said warmly.

Daniel blushed darkly. This was his nightmare. Worst nightmare.

Mrs. Lawrence laughed softly. "So cute." She pulled open her wallet again, slipping the photo of Johnny back into its spot and then with a furrowed brow, flipped a couple more times and Johnny's hand went to her arm.

"Mother." He looked horrified.

"I don't have a lot of photos from when he was little," she said softly but then she set one down on the table of Johnny at the carhop they'd gone to. He was sitting on the front of an old beaten-up car holding a swirled ice cream cone, surrounded by the staff, girls in skates, laughing and smiling. "But we were frequent customers when he was little, so they loved him, took a photo on one of our visits, and gave me a copy."

Daniel laughed. "It's almost like school for half of last week. Completely swarmed by girls." And being so utterly confused by it. Overwhelmed. It was the same look. But Johnny at the carhop looked happier. He'd been so small. It didn't match with the boy in front of him. The happy face, the small kid.

"Oh really?" Mrs. Lawrence asked question pointed at Johnny who ducked his head to avoid her eyes.

"The guys took care of it," he said softly.

"That gives me so many more questions," she said with a laugh but she didn't press it even though Daniel wished she did.

His mother was flipping forward, past Dad getting sick, skipping forward into awkward years, where Daniel shot up like a weed, not as tall as Johnny or his giant friends, but still tall, and he stood up suddenly. He didn't want to see himself getting acne for the first time, surrounded by friends despite how he looked, smile wide a complete opposite of how he was now.

"I'll get dessert," Daniel said.

He was dying to know what his mother had made. She'd sent him away while making it and slapped at him every time he'd tried to get a peek. She was amazing at cooking, but her desserts were to die for. Everyone growing up wanted an invite to Daniel's birthday parties because of the food. His mother's handmade cannoli, bombolone, the biscotti, the panna cotta, amaretti, fancy tiramisu, cakes, and tortes.

His mother didn't stop him. She just smiled and nodded. He headed to where she knew she'd hid it.

"Be careful Daniel, it's heavy."

Heavy.

What did she make?

He carefully removed the lid, the etched one specifically picked out so it could be pulled off with a flourish so no one saw what was underneath it until she wanted them to.

Torta setteveli.

His mother had worked hard on it. It was usually a birthday cake, a very intensive one.

He carried it over to the table, setting it carefully in the center and then got plates and forks, a cake server. He handed the cake server to his mother and took his spot, watching her pull the lid off with a flourish.

"Torta setteveli" she said with a grin. "A 7 layer cake."

She was so proud of herself. For his birthday last semester, they'd gone out for dinner. He told her she worked too hard, shouldn't have to make him anything.

They just went to a restaurant with Ali. She hadn't gotten to make anything and maybe she'd wanted to.

She showed her love through food.

He kept trying not to be a bother to her, to not worry her, and she'd tried to meet him where he was. But this was clearly what she'd been wanting all along. To open their home to people and share, even if it wasn't much, it was still a lot. Full of love, full of warmth, welcoming.

He'd been so worried she'd say something mean to Mrs. Lawrence, or Johnny. And maybe she would've, before. Before she'd taken one look at Johnny and decided "that boy needs a homecooked meal."

It's what she'd said when he came home after Johnny apologized. He'd been so upset, Mr. Miyagi seemed to have forgiven him so easily and when he'd learned Johnny had also been in his apartment, knew where he lived it riled up all the panic again. Johnny Lawrence, alone in his apartment with his mother who might be an Italian mother from Jersey, but Johnny was a bully, practically a gang leader. But she'd just been cleaning up tea and told Daniel, "that boy needs a homecooked meal." Daniel thought she'd lost it. She'd seen him kick Daniel's leg out from under him. The way they fought. The bruises and scrapes and his destroyed bike.

It became a theme. A seed she wouldn't let go of and now she'd gotten what she wanted. A full Italian dinner. Nice wine, nice company, her cooking that never disappointed.

She was cutting through the cake with a big smile on her face, passing it out.

"So," Mrs. Lawrence said. "Lucille, what's all of this?"

His mother held up a slice, delighted to be asked, excited to explain. "At the bottom, we have chocolate sponge cake, then a praline crunch, hazelnut Bavarian cream, more sponge cake, more cream, chocolate mousse, and then a chocolate glaze."

Daniel's eyes roamed around the table.

He had a feeling it would be too sweet for Mr. Miyagi, but the man dug in and nodded his approval and drank a lot of water.

Johnny was staring at his slice, counting the layers, eyes wide.

Daniel grinned. Bobby wasn't the only one whose family could bake.

Mrs. Lawrence was heaping compliments on his mother, and she was practically glowing. She'd needed this. She'd needed someone to talk to that wasn't someone she worked with or the lady who sat by the pool with her dog. She needed a friend. Daniel didn't know how he felt about that friend being Mrs. Lawrence of all people. But if they got along maybe it'd make things easier. He could take the two of them and pull them into his family. They could be in-laws.

He forced his eyes down on his plate. What the hell? He hadn't made a move and was already thinking twenty steps ahead. Most people didn't make sure their Mom's got along before pursuing a romantic relationship with one another. Absolutely ridiculous. What was wrong with him?

Johnny took a bite and looked like he liked it. Just the smallest spark of emotion. So different from his mother yet the same.

Daniel's eyes kept going back to him. He had chocolate on his face. He probably tasted like cake now. His mouth would be warm, wet, soft. Daniel chewed on the straw he'd stuck in his drink. Then sat up suddenly, shaking his head.

He focused on the conversation happening around him.

More wine had been poured and they had pulled Mr. Miyagi into the conversation again. He'd gotten the mochi out and was explaining how it was made. He was talking about traditions and everyone was listening and Daniel's eyes slid back to Johnny.

He'd cleaned up the chocolate and Daniel was disappointed. He was listening quietly to Mr. Miyagi, soaking up every word he said like a sponge. He blinked and his head turned slowly, eyes dragging away from Mr. Miyagi and every so slowly to Daniel. There wasn't an expression there. Just waiting. Daniel had been caught staring, but he couldn't look away. He couldn't avert his eyes. It was like a challenge.

If he looked away first then what? He'd have to admit that he'd been staring? Taking in the lock of blonde hair that had curled away from the rest, all rebellious like. How the top button of his green shirt was unbuttoned and Daniel was trying to remember if he'd come in with that button unbuttoned, or if at some point he'd done it when Daniel hadn't noticed until right then. Drawing Daniel's eyes to his clavicle, his collarbone, that little dip he wanted to kiss. Wondering if the first button was unbuttoned if it was possible that Johnny might unbutton another throughout the night.

He worried it'd all be on his face, with Johnny looking at him. That he'd read it in his eyes. That Daniel didn't want Johnny to leave, or if he did leave he wanted to go with him. He wanted to find someplace secluded and help Johnny out of his shirt. To kiss him until he was breathless.

Chapter End Notes

> Lots of food in this chapter. I don't want to spam everyone with food links. So I'll just share like photos of the food mentioned on tumblr. At least one website said the Torta Setteveli was invented in the 90's...but we're going to just ignore that.

Chapter Summary

> Mentions of past animal abuse/cruelty. Pulled something from the TV show. I figure Kreese always has used the same awful tactics.

Chapter Notes

Sitting at Daniel's table with his mother and Mr. Miyagi was not something Johnny had expected to happen. He knew his mother had wanted something like this. Told him she wanted to talk to them privately, gave him errands in case she saw an opening. Different words and phrasing he memorized, the way he had when he was little.

If she said one phrase, he'd say he forgot something and would go sit in the Avanti for twenty minutes. If she asked him to do something else, he'd go pick up the welcome basket she'd had made. If she put her hand on his and squeezed it hard twice, then he'd feign an upset stomach and they'd bolt.

They'd worked it out when he was little, perfected it by the time she married Sid and now it was old hat. But the atmosphere wasn't tense.

She seemed to be having a genuinely good time and it was nice. The food was good and Mr. Miyagi kept talking warmly about things in his life and it was pleasant to hear him talk. To hear his stories.

He felt Daniel's eyes on him and turned. He didn't know what Daniel wanted. A fight maybe? He wondered what he'd done this time. Was it because he was in his house? He'd never been there that long before. Maybe it was setting off alarms. Old warnings of danger. He didn't know how to make himself seem less of a threat. He'd been trying.

Daniel wasn't looking away. Brown eyes boring into him. He didn't know what to do, felt uncomfortable. He thought everything was going well. Decent at least. His mother's arm was on the back of his chair, listening to Mr. Miyagi.

Daniel wasn't blinking. Was this a staring contest? Who did staring contests anymore? Would he set Daniel off if he won? Piss him off again? What would happen if he looked away?

"Flirting?" his mother whispered quietly in his ear and he startled, turning bright red.

She laughed softly.

He ducked his head. He couldn't believe she'd said that. Not that it'd been loud enough for anyone else to hear. But still. He glanced up at her. She was all bright smiles.

"I like them," she whispered again. "Wish we'd found them sooner, huh?"

She was a couple of glasses in the wine she'd spent hours picking out. Something Italian, something expensive, but tasty. The sommelier had been so patient when he'd gone with her as she worked her way through the drinks.

Now it was hitting her. She was buzzed. But he knew what she meant. This could've been them in another world. If they'd been lucky. They too could've had a warm home, with warm friends and laughter at their dining table instead of whatever it was at Sid's table that was big but only ever had the three of them at it, or was crammed packed with people who really just wanted something from Sid.

He also knew from the way her hand was on his wrist, squeezing it ever so gently that she was taking this all in, everything it meant and she was planning. The wheels in her head were turning. What could she do to make this better? If she liked them so much after one dinner, how could she express that and keep it going?

He smiled softly looking at her, it was the look in her eyes she got. She was weaving her lie. The lie she'd tell Sid. How she'd made a cool new friend, a lady, of course. But she'd lie about where Mrs. LaRusso lived. And she'd make her seem more important. And he'd give his blessing, not that his mother would really need it.

She was planning coffee dates, she was planning PTA events, invites to the country club for lobster night. This was going to become a thing. Her eyes flickered to Johnny and she gave him a warm smile. He patted her hand. She needed a friend who understood. A friend who wasn't just interested in her because of who she'd married when she was drowning. Maybe this would be okay.

He just feared that maybe after two many drinks she'd start trying to be a wingman. He didn't need any more of those. The guys were bad enough. He didn't need her floating out ideas, seeing if Mrs. LaRusso knew things. They'd have to make boundaries. He wasn't looking forward to that conversation.

Mother, promise me you won't ask her if Daniel would date a guy. Promise me you won't try to test the waters to see if she'd be okay with it. I'm happy being friends.

But he knew when she had an idea she'd run with it and she was practically impossible to stop. Thankfully she'd been busy with something she wouldn't talk about lately. Something that required talking to city hall and trying to hunt down the mayor and with lawyers and whatnot. Too busy to try and interfere with Johnny's love life or lack of a love life.

He figured they'd get through this year and then go their separate ways, hopefully, friends, but at least no longer as badly damaged as they were before and that would be good enough.

Daniel would go on to better and greater things and Johnny would go for a drive.

He was starting to think of disappearing into the woods. His mother wouldn't like that. But there were so many mountain ranges. Some, he'd seen, liked having forest rangers who just lived in the wild for most of the year. He thought maybe that'd be good for him.

He'd take the bonsai and just live off the land.

He'd be out of reach of Sid, and he'd be somewhere where Kreese could never find him. Maybe. Kreese knew tracking. Kreese knew how to hunt people down in the wild. Some leftover war stuff.

But if Johnny didn't tell anyone where he was going. He could be fine. Maybe he'd grow a beard. Come back to see his mom from time to time, to visit Mr. Miyagi, help him with stuff, and then go back to the woods.

Dinner wrapped up. Mr. Miyagi bade everyone goodnight first, saying he had to go do something in his workshop.

Johnny scrambled to stand.

Mr. Miyagi bowed to his mother. His mother, delighted, bowed back.

"See Johnny-san tomorrow, home 6 am?" Mr. Miyagi asked a small warm smile on his face.

"Sure, of course," Johnny said.

His mother put away her photos and looked at the time, realizing they should go home soon too. Sid was probably still on set. Would be again for about a week. But the staff would still talk. His mother hugged Mrs. LaRusso.

"Thank you for having us," Johnny said.

"Oh our pleasure," Mrs. LaRusso said with a warm big smile. "We'll have to do this again."

"Oh yes, please! Here let me give you the number to my office," his mother said, writing it down on a piece of paper and handing it directly to Mrs. LaRusso. "Maybe I can show you around California a bit, we can visit my old haunts in Reseda. I'm curious what's still around."

Johnny smiled softly following his mother down the stairs, arms held out, ready to catch her if she stumbled on the steps. At the bottom of the stairs, he felt eyes on him, burning into him. He turned and looked back.

Daniel was standing alone in the doorway watching him. His eyes were too intense. He didn't know what he'd done wrong this time. But he'd try to diffuse it.

He waved a small wave. "Goodnight Daniel," he called.

Daniel stiffened and disappeared back into the apartment suddenly and Johnny frowned. Apparently, that hadn't been the right thing to do. He followed his mother, concerned she'd roll her ankle in her high heels and slide into the empty pool.

The door opened again. He looked back, wondering if they'd forgotten something.

"Goodnight," Daniel called quickly and the door shut again.

His mother started laughing.

Johnny hurried back to her, wondering how much she'd been drinking. He went to take her arm in his but she swatted him away, stumbling a little, still giggling until she made it to his Avanti, slipping in with a sigh. She ran her hand through her hair and then stretched out her arms with a little shout. "That was fun! You know I had my doubts," she said turning to him as he slid into the driver's seat and turned on the car. "I like them and you know," she said tapping him low on his shoulder near his elbow, her voice low. "Daniel couldn't keep his eyes off of you."

"Mom," he stressed it. "He's still getting used to me not beating him up anymore. Please don't start...whatever it is you're doing in your head."

"Wedding invitations," she said with a giggle of delight. "I think Lucielle and I could put together the nicest wedding for you two."

"Mom!"

"What? Oh, right it's not called a wedding right? Stupid laws. They'll change someday, just you wait," she said tapping away to the music playing on the radio.

Johnny's ears were burning. This was what he didn't want to happen. For her to get carried away.

"I'm thinking on the beach," she said. "Oh maybe somewhere in Europe. I've been hearing whisperings about Denmark. They might be the first to recognize unions. How do you feel about Denmark?"

"Mom!" Johnny said.

She turned. "Are you going to make a move Johnny, honey? His relationship with Ali is over right?"

Johnny relaxed his grip on the steering wheel. His knuckles had been white. Shoulders practically up to his ears.

"We need to make some boundaries," he said cautiously.

It felt weird. But the book he'd checked out from the library said boundaries were healthy. Helped. Like meditation, and breathing, and all the stuff Mr. Miyagi was having him do.

She was turning, curling up in the seat next to him, fingers reaching out to brush the hair from his forehead and trying to tuck the one stubborn lock that refused to stay down no matter how many hours he'd fought with it earlier. She was listening, waiting.

"I'm not ready," he breathed. "For all of this again."

She was still quiet.

He continued. "I know you like the LaRusso's. I know hanging out with Mrs. LaRusso would probably be real nice. But can you please not try and move pieces around like a chessboard? It's...it's my life. And I don't want...I'm trying very hard to not scare him off. I'm trying very hard to just be friends. We just made it to friends Mom. Friends. I didn't think we'd ever get there. I didn't think he'd ever want to be my friend. Not after everything I've done. Yes. I like him. I like him a lot. But Mom, please, please don't start scheming, not this. Let me just...enjoy being around him, in his presence. He's letting me be there and it might not last, things like this don't usually last for me. I mean Ali didn't. And you got all your hopes up with her. Like this. You and the Mills and Sid, started planning our wedding. And I just can't do that again. I can't..."

He stopped, blinking rapidly, tears running down his cheeks.

"I know it wouldn't be the same, it can't be the same, but I need you to just be there to listen and support, and not try and take over, to not scheme. Not this time. Can you, please promise me you'll let me just enjoy the small moments? Without extrapolating them to mean deeper things? I can't handle you telling me that there's more meaning to things that aren't there. Not again. You were so sure about Ali and I believed it too and..."

He swallowed hard and rubbed quickly at his face as the light turned. His voice dropped, becoming low.

"Please just have fun, enjoy hanging out with Mrs. LaRusso as I know you want to, but don't bring me into it. Just be...like a normal mom. Not one trying to matchmake. Don't view this as some secret spy work. I don't need to know. I don't want to know. I'm happy the way things are."

He didn't know if she'd believe him, not with tears running down his face. He sniffed. Let out a groan at the next red light and scrubbed at his face.

"Okay," she said softly next to him.

He looked over. Her face was serious, her pinky was held out towards him.

"Really?"

"Yes," she said.

He curled his pinky against hers and they shook on it.

"Think Daniel can cook as good as his mom?" she asked.

He laughed, it was watery. "From what I've seen, yes."

"Who knew beans worked in a desert? Rice and beans. That's what mochi is," she said with a sigh. "It works. And now I'm going to want more of it and where am I going to find it? Am I going to have to find Mr. Miyagi every time I get a craving and beg him to introduce me to his friends so I can get a mochi fix?"

Johnny laughed. "Maybe don't go rushing to do that. Knowing you you'll find somewhere that sells it."

"Hey," she said.

He glanced at her again.

"I know you're trying hard. I see you. I'm proud. You know that right? That I'm proud of you?"

He blinked back more tears and smiled, softly. "I know Mom."

She smiled. "Good."

The song changed and she drummed the dashboard with her hands, singing along, at the top of her lung. She elbowed him. It took him a while. It felt like old times, the roles reversed. Him sitting in the passenger seat, singing along to the radio with her. It took him a moment. A deep breath. He sang along with her softly and she grinned, dancing in her seat, hands raised to enjoy the roof down and the wind through her fingers.

Some things would never change and he took comfort in it. No matter what happened to them, there would be moments where they came back. Rich or poor, living in a shitty apartment a mansion, or in their car, they'd always have each other and moments like these.

Johnny drove himself to Mr. Miyagi's at 6 am. Mr. Miyagi was carrying coolers to his truck and Johnny quickly parked the Avanti and rushed out to help.

"Ah, good morning Johnny-san," Mr. Miyagi said as Johnny hurried to grab the next cooler and put it into the truck.

The weight was weird. Whatever was in it moved, sloshed around.

"Good morning, Mr. Miyagi."

"We put all in truck and go."

"Okay."

Johnny picked up cooler after cooler. He didn't think he knew anyone with more coolers than the guys, but soon Mr. Miyagi's back of the trunk was full. He closed the truck bed and there was a sloshing sound again. He was curious but wouldn't ask. Mr. Miyagi always shared what he wanted anyone to know and Johnny would respect his privacy.

"Johnny-san drive."

Johnny took the proffered keys and hopped into the cab. Mr. Miyagi sat on the other side.

"Where to?" Johnny asked turning the truck on and carefully pulling out of the lot.

He glanced back at the coolers. He didn't want them sliding around. He didn't trust they wouldn't break open. He listened to the address and directions Mr. Miyagi gave him and drove carefully.

"Johnny-san have allergies?"

"No."

Mr. Miyagi sank into silence for a while, watching the quiet early morning roads. It was a quiet trip. Johnny moving the truck nervously. Eyes jumping to the rearview mirror every time he stopped a little too fast and at every bump.

"We visit friend," Mr. Miyagi said after a while. "Help friend today."

Johnny nodded.

"Been too long since Miyagi saw friend."

It took a while with how slow Johnny was driving, how cautious. When they pulled into the drive he had to pry his fingers off the steering wheel. He'd been holding on too tightly. But he quickly jumped out and went to the trunk to be told what to do with the coolers, then paused reading the sign.

Animal Sanctuary.

He looked at Mr. Miyagi.

"Sometimes important to know every life precious, yes? Not just people. But animals too. Even bug. Miyagi play game with chopsticks, try to catch fly. Pesky fly. Game of concentration and skill. But Miyagi never hurt fly. Goal to catch, just to know can do it. Then let go and never again. Today help other things that need help. Bring cooler."

Johnny grabbed one of the coolers and followed Mr. Miyagi up to the front door where he knocked and went through.

A woman directed him on where to put the coolers, Johnny left her to catch up with Mr. Miyagi and worked on carrying things from the back of the truck.

His chest was tight.

He'd watched Mr. Miyagi catch a spider and ever so carefully move it outside. Any bug he saw Mr. Miyagi moved it. The opposite of Kreese again. He remembered the mouse Kreese had given him. The panic at being given something living that he had to care for, unsure what would happen when Sid found out. It'd been brown. A field mouse. He'd puzzled why Kreese had given them mice but no containers, no supplies to care for it. And then the lesson became clear. When he rolled out a snake. The glass case had been covered in a black sheet and he'd yanked it off with a big flourish.

"What happens in the real world boys? To the weak and helpless?"

Kreese had taken the mouse from him before he could act.

Johnny had felt sick. The guys didn't talk about it after. It should've been their first clue. The first warning sign to get out. But Johnny was still at a different school at that point. And he'd been desperate to stay with them. Desperate to see them.

So he didn't tell anyone.

Didn't tell his mother, how small the mouse had felt in his hands. How much it seemed to trust him and the panic knowing that he couldn't do anything for it. He couldn't take it home and save it, Sid would never allow it. He couldn't stop Kreese. He hadn't acted fast enough, hadn't been able to come up with a plan, and then it'd been over.

He moved the coolers back and forth until the back of the truck was empty.

"Johnny right?" she asked. "Welcome to our sanctuary, I'm Maisy, nice to meet you. Mr. Miyagi said you'd help out today?"

"Uh, yes," Johnny said.

"Awesome. Follow me."

Johnny followed her down a dark hallway into a large room. "We need someone to hold these little guys while we clean. They need to stay warm."

Before Johnny knew what was happening the tiniest kittens he'd ever seen were placed in his hands. They squeaked and cried and he held them to his chest looking down horrified.

They were too small, too fragile.

His hands were too big. S he cleaned out the kitten's container, adjusting the heat source, and then took them back. Gently placing them back into the container with a small laugh.

"You'll get used to it," she said. "Next one."

More kittens were placed in his hands. And he stood stiffly taking them. Their little claws sunk into his shirt as they cried. It was too much.

What if he dropped them?

What if he hurt them?

It became a rotation. She took the kittens out, put them in his arms, he stood there frozen while she cleaned, and then she took them back. When they were done she smiled at him and motioned for him to sit in a chair. She handed him the smallest bottle he'd ever seen and picked out a kitten and put it in his hands. She showed him how to hold it, how to hold the bottle up, how to feed it. Asked him to feed them all and showed him where the bottles were.

It took awhile, but Johnny relaxed.

Maisy had left him alone.

So it was just him and tiny kittens.

Impossibly small. They were soft and warm and clung little clawed paws to his fingers.

They couldn't really even open their eyes.

Maisy said they couldn't even regulate their own body temperature. Which was why all the containers were heated.

Their fur was so soft.

It was chaotic but peaceful. Trying to carefully reach into a new container to pull out a kitten and keep its friends off of it, from crawling out. Like herding cats was something he'd heard somewhere and he let out a soft laugh. This is what they meant. The absolute chaos of trying to stay organized around a bunch of cats. An impossible task.

He spoke softly to them, trying to be soothing. Reading the names on the containers.

"So which of you is Peanut and which of you is Butter, and uh what's this? Sir Mittens the fifth of the Royal court of Victoria?" he snickered. "You, you must be sir Mittens the fifth of the Royal Court of Victoria. You have a tiny mustache and white front paws."

He scooped out the kitten and held it gently the way Maisy had shown him, feeding Sir Mittens, then deciding that Peanut had to be the orange-brown kitten and Butter had to be the white one. He spoke quietly, whispering hello as he fed each one as they ate.

"Sir Mittens, that is atrocious table manners," he said, cleaning up the milk sticking to the kitten's fur.

Silly cat names. He liked that. One day if he ever lived somewhere safe enough, where he could care for something living and mobile he'd give it a ridiculously long title name and then a nickname.

He worked a rhythm, meeting new kittens, assuming which one was which, hoping he got it right, holding them ever so carefully and after a while, when his arms began to ache he was done. He stretched, double-checked he'd fed them all, and then popped his head out to try and find Maisy and tell her he was done.

He wandered down the halls, looking in the windows as he went. A room full of older kittens playing, a room of adult cats sleeping in sunlight. Puppies playing in another room. Dogs chasing each other and playing in the next.

"Oh good Johnny, done feeding the kittens?" Maisy asked. She shoved something soft into Johnny's hands and he took it. "Oreo escaped again. We got to put her back. Drives the cats and dogs nuts."

Johnny looked down at the white-furred creature in his hands, the long black ears lifting up and listening before round black eyes looked up at him. A bunny.

Johnny didn't think he'd ever seen a bunny up close, let alone held one before. It was impossibly soft.

He could feel the muscles coiling.

"Maisy?" Johnny asked, panic creeping into his voice. Oreo was going to try and run.

Maisy turned.

The rabbit kicked and darted out of his arms, landing with a jump on the floor and then bolting.

"You'll have to catch her. Meet me outside with her."

She turned and pushed the door going outside.

Johnny watched the door shut, turning to look at the rabbit with a sinking feeling. This was how "Alice's Adventures in Wonderland" started and that was not what Johnny needed.

He couldn't handle any more strangeness. Any more people calling for his head.

He clicked his tongue, crouching down, calling to Oreo.

Oreo's ear twitched but hopped off and Johnny sighed. He'd have to give chase. He darted after her, down the hall, skidding as she turned the corner, he jumped to try and catch her and missed, having to catch himself and curl back onto his feet before he landed flat on his stomach like some silly cartoon character.

He thought maybe the sound of his footsteps scared her so he walked slowly, the quiet way, on the balls of his feet, soft movements so he wouldn't be heard. He'd perfected it in the mansion. Where he was expected to not be seen or heard. But her ears were too good. Even at his quietest she still knew he was coming.

She wasn't hopping as fast though. Just curiously hopping around, little nose twitching.

He cornered her and crouched down to scoop her up.

She jumped, feet landing on his head for a moment before vaulting over him and heading back the way they'd just come.

He let out a groan and sunk to the ground. He was being led around by a bunny.

He flopped onto his back. He was exhausted.

He didn't want to hurt the bunny so he kept hesitating.

Kreese would've chewed him out.

He watched her hopping around the hallway curiously. He rolled over onto his stomach, watching her.

Food usually was a good motivator. He wondered if she was looking for something to eat. He looked around, saw a sign that said kitchen, and stood up, dusted himself off, and went in.

There were bins everywhere, labeled for different animals, different names. He saw a collection of vegetables in the rabbit section. He picked up a lettuce leaf and then head back out to the hallway.

Oreo was sitting in the middle of the hall, at the other end and Johnny carefully shut the door behind him. He held up the lettuce leaf, wondering why he felt like he was in the wild west about ready to get into a fight at high noon.

He walked slowly, carefully about halfway, and then sat down, and held out the leaf.

"Oreo, hey Oreo, pretty sure you know you're not supposed to be in here. How about we have a treat? Do you like lettuce? I'll give you a treat and then we can go outside and you can go back to where you're supposed to be. Hmm? How's that sound?"

Oreo moved and Johnny didn't dare move. He didn't dare breathe. She hopped the rest of the way and bit on the leaf and tugged, trying to tug the whole piece out of his hand.

"Hey now," he said relieved he'd kept a good grip on it, or else she'd have the leaf and would be hopping away and that'd be Johnny's luck.

He reached out with his free hand and scooped her up. She didn't seem to notice, focused on the leaf.

He stood and ran. There was no way he was doing it again. He pushed the door open with his hip and was outside into the bright morning light and heat and Maisy was standing on a fence feeding a cow. She heard the door and turned and laughed, taking off her hat and waving it.

"The hutch is over there!" she called pointing.

Johnny held the bunny carefully to his chest. He opened the hutch and slowly set the bunny in. Oreo didn't seem to care now that she had a snack.

He studied the hutch, latched it. He couldn't see how she got out. He stepped back slowly then turned to hurry to Maisy.

"She had you running in circles huh?" Maisy asked with a laugh. "Glad I'm not the only one."

"Here," she took Johnny's hand and put it gently on the cow's forehead,."This is Daisy, she's an old dairy cow."

"You have a lot of animals," Johnny said.

Maisy stuck her hands in her overalls and grinned. "Used to be a big farm. Family raised all sorts of things. Had lots of extra space so figured why not take in animals that no one else wanted? Ended up marrying a vet and thus all the cats and dogs and well all of that," she said with a grin. "We just can't help ourselves. We see something hurt and gotta help it. Its human nature you know?"

Johnny wanted to say he did. But it felt insincere. After a semester of hurting Daniel. After all the years of people hurting him. He doubted it really was human nature. Human nature seemed cruel, dark, twisted. It always hurt him. If human nature helped people who needed help then their landlord wouldn't have kicked them out. The kids at school would've stopped the first time they drew blood. He would've been able to stop himself on Halloween, or long before.

"You know what sets humans apart from a lot of other animals?" Maisy asked turning back to Daisy.

When he didn't respond she continued.

"When archeologists dig up bones and what not they've found all sorts of things. They've found mended bones. They found bones that show the history of people caring for them despite dying, keeping them safe long enough for it to be marked in the bones, like how the life of a tree can be found in its rings. People whose bones were damaged showed the hard lives they lived and yet they continued to live. An animal gets injured and other animals don't help out all the time, it's rare. But humans, we stand out because we have compassion. We care about people and we will protect them. Our friends, our family, our community. There's violence in the world, yes. Tragedy, evil, terrible horrible things, cruelty, but if you look close, somewhere nearby the violence are doctors and firefighters, average people rushing in to help, to pull people from the wreckage. There are strangers, giving aid. Not just to each other, but to animals as well. Almost all of our animals are rescues at this point."

She sighed and pushed back away from the gate and hopped down. Then looked at Johnny.

"I'm not going to keep you around working you to the bone. But you ever get bored, you ever want to come out, you're more than welcome. We can always use volunteers. And not just because you helped Mr. Miyagi carry all the fish my husband asked for his testing."

She grinned. Walking towards the building again. "We like to test and see how the water is doing in different parts around the city, and one of the best ways to tell is by checking on the health of the things that live in there. Mr. Miyagi helps sometimes. Him and the other fishermen."

Daniel followed her back to the front where Mr. Miyagi was standing talking to a man.

"Thanks for letting us borrow him for a bit. It was nice to have someone else feed the kittens and chase after Oreo."

"Of course Maisy-san," Mr. Miyagi said with a smile.

Johnny followed Mr. Miyagi to the truck. He was lost in thought. He knew that places like this existed. But he hadn't realized they existed. It was one of those things in the back of his head.

She had so much hope for the world.

Johnny realized he barely had any.

"They're nice," Johnny said softly.

"Hmm."

"I didn't know cats got that small."

Mr. Miyagi laughed softly. "Very small."

Johnny flexed his fingers around the steering wheel. He hadn't ever held anything that trusted him so much, not since the mouse.

They had been so small. So helpless and they trusted him. They didn't know any better. Didn't know what he was capable of. What he'd done.

The bunny, she might've known, might've read it in his stance when he tried to catch her, slipping away at the last second every time. It had been frustrating, infuriating.

But he'd caught her, put her back, without hurting her.

"Mr. Miyagi?"

"Hmm?"

"Do you think I can get better? Be better?" Johnny asked.

He tried to keep the desperation out of his voice. He meant a million things, but he couldn't voice them. He couldn't explain it, he needed Mr. Miyagi to understand, without the details, without showing the depths of all the wounds. Can I be compassionate? Can I help others? Can I be someone like them? Someone trustworthy and kind?

"Johnny-san changing."

"What if I fail?" His throat felt tight. His chest hurt. What if I hurt someone again?

"Then Johnny-san try again."

"If I can't?" he whispered. What if I can't change, what if I can't get better? What if everyone is right? Sid? Kreese? Ali?

"Johnny-san will. And when can't. Johnny-san ask for help. Help always here."

Johnny glanced over. Mr. Miyagi was patting his own chest, a warm smile on his face. Johnny took in a deep breath.

"Thank you Mr. Miyagi."

Silence fell in the truck as Johnny pulled into the space next to all of Mr. Miyagi's other cars.

"Johnny-san, movie tonight with Daniel-san and friends right?"

"Oh, uh, yes?" Johnny said.

"Good. Johnny-san have fun. Busy morning."

Johnny followed him out of the truck.

"Did you need help with anything else?"

Mr. Miyagi looked thoughtful. "No. Go enjoy day."

"Okay, Mr. Miyagi," Johnny said turning towards his Avanti. His bonsai.

Mr. Miyagi smiled softly looking at the tree in his passenger seat and nodded to himself walking off to his house.

Johnny didn't know what to do with himself until they were supposed to meet for the movie. He went home since Sid wasn't home. He showered, changed. He called Bobby and asked what time they were meeting and then looked through the books on his desk for Daniel's number, sinking into his chair. Hair dripping. He called.

"Hello?" it was Mrs. LaRusso.

"It's Johnny, Mrs. LaRusso. Is Daniel there?"

"Oh, good afternoon Johnny, yeah, he's around here somewhere. One moment."

Johnny waited, listening to her talking to Daniel in the background. The sound of the TV. Then suddenly the sound of the receiver being picked up and a breathless "Johnny?" Dutch was right everything Daniel did was like pure torture. His heart sped up. It was nothing. It had to be nothing.

"I'm not sure if the guys hammered out the plans, but I called to double-check. Did you want to go with us to the movies? I will try to get Dutch to behave."

That was like promising someone the moon. There was something about getting Dutch in someplace dark. He went wild. He couldn't keep still. He couldn't keep his eyes on the film half the time. He wanted to whisper through it. Wanted to throw popcorn or candy.

He used the fact it led to him getting Ali as an excuse every time they chewed him out for it.

A shrug and his hands up. "Hey, I got at least one of you laid with my antics, why would you wanna stop me? Just cockblocking yourselves at this point."

He didn't seem to realize what a pain in the ass it was to sit next to him, his legs bouncing like something had to be moving. He was better in class, better almost anywhere else. But the damn movies and Johnny felt like he was babysitting a toddler hopped up on sugar.

He didn't know if Daniel understood what that meant. Him trying to get Dutch to behave. But Daniel laughed and it sent a shiver through him. The sound of it in his ear. Amused, happy.

"Good luck with that," Daniel said. "Maybe we could sit on the end?" His voice was low.

In case he needed to run. Johnny got that.

"Okay. Do you want me to come pick you up?"

"Not carpooling with everyone?"

Johnny could practically hear his smile.

"No, I mean. They might be, but no one's going to want to do the van again...if that's okay."

"What time is the show?"

"8 o'clock. It's about an hour and a half film."

"How about..." Daniel said slowly, voice low again, thick like syrup. "I pick you up, say... at 6? I buy you dinner and then we meet them there?"

Johnny remembered Daniel saying his mother wanted him to buy him lunch. There hadn't been a time to follow through. She was probably still pressing it.

"Okay. Sure," Johnny said looking at the clock. He was glad he'd already showered. "Uh, just honk when you get here. I'll come out and meet you."

It was weird. Johnny was pretty sure he'd never been in the Ford. The banana boat. He wondered what it looked like on the inside, how Daniel drove it.

"See you then," Daniel said, and then there was a click.

Johnny looked at his bonsai. He couldn't take it. But Sid wasn't supposed to be home for a week.

He'd still take precautions.

He locked his door then walked to the window.

He had an hour. He had everything he needed on him. He slid open the window and pushed up the screen and slid one leg out, ducked at his waist and carefully curled his head to his chest, and slowly shifted until his head was on the other side. He put his feet on the roof and slid out of the window, letting the screen fall shut. He walked across the roof.

His mother's office window was always open. He pushed the window up, the screen, and slipped in.

She wasn't in. But her album was out. The photo album she'd started when she married Sid.

He walked out into the hall, found her in the kitchen, staring in the fridge with a frown.

"Trying to think of what you're going to eat?" Johnny asked.

When Sid wasn't around she liked to try and cook for herself. Liked to cook for him. Not always, but sometimes.

"Yeah. I want a snack. But I don't know what I want. Oh look at you, you look nice. Going out?" she asked leaning her head on the edge of the fridge door on top of her hand.

"Yes. In about an hour."

"Okay then help me decide. Do I want popcorn, pop tarts, pizza rolls, or chips?"

"We have pizza rolls?" Johnny asked leaning over the door to look in.

"Snuck 'em," she said with a grin.

"You gotta eat those."

"Want some before you go?" she asked pulling the bag out of the freezer.

"Probably shouldn't. We're grabbing dinner."

"Nice, where?"

"I don't know."

She finished cooking them in the microwave and sunk down into her chair.

He sat next to her. It was the best place to wait. He'd be out of the way of the staff, but close enough to the door to listen.

"Who's picking you up?"

"Daniel."

"Oh?"

"Don't Oh, me. We agreed, remember? You pinky promised."

"An oh is just an oh. What's he drive?"

Johnny smiled. " A yellow 1947 Ford Super De Luxe."

"Yellow?"

"Yeah."

"Nice car."

"It is."

"Lots of room," she said raising an eyebrow.

"I don't want to know what you're trying to say but I want you to stop."

"Do you have everything you need? Money, your ID, condoms?"

"Mom! You promised you'd behave!"

She laughed, it was like a cackle that spread through the kitchen.

"I'm sorry honey. You don't know how much I'm holding back. How hard this is."

"Rein it in. Asap," Johnny said sourly.

"Okay, okay."

She popped a pizza roll in her mouth, then started waving at her mouth looking around for a glass of water.

Johnny got up and poured her a glass. "Serves you right. Instant karma."

"Cruel," she said taking the water and downing it.

A horn honked and Johnny glanced at the clock. He was early. He looked at his mother. She tapped her cheek, dabbing at her lips with a napkin. He leaned down and kissed her cheek.

"Be good Johnny, be safe."

"I will. Maybe cut those so they don't burn you. Let out the heat."

"My smart boy."

Johnny worried it wasn't Daniel, but no one else had a yellow Ford.

He hurried down the steps and towards the car, wanting to avoid his mother following and embarrassing him further, or the staff. He pulled open the passenger side door and hopped in. Daniel smiled at him, pulling away from the mansion.

"You know it's dangerous running into strange cars. You shouldn't just blindly hop in. Never know who it is. Could be a creep," Daniel said.

"You're the only person I know who has a yellow car," Johnny said. Daniel had that playful tone, the look in his eye. "Unless you're saying you're dangerous?"

Daniel grinned at that. "I might just be."

Johnny smirked. A guy kicks you in the face, sucker punches you a couple of times. Believes he's dangerous. He was getting full of himself. Daniel was as dangerous as a group of kittens. Just chaotic.

"So...Ma really liked having you guys over. Wants to do it again. Both of you or...just you, whenever you're free."

"What about you?" Johnny asked.

Daniel glanced at him. "Huh?"

Johnny tried to think carefully on how to ask, it felt like walking through a minefield trying to talk to Daniel. He never knew what would set him off. And something had clearly bothered him at the dinner. He'd have to just persevere.

"I'd understand if you're not...comfortable with having me at your apartment...after everything...you can just tell me."

Daniel frowned.

Johnny studied him. He couldn't tell if he'd messed up again.

Daniel took a deep breath and rolled his shoulders back, squaring himself up, making himself taller.

"You're invited Johnny," he said slowly. "Okay? I didn't lie about the friend's thing. Ma likes having people over. Used to have people over all the time in Newark. Like all the time. Either there were people at our place or we were at someone else's. Crammed into small kitchens and apartments. It never clicked how much she missed it. And heck, I missed it. Having people over. I didn't...Ali never really came over. It was like this unspoken thing right? I didn't go to her place, or like through the doors and she didn't really come into my apartment either. We met elsewhere," he laughed.

"Movies mostly. Lots of movies. I think I've seen everything that came out last year. I was getting sick of popcorn. But that's beside the point. I don't know what you're thinking in that pretty head of yours. But the invite is there. Not with a caveat or whatever. You. Johnny Lawrence. Have an open invitation to dinner. Heck, Ma's busy and you want something I'll cook. Ma will be happy to have you at our table. I will... be down for it too. You're quiet. It's kind of nice to have someone listen to my nonsense. And Ma's nonsense. You'll get sick of us eventually. It's not a peaceful household.

"Lots of chatter about everything, about nothing. Phone calls are hours long. It's why Mr. Miyagi rarely comes over. Ma's been trying to get him to come for dinner for months. Absolute failure. He's very polite about it. But I think he can barely handle me. Put Ma and me together and it's just a pure nightmare of never-ending conversation. Overwhelming for such a quiet guy. So you know. I'm inviting you. 'kay? You can just show up on our doorstep. I'm not going to freak out. Ma's not going to freak out.

"You're not like a guy from a slasher flick, you know that right? Like you're some karate badass, but you're not scary on your own. Does that make sense? Like Johnny without the cobras is just Johnny. Johnny with the cobras? Sometimes it sets off a little flutter of panic. But Johnny without the cobras, man, alarm bells don't go off. I think it's because I kicked your ass." Daniel was grinning, a big smile.

"I know I can take you. So like, it's fine. The playing field is level, right? You got all those muscles but I'm not scared of them. Hope that's not offending. Ha, it's like what you said on the beach. Sometimes stuff sounds more offensive than you think it does in your head until you hear it leave your lips. My karate is all defense right, and my apartment is my home field. I don't know Johnny. I don't think you're going to snap suddenly after what, almost a month of making yourself useful and helpful and working so hard. I don't see you as that kind of person. Like I did at first. Thought it was a total trick. Thought Mr. Miyagi had lost it. You were some evil mastermind hard at work trying to get me to let my guard down. But nah. That isn't you. Like what would the point be in that? Like what evil mastermind makes sure I get home safe, time after time? Or that I'm okay at a party even though I was dating your ex but was so far gone because apparently, I'm so ridiculously awful with beer?

"And you. Ah what's it that my neighbors would say? I'll think of it. I know I will. It'll come to me. I can't have lived in Jersey, been hanging out near New York City, and forgotten the little bits of Hebrew I picked up. You know that's something that sucks around here. How do you not have a good everything bagel? Lox. I miss good lox. Do you know what lox is? A good bagel with cream cheese and salmon and some dill. Absolutely delightful. Great breakfast. But can't find a nice Jewish shop to try it around here. I think it's just because I don't know where any are. Damn. I'm rambling again. There was a point in there somewhere. Where'd it go? What was it?"

Daniel chewed on his bottom lip brows furrowed.

"Ah, right. Johnny Lawrence, friends are always welcome, the door is always open. Not just because Ma misses the house being full, but because...because...it's nice having you around. Aha! We're here!"

Johnny had been staring at Daniel. The way the sunlight was golden and how it made his tan skin glow as he drove.

He didn't normally like other people driving him around. It was a lack of control. He wanted to control where he was going. To be in charge, to hold his own life in his hands.

It was one of the few things he could control.

But Daniel looked so peaceful, relaxed as he drove, as he talked. Brown eyes occasionally glancing at Johnny as he spoke. The radio was on, but unlike in the Avanti it wasn't blasting. Just a quiet additional noise in the background.

He thought the Ford was silly. Beautiful but silly. It was yellow after all. Who wanted a yellow car?

But it was like the Avanti. The top could go down.

It was a classic. A well-loved and cared-for classic.

And it fit.

Daniel was also well cared for and loved. It was clear at dinner, looking at the photos of Daniel and all his friends. At the family photos. At the way his mother ruffled his hair at dinner. The way she talked about him. The look his father had in his eyes when they were in photos together, from the first moment, the baby photo of Mr. LaRusso holding Daniel to the last one Johnny had seen, standing together at Coney Island.

It felt almost inevitable, to be pulled into his orbit. To join the others who liked being around Daniel.

It took him a moment to registered they'd parked. Daniel turned to Johnny, eyes hard, serious.

"If you so much as make a move for your wallet I will slap you. This is on me. Understand?"

Johnny nodded and Daniel grinned. "Good. So Ma said that according to her coworkers if there's one thing to try it's Spago's duck sausage pizza though it kind of sounds blasphemous. But like only in the way California seems like it can ruin a perfectly good pizza. It's piqued my curiosity, but they got other stuff. That's just the only recommendation Ma had. But you're from around here so you might know something else that's good. Whatever you want."

With that, Daniel slipped out of the car, slinging his keys around his index then slipping them into his pocket and shutting the door to the Ford. Johnny followed and looked at Spago with its drab doorway and browning grass it looked unassuming, if not for the crowd.

His mother had mentioned it. The delight in her voice when she whispered that if they left you waiting too long you got free champagne.

"Did you make a reservation?" Johnny asked following Daniel through the large crowd of waiting patrons.

Daniel turned with a grin and winked at him and then turned back to the maître d', talking quickly and low so Johnny didn't hear what he said.

He was looking around, wondering if he'd have to name drop. One of the few pluses of being Sid's stepson meant he could pull strings fairly easily. Sid hated when he did it, but Sid hated practically everything. And if that didn't work, one of the other guys usually was enough.

Jimmy's family knew almost all the restaurants, or Bobby's. It'd made life easy with Ali. Because Johnny could always get them in anywhere. And Ali, well she also could get him in other places. All the art places. All the shows.

He kind of missed sneaking backstage with her, making her way through the back halls of museums to peruse the collections with gloves on and see what no one else got to see. She was always brave. Always down for an adventure. They'd been full of bad ideas but on the same wavelength that it seemed like good ideas.

He was pretty sure that the Ali he dated once upon a time was gone. She'd grown up without telling him. Became serious about her future and hadn't shared the memo, left him behind.

Daniel turned and grabbed Johnny's hand, following a waiter who snagged two menus and dipped into the restaurant and Johnny wondered if he'd had a reservation. Though it didn't add up. They'd made plans that afternoon. Maybe he'd annoyed the maître d' enough that he relented just to get rid of them. Or maybe this was one of the multitudes of Daniel Johnny didn't know yet.

They walked past a large brick pizza oven and open kitchen and were shown to their seats. They were handed their menus and Johnny flicked his open.

Daniel had mentioned a pizza, duck sausage? He tried to remember what his mother had said of the place as his eyes ran through appetizers and salads to a pasta that said it came with smoked salmon and gold caviar.

He frowned.

This was too expensive.

His eyes ran over the main dishes, a grilled chicken in herbs and garlic, it was simple but bizarrely more expensive than the caviar pasta. Fish was out of the question. It was way too expensive.

Daniel kicked him without any force behind it. Johnny looked up startled.

"I know that look on your face Johnny. You're looking for the cheapest thing on the menu. Ali always picked the damn salad, if you pick out a salad I think I might kick you again."

"Salad?" Johnny asked with a frown.

Ali always got steaks and burgers and lobster. She wasn't a cheap date. They always got dessert. The most ridiculous thing they saw on the menu. She always had to have her own. And then she'd steal bites of whatever Johnny got. She said salad was rabbit food and felt bad for all the girls who couldn't just eat what they wanted on their dates. She sure must've changed. Maybe it came with wanting to be a doctor. She got serious.

That spark went in Daniel's eyes, the flicker of anger. "Let me guess, she never got the salad with you?" He sighed and rubbed his face. "Damn. Okay."

He took a deep breath then looked at Johnny. "Just get something that sounds good, okay? Like actual food. I got this. I wouldn't have come here if I didn't think I could cover it. So like pick something you'll actually enjoy."

Johnny nodded. looking through the menu. Maybe they could share something. Pizza.

"I'm going to order the duck sausage pizza, even though it's a crime. If you want you can have some, but I want you to get something else. If you want to share things, I'm down, but I'm buying you your own meal. And dessert. We can split a dessert," Daniel said.

Johnny looked at his menu again. No to pizza then. Maybe a calzone? Why was everything so expensive?

He was sure there had to be cheaper places out there. Pizza and calzones should be bought for cheap, not whatever price this nonsense was.

Were they paying for the brick oven?

The location?

He heard Daniel shifting in his seat, the sound of his chair moving closer. Johnny didn't lookup.

They'd brought them a basket of warm bread. He could try and get something small and just fill up on free bread.

Daniel would kill him.

Something touched his leg.

Daniel had hooked his legs around his.

The table was small, they'd been bound to bump their knees against each other even if they sat back a bit, but Daniel had his ankles crossed behind Johnny's like he was trying to keep Johnny from running away, or like reassure himself that Johnny was still there.

He looked up at Daniel flipping through his menu nonchalantly. Another strange quirk.

"I'm not going to run," Johnny said amused.

Sometimes Daniel seemed like a kid.

Daniel flipped the page of his menu. "You're sneaky Johnny Lawrence. I don't trust you're not going to still try to pay. This way you can't leave my sight. I've got you."

His eyes flicked up and met Johnny's.

That look wasn't a look of a playful kid. Johnny quickly looked back down at his menu, heart pounding fast. It meant nothing. Daniel was always touching him. He was probably still just trying to figure out how to sit across from Johnny. Like during the dinner at Daniel's house. When he kept stretching out his leg to press his against Johnny's under the table. The guy just needed to know he wasn't alone.

Tactile. Daniel was tactile. It meant nothing.

The back of his neck felt like it was on fire.

Avocado and Maui onions. What even was that? Blood pink carpaccio. The hell was this menu?

Daniel wasn't moving his legs. Johnny wouldn't be able to get up without a huge ordeal. He was effectively trapped.

What was a radicchio? Was it a radish? Why not just say radish? Was it something else? How does one roast a salad in butter? Doesn't that defeat the purpose of it being a salad? Of course, this place would serve oysters.

The waitress came over, Johnny flipped back to the pizza and calzone section.

"I'll do the artichoke and eggplant calzone, with garlic," Johnny said after Daniel ordered his duck sausage pizza.

She flashed him a smile and left to put their orders in.

"Artichoke and eggplant?" Daniel blanched. "Seriously? What is wrong with California? What happened to a good old-fashioned pizza? Calzones are fine, but you essentially got a salad version of a pizza. Artichoke and eggplant. Really? Duck sausage. This place, this place is the most popular spot on the Sunset Strip? With this pizza?"

He was all wound up, pissed on behalf of New Jersey and New York. This, exactly this was Daniel talking shit and not realizing he was going to piss off everyone within earshot.

A bunch of Californians excited to try new flavor combinations and to enjoy a night in a place that was hard to get into. To specifically try weird shit like duck sausage pizza. It was what they liked.

This was what Johnny meant when he worried that Daniel mouth would get him into trouble.

But he was so damn passionate about it. It was kind of funny. Hands flying, talking about real pizza, what pizza actually meant in New Jersey. Exaggerated complaints.

"If anyone from Jersey found out I ate this, they'd never let me back in the state."

Johnny smirked, it was a funny thought. He doubted they'd be able to keep him out long. He'd figure a way in.

Daniel was shifting in his seat, moving his chair closer to the table. He'd fallen silent, was checking out the open kitchen and the brick oven.

"Okay, the oven is cool," he admitted turning back to meet Johnny's eyes.

"So, Mr. Enchino Hills, have you been here before?"

Johnny shook his head. "No, Mom's talked about it."

Daniel grinned. He looked proud of himself. He talked about the coolest restaurants he'd been to. The weirdest ones. Their food came. They split both. The duck sausage pizza with its tomato, mozzarella, and basil.

Daniel looked pissed when he ate it.

"I like it," he complained. "How? How is this good? What the hell?"

Johnny laughed. It was good. He also liked the calzone that Daniel shared with him and that seemed to piss him off more.

"Have I been in California too long? Is it the water? The air? That, what did you call it? Santa Ana winds? Do those fuck up your sense of taste? Is this witchcraft? No one in Newark is going to believe me that this shits good."

"You'll have to make them come here, then, try it for themselves."

Daniel laughed. "Right, I can totally see Uncle Louie here or my grandparents. They'd cross themselves at the door and I'd have to shove them through the doorway to get in. They'd just eat the grilled chicken. I'd have to sneak it to them. Not let them see the menu. Not tell them at all. They're too stubborn."

Seemed like a family trait.

It was pleasant. Just the two of them, in a loud busy restaurant. It was too many people but it was easy to just focus on Daniel. To listen to him talk, at ease despite the fact he was throwing out fighting words almost every other sentence. Lucky that everyone else was too busy, too cheerful to care.

Their leftovers were packed up and Johnny thought it was time to go but Daniel still held his leg between his and leaned forward. "Which dessert sounded good?"

"I'm quite full." Full of cheese and bread and tomato from calzones and pizza.

"Just a bite then. I'll get something. We'll share. Which one?"

Johnny had watched the desserts come out. The woman working on them in the open kitchen, adding finishing touches before they left her watchful eyes. The fruit tart was popular but small, and the chocolate tart was common. Most people seemed to order it. There was an almost green pale sorbet with blueberries and a basic-looking apple pie.

"You get to pick," Daniel said. Waiting patiently.

"Do you like lemon and almonds?" Johnny asked.

"Not going for the chocolate torte?"

"I don't think it'd hold a candle to what your mother made."

It was true. He didn't think he'd ever have such a nice chocolate cake again. It was ruined for him, the rest of his life he'd compare all chocolate cakes and tortes to it and be disappointed.

Daniel's face lit up at that, his smile bright, eyes sparkling. "It was a what, paste cake? Okay, lemon can cut through all the heavy things we ate. I like it." He turned to catch the waitress's eye and put in their final order.

Johnny ate more of it than he meant to. He meant to let Daniel have all of it but a bite. But it was light and refreshing.

They split it fairly equally, not playfully bickering over the last bite.

Which happened every time he'd gone out with Ali. She usually stole the last bite, even if they got separate desserts, and would fall into a fit of laughter at his face.

He'd be too slow.

Eventually, it was just a game. He let her have it. But the game was in the fun of making her work for it. Trying to stab his fork down faster than hers, but always slow enough that she'd beat him. She'd like Spago's. She'd probably already been there with her parents. Opening night he bet. She'd have gotten the fish. She'd know what radicchio was.

He wondered if Daniel did.

"What is a radicchio, do you know?" Johnny asked.

Daniel blinked at him, setting his fork down.

"It was on the menu, in one of the salads," Johnny added.

"It's a leafy vegetable. You know salad mixes? It's the purple-y red and white stuff. It's a type of Chicory, Ma uses it in some of her risotto."

"So not a radish."

Daniel smiled softly. "No, not a radish. Think like a cabbage."

The waitress came back and Daniel paid. He looked pleased with himself. They gathered up the leftovers and walked back to the Ford.

It had looked so unassuming from the outside, but Johnny felt warm.

It'd been nice.

The crowd outside hadn't dwindled.

Daniel started talking about weird leafy vegetables. Stuff his mother used in her cooking. Things he knew about radicchio. Apparently, it was a very Italian vegetable. Or from Italy.

After a while, he asked, "So what movie are we seeing?"

"I don't know. The guys said they already bought the tickets. They...don't always pick good movies. So, it might be a bad one."

"What like something rated Nc-17?" Daniel asked. He was grinning, playful again.

Johnny flushed red. "No! Like they like watching bad flicks. Like with bad acting. You know like B movies? But they like watching normal stuff too. It's all over the place. We've seen some cool foreign films because they're down for it. Dutch whines about subtitles, but he usually calms down once he gets into the plot. But I don't know whose picking the film this time or what it is. I just...it might be bad."

Daniel shrugged, "I'm down no matter what. I think I've seen every good movie that came out last semester."

Ali. With Ali. Of course.

She liked going to the movies almost as much as the guys did. It was how they met anyway. He hoped she wasn't there tonight. He didn't want to see her. And the guys, the guys were still pissed on his behalf. They held grudges like a Koala clung to a eucalyptus tree.

> Spago's was a real place that opened in the 84 in LA and apparently was one of the places to be. I did a price conversion from how much everything cost then versus now and yikes it was expensive.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Daniel had run through their apartment to find his mother.

He'd done it.

Gotten Johnny to agree to dinner.

It wasn't a date. But it felt like one. He ticked off another date in his mental box. Not a date. But he'd laid it on thick. Flirty. The guy was made of stone or something. He needed something good.

He accosted her in the living room, a flurry of movement, tripping over his words. But it got through. He needed a nice place to take Johnny for dinner. Finally paying off that IOU.

She grinned and waltzed over to the phone.

"You watch and learn."

She made calls.

Chatted with coworkers, who had promised her things, working her way through until she got a last-minute reservation at Spago. Pulling strings, cashing in on things owed to her.

It helped to have a mother who was social and knew people well. One second she was calling and asking about their kids, about how their parents were doing, how their dog was, all the little tidbits she remembered because she was a people person.

She remembered everything.

And the next thing he knew she was writing down an address, going over with him how to get there and what to tell the host.

What to whisper since he wouldn't be in the book, but that there would be a table, ready when he got there.

Like magic.

His mother sometimes was pure magic.

She may not have the extensive network she did in Newark but she'd already set up her web in LA.

He kissed her on the cheek and ran to get ready.

She had backups.

A list, just in case it didn't work out.

But he knew it would. It always did. Plus they'd give him a discount. The pricey menu would be half what it normally would.

He could do this.

He could treat Johnny, and treat him well.

He was too excited.

And it worked.

He waltzed in, straight to the guy at the front, said the guy's name and the guy looked surprised to hear his full name and not just the name on his name tag, and Daniel mentioned the table his mother reserved, the little code, and boom.

They were in.

He liked the way Johnny seemed stunned. Surprised.

He didn't ask to know how Daniel had accomplished it. Just seemed to take it in stride. Magic.

That was nice.

But he looked so nervous seeing the prices on the menu. Looked like he was going to run. Bolt. Couldn't have that. He slipped his legs around Johnny's. Watched the way he blushed and hid behind his menu.

Nice. Cute. Maybe there was a chance.

The food was so good it made Daniel mad.

He kept expecting Johnny to tell him to shut up.

But he just looked amused.

And Daniel was nervous. Nervous that someone would realize maybe they didn't actually belong there. A kid from Jersey with a kid from the Hills. Playing at being adults. A date that wasn't a date.

He wanted to do this again. A thousand times. Pick Johnny up, go somewhere fun, sit and eat weird food with him, delicious things, strange things, new things. Watch the way he tried things, slowly tasting it like he was trying to take it apart, figure out how the flavors worked.

How he listened to Daniel, never seemed to tire of it.

When he offered dessert he thought Johnny might try and bolt again and tighten his grip on Johnny's leg. But he didn't. He picked something Daniel wouldn't have.

The way he dismissed the chocolate cake, complimented his mother's cooking so easily Daniel wanted to lean over the table and kiss him, right there in front of everyone.

It had been good. Everything had been good. He even asked Daniel to explain something, curious if Daniel knew in a soft voice and Daniel was delighted that he did.

Delighted to watch Johnny soak up the information in the sweetest way. The urge to kiss him bubbled up again.

Movies and dinner had been most of Daniel and Ali's dates.

It was hard not to feel the ghost of his past relationship.

But Johnny was very different from Ali. Quiet. Attentive.

He was still healing Daniel knew. Readjusting to life without Cobra Kai, without Kreese.

But if Daniel looked close enough he could see new growth, like the green buds of leaves after a long winter. It was slow, but it was happening.

He didn't know what Mr. Miyagi was working on with him, but they were getting there.

He wanted to help, wanted to protect that new growth, support him, keep him safe.

One day he thought, maybe, they could come to someplace like this again and he'd get Johnny to talk more.

They could playfully tease each other.

They'd get there.

He was sure of it.

And he was looking forward to it. To many more dinners shared with Johnny Lawrence.

The ex-cobras were milling around the front of the theater under the bright lights, waiting. They looked happy to see them. The old anger, the heat in their eyes when they looked at Daniel was gone. The atmosphere was light, cheerful. Every time he saw them he half expected things to go south, but they were pulled into the group, arm thrown around Daniel's shoulder and one of them threw an arm around Johnny's waist, familiar, friendly, full of smiles and happiness.

Jimmy was asking him what snacks they should get, Tommy was complaining about some family thing he'd had over the weekend, Dutch was whispering something in Johnny's ear that earned him a swat and Bobby had the tickets and was directing their group like he was herding them through like if he didn't they'd just stand around and hang out and miss the movie. With the tired practice of a veteran kindergarten teacher.

He wondered if that happened. If sometimes the ex-cobras would plan something and just not show up because they were too busy enjoying one another's company. If it didn't matter because they were just happy to be together.

They got popcorn. Jimmy leaned over the glass counter and pulled Daniel forward, asking him what he liked. Daniel picked out sour patch kids, too full really to want anything but appreciating the effort, and the box was pressed into his hands along with several others to carry to their seats.

Daniel found himself on the end of the row. Johnny sitting between him and Bobby. He was in charge of their popcorn and Daniel was in charge of candy, sharing his sour patch kids.

It was weird to be at the movies without Ali.

He'd been a little tense, worried they'd run into her. But there'd been something nice about the ex-cobras surrounding him. Like a little shield.

He didn't think they knew.

Not how badly he'd obliterated his relationship with Ali.

How tersely she spoke with him when she had to. She was still pissed. And he got it. He hadn't handled it well. But everything felt like a ghost of her. The movie theater, the seats, the smell of popcorn. How did Johnny handle it?

"Hey, you okay?"

Daniel blinked and looked at Johnny, who was staring at him, brow furrowed with concern. He was overthinking things.

Yeah, it was weird. But Ali wasn't here. Johnny was.

It wasn't like he could avoid movie theaters for the rest of his life because he was trying not to run into Ali.

He had school with her and that was going fine. Though it helped that other people had filled the void. That his class partners had changed.

He smiled softly at Johnny and grabbed a handful of popcorn.

"Yeah," he said, offering some sour patch kids.

Johnny studied him for half a second longer, then took the offered candy and returned to the movie.

It fit. It was some crime film with a good guy hunting down a murderer. It seemed like the type of movie the cobras would pick.

A tough guy film.

He nearly laughed. He wasn't sure what he'd expected them to pick. But this was so very cliché. He wondered if this was all they watched. If they only ever saw romantic films, if they sat with their girlfriends at those, or if they came together. Or if it was only this. He tried to imagine them sniffing and crying at some dramatic sappy romantic film and the thought was hilarious.

Johnny had made it seem like the options were eclectic. That they'd sit through b movies and foreign films. But it was hard to imagine.

He wanted to wrap an arm around Johnny's shoulder. He wanted to reach over and take his hand.

Daniel held his candy tightly. The cake had been enough. He didn't really need anything else. But it kept him from touching Johnny. Kept his hands to himself.

For about half the movie.

Until he ran out.

Until he couldn't stop himself.

He had to try. Had to see what would happen.

He was in the aisle.

He could run if it didn't go well.

He'd already noted the exits.

He just had to get up, turn and bolt out the door and the other guys could drive Johnny home. But he doubted it would become that.

Not this Johnny. He put his hand on Johnny's leg as casually as he could. Like it was the most normal thing in the world. Higher up his thigh than he had before.

And he left it there, watching the film like he suddenly was very invested in the plot and his heart wasn't in his throat threatening to rebel and run before he did.

Did the guys usually touch him so much that this was nothing?

Daniel frowned, resting his elbow on his other armrest and putting his cheek against his palm, letting his eyes flick down the aisle.

They were all watching the movie.

Johnny was just ever so slightly stiffer than normal.

So he had noticed. Daniel smiled softly.

He'd been worried Johnny just was immune.

But now the concern was that this was normal.

Was it a California thing?

A rich kid Encino Hills thing?

They just always touched each other, if so how high? As high as the grey shorts Johnny wore after school at practices? In gym?

That stirred up some jealousy.

He chewed on his bottom lip.

Maybe he just didn't get that Daniel was trying to flirt.

Maybe California guys didn't get it.

All used to living in sunny California and spending their time on the beach so all those barriers were blurred.

He was starting to feel like a peacock, a bird doing a little dance but being ignored because Johnny wasn't the same type of bird.

Maybe he was like those ostriches that screwed up so bad they flirted with humans instead of other ostriches.

He wasn't pushing Daniel's hand off of him.

He should've gone for Johnny's hand.

Should've tried to hold it.

This was probably just buddy buddy to him.

Oh, what was wrong with California boys?

He was panicking a little.

Ali would've known what he was doing by now.

He was pretty sure any other human would've known he was flirting. That this wasn't platonic.

Maybe Johnny was humoring him. Still felt bad and thought Daniel could do whatever he wanted within reason.

He didn't like that.

What if one of those girls from school had already nabbed him?

What if he'd missed his window?

What if he'd been too slow?

He thought he was moving too fast.

That Johnny needed time to find his footing, adjust his stance.

But the girls had dispersed like someone had staked their claim already.

His hand was getting clammy. Something warm patted his hand gently.

Daniel glanced over.

It was a there-there pat.

Johnny wasn't looking at him, but his hand was close to his, he could strike.

If he hurried he could turn that You're hand is all sweaty and tense on my leg, you okay bro? into holding his hand.

He flipped his hand over and when Johnny brought his hand down for another awkward pat Daniel caught his hand in his, holding it tight.

Johnny looked startled. Daniel had caught him by surprise.

He grinned. He wasn't going to let go. Johnny would have to get a crowbar. This hand was his now, for the rest of the movie. And maybe it'd get through that thick head of his.

Johnny didn't try to pull his hand away but Daniel caught him, covering his face a little. The way he always did when he was hit.

Okay.

He needed a book. Someone who knew Johnny to start deciphering things. Because that seemed like this was fine. Or maybe he was laughing.

Daniel really couldn't tell in the dark.

Was this a good thing?

A bad thing?

It seemed cute. He seemed embarrassed.

But who knew? Johnny was making it so hard to tell what worked and what didn't, or if anything even worked at all.

Daniel didn't let go of Johnny's hand until the credits rolled. He gathered up his trash and stretched before heading out to wait for everyone.

It might not have been a date. But if it had been a date, he was pretty pleased.

Even if he was more confused than ever.

It took a while but they came out, chattering about the film, hands-on Johnny. His lower arms, his back, avoiding the area Daniel had told them about, but still touching him.

Dutch ruffled Johnny's hair with a laugh.

Johnny glared, smoothing it back down.

No wonder he barely reacted most of the time. He had to be bolder.

"Hey, LaRusso," Jimmy called, giving Johnny a push forward towards Daniel. "Get our Johnny home safe will ya?"

"Of course. See you at school," Daniel said stepping forward, he had seconds to pick a move.

One of them had put their arm around his waist.

He liked that.

He'd do that.

He caught Johnny around the waist, arm resting the way it had when they'd been in the mountains. He hadn't tried to walk like that. It kind of worked. He steered Johnny out of the theater and back to the Ford. He stopped at the passenger door, dragging his arm away once they reached the door and gently pressing his palm on the small of his back, lingering a beat obviously too long before pulling away from him to get to the driver's side.

He turned on the radio, drummed his fingers along the steering wheel, and sang along.

It was that time. When all the songs were love songs and he kept glancing at Johnny.

But he was back to being unreadable.

Which was frustrating.

He was being so obvious.

And Johnny was oblivious.

He was definitely a peacock.

He had to figure out what Johnny was because apparently, it wasn't on the same wavelength.

He pulled up at the mansion.

Maybe he could kiss him.

That'd be obvious.

Guys didn't platonically kiss each other too often.

Not after dinner and the movies for sure.

He could lean over, try to be smooth, act like he was going to open the door for him without leaving the car which always felt a little rude but go in for a kiss instead, or help with the seatbelt and kiss him, or he could- damn where'd he go?

Daniel had been so busy trying to think of his move and Johnny had slipped out of the car and was already walking up to the mansion.

He'd said something.

Daniel had missed it.

Johnny paused at the door and Daniel wondered if he ran, if he threw open the car door, if he could still kiss him before he went into the mansion.

He knew he wasn't fast enough.

But maybe he could yell something, shout something to stop him from disappearing into that big dark house.

But what? His mind was always full of chatter. Always full of things to say but he didn't have a clue what to say and Johnny had the door open and was turning, gave him a little wave, and disappeared inside before he could untangle the mess in his head to come up with a plan.

Damnit.

His fingers were gripping the steering wheel too tightly.

He drove home, turning the music off.

It wasn't like that'd been his last chance.

He chewed on his bottom lip.

But it'd been a perfect one.

A nice night.

A fun night.

The perfect night to make a move and he failed.

He struck out by being too slow.

Even though he promised himself to be slow. That he wouldn't rush.

If Johnny wasn't even learning karate yet it'd probably be too early to do anything. But he'd still wanted to kiss him.

He continued to mull it over as he climbed the steps to the apartment and pushed open the door.

His mother was still up, drinking hot chocolate and reading a book. She smiled when he came in.

"How'd it go?" she asked, patting the space next to her on the couch.

Daniel sank down into the couch, putting his leg up on the coffee table.

She'd put so much work into getting him the reservation. So he told her all about Spago. About the food he ate, the food he shared with Johnny, how weird but good it was, what Johnny had said when it came time for dessert.

Her face lit up. She was delighted. Just like he knew she would be.

He talked about the movie. He thought she might like it. So he didn't spoil it.

Told her he drove Johnny home and then

"And I was too slow to kiss him. He was out of the car before I even..."

He froze. He hadn't meant to say that aloud.

"Ma, I mean... I didn't mean..."

"Valentine's day is Thursday," Lucille said getting up and walking over to the kitchen.

She grabbed her recipe box and her cookbook and came back.

"Ma?" Daniel squeaked.

"Chocolate biscotti?" Lucille asked setting a recipe down. She flipped through her box. "Oh, I have this truffle recipe I got from a New York Chocolatier. We could make truffles."

"Ma!"

"Yes, dear?" She asked, looking up from the book in her lap.

"I-I..."

"Like Johnny. I'm aware. I wasn't sure if you were aware though."

"What?"

Her gaze fell back to the book. "You could make him candies. There's a whole section in here on candies. Caramel maybe. You think Johnny likes caramel?"

"Wait, wait," Daniel said turning to her. "What do you mean you were aware?"

"Does he have a bike?"

"A bike? What do you mean?"

"Like a motorcycle or dirt bike?"

"I mean yeah, but I don't know what that has to do with anything. I mean they were on their bikes when we met. Drove them onto the beach."

She hmmed, turning back to her book. "You were saying Bobby makes sweets, so probably shouldn't do any cookies or cupcakes or stuff like that."

"Ma!"

She sighed and patted his arm. "Honey, he's a blonde whose cool. A muscular, popular, tough guy who has a cool bike and car, wears that leather jacket. And now he's sweet and kind to you. He's being nice. It's kismet. Plus you're very obviously constantly flirting with him. I saw the looks at dinner. How you touched his leg in the car."

She knew. She made it sound like he had a type.

"But...how did you? He can't even tell I'm flirting."

"I'm your mother."

He swallowed his response. He sunk deeper into the couch.

"What if he doesn't like me back?" he asked softly.

She scoffed. "Is this because of the girls?"

"What?"

"You were floating along without a care in the world. Flirting but just enjoying flirting. And then at dinner, you said Johnny was swarmed by girls, and your voice was all tight." She poked him in the arm. "You were upset, even though you laughed." She studied him.

Daniel looked away.

"You're not going to lose your window. I doubt it I mean. I say ignore it."

He blinked and looked back at her.

She sighed. "Laura and I are going for high tea at the Getty Villa. I'll see if you have anything to worry about." She held up her hands. "I'll be discrete. But honey, you're hanging out with him and his friends near constantly. And when he's not with you, isn't he with Mr. Miyagi? I think you'd notice if he suddenly was back on the dating scene."

He mulled that over. She was right. He'd just have to keep an eye out. But he didn't want to miss his shot. But he did miss just casually flirting. Seeing what landed and what didn't. What got a reaction. Not a lot yet seemed to.

But he'd work on it. Take a peek under that cool guy exterior. Then he'd lift up the mask and give him a real kiss. The only concern was that under that mask were nothing but tears.

She tapped the cookbook again. "So, what do you want to make?"

He leaned over, looking over at the glossy pages. At the recipe cards, she'd set out.

He had known his mother wouldn't really care, but there'd been a small bit of him that'd been scared. Worried.

He hadn't meant to tell her. But it was a relief that it didn't change anything. He picked up one of the recipe cards.

"Let's make this one."

She grinned. "Good choice. The best way to a guy's heart is through his stomach, right?"

He laughed.

"Alright, I will pick up the ingredients tomorrow after work, and then we can make some tests. Then you can make them on your own Wednesday, take them and give them to Johnny on Thursday. And I can enjoy all the rejects. I like this plan. Maybe I'll take some to work. They'll like it."

"Oh, I almost forgot," Daniel said. "I'll get it later, but we had too much food. So I brought you back leftovers from Spago."

"You'll get it later you say. Give me your keys. I want to try this nonsense myself," she said getting up quickly and holding her hand out for the keys.

He laughed and passed them over.

"Duck on pizza. Grease on grease. What a terrible idea." She was still grumbling about it as she left.

She returned with the boxes. He'd forgotten to give Johnny his leftover calzone. Been too preoccupied. Too lost in thought.

His mother returned with a reheated piece of pizza to the couch and took a bite. Her nose wrinkled. She took another bite. She looked at Daniel with a frown.

He laughed. "Right?"

"What sort of sorcery is this?"

"It works. Everything they made worked. It was all delicious!"

"I'm stealing this. This is my lunch tomorrow. I'm taking it to work. I get why you were mad. This was normally how much?"

"You don't want to know."

Chapter End Notes

> So the ostriches flirting/doing their dance for humans is a...thing. And there have been other studies of birds flirting with humans. But here's an old BBC article on the ostrich-specific one: http://news.bbc.co.uk/2/hi/uk_news/scotland/2834025.stm

> Oh, also the movie they saw was "Witness." Because uhhh awkwardly a lot of the films in January/February 1985 were like the same plot of Karate Kid of new kids moving to a new town and then ending up with the local blonde "gang" leaders girl and thus having to like fight for their lives against the local bullies. And I just couldn't come up with a way in which that wouldn't be awkward AF. lol

Intervention and Lavender Cookies

Valentine's Day week snuck up on Johnny. He hadn't been paying attention. Hadn't noticed the pink, red, and white that exploded over the school. Hadn't noticed the flower sign-ups.

He'd forgotten about it.

Until the guys filled up the Avanti and he didn't know why they were there.

School had ended.

They'd all driven their own cars.

Johnny had enough time to grab his bonsai before Bobby sat on it, as they drummed on his seats.

"So, Valentine's Day. What do you have planned?" Tommy asked leaning forward.

"Nothing."

"Nothing!" Jimmy sounded scandalized. "For Ali, you always had flowers for her. A bouquet of the stupid expensive shit from the florist that you ordered months in advance. She nearly got buried in it when she opened her locker the first year you guys dated. Then you took her out skating. The other year it was dancing and you snuck champagne right? Got those expensive chocolates imported from... Oh, where was it again?"

"Peru," Tommy said.

"Right. From there. You got a private dinner reservation where it was just the two of you and that five-star chef," Jimmy continued.

"And you got nothing for Daniel?" Dutch said with a frown. "Seriously?"

"I forgot about Valentine's Day okay?" Johnny said starting the car. He also didn't know how he could afford any of that anymore. He didn't have a date fund. He didn't have money to splurge. Not much. Sid had given him so much money to spoil Ali. "Where are we going? What's happening here?"

"Apparently an intervention," Bobby said with a laugh. "Let's go to my place."

"Am I seriously driving you all to the Brown's?"

"Yes," Bobby said putting on his seatbelt. "Drive on chauffeur."

Johnny rolled his eyes and made his way to Bobby's house.

"I was worried this would happen," Bobby said.

"What would happen?"

"You'd drop the ball."

"What ball?"

"In old fancy ways," Tommy said. "You're courting and you missed prepping for the big event."

"We're seniors, not kindergartens. We don't need to make a big deal out of Valentine's Day. It's a stupid holiday anyway."

"You didn't think so with Ali. What, is big strong Johnny scared that Daniel won't like whatever you plan? Or did you make a move after the movie and he didn't like it?" Jimmy asked.

"I doubt that, I mean did you see the way he put his arm around Johnny's waist?" Dutch laughed. "Also I'm pretty sure I saw him holding your hand."

Bobby frowned and Johnny could feel him staring. He avoided looking.

"You still like Daniel don't you?" Tommy asked.

"Yes," Johnny said through gritted teeth.

"You're scared!" Bobby said.

"I am not scared!"

"You are! You're scared shitless that what? We're getting your hopes up and he doesn't actually like you? Or...oh."

"Oh what?" Johnny said whirling to look at him as he stopped at the red light. "What Bobby? You read me so well, what the hell am I scared of huh?"

"That he'll leave you suddenly like Ali did," Bobby said softly after a while.

Johnny frowned, turning back and driving. He hated that Bobby could do that. He knew where all the chinks in his armor were and how to peek in and see straight through. He was too good at reading Johnny. Too empathetic.

"What's your plan Bobby Brown?" he asked.

"My house is chaos. I was going to put you all to work." Bobby said softly. "My little siblings have already jumped ship."

Johnny scoffed.

Of course.

The day before Valentine's Day was when Bobby's life always turned upside down. Usually, he was the one abandoning ship.

It was when his parents were working wildly in the house, trying to cram in last minute designs and desserts onto the menus. Testing out new things. They ran headfirst into their deadlines.

Their customers ate it up. Loved showing up on Valentine's Day to see what the newest concoction they'd come up with.

Even if it'd only been finalized 3 hours before they opened.

Bobby usually spent the week leading up to Valentine's Day crashing at Johnny's.

Avoiding the chaos and tired of taste testing which was the right ratio of flavors even if it was only 1 teaspoon difference.

He smirked. Of course, he was calling in reinforcements. Johnny was surprised he hadn't done so earlier. Going home with 4 other teenage boys was sure to help curb the amount of taste testing Bobby and his younger siblings would have to do.

When they were doing karate together they were like locusts. Ate so much food. He was sure they could do that again.

It just depended on how much the house was already drowning in. This he could focus on. He'd hold onto this and ignore the arrow

Bobby had shot straight into his heart.

Walking through the front door of the Brown's house was like walking into a bakery. It smelled sweet and warm.

It always did.

No matter how many times Johnny visited.

He liked the Brown's house. He liked Mr. and Mrs. Brown. He even liked Bobby's little siblings. Even though they were loud and messy.

The first time he'd been there he'd been invited to dinner. They'd ordered a pizza.

They didn't cook.

They baked.

Mrs. Brown had said they were different beasts, cooking and baking.

Mr. Brown said baking was more of a science.

Organized and specific. He made it sound like he was a mad scientist hard at work.

But it was just creative chaos.

A messy kitchen with messy notes covered in batter and vanilla extract. They made their own jams and preserves. Grew their own fruit and had an herb garden that Johnny liked sitting in.

He liked the lavender and the mint that grew there that they picked fresh to use in their testing.

It'd taken almost a year of friendship for Johnny to realize they even had two kitchens.

Their test kitchen was where he and Bobby usually hung out, among the chaos talking about homework and the other kitchen that they showed guests.

They didn't let people into their test kitchen.

Johnny hadn't even realized what a big deal it was until he'd seen other people at their house.

He'd had a lot of firsts at the Brown house.

His first study group session. Him and Bobby trying to figure out algebra even though they went to different schools.

His first board game night.

The first time he'd been to someone's house when it wasn't because of Sid. He'd been to so many parties before going to Bobby's, but the invitations had always been because of parents. Because someone's parents wanted to get on Sid's good side. The kids hadn't actually liked Johnny.

His first sleepover. Bobby had just invited cobras. They'd slept in the living room, after a night of games and music and snack food and more sweets than Johnny thought any parent would normally let their kids have. Before turning out the lights Mr. and Mrs. Brown had tucked all the boys in. Like it was normal. Like that's just what they did. No one made fun of them for it. No one made fun of Bobby.

No one but Johnny's mother had ever tucked him in, and she'd stopped because there wasn't anywhere to tuck him in in the car. And then Sid had told her she was spoiling him. So she hadn't continued it very long after they moved in together. He'd said Johnny was too old to be coddled.

He'd always thought that if something went south fast. Like before he got the Avanti, before he could drive, if something happened to the Avanti or his bike. He'd go to the Browns.

He memorized how to get there on his bike, on foot. He knew how long it'd take. If he ran he could get there much faster. He used to, when he was training, time himself. Running from his house to the Browns.

They weren't close.

But he wanted to make sure he could do it.

If he had to.

They'd always told him he was welcome any time. He could just come over.

But he'd never taken them up on it.

He didn't want to be a burden.

He couldn't think of any way to make himself be useful for them.

He'd just be in the way.

So he only came when he was explicitly invited.

When Bobby dragged him home with him. When it was Bobby's birthday. When they invited him to dinner.

He'd nearly done it once. His mother had been out of town. Which was rare. She'd been invited out with some of the ladies from the country club. She was gone for a weekend.

Sid got drunk.

He'd thought about going to the Browns. But his mother would be back. It'd be fine when she got back.

He didn't want to worry the Browns. Didn't want to have to explain.

Johnny slept on the beach.

Mr. Brown was pulling something out of the oven, very slowly, very carefully. He turned and grinned at the boys moving it somewhere to cool.

"Hey! Bobby said he might've been calling in the cavalry!"

Mrs. Brown was curled over their notes. She had flour in her hair.

He liked that they didn't care about their appearances. They were always a mess.

They could clean up.

Johnny nearly hadn't recognized them at a fancy benefit they'd attended. Where they'd met his mom and Sid. They weren't useful to Sid, so he didn't care.

It was better that way. He'd come to realize there was less pressure if Sid didn't like his friends.

If he had, it would've been like Ali. He would've been too interested, too involved. The thought of Sid at his karate matches made his stomach flop. The thought of Sid and Kreese meeting made him feel sick. It was better to have things separated.

She looked up and smiled. Her hair was up in a messy bun. Glasses low on her nose, threatening to slip off. She pushed them back up with the back of her hand, the only part of her hands that were clean.

"You ready to be put to work?" she asked. Her voice was warm.

"Of course," Johnny said.

She smiled at him. "We've got a few recipes we need tested."

"I woke up inspired," Mr. Brown said with grandiose.

"He woke up scribbling like the combinations in his dreams were good combinations. Like he'd been touched by a muse. I'm pretty sure it's nonsense." She laughed and he pouted. But it was playful. Warm.

He pulled out his notebooks and handed them over to Bobby. "Go use the other kitchen. Don't worry if you destroy it," he said with a grin. "We'll come by with stuff for you to try."

Bobby took charge. Leading them to the pristine kitchen. He read through the recipe and ordered them around.

Johnny wasn't good at cooking or baking.

But Bobby was patient. He kept a watchful eye as he delegated tasks amongst their group.

"And then we need some vinegar."

"Vinegar? Really, let me see that," Johnny said with a frown, snapping up the notes and squinting.

The Browns had doctor handwriting. It was unreadable.

"How can you read this?"

Bobby leaned over and pointed to the chicken scratch., "That says vinegar. I can read my parent's handwriting."

Johnny pushed it back to him and grumbled about who put vinegar in their dessert. But he did as he was told. He couldn't try to decipher the Brown's handwriting. All their special recipes would stay safe forever because no thief would be able to read them. He thought maybe that was the point. Wondered if they'd created their writing style for that purpose.

He knew though they re-wrote them when they were put into their recipe books and boxes. Those he'd seen. Printed out neatly. But the experiments never were.

The first batch went in the oven and despite his reservations, it smelled good.

But Bobby wasn't done.

There was no rest.

There were more things to make.

More fever dream recipes to test.

It was exhausting. Johnny was covered in sweat. The guys were whining. But it was just like letting out steam. They kept working. Kept kneading dough. Kept mixing batter. Kept whisking. Kept folding meringue.

Johnny wondered if maybe Mr. and Mrs. Brown were stronger than they looked. It was a good workout.

Maybe he could work in a bakery. He could get up before the sun and make bread every morning.

When they were finished the guys sunk dramatically to the floor.

Dutch laid flat on his back on the marble floors.

"When you said we were going to bake for Valentine's day," Dutch said, slapping a flour-covered hand against Bobby's leg. "I thought you meant we'd make like kiddie chocolate or something we could give girls. Not this nonsense."

Bobby frowned dusting off the flour handprint on his leg. "I never said that. I said I'd put you to work and you could take some of it with you."

"I'm realizing now that you neglected to tell us what we'd be making," Jimmy said with a frown. "How strategic Brown."

Johnny sunk to sit on the tile to join them.

Bobby grinned, hands on his hips looking down at them. "You think those baked goods just show up? Magically are whisked into existence?"

"We get it," Tommy whined. "Your parents do a lot of work."

"Yeah, it's about time you get it. I've been doing this since I was like 5," Bobby said flexing his arms.

The guys tiredly clapped. Applause for the muscle show but too tired to really care. Bobby laughed and crouched down.

"Thanks. My parents are going to really appreciate it."

"No problem. Glad to be of help," Johnny said.

Bobby turned and flicked him on the forehead.

Johnny's hand shot up to his forehead. "What the hell Bobby?"

"You always do that. Get out from under that dark cloud. Thank you for your help. But I didn't bring you here just for your muscles. I specifically dragged you here so you could have something to give Daniel. That you made."

"Are the things we made any good?" Johnny asked.

Bobby's hand flew to his chest with mock offense. "You dare? In my home? The home of my parents? Challenge their creative endeavors in baking? You dare doubt their brilliant recipes? The ones you've eaten for years?"

Johnny looked away, down at the floor. "Sorry."

Bobby laughed. "You didn't have to try the salsa cupcakes. Those were nasty. Too spicy and they didn't set right. Nah, these ones all looked like they'd work. Mom and Dad cleared them for bulk making and testing. They only make the weird stuff in the other kitchen."

Tommy pushed himself up and looked at Johnny. "Are you going to at least try to look nice on Valentine's Day?"

"Don't I always look nice?"

Tommy frowned.

"He means nicer. Effort," Dutch said. "You know, something that shows off your...assets."

Johnny did not like the way he said that. Didn't like where this was going. Like he was some rich ladies purebred poodle about to go to show.

"I'm trying to remember what Johnny's got in his closet," Jimmy hummed.

"Can't do the red jacket," Tommy said.

"What's wrong with my jacket?"

"It's good for biking and being cool. But it's...well with the patch is gone..." Jimmy said slowly.

"Oh! What about the green button-up? Has Daniel seen that yet?" Tommy asked.

"Yeah, I wore it to dinner at his house."

"Wait," Dutch said sitting up suddenly. "You had dinner at his house and didn't tell us? The hell Johnny, next we know you're going to say you already kissed and yet still have cold feet."

Johnny looked away.

"The HELL! Johnny I'm going to murder you," Dutch said landing a punch on Johnny's leg. "Seriously! How can we help you if you're keeping shit from us?"

"It doesn't count. And I don't talk about this stuff."

Dutch rolled around on the floor muttering curses covering his face with his hands. "Someone else, someone else do it. I can't, I will kill him."

Bobby leaned close, too close and Johnny scooted back until he hit the cabinets. He turned to scoot further down but Jimmy was there, blocking his way.

"I don't talk about this," he repeated.

"Yeah," Bobby said. "We get that. Dutch always pressed about Ali. He's a bit of a perv. You like to respect your partner's privacy. I get that. Very noble. But you keep saying Daniel doesn't like you. So if you've kissed it's for sure going to make us think maybe just maybe you've fallen and hit your head something damn awful." Bobby slapped his hand into the cabinets next to Johnny's head. "Did you fall and hurt yourself recently Johnny? Huh?"

Johnny usually wasn't on this end of this version of Bobby. Dutch usually was. Sometimes Jimmy or Tommy was. But never Johnny. He was cornered. He was stuck. There wasn't any escape.

"He was drunk. It didn't count. Drunk kisses never count," Johnny said sourly.

It was his only way out.

He wouldn't go into details.

Bobby blinked looking at Jimmy with a frown.

"Johnny doesn't really take advantage of drunk..." Jimmy said slowly.

"Daniel kissed you!" Tommy said popping up from the floor.

"He was drunk," Johnny said slowly.

"Wait, when was Daniel drunk? At the dinner you had? He drunkenly, kiss you good night?" Dutch called. He'd gotten up and was opening the fridge, peering in. He grabbed a fruit bowl and set the bowl down and sat down on a stool, tossing grapes into his mouth.

"The dinner was a thing his mother wanted us to do. So my mother and I went. I wore the green shirt and we ate her home-cooked food. It was really good."

"Better than the lasagna?" Dutch asked.

"Good as, but more. Lots more," Johnny said, hoping they kept talking about the dinner and not circling back.

"Damn I want to eat more of Mrs. LaRusso's cooking," Jimmy said. "That lasagna was delightful."

Bobby snapped his fingers in front of Johnny's face. "Nope. Focus. You're not leading us down a food rabbit hole."

"The party," Tommy said. "Isn't that when Daniel got super drunk and Johnny had to drive him home? We couldn't find Johnny or Daniel most of the night. And! Daniel was pissed when we thought he and Ali did it. Told us not to spread rumors."

Damn. All those detective novels Tommy read.

He was grinning at Johnny.

"I'm right aren't I?"

He was too pleased with himself. Too damn observant.

"So Daniel sees Ali, gets his heartbroken, gets drunk, finds Johnny, kisses him? That what we're going with?" Jimmy asked.

"Based on his face?" Bobby said studying Johnny in that annoying way he did. "Yeah."

"So what's the problem?" Dutch asked, flicking a grape at them. Bobby caught it and glared at Dutch. Dutch looked away.

They were quiet. Waiting for Johnny to speak. He frowned.

"Drunk means nothing." He said softly, pushing himself up. "Ali sometimes kissed other people when she was drunk. It's why...I thought they'd work it out."

"Don't know how to break this to you bud, but Ali and Daniel are not the same people," Dutch said tossing a grape high up in the air and leaning back to catch it. He did and grinned, satisfied. "Some people, show their true colors when they're drunk. Like you."

Johnny felt his face flush bright red. "Yeah? What kind of drunk am I?"

"Sad," Dutch said. "And sweet."

Johnny frowned, looking at them.

"You're very hands-on," Bobby said with a soft smile. "Lots of hugs. Lots of things you don't normally say."

"It's why we honestly didn't hate how much you drank at the lodge. Why we suffered and still bought you that stupid drink," Jimmy said. "Because, unlike Dutch, you wouldn't strip or want to challenge the poor bartender to an arm wrestle. You, we have to pick up off the floor as soon as you stand, and you're a miserable man when hungover. Just whiny and full of curses. But there's no heat in it. And on the way back to the lodge you always told us how you feel."

"Just go back to fixing my terrible wardrobe problems will you?" Johnny said burying his face in his hands. Told them how he felt. About what? What kind of embarrassment was he to himself?

Tommy laughed. "Maybe you could borrow Bobby's flannel."

"Oh, now that's an idea. If we open up our closets we could definitely get him in something nicer," Jimmy said turning to Tommy.

"Oh god, what is this?" Johnny groaned.

"What? It's what they always do in the movies," Tommy said with a grin.

"A makeover? Seriously? That's where you're going?"

"I'm down," Dutch said with a grin. "Something that makes his eyes pop, and shows off the guns."

"I hate you all."

"According to drunk you, you don't," Bobby said patting his arm and standing.

Johnny groaned.

"They've cooled. We make the icing now. And then later we can go through my closet and see what fits Johnny."

Johnny helped to make icing and glazes and they decorated the things they made. When they were done Johnny thought it was about time to go home. Wondered if he could sneak out.

But instead found himself sitting on the floor in Bobby's room while the guys raided Bobby's closet, holding things up to Johnny and throwing things in a yes pile or a no pile.

Bobby's room was normally neat, and they were destroying it. Johnny half expected Bobby to put an end to it. But he looked amused. He was commenting. He was helping destroy his own room.

Some things were too casual.

Others too fancy.

Not enough asset showing. Whatever the hell that meant.

Johnny was half tempted to just lay down and fall asleep. He started to nod off but a shirt was thrown at him and he started awake.

"Dude, we got to see if it makes your eyes look nice."

What was wrong with his friends?

He wondered if they'd get pissed if he just left. Left them all stranded. He was their ride.

He couldn't just leave them all and inflict them upon the Browns.

But damn he was getting close to going to his car and leaving with his bonsai.

A knock came at the door about halfway through Bobby's stupidly large closet. What teenage boy needed so much clothing? It was practically a store.

"Boys, Dinner," Mr. Brown said. "We ordered Chinese food."

"We'll come back to this," Bobby warned, helping Johnny to his feet and pushing him out the door to the dining room.

Were they going to be at this all night?

Ridiculous.

Yes, Valentine's day was the next day but he didn't need to make a big deal about it. They didn't need to make a big deal about it. He liked doing things his own way. And yeah he did forget but he'd been busy.

The Chinese food was nice. The guys talked. The Browns listened but then would get ideas that they'd jot down.

About halfway through, Mrs. Brown lifted her pen. "I put out the extra towels and bedding."

Extra towels? Bedding?

Johnny turned to Bobby with a frown.

"Yeah, you're not going home Johnny. This year you're spending the night," Bobby said.

"We all are," Jimmy said.

"But clothes?"

"You're borrowing mine," Bobby said.

"And we packed," Tommy said.

"So you planned this ahead of time?" Johnny asked, voice tight.

"Yup. You're driving us to school tomorrow." Bobby nodded.

Johnny frowned. This really was going to happen all night.

When dinner wrapped up Johnny went and got his bonsai and his go-bag. He didn't want to leave it outside all night.

He protested when they tried to get him to try on clothes. So many clothes. They were too into it. Too amused.

He was relieved when they all agreed on an outfit and when they started nodding off to go to bed.

He showered.

He opened his go bag, pulling out a change of clothes, soft enough to sleep in.

The room was quiet.

All the guys had fallen asleep.

There was a little bit of bedding on the floor for him to sleep in.

Unlike Johnny's bed, Bobby's wasn't big enough to share.

Not without bumping into one another in their sleep.

But the Browns had little foam things they rolled out onto the floor so it was softer for guests.

He slipped out of the room and down through the halls, holding his bonsai.

Johnny made his way to the test kitchen. Heart pounding, hands sweaty. Show no fear.

He knocked gently on the kitchen door. Mr. and Mrs. Brown were still hard at work.

"Johnny! What's up? Here try this."

Johnny took the cupcake. He nodded his appreciation after a bite. "Mint?"

"Yes. Great."

"Do you remember the cookies you made, the simple shortbread ones? Uh, a couple of years ago for the summer, with lavender?"

"Oh of course." Mr. Brown said.

"Could," Johnny cleared his throat. "Could I make some?"

Mr. Brown and Mrs. Brown glanced at each other then grinned. Mrs. Brown got up and walked over to a cabinet and jumped up, grabbing a binder off a big shelf. It was messy, full of sticky notes and loose pieces of paper. She flipped through it and Mr. Brown came close.

"No, it's further in the back."

"I thought it was next to the lava cakes."

"No, we moved it, we tried reorganizing by season remember?"

"Oh right. There it is."

She snapped open the binder and pulled out a piece of paper. Mr. Brown took it and handed it over to Johnny. "Everything you need is in the other kitchen. Except, honey, where's the lavender?"

"Here," she said grabbing a jar and passing it over. "Cute tree by the way."

"Uh, thanks. It's a bonsai."

"If you get confused let us know okay? Make yourself at home Johnny. Oh and there are little bags and stuff. Help yourself with storing your cookies, there are also paper boxes. Use what you want."

"Thank you," Johnny said, looking down at the recipe.

It was readable.

Someone had typed it up.

He made his way to the other kitchen and set the bonsai down. He looked at it and smiled softly.

"I used to have a book," he said as he got out all the dry ingredients, all the wet ingredients. "Mom gave it to me. One of her jobs was at a florist, she liked that job, but it went under."

He set the temperature on the oven, glancing at the paper and setting everything out. Organizing it based on what he read.

"Language of flowers. Valentine's day is a lot of red roses, dahlia's, red tulips, carnations. They're romantic. They mean love. But lavender. That's something different."

He opened the jar. He kind of wished he still had his black headband. It was in the box in the back of his closet with his gi, and his patches. He figured no one would want that. Even if he donated it. It'd do no one any good.

He couldn't believe Mr. and Mrs. Brown had just given him the recipe. They hadn't asked him why he wanted to make it.

He'd leave their kitchen nicer than he left it. He'd clean as he went. He'd move slowly. Patiently.

He ground lavender and sugar together with a mortar and pestle. It smelled like the garden. He completed the dough and set it in the fridge. Moved onto the glaze.

Johnny didn't cook a lot. Didn't bake a lot. But he was good at following instructions. And a lot of the unfamiliar terminology Bobby had gone over that afternoon for the cakes and candies they'd made.

He rolled out the cookie dough when it was chilled then looked at the bonsai.

"I got to cut them. But how? And what?"

He frowned.

Hearts were too much.

If he handed anyone a cookie he'd made in the shape of hearts he'd never live it down. Plus it felt too...cheesy.

He looked through the drawers. He knew the Browns had a ridiculous amount of cookie cutters. He found a box and went through it. Basic shapes, hearts, flowers, a circle.

He set the circle aside.

Dinosaurs. Ha, perfect if they were in elementary school. He found Christmas ones, alphabet letters, butterflies, holiday shapes, one of the state of California, a star. He took the star out. Stars and circles. That was fine. It wasn't perfect. But it was good enough.

He cut out dough, put it on cookie sheets, rerolled, cut again, set those on more cookie sheets. Popped them in the oven and waited.

He cleaned.

He pulled the cookies out when his timer went off. He let them cool, sitting on a stool and resting his cheek on the countertop looking at the bonsai.

"Bobby said I'm scared." He sighed. "I think that's an understatement. Which is silly."

He pressed his forehead into the cool countertop.

"Fear doesn't live in this dojo." he imitated, Kreese's voice, a grumble. "It's not that fear doesn't live here. It's that you don't show it. It's all he really wanted. Easy to fake."

He reached out and poked one of the cookies. Still too warm. He wanted to taste it. They looked okay.

He waited.

"I still have that book. Managed to keep it. Think it's the only book we have from before. Used to take it with me when I went to the florist to pick stuff out for Ali. The florist had the same book. Ali didn't actually really care I think. She liked the flowers. The effort. But not the language behind it. Never got my secret messages. I even got her a copy of the same book. But that's okay. I didn't tell her why. Didn't tell her the point. It was more for myself I think."

He poked the cookies again. They were cool.

He sat up, gathering up the glaze, and pouring it carefully over the cookies.

Maybe he was like a kindergartner. It was kind of silly. But he was doing what he wanted.

He picked one up and studied it carefully before taking a bite. It was what he remembered. A taste of spring. Of a garden. He hadn't screwed it up.

He looked around looking for the boxes and bags. He packaged them up carefully. Found a pen, made a note, and stuck it on one of the boxes that he set in the corner of the kitchen. Then he carefully carried the rest out to the trunk of his car. He scrubbed everything in the kitchen down and returned the recipe to the Browns.

He thanked them, not just for the recipe but for dinner and having them over. They smiled.

He went back to Bobby's room and went to bed.

Johnny woke up early, folding up his bedding and getting ready. He woke up the guys.

Only Bobby responded.

"I'm going to school now. If you want a ride, your chariot's leaving in a half-hour."

Bobby groaned looking at his alarm clock. "Johnny it's 6 am."

Johnny was adjusting the deep blue flannel they'd decided on. "I got stuff to do this morning." He glanced around. They weren't moving. He sighed. "Fine, I'll come back and get you. Be ready by 7:30. Like outside."

"You're an alien," Bobby complained, grabbing his pillow and shoving it back over his head. "A different planet where people don't sleep."

Johnny grabbed his stuff and headed out the door. He hoped in the Avanti and headed out to Reseda. He pulled into the parking lot and popped the trunk, picking out one of his boxes, with one of his notes.

He spotted the truck and grabbed another and headed towards the apartment complex.

That saved him time. He set one outside of room #20.

He couldn't sneak one to Mr. Miyagi.

Mr. Miyagi glanced up surprised.

"Very early Johnny-san."

"Yeah, I'm running uh gifts. For you, as thanks," Johnny said passing him a box of cookies. "I made them. They're lavender cookies."

"Lavender," Mr. Miyagi repeated taking the box. He smiled softly. "Calming flower. Many meanings."

Johnny nodded. "Have a good rest of your day. I got to drop off another."

Johnny hurried back to his car and drove home.

He knew his mother was up.

She got up early on Valentine's Day because Sid always did something ridiculous. One year he flew her to Paris.

She always had to drink her coffee first. Mental prepare herself.

He walked into the kitchen through the back door and she stood in her robe, hair done and her make-up already finished as she drank her coffee, leaning against the counter.

She turned and smiled at him.

"Oh, I like this look."

"You can thank Bobby and the guys," Johnny said.

She cupped the side of his face with a smile. "Got anything up your sleeves today?"

He held out a box. She glanced surprised but smiled, she flicked it open and grinned. "Cookies?"

"Lavender."

"Ah, how sweet. Devotion." She kissed his forehead and then popped one in her mouth. "I hope you have some fun today."

He smiled. "Good luck to you."

She laughed. "I think we're going to brunch somewhere ridiculous."

Johnny glanced at the clock. "I got to go pick up the guys. Love you."

"Love you."

They were standing around outside Bobby's house when Johnny returned to get them.

"7:30 on the dot," Bobby said shaking his head looking at his watch before opening his door. He frowned. "What's that?"

"Your gift."

"My gift?"

"Yeah."

Bobby glanced into the back seat where three more boxes sat. "Did you chicken out?"

"Do you not want the cookies I made last night?" Johnny asked leaning over to reach for the box.

Bobby snatched it up. "Oh don't you dare try and take my cookies back."

Johnny smirked.

"Wait, you made these?" Dutch asked through a mouthful, already digging in.

Johnny checked that they had their seatbelts on and headed off the familiar way to school.

"Yeah."

"When?"

"While you were all sleeping."

"Why don't you ever seem to sleep?" Bobby said.

"Did you make some for Daniel?" Tommy asked.

"Yes."

Bobby nodded. "So you didn't want to give him any of the cakes we made yesterday?"

"No," Johnny said then glanced at Bobby. "But, uh, thanks for setting that up. For reminding me."

"Yeah?"

"Yeah."

Bobby looked pleased, he popped open the box. "Are these my parent's lavender cookies?"

"I borrowed the recipe."

"Good choice."

Pity

Determination was something Daniel had in spades.

He'd made truffles, spent the week going over the recipe his mother had, making adjustments. She took all of the samples to work. Helped him by taste testing and giving him advice. And he was pretty proud of what they'd come up with.

At school on Valentine's Day, he tried to figure when the best time was to give them to Johnny.

He was so singularly focused that he was caught off guard when he saw Ali at Johnny's locker.

Talking to him.

Leaning against the lockers, holding her folders to her chest.

The way she tucked her hair behind her ear and looked up at him.

He reminded himself that she was dating the football player.

But they looked like they were at ease with one another while Johnny was opening his locker.

A flood of colorful paper.

Hundreds of envelopes slid to the floor around his feet.

Johnny looked startled and Ali started laughing.

He stooped down to pick them all up, brows furrowed as he set them carefully back in his locker in a little pile.

There wasn't enough space. He dumped them into his bag.

Ali was still talking.

Johnny nodded.

She reached out and touched his arm, just above the elbow.

Left it there too long.

Daniel was not in a good place to give Johnny his truffles. His hands were in fists, his jaw too tight.

He turned, he walked to his class, slamming his locker a little harsher than he meant.

He calmed down in class.

Thought about handing it over then.

But girls swarmed Johnny's desk.

Johnny kept shooting looks at Tommy who gave him a shrug.

Daniel put the truffles back in his bag.

At lunch, Bobby gave them all heart-shaped cupcakes.

They were delicious.

Johnny held his bag in his lap and kept zipping it and unzipping it, fiddling with it.

He was too distracted.

They all had their own pile of treats.

Things girls at the school had given them.

It was like Halloween.

Like kids going through their spoils from the night.

They offered to share with Daniel.

But Daniel didn't want it. It was a stark reminder of how little the girls liked him.

But that was fine.

He didn't care about the girls. It just hurt his pride.

He was running out of time.

Johnny was busy in the halls.

Girls kept giving him stuff.

He'd have to do something else.

He'd have to come up with something else.

When school was over he shot straight to the Avanti.

He waited for Johnny.

For Johnny to go collect his bonsai from wherever his new hiding spot was.

Daniel had peeked into the greenhouse shortly after the first time he'd found Johnny in there, and the bonsai was gone.

He'd worried that someone had stolen it.

Nearly tore the greenhouse apart only for the teacher to find him and chew him out.

He didn't know how he had the worst luck with the teachers misunderstanding him. But he did.

Then he'd seen Johnny with it. Realized Johnny had hidden it elsewhere.

There.

Blonde in tight blue flannel, so blue Daniel could see his eyes, bright and blue from across the parking lot.

The bonsai was sticking out of his bag.

His bag was full.

"Hey. Need a ride?" Johnny asked.

Yes.

"No," Daniel said.

Johnny sat his bag down and very carefully put the bonsai in the passenger seat and carefully pulled out a box. He ran his thumbs over it, staring at it before turning to Daniel.

"Here," Johnny said.

Daniel took it.

He was sharing some of the millions of sweets the girls had given him.

Cookies.

Homemade.

Ouch.

Poor girl.

Daniel wavered.

His Mom would be upset if he didn't.

Johnny was zipping up his bag and setting it on the back seat.

He had a small smile on his face.

He looked pleased. Probably from getting hundreds of treats.

From the girls suddenly flooding back.

From Ali flirting with him as if nothing had ever happened.

What an ego boost. Daniel wouldn't know.

Daniel opened his bag and took out the small box of truffles.

"Johnny," Daniel said.

Johnny turned and Daniel put the box in his hands.

He was losing his nerve.

The millions of things he wanted to say.

It was all jumbling up.

His heart was pounding in his ears.

His fingers were touching Johnny's and that was fine, that was normal.

He touched Johnny all the time. Not the way he wanted. Hmm. Nope. Needed to reel his brain back in.

"Ma's got this recipe."

Oh god, why did he mention his mother?

"She got it from this chocolatier in New York."

This wasn't what he meant to say.

"I made some. Er. I made these."

Run.

Oh god.

What a fool he'd made of himself.

He turned quickly, retreating to the Ford.

He slammed the door and hurried home.

He popped the box of cookies open.

Pity cookies.

Might as well eat them.

He didn't like wasting food.

He ate one.

It was weird.

It was floral.

He sniffed it.

Were they actually cookies? Was he eating soap?

What girl made these?

His truffles were better.

His mother was home early from work.

He flopped down on the couch, putting his leg up.

He was annoyed.

He held the box of cookies on his chest.

Of course, Johnny was drowning in Valentine's Day gifts.

Why had he even bothered?

What had Ali talked to Johnny about?

Had the UCLA guy just been an excuse to break up with Daniel?

To try and go back to Johnny?

It was all a joke.

He angrily bit into one of the cookies.

"Oh I see you got some too," Lucille said.

Daniel looked up at her confused.

"The cookies Johnny made. They're kind of nice. Lavender shortbread. He left me the sweetest note. Did you read your note?" Lucille asked, holding up a familiar-looking box.

Daniel coughed, scrambling to sit up and looking closer at the box. Sure enough, there was a tiny note.

He unfolded it carefully.

Daniel,

I'm not good at baking. Or cooking. Not nearly as good as I'm sure you are. Or your mother is.

But I wanted to try. As thanks. For being with me these last few months. For giving me a second chance.

For being there. They're lavender cookies. One of my favorites. They remind me of spring.

Happy Valentine's Day.

Yours,

Johnny

Daniel flushed red.

Yours.

He should've included a note with his truffles.

It was so innocent.

So sweet.

Oh god.

He'd been so rude when accepting them.

He was keeping this note forever.

Wait, his mother got one?

What did her note say?

No, he didn't want to know.

His mother was laughing. He looked at her.

"You didn't know they were from Johnny did you?" she asked.

"No. He got like a million things from girls today. I thought he was just sharing," Daniel said.

He looked down at the box with a feeling of regret.

He should've savored them.

He wouldn't eat any more today.

"I thought they were soap at first."

"Soap that you ate?" Lucille was laughing.

Daniel wrinkled his nose. "I thought I'd just give it a try anyway."

"Did you give Johnny your truffles?"

"I did."

"Good. My coworkers loved all that I gave them. They were a hit."

He nodded, looking at the box.

There were still several left.

Little speckles of purple mixed in.

Circles and stars, and as he shifted the box.

One heart.

He'd save that one.

Eat it last.

Bad Karma

Ali was talking to Johnny again. And it was weird.

The girls were back too.

Tommy had just shrugged when he'd asked.

The rumors hadn't worked.

Tommy didn't know why.

He was opening his locker and there she was. Grinning up at him, like the past 7 or so months hadn't happened.

Like she hadn't ripped his heart out and stomped on it.

Like he hadn't tried to pull her back to him, tried to demand she give him a reason that she never did.

Like he hadn't hurt Daniel. Like she hadn't dated Daniel.

"I think you're a liar Johnny Lawrence," she said.

"I don't know what you're talking about," he said putting his things in his locker.

"There was a rumor going around. That Johnny Lawrence liked someone. But," she shrugged her shoulders following him to their shared class. "I haven't seen Johnny-boy make a move. On any young lady at our school. And I know you strike first. It's who you are."

"I don't do Cobra Kai anymore," Johnny said.

"A tiger can't change his stripes."

"I'm not a tiger."

"Who do you like Johnny? I can help." She was talking sweetly. Sugary.

Like nothing had ever happened. Like they were just friends from the country club.

Johnny really didn't need any more help. The guys were bad enough. His mom was bad enough. He felt like he finally had everything under control.

It wasn't her business. Not anymore.

He sighed. "Ali, I appreciate it. I do. But I'm not going to talk about it."

She laughed. "And that, is exactly why I don't think you actually like anyone. I think you're still licking your wounds. If you're not going to tell me then I'm going to keep telling the girls that you're free and up for grabs."

"Can you not?"

It was such a headache. The girls, Ali. He wanted to just be left alone.

But she wouldn't understand. Wouldn't get why he was tired of it.

"A name Johnny."

He shook his head.

"Then the girls are going to be delighted. Really Johnny, just go on a few dates. Have some fun. You'll find the right girl for you eventually."

She walked past his seat and he frowned.

She sounded just like her Mom.

The last couple of times he'd gone to the country club Mrs. Mills had asked him if he was seeing anyone new. When he shook his head she grabbed his elbow and started introducing him to the other girls his age.

"You just need to find the right girl," she said.

He had a feeling she felt bad about Ali. But she'd accepted the football player as a good trade-up. And Johnny was just a loose end she needed to tie up.

Ali would hate him for the rest of his life if he told her that. That she was acting just like her mother.

He was tempted. She'd give him the silent treatment again.

It became a thing.

As the weeks progressed into spring.

As the school talked about spring break.

Ali was just around again.

Not at their table.

She still seemed to be out of sorts with Daniel.

But she kept coming back to his locker.

"You coming to the country club?" Ali asked.

"I've got plans."

"You have plans? What could you possibly be doing?"

"Working."

"You have a job? Seriously? How much do you make?"

"Nothing."

She blocked his path as he turned to go to his class. "Wait, you're volunteering?"

"I don't call it that...but I guess so."

"Where? How often?"

Johnny frowned walking around her.

She fell in step beside him.

"It depends. Sometimes I help out Mr. Miyagi. Other nights I babysit. Some nights I work at an animal sanctuary."

"Damn, I should've thought of something like that for my college applications."

"Your college applications will be fine, Dr. Mills."

She looked so delighted when he said that.

He was surprised it doesn't make his heart pound the way it used to.

That it had the opposite effect it used to. It left a bitter taste in his mouth, a souring in his stomach.

She made it seem easy. Like nothing.

The Friday before spring break, after school Daniel met him in the parking lot.

"You free?" Daniel asked.

Daniel seemed to be uneasy.

Shifting around.

Too much nervous energy.

"Where do you want to go?" Johnny asked.

He already has his bonsai.

"I just want to talk," Daniel said.

"Where?" Johnny asked.

Daniel looked around at their classmates pooling out of the school.

He was too quiet again.

Worrying at his lower lip as he looked around.

Full of thought.

Thinking of what he was going to say. It made Johnny nervous.

Every single time.

Talkative Daniel was better.

Their classmates were leaving, the parking lot was emptying out.

"Here I guess," Daniel said.

Johnny nodded dropping his bag in the Avanti. He set the bonsai in the passenger seat and leaned against the side of his car.

"You okay?"

It was like poking a balloon with a needle.

"It's none of my business." Daniel started, looking at the ground. "So you can just tell me to shut up. But it's driving me nuts."

Johnny waited.

"How'd you get Ali to talk to you again?"

Johnny blinked.

Right.

Of course.

"I apologized to her."

"What? Why? When?" Daniel turning towards Johnny surprised.

"After the party, I saw her at the country club and I apologized for everything I did."

Daniel frowned, turning back to the parking lot, he was chewing it over then he whirled back, eyes wide.

"After the party! You mean after I kissed you. You realized what it's like to have someone kiss you who you didn't want to kiss them. You apologized because of me. Because I- I disgusted you that much that you learned your lesson."

He was speaking too fast, eyes too wide, backing away.

"Daniel, that's not- you were drunk," Johnny said pushing away from the Avanti quickly. "That's not why-"

"No. I get it. Yeah, sorry for that man," Daniel said, he was rushing to his Ford.

Johnny was trying to figure out how to respond.

He hurried after him.

"Daniel, I-"

"Hey, don't worry about it."

The door was shutting.

"We never talked about it. I figured you just were being nice. That...maybe... But it's all been a joke, right? Be friends with Daniel, but laugh about him right? Don't actually be friends with him, except because of guilt. Consider your guilty conscience cleared. You don't got to do anything else. Community service project done."

His voice was so bitter. So final. Eyes hard.

"Daniel, it's not like that," Johnny's voice was full of panic.

The Ford was backing up.

Turning.

Daniel wasn't looking at him.

"Daniel!" Johnny called but the Ford was speeding out of the lot.

Daniel didn't look back.

Johnny ran back to his Avanti.

He jumped over the side and in, grabbing his keys.

If he hurried maybe he could catch him.

Maybe he could explain.

Maybe he could figure out how he fucked up.

He didn't know how but he had to have.

He always did.

He liked that kiss.

But maybe they should've talked about it.

They probably should've talked about it.

Why hadn't he talked about it?

He just hadn't wanted to take advantage.

He looked around.

He didn't know which way Daniel had disappeared in.

He slammed his hand against the wheel.

He brought the palms of his hands to his eyes.

They were wet.

He brushed away tears and drove.

He'd keep an eye out for that yellow car.

The banana boat.

He'd find it.

He drove for a while.

It wasn't sitting outside Seven Seas, he couldn't see it at Mr. Miyagi's, it wasn't a Golf 'n Stuff.

Eventually, he stopped, because it was getting hard to see.

He parked next to the beach, grabbed the bonsai, and walked out towards the water sinking into the sand.

He bowed his head over the bonsai.

He sat until the tears stopped.

Hugging the bonsai to his chest.

He knew where he was.

He always knew where he was in LA.

If he walked a couple of blocks down there was a bar.

A bar that didn't card.

A bar owned by Jimmy's cousins.

He had his wallet.

He grabbed his bag from the Avanti, put the hood up, locked it and started walking.

The bar was dark and music played.

He sat down at the bar, in the corner and ordered a beer.

He had a tab.

The last time he'd been there was the night Ali broke up with him.

He laughed.

He wasn't even dating Daniel and it felt the same.

He drank.

He put his bag against the wall with the bonsai in it.

His glass was empty.

He ordered another.

The bonsai was judging him. He tried to cover it so it couldn't see him. Then he felt silly. Plants didn't have eyes. Then he worried about the bonsai being able to breathe. Then he panicked quickly unzipping his bag again.

"Sorry," he whispered.

He placed his hand on the pot, feeling the cool ceramic.

His glass was empty. He ordered another.

The bartender walked to the other side of the bar.

He tried to remember his name. Jimmy's cousin. Could not remember his name. He felt bad. He should've known his name.

"Hey, Johnny."

Johnny turned.

There were three Bobby's standing next to him. He picked one.

"Hey," he said.

He couldn't remember how many he'd had. But he passed the glass forward to the bartender and tapped.

"What happened?"

"Do you know about karma?" Johnny asked. "When I was a kid. I read this book and this character mentioned how something was bad karma. I think it was stepping on ants. Bad karma. I hadn't heard of it. So I checked a book out at the library. It was a little difficult to get. But what I did get was...the idea...that your actions affect your future life, your next life. And your past actions affected this one. It wants you to put good things into the world because the good you put out comes back to you. Bad things, likewise. I think...I must've been the most evil mother fucker in my last life."

"Oh Johnny," Bobby said in that tone.

He was sitting down next to Johnny.

Johnny's hand was wet. His vision was blurry. He rubbed his eyes. He was crying. He laughed. It was watery.

"I never say the right thing. I can't do the right thing. I don't trust the right people. I'm surprised I wasn't reincarnated into a mosquito. Would've been less cruel. In my next life. I'll probably be a cicada. And not even one that gets to mate. One that's eaten as soon as it pops its head up in the summer."

He picked up his drink. He looked down into the amber liquid.

Jimmy's family always made good beer.

"He's told me that five times," the bartender was telling Bobby. He looked at Johnny. "Glad you like it, Johnny."

Johnny didn't remember saying it aloud but nodded.

"Could you call Jimmy? Tell him to be here in like an hour? I'm joining him. A beer for me as well," Bobby said.

"Your life," Johnny said looking at Bobby, if he squinted he could see one of them. "Is alien to me. Like what do you want to be Bobby?"

"I'm thinking of studying religion. I kind of want to be a pastor."

Johnny wrinkled his nose. "Doesn't that mean you can't get married? Or laid? That doesn't seem like you."

Bobby laughed. "Pastors can get married. It's not like a monk or something like that. How's my life alien to you? We're best friends."

Johnny looked down into his drink again. He could make out a wavering reflection of himself and he didn't like it.

"I think a lot of Mr. Miyagi's karate is balance. I don't know for certain. But like balancing life." Johnny turned and poked Bobby's shoulder. "Your life is balanced."

Bobby frowned. "Hey, did something happen with Mr. Miyagi?"

"No. Mr. Miyagi is so nice. How do you live that long and stay kind? I want to be like him. But I don't think it's in my nature. His family died Bobby. His wife. His son. But he's still kind. He went to war. Like Kreese. But he's still kind. Kind to me. Me. I wasn't nice. But he's nice to me. I hurt Daniel and he's still kind to me. I don't get it. But I just add it to the pile of things I don't get."

His glass was empty. He passed it to the bartender.

"Is it Kreese?" Bobby whispered, voice soft next to him.

Johnny laughed. "No. You know. I thought Sid was right. Sid told me, the next time I spoke back, backtalked, I'd die. I learned my lesson that time. But I forgot. Because it was Kreese. Because I expected him to be different. But he was the same. In the end. Just like Sid. Only useful until I'm not. I don't know how to be useful to everyone. But I'm trying. To be helpful. Because I want to keep people in my life. My friends. My mom. Mr. Miyagi. Daniel. But I can't think of how to be better. More useful. I don't want to be tossed aside again."

Bobby's hand sat on top of Johnny's. Johnny looked at him.

Bobby looked pissed.

"No," Bobby said, holding Johnny's hand tightly.

Too tightly.

"No Johnny. That's not how life is supposed to work. Your relationships aren't based on usefulness. You're not disposable. Do you understand me? We're not your friends because you're useful to us. Who the hell- Sid. Fuck Sid. Listen, Johnny, listen to me, okay. You're stuck with me. Okay? Like a fucking barnacle. Best friends. For life. And I know the other guys feel the same. They show it in their own ways. Why do you think we never wanted to skip without you?"

Johnny looked down at his glass. "Because you like my Avanti."

Bobby burst out laughing.

"Oh, Johnny. You could drive some awful piece of shit and we'd still not want to skip without you. It's because we're friends. Because it's not fun without you. Because when you're not around we miss you."

Johnny puzzled that over in his head.

He looked at the bonsai.

He pressed his hand against the pot.

He laid his arm out on the bar and rested his head on his arm and took a deep breath.

Everything smelled like beer.

"Daniel wanted to talk."

Bobby was looking at him, that look that could see through him.

Johnny closed his eyes.

"He wanted to know why Ali was talking to me. I told him I apologized to her. He asked when. I told him after the party. He got the wrong idea. Thought I...thought I learned my lesson. About forcing a kiss on her. One she didn't want. And I learned because Daniel corned me and kissed me while he was drunk. He didn't listen. He said my community service project is done. I don't know what that means. I don't have to be his friend out of guilt. He drove away," Johnny looked at Bobby. "I don't know how to fix it. He didn't want to see me anymore. We're not even dating."

"I'm going to have words with that boy," Bobby grumbled.

Johnny watched him wave to the bartender.

Johnny closed his eyes.

He hadn't meant to tell so much.

Too much.

But he felt better.

A little better.

The bartender heaved a phone onto the counter in front of Bobby.

"What's Daniel's number?" Bobby asked turning his eyes on Johnny.

Johnny frowned. "Don't drunk call Daniel. What if his mom answers?"

Bobby frowned. "I'm not drunk."

"How many have you had?"

Bobby started counting on his fingers, staring hard at them. He frowned. Started over. "Wait, give me a moment."

"Too many," Johnny said.

"What was your plan?" Bobby asked sounding frustrated.

"Gonna sleep on the beach," Johnny said. "Warm enough."

"You are not going to sleep on the beach."

"Well, I'm not going home."

"We'll go to my place."

"I'm not going to be a burden to Mr. and Mrs. Brown."

"What does that mean?"

"'m drunk," Johnny said turning his head away.

"Is this that useful crap? Is this why you never come over?"

Johnny didn't look at him.

Bobby kicked his stool. Kept kicking it until he turned back.

"Parents like easy," Johnny said. "Easier if I can be charming. Nice. Not around. People like that more. Spend too much time with Ali, poof. Too much time with Daniel. Poof."

Bobby frowned. "What about me then?"

"Somethings wrong with you. You'll get there eventually. I've reached acceptance."

"Are you going through the 7 stages of grief right now? Drunk as hell in this bar? Seriously?"

"Only way I survive."

"I'm going to kill Daniel."

"You will do no such thing. I messed up. Just can't figure out how. But I'll tell you when I do," Johnny said letting his forehead rest on the cool bar. His voice was muffled.

"Damn. What the hell happened?" Jimmy's voice said.

"You gotta drive us home," Bobby said. "But first you gotta call Daniel. Johnny says I'm too drunk."

"The hell?"

Bobby kept talking and Johnny focused on his breath. He reached out his hand and put it against the pot of the bonsai again. Let his fingers hang over, touching the dirt, the top of the roots, the bark.

"...too angry. I wanna fight. Bite something."

"Yeah, I figured. Hold on a second."

Johnny glanced over.

Jimmy was going through his jacket pockets. He pulled out a packet of Twizzlers and handed them to Bobby. "...said you were getting pissy. Said Johnny was crying and you were pissed."

Johnny shut his eyes.

"Tell him he's a bastard."

"I'm not going to tell him that."

"Tell him I'm gonna kick his ass for making Johnny cry."

"Also not going to tell him that. Can you even remember what Johnny told you?"

"What bastard starts a conversation then jumps to conclusions and then runs away without hearing the response?"

"Daniel ran away? Bobby can you chew with your mouth closed. That's disgusting man."

A hand slapped Johnny's back. "Didn't let him say like anything. He drove around, tried to find 'em. Ended up at the beach."

"Beach is close. That explains how he ended up here. Listen. I'm going to go into the back. Then we'll go. You can crash at mine, from the looks of both of you."

"I got money. Could take taxi," Johnny offered, peeling his face from bar. "I took a taxi home."

"Yeah, no, you're not going near a cab," Jimmy said. "Let me just call home.

"Call Daniel," Bobby said waving his packet of Twizzlers, mouth full.

"And tell him what, Johnny's sitting at our family bar crying?"

"Not crying."

Jimmy gave him a look.

Johnny blinked and touched his face.

"Not anymore," he muttered.

"Just stay here. Bobby keep an eye on Johnny. Don't let him wander off. Can you do that?"

Bobby raised a hand to his forehead and gave a drunken salute.

He turned back and looked at Johnny.

Johnny stared back.

"Wasn't Jimmy here?"

"Yeah."

"Where'd he go?"

"Call."

"Who?"

"Daniel."

"Why?"

"Tell him off."

"Why?"

"He left you."

"He didn't...he...was upset."

Bobby reached out and patted the top of Johnny's head.

"Want a Twizzler?"

"Yeah."

After a while, Jimmy came back.

"Okay, that's done. Can you both stand? When we get home. I'm calling in the cavalry. Damage control."

"Jimmy. When'd you get here? I missed you. Where'd you go?"

"Damn Johnny this is almost lodge level drinking."

"He's hurt. Be gentle," Bobby said sternly, standing.

Jimmy lifted his hands that had been reaching to help Johnny stand. "The hell? Daniel hurt him? Where's he hurt?"

"Inside," Bobby said, tapping his own chest.

Jimmy rolled his eyes and helped Johnny up. "Johnny man, get your bag, your bonsai. Actually, fuck. You drop that thing and you're gonna shatter with it. I'll get the bonsai. Bobby, you get Johnny."

"Why's Jimmy here?" Johnny asked Bobby as Bobby slung an arm under his. He leaned on Bobby and followed him out the door.

"We can't drive. Too drunk."

"Right."

Bobby opened the back door to Jimmy's car and put his hand on top of Johnny's head, gently pushing him into the car. Johnny flopped onto the back seat and Bobby pushed his feet in and shut the door.

Johnny shut his eyes.

The doors opened and shut several times and then they started moving.

It was dark out. He felt a little queasy.

"Did you eat anything?" Jimmy asked.

"No."

"We'll eat at my house," Jimmy said.

Johnny bolted up. "We have to go back."

"What?"

"My-"

"Johnny on the floor next to you is your bonsai and your bag. See them?" Jimmy asked.

Johnny squinted in the darkness, laying back down. It was his bag, his keys to the Avanti, his walkman, and his bonsai. "Yeah," he said with a breath of relief. He rolled onto his side.

"Did you tell him he's a dick?" Bobby asked ripping into a twizzler.

"No. I didn't call him."

"Should've."

"And then Johnny would've been more upset in the morning."

"Did you talk to him?"

"Who? Johnny or Daniel?"

"Daniel."

"No."

"What a waste."

"Bobby."

"Daniel doesn't seem to realize how fragile Johnny is. And I'm...I'm gonna kick his ass."

"Sure you are Bobby."

"I am!"

"You do realize Daniel probably thinks Johnny is tough as nails."

Bobby looked back at Johnny. "Impossible. I'm going to kick his ass."

Johnny blinked at him. He was sleepy.

"Listen. We're going to get to my place. I'm going to call your parents and tell them you're spending the night. And then we're going to eat. And you're going to bed. Straight to bed Bobby Brown."

"Who are you, my mom?"

"Don't sass me."

"Isn't it fucked up?"

"What?"

"You're calling my parents. We always call our parents. Heck Daniel called his mother. We never call Johnny's."

Jimmy didn't respond, pulling into the drive of the mansion and parked the car in the garage. "Yeah," he said quietly.

The doors opened. Johnny tilted his head back and looked up at Jimmy.

"Hey man. What do you wanna eat?" Jimmy asked picking up Johnny's bag and bonsai.

"Seven Veils Cake."

"What the hell is that? Bobby you got him?" Jimmy called.

Hands found Johnny's ankles and pulled.

Johnny looked down.

Bobby was pulling him out of the car.

Bobby leaned into the car and hooked his arm around Johnny's back, under him, and put his hand on top of his head again, helping him out of the car and to his own unsteady feet.

"Woah there cowboy," Bobby said as Johnny started walking. The ground was swaying, but he tried to keep going.

Bobby caught him, arm going under him.

Jimmy sighed, holding the door open. "This way. At least Daniel fucked you up on the Friday night before spring break. Come on gentleman. This way. Food through this door. Almost there. I've always wondered what the drunk leading the drunker looked like and now I know. It's absolutely awful if you're sober. Mildly hilarious. Absolutely frustrating as hell. You're both so fucking slow."

Johnny's whole focus was on his feet.

Moving one step in front of the other.

All his life, all he could focus on was moving forward.

One step in front of the other.

Every time he looked up, looked around, the world swayed, and eventually, he'd find himself on the ground.

Every time.

Like a baby deer.

He just couldn't figure out life.

And he was practically an adult now.

A senior in high school.

Still swaying on his feet.

While everyone knew their lives, their plans. Bobby was going to be a priest? Pastor. Ali was going to be a doctor. Johnny was going to...continue trying to walk.

There were steps and he frowned. Steps to get into the house.

"Come on man," Jimmy said. "Almost there."

Bobby had moved from his side to behind him. Hand on his back.

Johnny put his hands on the door frame and stepped, one foot in front of the other, up the stairs and into the house.

Bobby returned to his side. They made their way to the kitchen.

"Real food gentleman, what do you want?" Jimmy asked, setting Johnny's bag and Bonsai down in a safe corner of the counter against a wall so it was protected. "Gotta eat. It's like...yikes. Ten o'clock and I think Johnny you've been at the bar since when?"

"I got there at 7:30," Bobby offered, pushing himself onto one of the stools.

Bobby made it look easy.

Johnny stared at the stool.

He put his hands on the counter and was so relieved when he didn't fall but sat on his stool.

"Burger," Johnny said. Jimmy always made the best burgers.

"Thank you, glad to be acknowledged," Jimmy said opening one of the big cabinets and opening the fridge hidden inside it. He pulled out some meat from a drawer and some bread.

"You gonna stay there?" Jimmy asked.

"Yeah."

"Then I'll make you a burger. Bobby?"

"Burger."

"Bless," Jimmy said relieved.

Johnny watched him work for a bit. It reminded him of being at the lake house. Or at Tommy's beach house. Jimmy at the grill, swatting everyone away while he worked. He took it so seriously. They were divine. Johnny lowered his chin to the marble countertop.

"Johnny."

He blinked his eyes open. A burger was set in front of him and French fries.

"Thanks."

He felt better after he ate. Jimmy kept filling his water glass.

"Thanks."

"Of course."

Johnny turned to Bobby. Tried to remember something important. He kept trying to catch it but it kept fading. He blinked.

"Don't be mean to Daniel."

Bobby frowned.

"Be nice."

Bobby shook his head. "No."

Johnny put his hand on Bobby's arm. "I like Daniel. Be nice."

Bobby frowned. "I'm mad at him."

"Okay. But be nice. Pastor Brown."

Bobby looked away but he was smiling.

"Pastor Brown. Did you guys do confessional? Damn, why'd you not call me sooner?"

"What do you want to be?" Johnny asked blinking at Jimmy.

"A lawyer," Jimmy said.

Johnny finished his burger thinking about Jimmy being a lawyer. And Bobby being a pastor. It was like another world.

"Want another?"

"Yeah."

Like magic, Johnny had another on his plate. He frowned. It was like the beer. He was too drunk.

"Sorry," Johnny said.

"For?"

"Drinking so much."

"Hey, it's fine. You don't do it a lot. And my cousin kinda likes the ego boost."

Johnny looked at Jimmy.

Jimmy laughed.

"You tell him how good the beer is, like every five minutes. And apparently, tell him he's got the best bar in LA. You tell him he's cool."

"He is cool."

"Want to know a secret?"

"What?"

"He also doesn't let you drink too much. Always gives you the shit with the low alcohol content."

"No."

"Yeah. Doesn't want you to have to get your stomach pumped."

"Damn."

Jimmy grinned. "Okay. Foods done. Off to bed with you. Come on. Careful getting up. Yeah yeah, I'm getting your bonsai."

Johnny found himself in one of the guest rooms. One with one of the big beds. The extra clothes. The extra toothbrushes.

Jimmy was sitting on the side of the tub.

"Brush your teeth, boys," Jimmy said. "Yup okay, no you don't swallow that shit. What are you five? I hate being sober when you're both drunk. Is this what being a parent is? Hell. I gotta apologize to mine. Are you guys feeling okay? Sick? I already grabbed like a pitcher of water and aspirin. Okay yeah, I'm going to leave you clothes. Change. I'll be back. Don't you dare fall down. If you feel like you're gonna fall, aim for the carpet. Not the damn tile."

Johnny curled up in the bed. He didn't remember getting there, but it was like a beacon. Sleep. A siren call. When was the last time he'd slept?

"Move over," Jimmy said. "I don't trust you two. Okay. Johnny. Look at me."

Johnny looked at him.

"Your bonsai, your bag. They're both over there. See them?"

Johnny glanced to where he was pointing. His bonsai was sitting on top of the dresser. So was his bag.

"I set out your Walkman. In case you want it. It's over here."

Johnny followed where Jimmy was pointing, It was sitting on the bedside table.

"Bobby. Yeah. Hi. Okay. Called your parents. They're fine with it. They know you're here. I'll drive you to pick up your car tomorrow. Cousin's going to keep an eye on it."

"Thanks," Bobby said sinking into the pillows on the other side of the bed.

Jimmy turned off the light. He gently rolled Johnny over into the middle.

"You guys need something wake me up. I don't want you face planting or freaking out because you forgot where you were. Okay?"

"Okay."

"Okay."

"Good night."

Johnny looked up at the ceiling. Everything was quiet. Calm. But not in a peaceful way. In the hollowed-out, empty way.

He rolled over, burying his head into his pillow.

He didn't want to sleep.

But he also didn't want to be awake.

Chapter Notes

> I've decided Spring break is in mid to late March so Daniel had like a month or so to get freaked out by Ali being back. It's usually somewhere between March and April in the USA but depends on the school.

Daniel parked the Ford outside of the brunch place.

The last place he and Ali had been on good terms.

Her car was there.

He couldn't believe he'd panicked and called her. Couldn't believe she agreed to meet.

He pushed the doors open. His hands were sweaty.

She was sitting in the corner, her eyes rose and met his. Her lips were pursed into a line. Flat. She wasn't happy to see him.

He took a deep breath and continued over to her.

Normally he'd make a joke.

But he hadn't slept. He was desperate. He had no one else to turn to.

"I suppose," Ali began picking up her water and taking a sip. "I owe you an apology. For your car. Glad to see it's been repaired."

Daniel blinked and looked out the window at the yellow Ford.

He'd forgotten about it. Too much else had happened.

"Will you hear me out?" Daniel whispered.

"Yeah. You sounded pretty freaked out."

Daniel relaxed a little and took a deep breath and the waiter came over and asked what they wanted.

Daniel never hated a waiter so much in his life.

But he breathed again, put in his order, an omelet, and turned back to Ali when he left.

"I didn't want our breakup to happen the way it did. I'm so sorry. I thought it should be amicable. I wanted to stay friends."

The waiter had brought her coffee and she was ripping open sugar packets and pouring them in, not saying anything.

"I mean you liked someone else and I...I was realizing I liked someone else."

She stopped, mid-rip of her fifth packet, and looked at him.

He had to push through. Before he lost his nerve. Before she started talking.

"I saw you kiss someone else at the party and it hurt. But more like shock and damaged pride. And I'd already been thinking, maybe we should be friends instead. But I was still upset. Because...well I... never mind. I kissed someone at the party too, okay? So it just felt like it was meant to be. That we needed to break up. Clearly, we weren't meant to be dating. But with all of last semester, it felt like we had to if that makes sense? Like after everything. Everything we went through together, that I went through. I just thought everyone expected us to stay together. And then I was trying to figure out a good way to talk about it. But I was still hurt. Still confused. And I'm sorry Ali. I fucked up. With you...with..."

"You kissed someone else at the party?" Ali asked, eyes wide.

"I got drunk. I suck at beer pong," he said with a weak laugh.

"One of the college girls? I know it's not a girl from our school," Ali said thoughtfully.

It looked like she was trying to solve a math problem. The exact same look when they were studying together.

"I fucked that up too," Daniel said.

"Who?"

Daniel had told himself he'd tell her.

He held out his hand, pinky extended and she laughed. Then saw the serious look on his face.

She sighed and hooked her pinky through his.

"Fine Daniel, I won't tell a soul."

"Only Ma knows who I like."

"I get it. Wait so she doesn't know either? Even though you kissed her?"

"I kissed Johnny," Daniel said voice barely a whisper.

Ali stared at him, eyes widening, and then sunk back in her seat, arms crossed and lifting one hand thoughtfully to her lips.

She was processing.

Daniel played with the straw in his drink uneasily.

"Start from the beginning," Ali said.

"The beginning beginning or?'

"I swear if you start talking about the first thing you remember from your life in Newark- if you even include Newark and it's irrelevant I'm going to smack you. No. And not the damn beach either. Start with Johnny. Who you apparently have a crush on."

Daniel told her.

He started with the tournament. With Johnny handing him the trophy, the way his eyes followed Daniel as he was lifted up in a cheering crowd. How for a moment it made him feel like a god or a king.

How Johnny appeared in Mr. Miyagi's workshop. How scared he'd felt. How he'd slapped away the apology. Mr. Miyagi admonishing him for it. But Johnny had already left.

Going to Johnny's house, hearing what the staff said.

Ali frowned at that but didn't say anything.

Meeting Johnny's mother, how awful that had been. He started on a tangent about the tournament again, because he still won, they nearly broke his leg so why couldn't a crane kick count?

Ali snapped her fingers in front of his face.

"Focus Daniel," she said.

He talked about the bonsai. How fucked up it was that Johnny thought Daniel, Daniel of all people might do something to a bonsai. He was like the bonsai prince. How he found Johnny with the bonsai at school and took him to Mr. Miyagi's. Where they talked, where Mr. Miyagi decided to invite Johnny back.

"No, slow down. What happened? You tripped and?"

Daniel told her about how Johnny had caught him when he was being a fool, too excited to show off Mr. Miyagi's backyard. How nice it was to be caught.

Ali nodded.

Their food was brought out. He ate and talked.

How his point of view started to shift.

He talked about practicing on the beach with Johnny. Getting pissed and how Johnny didn't fight him.

How pissed he'd been that Johnny offered to take care of his leg and how he scratched him up. How Johnny didn't complain but just ran away as soon as he could. He kept the carhop to himself but told Ali of the doctor's appointment, glossed over lunch, and the way the cobras started closing in around him. How they invited him to the party and how he went to hang out with Ali but kept finding himself with Johnny.

She laughed at 7 minutes in heaven being awkward as hell.

He worked his way through everything, the lodge, the days out and around LA, trips to the zoo with the cobras, the aquarium, the damn sports game they'd dragged him to, dinner, and the movies.

He kept bits and pieces to himself, the way Johnny looked at the snow sculptures, how nice it'd been to teach him to cook even basic things, how he latched onto Johnny in his sleep and helped him calm down from nightmares. How much he held onto Johnny. He kept the things he found precious, the minute details to himself because those were his even if he was hurt.

He complained about the girls surrounding Johnny. Looking down at his plate, admitting to the jealousy of seeing Ali talking to Johnny.

How he watched her acting the same as she had with him.

"You know we're not going to date again right? Johnny or I?" Ali said softly. "We dated for 2 years, knew each other for a year before that. We were kind of friends. Now we're just friends again. You know? I'm not after him. I'm quite happy at the moment."

"I'm glad that you're happy," Daniel said softly.

"It sounds like it's been fun. That you've been having a good time. So what happened?"

Daniel told her. Unable to meet her gaze. Of asking him about Ali. How they'd become friends. Putting two and two together, how this was probably all guilt. Johnny clearing his conscience by being Daniel's friend, by letting him become close. By never bringing up the drunken kiss. And then...leaving him without letting him talk, too panicked to realize what he'd done, that he'd run away until he got home hours later. He buried his head in his hands.

Ali let out a low whistle. "Damn Daniel. I knew you were insecure in relationships but you guys aren't even dating."

"I know," Daniel whined. "I fucked up. But how am I supposed to know? You went from ignoring him and hating both of us to suddenly back at his side. And he apologized for kissing you but he's all guilt-ridden so maybe? He's like...not even in a great place and I just...left him without talking to him. Ali I don't know what to do."

"At least you picked spring break to fuck up. You got some time to figure it out," Ali said taking the last bite of her French toast. "I can help. I'll put him back on the blacklist. So the girls aren't after him. They're trying to get dates set up for prom you know? And the senior field trip. But damn, spring break is a great time to be friends with the cobras," Ali said with a sigh leaning back.

"They usually go to Jimmy's lake house. I'm going to assume you're not invited to that at the moment. They're very...uh...protective," she laughed. "I expected like even though I broke up with Johnny that Tommy would still be my friend. He's in the student council and we've been in the same school together since like preschool. The cold shoulder I got when I broke up with Johnny was like pure ice. He didn't warm up again until all their focus was on you. Guess he could only focus on one person to be pissed at at a time."

She laughed. "Sorry, not really funny huh? But the cobras hold grudges. Okay, let's think. So you panicked and ran. Bad move. You know that Johnny and I are nothing right? Like on my end. Just friends. And according to all the complaints I hear like all the fucking time, none of the girls had managed to make any headway on securing a date with Johnny. So as far as I know, he's free. Now whether he's going to go for you? I don't know. But him pushing you away while you're drunk? Not talking a drunken kiss? That's his M.O. He always does that. Pissed me off. He said, oh it was something sappy, he always said it. What was it?"

She was tapping her finger on the table and then it shot up and pointed at Daniel. "Right! I want you to remember our kisses. He's an absolute sap. He looks tough as nails now because of all that muscle and how he shot up like a weed, but he's all romantic and ooey-gooey on the inside. So he doesn't count drunken kisses as anything. I tried to keep count, right? As some romantic gesture for this cute idea right? Like, celebrate our 100th kiss or something dorky like that. And he deadpanned that we hadn't had 100 kisses yet because the drunken ones didn't count."

Daniel frowned.

She studied him and her lips quirked into a grin. "Hey, don't get discouraged. Listen okay. If Johnny isn't interested he won't let you that close. Almost every single girl at our school has been kept at arm's length. They haven't even been able to get close enough to attempt to steal a kiss. Drunk or not. Heck, they've challenged themselves to give him a hug, and it's been an absolute failure. It's kind of funny to watch. He dodges out of the way, leaves them hugging air."

She tapped her nail thoughtfully on the table again, head in her other hand. "Now I know he likes girls. I mean, we dated for two years. My parents were pissed when I broke up with him. Told me I'd never find a guy like that again. And maybe I won't. But." She shrugged. "I made my choice and I don't love him. We're on different paths. I don't want to be the girl on the back of the cool guy's motorcycle, holding a raw steak to his face because he's gotten into a fight again. But that seems to be something you kind of want. Maybe?"

"Maybe," Daniel mumbled. He didn't say he also wanted to take Johnny's motorcycle and drive it, hadn't mentioned how nice it'd been to drive the snowmobile with Johnny's arms around him. He hoped neither of them got into fights bad enough they'd have to use raw steaks. Didn't think it'd even happen with Mr. Miyagi around.

She smiled. "I don't know if he likes guys. I mean I've only really seen him interact with the cobras. And they're...the weirdest group of guy friends I've ever seen. There was one time I tried to sneak into Johnny's room. I thought we'd have a romantic evening, right? And I open the door and on the other end of the bed was a body and I flipped. Thought he'd stepped out with another girl. Nope. It was Dutch. Told me to stop hitting him. And rolled over so if I wanted I could get in bed as well." She put her hand to her face. "I did but I was so pissed. I wanted to kick him out. I was Johnny's girlfriend. I should've been the only one in his bed."

She laughed. "Oh god, it's so funny now. Me pushing Johnny over so I could sleep on his side. So I wouldn't have to be near Dutch. I knew if I slept in the middle I'd kick him out of the bed. I'd just fucking kick him all night on purpose. And elbow him. I learned they all did it. They'd never tell me why. They just spent the night with Johnny. Johnny said it was because they were too drunk or too high or like got into a fight. But I doubted that. It felt...more like they were standing guard. But I never understood that. Maybe they are close enough now that I think about it that it blurs the line. Heck, I don't know if they've kissed him while drunk. But they did hang their arms all over him, were constantly touching him. So maybe that's why you're struggling to tell."

"How bad is Sid?"

"He's a bastard. But like not that bad," Ali said. "Johnny's mother is sweet, kind, but smart as hell. She wouldn't stick with someone she knew was as bad as your insinuating. And also their staff doesn't do what you said. They're always polite. Sid's just...opportunistic. He's got that slimy personality you know? But he's not bad. Not like that."

"I think he is," Daniel said quietly. "I think you didn't actually get to see anything."

"We'll just have to go to Johnny's house," Ali said. "And you'll have to show me. But there's no way."

They paid and Daniel drove his way to Johnny's house with Ali next to him.

He parked so the staff wouldn't be able to see her and walked up to the front door.

He worried about running into Johnny. He still hadn't thought of what to say, what to do.

He knocked on the door. The guy from last time opened it, looked down at Daniel, and sighed.

"The little fucker isn't home."

It was worse this time. He cringed.

He heard the door to the Ford open and heard the sound of Ali's shoes on the pavement.

"Oh! Miss Mills. Welcome! The young master isn't home at the moment. But I'd be delighted to leave him a note and tell him you've visited. Have you eaten yet? The chef is still making breakfast, the lady of the house is out eating in the garden. She'd be delighted to see you again."

Ali threw her arm around Daniel's shoulder and put her other hand on her hip.

"Oh really? Me, but not Daniel here?"

"I...I was unaware he was...I-"

"It's fine. No need to tell Johnny anything. Just wanted to see if he was home. Thanks for your help," she said.

She was grinning wide, icy cold. She turned, pulling Daniel with her back to the Ford.

"The fuck?" she whispered, eyes wide.

Daniel drove. "So they clearly have protocols in place. For you, probably for his mother. If you didn't know. Maybe she doesn't know."

"Who the hell does that?"

"Sid."

Ali frowned.

"You can't give up Daniel."

He blinked looking at her. "Huh?"

"I dated Johnny for 2 years. Knew him longer because of the country club. Because of school. I didn't have a fucking clue. If in your own words, he's letting you be his friend out of guilt, but he's letting you in this much? You take it. You go in there with a fucking salve. You got to. Someone has to. He never let me in that far and I thought he let me in far. I thought I got pretty deep. I thought I graduated with a degree in Johnny Lawrence. But apparently, I graduated preschool." She turned toward him, her arm along the back of the seats. "You like him right?"

"A lot."

"You think you might love him?"

He blushed bright red.

She laughed, poking his cheek. "Damn you never blushed like that with me. The Daniel I know, he won't actually leave Johnny alone. He'll go visit Mr. Miyagi, center himself and come up with a plan to whisk Johnny off his feet. Win over that heart you think is so fragile."

"I think I might've damaged it pretty bad," Daniel said. "I mean what if he doesn't like me? What if he is just being my friend out of guilt? What if that kiss really truly disgusted him but he's not going to say anything because he owes me?"

He could feel her eyes piercing through him as she brushed hair from her eyes. "Daniel, you always jump to conclusions. You always think you understand what the hell someone else is feeling without actually listening to them. You overthink. Your trust is fragmented into little shards so any time you try to trust someone or they try to trust you you both get hurt. You spiral. I say go against what your brain says. Tell it to shut up. So what if Johnny's hanging out with you out of guilt? Or because he owes you? You're enjoying it right?"

"I was."

"Yeah, until you stuck your foot in that big mouth of yours. Be selfish. Do the shit you like. Don't overthink it. When you start overthinking you don't let other people talk and you take off with whatever bad thought you had. You fuck up. You fall into all these misunderstandings. You might owe Johnny an apology for running away. For not listening. Hell I might. Johnny doesn't talk a lot, and hell, when he wanted to talk I should've listened."

She rubbed her face with her hands. "If Sid is that bad, who the hell knows what actually happened? But I can't think about that. I don't want to know. I can't. I can only do better now. I can't go back and fix it. But you should listen to him. Sometimes he says stupid shit." She sighed and put her hand on Daniel's shoulder. "But Daniel, I'll help. I'll do what I can. I'll try and help you get the guy if it's possible. If there's an opening you can take I'll help you find it. And if there's not, it still might be worth it just to be his friend. He's clearly doing something right in that avenue, just look at the cobras and how much they love him to pieces."

Daniel felt a lump well up in his throat. He felt tears well up in his eyes. "Thanks Ali. And I'm...sorry again."

She laughed. "I freaked out on you too. So I get it. I didn't want to listen to you either. But you're right. I think we're better off as friends."

She left her hand on his shoulder and he tilted his head, letting his cheek press against it for a moment.

"Promise me something though," she said.

"Yeah?"

"Go home and sleep before you do anything. You look like shit."

He laughed. "Damn Ali."

"And before you spiral, talk to me or someone next time. You explode too easily and you try real hard to scorch the earth. I think you might be right. Johnny can't handle that. Hell I did it to him and he really couldn't handle that. So come find me and we'll talk it through okay? Or like train yourself to calm the fuck down and shut up and just listen. I've got to work on that too. I'm trying to stop, think, and just calm down."

"Got it," Daniel said.

He felt better.

He dropped Ali off near her car and before she left she leaned over and kissed him on the cheek. "Go home and straight to bed. Then go talk to Mr. Miyagi okay?"

"Yeah."

It took a couple of days to get up the courage. He kept overthinking. Jumping to conclusions. Spiraling as Ali said.

What would Mr. Miyagi think? What even would he ask? Would he tell Mr. Miyagi how he felt?

He couldn't lose Mr. Miyagi. But he needed a drought of calm that the man always poured.

He drove over to Mr. Miyagi's house one afternoon and nearly turned around before he parked.

The Avanti was in the parking lot.

He frowned. Heart pounding in his veins.

He couldn't. But he had to apologize. Had to say something. Learn something.

Maybe it was better to face them both at the same time.

He parked the Ford and made his way up the steps. Pushing the door open.

The floor was wet. Odd. He pushed past it.

Mr. Miyagi was at work in the kitchen. It smelled like soup. His lips were in a thin line.

He didn't look happy. Disappointed. Upset. Worried.

Oh god, what if Johnny told him?

"Hey Mr. Miyagi," Daniel said softly, eyes searching for Johnny.

He wasn't there.

"Ah Daniel-san," Mr. Miyagi said. "Make tea."

Daniel blinked and set about filling the kettle with water and putting it on the stove. The atmosphere, it was weird.

"Hey, about Johnny, I didn't mean-I'm sorry Mr. Miyagi. I messed up."

Mr. Miyagi blinked and looked at him.

"Hah, we both?"

Daniel stared at him.

"Both? Wait? Did you-? What happened?"

"Miyagi introduce Johnny-san to friends. Not realize Johnny-san desperate to fix everything. For good. Removed no from vocabulary."

"Isn't that a good thing?"

Mr. Miyagi shook his head adding seasoning to what he was making. "Take Johnny-san out on boat, Daniel-san remember boat. Fun."

Daniel remembered Mr. Miyagi's laughter while rocking the boat and sending Daniel into the lake. He glanced back at the water on the floor. The trail it led.

"Yeah, I remember. You took Johnny?" He grabbed a towel and started drying it up.

"Mmm," Mr. Miyagi said nodding. "Knock Johnny-san in water. Johnny-san not fall in again, no matter how much Miyagi rock. But Miyagi not notice Johnny-san shaking."

He frowned.

"Miyagi not notice many things. Think Johnny-san balancing well. But Johnny-san letting self be crushed instead."

"Crushed?"

"Johnny-san go to school, spend time with friends, help Daniel-san, help Miyagi, babysit Miyagi's friend's children every time asked, keep going to animal sanctuary and help. Johnny-san not stop. Maybe not sleep. Work work work. So body stop for Johnny-san."

"Stop?" Daniel squeaked, panic rushing through his veins.

"Sick. Very sick. Fever," Mr. Miyagi said pointing to the darkened room down the hall. "What Daniel-san do?"

Daniel chewed on his lip with worry, standing. "I panicked, jumped to conclusions, didn't listen to him, and ran away. I haven't spoken to him since."

Mr. Miyagi sighed. "Daniel-san."

"I know," Daniel said, tears pricking at his eyes. "I keep...I keep messing things up. And he's...He was hanging out with Ali and I got upset and I didn't listen."

Mr. Miyagi made a small sound, pouring what looked like porridge into a bowl, and setting it on a tray. He put it in Daniel's hands.

"Give Johnny-san."

Daniel took it, hesitated a second then turned towards the darkened room. Mr. Miaygi was giving him an opening. An excuse. Just like before, with the shirt.

Johnny's eyes were shut. He was breathing through his mouth, lips parted. His blonde hair was sticking to his forehead.

Daniel set the tray down and sat down next to him. He hesitated a moment before brushing the hair from Johnny's forehead.

He was hot. Definitely had a fever.

Blue eyes opened and found him. Stared. Waited.

Daniel didn't know what to do. Didn't know what to say.

"Daniel?"

"I'm sorry," Daniel whispered. "I shouldn't have...hey, think you can sit up?"

Johnny looked at him, still, staring, waiting. But then he shifted and pushed himself up. Blanket falling from his chest. A bare chest.

Daniel looked away, grabbing the tray with the porridge.

"Mr. Miyagi made you food. You should eat."

Johnny took the offered tray and ate. He was quiet, but his blue eyes bored into Daniel. Patient.

"I'm sorry," Daniel said again. "I...saw you and Ali and panicked. I talked to Ali. It was weird. But I feel more focused. Kind of. I mean I still panicked for a couple of days. I thought, I mean...when I moved here I thought I made friends. And then when I lost that fight on the beach they ditched me. Made fun of me. And everyone else avoided me. I wasn't used to that. In Newark...I didn't have these problems. It's not easy. I'm like a fish out of water here. So I second guess everything. Everyone's motives. Everyone's actions. I don't trust them I guess. So I convince myself of things that aren't always true. Or I don't actually listen to the responses." Daniel took a deep breath, he was fidgeting. He had to just ask. But that desire to bolt was rising again like a wave. "Do you...do you hate me for kissing you? Did I ruin everything?"

Johnny blinked at him and shook his head. "No."

"Think we can still be friends?"

Johnny nodded.

Daniel's shoulders relaxed a little. "I'll make it up to you. I promise," he said reaching out.

Johnny's hair had fallen again. It was getting long, he tucked it behind Johnny's ear, cupping his face ever so gently.

Johnny shut his eyes and pressed his face ever so slightly against Daniel's hand. Daniel's heart pounded.

Johnny liked that. Must have. Right? Why else would he? Okay. He'd have to remember that.

He wanted to kiss him. But he couldn't. He'd fucked up too much. He'd thrown a damn anchor into the foundation he'd been working on.

Johnny was shivering.

Daniel grabbed the blanket, pulling it around Johnny's shoulders.

He could do this. Take care of Johnny while he was sick. While he tried to figure it out.

"I'm sorry for not checking in on you earlier," Daniel said.

"'s okay," Johnny rasped. His throat sounded nearly as bad as after Kreese had...

It hurt Daniel's heart, twisted it in a vice.

"No. It's not," Daniel said. "Eat your porridge or I honestly don't know what it is, but eat it okay?"

Johnny nodded and ate.

Daniel didn't want to leave. But he could feel the tears in his eyes. He was mad at himself. He knew better. He always was better. He just couldn't help himself, couldn't stop himself.

He knew Johnny was fragile. Recovering. Letting him in, like Ali had said.

What if he closed up again? Put space between them because Daniel had shoved him away? Because he'd broken that fragile trust that was growing?

He'd never forgive himself.

Mr. Miyagi was mixing something into a mug. He had several jars open. He glanced up at Daniel.

Daniel walked over.

"He sounds awful," Daniel breathed.

"Hai," Mr. Miyagi said nodding.

"What is this?" Daniel asked, trying to stave off tears, pointing to the porridge.

"Okayu. Rice and soup. Congee. Dinner Miyagi make Nabe."

Daniel nodded, he took a shaky breath and folded his arms over his chest. "I'll stay and help."

"Hai."

"Mr. Miyagi?" Daniel asked after a while.

"Hmm?"

"You think he'll forgive me?"

Mr. Miyagi blinked, then looked back at Daniel.

Tears were running down Daniel's cheeks.

"Daniel-san heart hurt?"

Daniel nodded.

"Sometimes...Daniel-san overthink. Yes?"

Daniel nodded again.

"Daniel-san run headfirst in wrong way. Like first-time play sport. Keep scoring for wrong team. Daniel-san panic. Need to breathe. Re-center. Listen to thoughts. When they go wrong way. Stop. Ask why?

Why Daniel-san panicking? Why mind going wrong way again? Like alarm bell, yes? So Daniel-san looking for fire, no fire. Go through, calm, talk to self. Hmm? Johnny-san talk to Ali-san yes? Daniel-san panic. Did Johnny-san or Ali-san give Johnny-san reason to panic?"

"No. Probably not."

"No fire. But Daniel-san worried. Re-train mind. What is actual fire. What is fake fire. Brain try to protect Daniel-san. But scaring Daniel-san. Making panic. So Daniel-san breathe. Look for source. Then talk, gently. Ask. Johnny-san answer yes?"

"I didn't let him," Daniel said rubbing tears from his cheeks.

Mr. Miyagi nodded. "Must also listen. Johnny-san very quiet. Like Miyagi?"

Daniel laughed softly. "Yeah."

"Johnny-san also say wrong thing sometimes. And sometimes say nothing. Daniel-san easy. Daniel-san talk lots. Miyagi can pick out what Daniel-san means. Johnny-san though hides much. So Miyagi has to look for it. Like hawk. Miyagi getting old, hawk eyes aren't same anymore. So need Daniel-san's help. Help Miyagi realize when there are cracks. Where they are. We use Miyagi's medicine. Patch him up. But Daniel-san have to listen. Look for it. Just like when Daniel-san upset have to stop and breathe. Do exercise. Like kata. Find balance."

Daniel nodded. He finished brushing away tears and took a deep breath.

"Tea ready. Want to take to Johnny-san? Or Miyagi take?"

"I'll do it. I think. Yeah. I can do it," Daniel said holding out his hands and taking the tea.

He walked back to the dim room and sat down next to Johnny again.

Johnny had set the tray aside and had nodded off while sitting, head bowed. How had he not noticed how tired Johnny looked all this time? Not until now? Not until he crashed?

Daniel gently lifted Johnny's chin.

"Johnny?" he whispered.

Blue eyes opened.

"Mr. Miyagi made you tea. It'll help. Can you drink it?"

Johnny nodded and Daniel carefully put it in his hands. "I'll be back. I'm going to clean this up," Daniel said softly taking the tray and porridge and took it to the kitchen to clean.

"Good," Mr. Miyagi said nodding to the empty bowl. "Ask if still hungry."

Daniel nodded and went to stand in the doorway.

"Think you could eat more?"

Johnny shook his head.

"No, Mr. Miyagi."

"Hai."

Daniel walked back into the room. Taking more in this time. Johnny's bag was on the floor, the bonsai was sitting on the side of the table.

He'd glanced back once before driving away. To see Johnny running after him, only for a moment. He regretted not stopping, not going back. But he couldn't. He couldn't bring himself to stop. To turn around. Even though he could tell from Johnny's face, the mask completely gone that it'd been the wrong choice.

Johnny was still watching him. So quiet.

Tears pricked at his eyes.

What if Johnny never talked to Daniel again. Just sat there quietly and stared?

"I'm sorry. I should've stopped. I should've listened. I fucked up. You're being my friend and I...I got jealous and I...I didn't listen to what you said or would've said. And you're so used to people not listening, like I...I did what Ali did and I never wanted...Johnny, I'm sorry."

He bowed his head, he didn't want to cry. He'd hurt Johnny. Why was he crying?

He heard Johnny moving, shifting in his bed slowly.

He looked up.

Johnny was inching closer. Moving so slow. His hand was reaching for Daniel. Gently going behind him. Daniel thought he was going to get a hug. Which made him cry more. Johnny kept studying him. Looking for something that Daniel wasn't sure what it was. But then his forehead pressed against Daniel's and Johnny shut his eyes. His hand was resting gently on Daniel's shoulder, patting gently. That tap tap. It's okay.

"Talk," Johnny said softly.

"I...did I make you sick?"

"No."

"Did I ruin everything?"

"No."

"You don't hate me?"

"No."

Johnny's forehead was hot. He appreciated the gesture but he worried. This was probably too much for Johnny. He gently put his hand on Johnny's shoulder, taking the cup of tea from his other hand.

"You should get some rest," Daniel whispered.

Johnny's eyes flicked open again, searching through Daniel's face for something but nodding and pulling away. Daniel reached out gently to his back, his skin was so warm, too warm. Soft. He helped Johnny to lay down.

Johnny's eyes shut. His breathing slowed. After a while his eyes flicked open again, searching around the room, finding Daniel, staring, then shut again.

It happened a few more times.

"Hey, I'm not going anywhere okay?" Daniel whispered.

He tucked Johnny in, pulling the blanket closer around his bare shoulders, and after a moment's hesitation took Johnny's hand in his.

Johnny stopped jerking awake.

So Daniel stayed.

He watched Johnny sleep, gently running his thumb over the back of Johnny's hand.

Hope Growing like Weeds

The phone woke Johnny up. He blinked up at the ceiling. It wasn't his ceiling.

"...hai, Johnny-san here."

That was Mr. Miyagi. He was in Mr. Miyagi's house.

He pushed himself up. He felt gross. His bonsai was on the bedside table, which was a relief.

"Hai."

There was a weight on his leg. Daniel. Daniel was sitting in a chair, but curled over onto the bed, using Johnny's thigh as a pillow. Hugging it tight.

"Which lake?"

Johnny tried moving, shifting, but Daniel just held on tighter. He stared.

He wasn't sure if this was real Daniel or dream Daniel. Real Daniel was upset with him because he misunderstood. Because he thought Johnny had gone after Ali again. Or Ali had come after Johnny. But because of Ali.

Because he was still so broken-hearted. He got that. He understood that.

Dream Daniel kept crying and promising him things.

"Good lake for fishing."

Johnny reached out tentatively, placing his hand on the back of Daniel's head, running his fingers through Daniel's soft messy hair. Dream Daniel had taken care of him while he was sick. Maybe he was still dreaming.

"If Johnny-san better, I bring Johnny-san and Daniel-san."

If this was the real Daniel then...

Nothing about that position looked comfortable. His back was going to be stiff, his knee probably would hurt.

He really shouldn't have been sleeping like that.

"Ah, Johnny-san awake, here."

Johnny looked up. The phone was being held out to him by Mr. Miyagi, the cord stretching. Johnny took it carefully. He held it to his ear.

"Hello?" His voice sounded awful, cracking.

He remembered being out with Mr. Miyagi, had been coughing for a couple of days, but thought it was leftover from being hungover and crying so much.

Mr. Miyagi had given him medicine as soon as he'd driven Johnny back to his house.

Johnny didn't even know what day it was.

"Johnny! Oh, thank god! You can't do that. You can't just drop off the grid. You can't disappear. I was worried sick. Promise me you'll never do that again."

It was Bobby. He sounded panicked.

"Get sick?" Johnny asked, a smirk playing on his lips.

"Dude, seriously? I haven't heard from you since Saturday. Most of spring break is over. The hell man? You were supposed to be here. Do you know how many people I had to call to find you? I called your place, called every bar we've ever been to, I even called Ali man and that was the most awkward conversation I think I've ever had in my life, and I even dragged the LaRusso number out of Jimmy, and hmm that was also awkward but she gave me Mr. Miyagi's number. Man, you can't do this to me. Not when..."

Not after Friday, when you wouldn't stop crying.

"Yeah," Johnny said. "Sorry."

A loud heavy sigh came through the phone. Johnny could hear the guys in the background. And Bobby turning his head away from the receiver. "Yeah, he's at Mr. Miyagi's. Apparently, he's been sick. Sounds like shit."

"You okay man?" Bobby asked, voice-directed to him again.

"Yeah."

"You're coming, right? I mean Mr. Miyagi said he was going to drive you over. He sounded...I mean I don't know him that well...but pretty excited about the lake."

Johnny chuckled, it hurt a little. "Private lake means fishing."

"Is that what he's into? Damn. Okay. I'll tell the guys to ready a boat for him. He can go fishing to his heart's content. Jimmy's...dude will you stop hitting me, fine you talk to him."

"Johnny, I'm getting the grill ready man. Get your ass here. Even if you're fucking sick. I ordered a shit ton of chorizo and boerewors. Hell, bring Daniel. Bobby's going to have to stay like on the other end of the room from him because he's still being pissy. But man, I bought too much food and if you can bring some back up I'd appreciate it. Hey, you think Mr. Miyagi would eat some? He's from where, Japan? He vegetarian?"

"Okinawa. No."

"I got that soda in. Brought it. Because you know, I prepped before Friday. Listen. Give Bobby some time. We've chewed him out. You know for being the only one there and not calling me until so much later, or like not calling everyone else. I know you get overwhelmed. But man, you really okay?"

"Yeah," Johnny said gently reaching out to Daniel again.

Daniel was still sleeping.

Johnny leaned against the wall. "Got my hopes up."

"Damn. Okay. We'll dial it back a little. It's going to be a bitch to get Dutch to dial it back. Dutch! Where the hell did you get those? Put those away. Sorry man. He's like a fucking child. Here's Bobby back."

"Hey."

"Dutch get your ass back here! If you light one of those on fire I'm going to shove it in your mouth. Fireworks are fucking illegal in California. You set those off and we get a fucking wildfire I sure as hell am not going down with you on that."

"Chaos. Absolute chaos," Bobby said with a sigh. "All week so far."

"What day is it?"

"Friday. Dude, how long have you been out? Like a fucking week?"

Johnny thought about it. He'd babysat the kids for a couple of days. Their parents had some emergency and had to be out of town. One had been sick and couldn't sleep. He'd been there until four in the morning when they finally got back days later. Then he'd gone to the animal sanctuary and worked until he met with Mr. Miyagi. "Three days."

"Fuck."

"Yeah."

"Could you get your ass here?" Bobby asked.

He sounded tired. But there was that strain of worry, concern. A thread underlying everything else.

"Yeah."

"Okay, well hurry up."

"Bye."

"Bye."

Johnny set the phone down, the receiver too far away, and gently poked Daniel's cheek. He was starting to think this wasn't a dream. That the real Daniel was clinging to his leg like a pillow.

Daniel shifted in his sleep, hand going up Johnny's thigh, a little too close. A little too far. Johnny swallowed an unmanly sound, his skin erupting in goosebumps as he shivered.

Sleeping Daniel was almost as bad as dream Daniel. But dream Daniel knew what he was doing and did it on purpose. Sleeping Daniel didn't have a clue what he was doing to Johnny.

They'd already had an awful misunderstanding along this vein. Johnny wasn't sure how Daniel would react to waking up knowing how close his hand was to Johnny's dick. He slid a finger under Daniel's palm.

He could try and remove it, the way you were supposed to pick up a snail, to slide your hand underneath rather than to pull on the shell.

Give him something else to hold onto. Something safer.

His fingers brushed against Daniel's palm. This was more stressful than taking a math test. To try and not wake Daniel up, to not let him grab anything else in that general direction, to pry him off.

He moved slow, sliding his hand under Daniel's and then it popped off his inner thigh and held his hand.

He sighed, relaxing his shoulders a little.

"Hey Daniel," Johnny said softly.

"Mmm."

"I wanna shower."

A brown eye opened and looked at him. Then sat back up suddenly, letting go of his hand.

"Huh? Sorry."

Johnny blinked. "I'm going to shower."

"Uh-huh. Okay. Uhh. I leave clothes at Mr. Miyagi's. You know, he dumps you into a lake or ocean enough times you gotta leave a change of clothes." Daniel looked nervous, was avoiding Johnny's eyes, wasn't looking at Johnny.

His hair was so messy. Sticking up more than Johnny had ever seen. Even compared to the lodge. That had been tame. This was wild.

"I don't think your clothes will fit me," Johnny said. "I got stuff in the trunk of the Avanti."

"Oh, I'll get it," Daniel said. "Where are your keys?"

"I can-"

"Let me," Daniel said quickly.

"Keys are in my bag. There's a gym bag in the trunk. Just bring the whole thing."

"Got it," Daniel said and Johnny got up, slowly, carefully.

"Mr. Miyagi, mind if I use your shower?"

"Hai," Mr. Miyagi said waving for Johnny to go ahead. "Breakfast ready soon."

Johnny walked into Mr. Miyagi's bathroom. He was a little too tall for the showerhead and had to duck down to wash his hair. But it felt better to have the warm water run along his skin.

It was Friday. He'd missed most of spring break. He was supposed to have met the guys a couple of days ago. No wonder they panicked. Johnny had never missed anything with them before.

After his fishing trip with Mr. Miyagi that ended up not being fishing. Ended up with Johnny standing on the prow of the boat trying to balance while Mr. Miyagi tried to throw him in the lake. Another balancing test.

Johnny didn't know what it meant. What Mr. Miyagi was up to. But if Mr. Miyagi wanted Johnny to carry him through the mountains like Yoda made Luke, he'd do it.

He'd seen the guys Saturday morning. He'd woken up to Dutch and Tommy coming in with donuts and coffee. Jumping on the bed.

Too loud. Too cheerful.

Foisting donuts and coffee into his hands almost as soon as he'd opened his eyes.

Bobby had thrown a pillow at their head, grumpy with his hangover. Eventually, though they got him up too and eating.

No questions asked, just there. Talking about the trip to the lake house. All the things they wanted to do.

No mention of Daniel. It was a first. In months. Where Daniel didn't come up. It was like they were avoiding the topic.

One of many they avoided around him.

He sighed. He hadn't meant to get his hopes up. But he hadn't noticed that he had. He thought Daniel might've...could've... one day liked him back. But of course, he was still all twisted up about Ali. It had taken Johnny months to get over her and sometimes it still stung.

Nearly a whole semester.

It'd only been a few months. Who knew how much her kissing the UCLA guy had affected Daniel. His pride. He'd only had one friend at school. Everything had been piled onto one relationship. Just Ali.

Johnny at least had the cobras. Could rely on them when he was hurt, even if he didn't ask them for help they just always showed up. Hell, they hunted him down when they couldn't find him.

He always wondered how they found him. At the bar. It was Jimmy's cousin's bar, he guessed Jimmy's cousin called Bobby. Like hey blondie is here, come get him.

He hadn't realized they did that. That they had that sort of system set up. That if Johnny didn't show up they'd go looking for him. That they'd show up. But they kept doing that. Even when he had nothing to offer them in return.

Idiot. When you're not around we miss you.

He sighed. He didn't know what they saw in him. But it was comforting.

He heard the door open.

"I'm setting your bag here," Daniel's voice said.

"Thanks," Johnny said.

He heard the door click again.

Johnny peered out. His bag was sitting in the corner. He breathed in the warm steam.

Whenever he felt like he was going to fall over, whenever he felt like he was going to just give up, they always showed up and propped him up. Said things that felt like the first moment of spring after a fire. Like after the wildfires and things started to grow again.

It was like all the stuff Mr. Miyagi told him. Like when Daniel held his hand.

It'd be okay. He'd be okay.

Today was easy. He'd go see the guys. Eat whatever Jimmy put on his plate. Tell them to be nice to Daniel. He knew Bobby would need time. It'd been in his voice. In Jimmy's tone.

He stepped out of the shower and dried off, opening his bag and pulling out a change of clothes. He felt better. His throat was still a little sore. His voice sounded awful. But he didn't feel like he had to cling to the walls to move. Which was progress.

He walked out with his bag over his shoulder.

"So, uh, thanks," Johnny said to Mr. Miyagi who was putting on his fishing vest.

"Miyagi cook. Daniel-san take care of Johnny-san," Mr. Miyagi said softly. "Daniel-san try to make up for mistake."

Johnny blinked. So it wasn't a dream. Daniel had brought him food, held his hand, and had cried. Had helped him up and walked him to the other side of the room so he could lean against the wall on his way to the bathroom, tucked him back into bed, played with his hair, put cold compresses on his forehead. Took care of him. Hadn't left his side for days.

"Breakfast ready," Mr. Miyagi said.

Johnny followed him back to the kitchen. He set out rice and soup, egg that looked like it was layered almost like a cake, and a bit of fish and vegetables.

Daniel was sitting down, his hair was still sticking up but he'd changed and he was staring at the food.

"Breakfast?" Daniel asked.

"Hai."

"Huh."

"Thank you, Mr. Miyagi," Johnny said picking up his chopsticks.

He felt so much more confident with them now. Picking up the food was so much easier. He ate quietly.

Daniel tried everything, commented on everything. It was nice to hear him talk again. That endless stream of conversation. The abysmal table manners.

"What's this?"

"Egg. tamagoyaki...like omelet, rolled and fried."

Daniel nodded.

Johnny picked up his and tried it. Like Jimmy's house or Tommy's, like Mrs. LaRusso's apartment, Mr. Miyagi's house was somewhere where he felt like he could eat anything and it'd be amazing. Anything Mr. Miyagi gave him to eat, Johnny would. And it'd be delicious.

Daniel was commenting on the eggs. Trying to figure out how it was made. He was trying to figure out what everything was in the soup. All the different flavors, components working together.

When they finished they helped Mr. Miyagi clean up.

"We go, hmm?" Mr. Miyagi asked.

"Uh, yeah," Johnny said, grabbing his bags and carefully getting his bonsai.

Mr. Miyagi was singing to himself. Walking off through the parking lot past his truck.

Johnny relaxed. He was relieved Mr. Miyagi wasn't going for the truck again. He didn't think he or Daniel could handle that again. Not now.

Mr. Miyagi patted the side of the blue and white Nash Metropolitan. He popped the trunk and set his fishing gear inside. Then looked back at Johnny.

Johnny hurried and set his bags in.

Mr. Miyagi handed him the keys.

Johnny stared at them in wonder.

"Feel okay?" Mr. Miyagi asked.

"Yes."

"Daniel-san, time to go," Mr. Miyagi called.

"Coming!" Daniel said. He'd brushed his hair and was hopping back into his shoes. "Oh no way! We're taking the Nash?"

"Hai," Mr. Miyagi said opening the door to the backseat and he sunk into the back.

Johnny stared at the keys.

This was one of Mr. Miyagi's nice cars. Like the Ford he'd given Daniel. A classic he'd painstakingly restored. And Johnny got to drive it. No one let him drive something this old, this nice. No one ever trusted him with something like that.

He opened the driver's seat door while Daniel looked at the car with wonder, brown eyes wide before joining him up front, in the passenger seat. He was bubbling again. About to overflow.

Johnny understood that. Looking at wonder at the inside of the car.

The bubble popped Daniel started talking. How beautiful the car was. How it was his first time inside any of them other than the truck or Ford. They'd been under the hood. Mr. Miyagi had shown them out to repair it. But it was different sitting inside of it.

Johnny turned the key and it came to life.

"Seatbelt Daniel," Johnny said.

"Ah, right," Daniel said, putting the seat belt on. He was all hands again. Talking and distracted.

Johnny was going to drive them to the lake house. It'd take a while, they had to get out of the city. But it wasn't like the lodge. This little car could handle it. His Avanti could handle it.

It was nice to drive. Nice to get out of the house. Even if he loved Mr. Miyagi's house. Getting out after being sick was a relief.

He'd have to borrow Jimmy's phone and call and see how the kid was doing.

Daniel was talking about cars, asking Mr. Miyagi about the one they were in. When Mr. Miyagi had gotten it. How long it'd taken to restore it. He wondered if Daniel wanted the same thing. To find a nice car like this, take it back to Mr. Miyagi and work on it together. To fix it.

It was such a nice day. The sun was up in the sky. Everything would be okay.

The roads to the lake house were easy. He made his way up to the gate, rolled the window down, and leaned over pushing the buttons on the keypad. The gates slid open and he continued up towards the house. The lake was big, easy to see from the drive.

"Wow," Daniel whispered.

Johnny glanced over. He liked that. Surprising Daniel with the beauty that could be found in California. Albeit this one wasn't accessible to everyone.

He parked the Nash Metropolitan. He saw Jimmy down by the lake at the grill. Bobby was in the water, swimming, it looked like a race between him and Dutch. Tommy was opening the door to the house, carrying a big cooler.

They got out.

"Hey, you made it finally. You feeling okay?" Tommy asked.

"Yeah."

"Cool car."

Mr. Miyagi gathered his fishing supplies from the trunk and Johnny started to head down. He noticed that Daniel hesitated. He stopped. Johnny looked back. Cleared his throat.

"Your still welcome...to hang out with us," Johnny said.

He thought about holding out his hand. Would that be too much? He didn't have to take it. Daniel could walk past him down the hill to the lake if he wanted.

He held out his hand.

Daniel still hesitated. But he took the proffered hand. Johnny hadn't expected that. Hadn't expected Daniel to take his hand again.

Hope kept springing up. He kept trying to dig it up, store it elsewhere. But it was becoming a weed. It kept growing back, every time he dug it up. No matter how much he cautioned himself. No matter how much he tried to hold onto reality.

Mr. Miyagi was already standing on the dock with his fishing gear looking out at the lake. Tommy was setting up the boat, talking to him, holding it steady while Mr. Miyagi climbed in. He looked happy. Absolutely delighted to get to fish in a lake he'd never been in before.

"Another guy easy to please," Jimmy said as they reached the bottom of the hill. He grinned at Johnny. "So how'd you get sick?"

"Kid I was watching was sick. I think I caught it," Johnny said.

Daniel was hiding behind him a little. Quiet. He hadn't let go of his hand yet.

Jimmy shook his head with a sigh. "You're babysitting?"

"Yeah."

"Since when?"

"A little over a month, almost two."

"Damn. What else are you hiding?"

Johnny thought about it. It wasn't that he was hiding, he just hadn't brought it up.

"Been working at an animal sanctuary."

"Seriously? What kind of animals do they have?"

"Everything."

"Like horses and cats and what, frogs?"

"Yeah."

Jimmy closed the grill.

"Why didn't you tell us you were sick?" Jimmy asked.

"He could barely sit up," Daniel said softly letting go of Johnny's hand.

It was shocking how fast he missed holding Daniel's hand.

"Wait, so you...took care of him?"

Daniel was looking at the ground, digging his foot in the dirt and grass. "Yeah. I figured it'd be the least I could do."

Jimmy frowned. Johnny caught the glint in his eye. He knew Bobby was pissed. But he figured the rest of them would sway a little easier.

"Yeah." It was steely. Cold.

He had to relieve the tension. He didn't know what to say. "I've been left behind at worse places, I at least still had the Avanti," he said with a small laugh.

It was a joke. It wasn't like Daniel and him were heading anywhere together or had even left school grounds. He hadn't been left behind. Not really. Daniel had just run away. And saying he was used to Daniel running away from him, while true, also hurt and wasn't something to say.

Both of them shot him a look. Clearly not the right thing to say.

Daniel looked horrified.

Jimmy looked pissed, questions in his eyes. A who? when? where?

"I just mean," Johnny struggled. Oh god, why'd he even open his mouth? "I'm fine." He cleared his throat. He'd made it worse. It wasn't a big deal. It wasn't. "Listen. I'm okay. Yeah?"

"Who the hell-"

"When did someone-"

He'd opened a can of worms.

Tommy was coming back up from the lake.

He could run over. He could avoid this. Hands clamped down on his wrists. Jimmy and Daniel were leaning forward.

"It just happens sometimes. A lot more when I was little okay?"

"That's worse. Like you realize that's worse right?" Jimmy said.

"Was it Sid?" Daniel asked softly.

"Sid's left me at places before. But he always sends someone else to pick me up. A couple of hours later. When Mom notices...but no...it happened a lot with kids from school."

He glanced away from them. Jimmy's hand tightened on his wrist.

"It's nothing, it's seriously was nothing. Just stupid kids being stupid. You know?"

"You mean you'd go places with other kids and then they'd ditch you?"

Jimmy said, voice low, and hard.

It wasn't exactly like that. Close. Usually, he got beat up too. He fell for it too easily. The let's go do something fun. Only for it to be a nightmare that wasn't fun for Johnny. But it meant that Johnny could be dropped anywhere in LA and find his way home. He always knew where he was because he'd been left behind in almost every corner.

Daniel's eyes were too big. Too horrified. This was nothing. Daniel was too pale.

"Damnit," Daniel whispered.

"Yeah, yeah," Jimmy said, in a voice, a voice Johnny recognized. An argument. A fight. Revving himself up.

Tommy was so close.

He could bolt.

He could- arms wrapped around him.

He blinked.

Daniel's arms were wrapped around him. He held his hands up.

Jimmy had let go of his wrist, he was staring.

Daniel was hugging him tightly.

"You gotta take better care of him," Jimmy said after a while, smacking Daniel's back, fight gone.

Johnny shot him a look but Jimmy just grinned and walked off to Tommy.

"Don't you dare go anywhere," Daniel said into his chest. "You just drop the most heartbreaking shit, so suffer this hug."

Johnny didn't know what to do with his hands. Daniel really was stronger than he looked. It was like a grip. If he moved just so he could send Johnny to the ground.

He lowered his hand and awkwardly patted Daniel's shoulder.

Daniel laughed into his chest.

Should he hug him back? He lowered his arms, around Daniel's shoulders.

"I won't ever do it again. I promise. I won't abandon you. I won't leave you behind. I won't leave you alone."

Johnny lowered his head, resting it atop Daniel's. He waited to feel any sort of pull. For Daniel to let go, to pull away from him, to stiffen. But he didn't. He could feel Daniel's steady breathing, his heartbeat. He was talking still. Muttering about stupid kids. How was he as stupid as a kid? He was 18. He was supposed to be an adult.

18. Huh. Daniel was older than him. Who'd have thought?

Daniel's hands were rubbing his back. Soothing motions. He did seem to have a better handle on life. More balanced. As nice as it was he couldn't let Daniel keep beating himself over something so...common in Johnny's life.

"When you went to Golf 'n Stuff, did you play mini-golf?" Johnny asked.

"Huh?" Daniel asked prying himself away, just slightly to look up.

"Jimmy's got croquet here. It's set up in the grass. If you want to play."

"Croquet..."

"It's the Alice in Wonderland game. The one with the flamingos," Johnny explained.

"I'm sorry, but what the hell is that? Is this some rich person thing? You actually play with flamingos?" Daniel asked. He laughed, not a big laugh, but a small one and it was enough. Nice to hear it again.

"No. Mallets. It's kinda like mini-golf but you have to get it through the wickets, not holes."

"I think you're making this up."

"I'm not. It's an actual game. Seriously. It's over there," Johnny said motioning the stakes that looked like giant staples sticking up out of the ground.

Daniel looked. "Definitely a rich person game."

Johnny sighed. "I guess? I didn't learn to play till we moved in with Sid and I visited some other kid's house. The guys like to play it here. Mostly because they suck at it while drunk. Because if you keep getting it through the proper wickets you get to keep taking your shots, but if you don't, then you got to wait. And when they're drunk, they miss a lot."

"I'll give it a try," Daniel said.

It took a while of explaining how to use the mallet, the format of the direction you had to hit the ball through the wickets. But eventually, that competitive spirit flared up in Daniel and he started talking. A mile a minute. Asking who came up with games like this? Johnny didn't have the answer. It looked so easy, was this a kid's game? Kind of. He complained about rich people's games being boring. But was absolutely delighted when he won the second round.

Insufferable. Cute.

He noticed though that Daniel kept looking out at the lake. The glittering water. Mr. Miyagi was out in the center, fishing peacefully. Dutch and Bobby were still swimming around. He leaned against his mallet.

"You wanna take a closer look at the lake? You can swim in it. If you want."

He remembered Daniel's constant complaint. Being so close to the ocean and everyone having all these pools and never getting to swim.

"Yes!" Daniel said turning to him, excited.

Johnny gathered up the mallets and the wooden balls and put them away then walked down to the dock.

"I'm going to just stick my feet in," Johnny said taking a seat on the dock.

"You're not going to swim?"

"I'm still not 100%. Probably would be a bad idea."

Daniel frowned but nodded. He took off his shoes and socks, took off his shirt, and then dove into the water.

Bobby swam over to Johnny who was setting his own shoes and socks aside and sticking his feet in the water. It was cool.

"There's sunblock in my jacket," Bobby said pointing. "Put some on before you burn."

"Thanks, Mom," Johnny said.

"Hey, don't take that tone with me, young man. You burn so easy. And then you're just quietly miserable. And grumpy. I don't wanna deal with that. So use the sunscreen," Bobby said before swimming away.

Johnny sighed, grabbing Bobby's jacket and fishing out the sunscreen, rubbing it on his exposed skin.

Dutch popped up.

"So....how's uh...this going?" Dutch asked motioning towards Daniel and then back at Johnny, treading water.

"I want you to get rid of your prom deadline," Johnny said, rubbing the lotion into his neck and face.

"Seriously?"

"It took me like six months to get over Ali. Almost six months. It's only been. What 2 months for Daniel? He's still struggling with it. And we've got what two months before prom?"

"Less than that," Dutch said.

"So just, can you dial it back?"

Dutch frowned. "I heard what happened. You think it was because Ali's been hanging around again?"

"Yeah."

"Are you...giving up?"

Johnny glanced at him. Dutch swam over and leaned against the edge of the dock and looked up at him seriously.

"Every time I think I should give up hope pops up. It's like weeds. It's overwhelming. I...really do like him. But I know I need time to figure myself out and what I want. He needs to get over Ali. And then we'll see."

"Hope blooming like weeds," Dutch said with a frown looking at the dock. "Why are you making hope seem like a bad thing?"

Johnny blinked. "I..."

Dutch pulled himself up out of the water and sat next to him on the dock, looking out at the water at Daniel swimming. He sighed.

"You know Bobby is pissed right?"

"Figured."

"It's because Bobby doesn't fuck up that much. He doesn't know what it's like to panic and fuck up. Not that badly. I mean I get it. Daniel I mean. Kind of. I do stupid shit all the time. Sometimes I have to walk away and think about it."

"I...thought he'd never talk to me again," Johnny said quietly.

"Why? What could you have possibly done to-"

Johnny shrugged. "It's happened for fewer reasons, even more, confusing reasons."

Dutch stared at him. "And yet you still have hope?"

"He came back okay? No ones ever done that and come back. And he's cried more than I have over it."

Dutch burst out laughing at his side.

"What did he also nurse you back to health?"

Johnny nodded.

"What is it with you and your life turning into a fucking soap opera? Next, you're going to tell me Daniel has a twin, and one of them is gonna end up in a coma and you're going to get kissed and slapped not in that exact order."

"How many soap operas do you watch?" Johnny asked amused.

"Hey man, you try and find something to watch when you got mono and are stuck at home."

"Wouldn't know, never caught mono."

"Hey did you tell him?" Bobby asked as he swam over.

"No, was waiting for you," Dutch said. "I mean do you really think he doesn't know?"

"We're covering our bases. Besides you already did the leg work," Bobby said pulling himself up to sit on the other side of Johnny on the dock.

"But seriously?" Dutch asked again.

"Here, let me," Bobby said holding out a hand to Dutch to quiet down and then turned to Johnny. "Hey, you remember when I beat up Dutch, what does the word he used mean?"

Johnny frowned. "It's a cigarette right?"

Bobby leaned over giving Dutch a look.

Dutch looked at Johnny. "You sweet sunshine child. Bobby, you're right. He's clueless."

"What the hell is happening?" Johnny asked uneasily.

Dutch cleared his throat and sat up straight. "I know you know how to have sex with a girl. You were with Ali two years and well I did have a room next to yours at least on one occasion."

Johnny turned to look at Dutch, burning red. "The hell?"

"Shush," Dutch said. "We realized, someone, needs to have the talk with you."

"What the hell is happening?" Johnny said turning to Bobby.

"Well, the school covers the birds and the bees...and not particularly well I might add," Bobby said. "But not the bees and bees or birds and birds, you know?"

Horror dawned on Johnny. "What the hell? Like you two are even qualified to...why? What did you do?"

"Well, you know that punk bar we go to sometimes?" Dutch asked.

"Yeah?" Johnny asked uneasily.

"Well, I went and talked to the owner, the gay one. Told him I had a friend who liked this other guy and I didn't think he knew how to do it so I wanted to know if he had any advice. Like what the talk is for dudes who like dudes."

Johnny was contemplating what would happen if he just slid into the water and didn't come up again. Whose friends did this? What sort of nightmare was it where your friends cornered you to make sure you knew how to...fuck?

"And I had a call with my uncles," Bobby said. "We wanted to compare notes, make sure nothing was missed."

"Essentially," Dutch said holding up his hand. "You need lots of lube, a condom, to prepare, and to go slow."

"My uncles stressed the same thing. Also that most porn is inaccurate and if the condom breaks to get checked out depending on each party's history. I got a list of clinics where the staff are nice."

"Some of the stuff is the same. But it's also anal."

What was wrong with his friends?

"My uncles are also coming next month to like take me out for brunch and ask me who I'm dating....they apparently didn't believe the "my friend likes a guy" thing," Bobby said.

"Oh, the guy at the punk bar didn't believe me either. Wished me luck. Told me to bring my boyfriend to the club sometime and then when I corrected him he said to bring my friend and his boyfriend," Dutch said. "But he did air quotes."

"So you got that?" Bobby asked.

He was going to kill them.

"Yeah, sure," Johnny said. "Hey, you want to know about this meditation I'm learning?"

"Uh sure," Bobby said uneasily.

"So you take a deep breath, a very very deep breath and you hold it," Johnny said, breathing in deeply and holding his breath.

They both did at his side and he leaned back shoving them both off the dock and into the water. He pulled his legs up and under him. He grabbed his shoes and hurried off the dock. He heard them come up spluttering and yelling at him. Dutch's voice followed.

"Fine! Then I'll ask Daniel!"

Johnny froze, turning, but Dutch was already swimming out towards Daniel.

He wouldn't make it in time. He was too far.

"Ask Daniel what?" Tommy asked coming up next to him.

"I..." Johnny watched Daniel stop his swimming. Dutch was grinning, talking. And then Daniel responded earnestly. Kept talking. It didn't stop. It was one of Daniel's rants. One that was just a waterfall of information dumped on someone's head.

They had to be talking about something else. Dutch had just said that to get under his skin.

Bobby was walking toward him, drying himself off with a towel and grabbing his jacket and sunscreen.

"I really don't know," Johnny whispered.

Bobby turned. "Huh, you know I don't think I've ever seen Daniel talk so much to Dutch. Even from a distance."

"It's normal," Johnny said. "He talks a lot."

Bobby studied his face. "You weirdo. You like that he's chatty."

"It's calming."

"Oh, looks like Dutch lost his battle of wits. Here he comes."

Sure enough, Dutch was pulling himself up onto the pier. His head was bowed and he was walking fast. He was bright red.

"You okay?" Tommy asked.

"Shut up," Dutch said, breaking into a jog towards the house.

Bobby burst out laughing. "I never thought I'd see the day where someone embarrassed Dutch. Oh, I gotta find out what happened," he said turning and following after.

"You guys hungry?" Jimmy called.

"Yeah!" Tommy called back. He gently nudged his elbow at Johnny. "Why don't you call Daniel and Mr. Miyagi back in? Let them know lunch is almost ready."

Johnny nodded and walked back down the dock. He waved at Daniel. When Daniel paused and started treading water he then jerked his hand back to point towards the shore, towards the table next to the grill and the chairs. Then he pointed out at Mr. Miyagi.

Daniel disappeared beneath the surface, and Johnny waited. He watched as Daniel popped up next to Mr. Miyagi's boat. Watched as Daniel pulled himself up and into the boat. As Mr. Miyagi pulled back his line and set his fishing rod aside.

He wondered how Daniel had the energy. He was exhausted just from watching Daniel. He'd been swimming nonstop for nearly an hour. He hugged his arms to his chest. There was a breeze, a cold one. It was colder here, further out from the valley, it was greener.

Daniel took over rowing. Rowed them back to the dock and Tommy appeared again at Johnny's side.

He threw a jacket over Johnny's shoulders.

"Don't you dare get sick again," Tommy said.

He was holding a towel and handed it to Johnny. "For Daniel."

All Daniel had really been promised about California was swimming. He'd get to swim. He'd get to hang out in a pool. All year long.

But the only time he got near water was to train. He didn't swim. So while he was playing whatever the game was that Johnny wanted to play, fancy rich person mini-golf, he was staring at the water.

He wanted to swim.

And it was great. It would've been better if Johnny had joined him. But he didn't want Johnny getting sick again. He'd spent days at Johnny's side, making sure he ate. Concerned when he woke up with coughing fits until Mr. Miyagi showed him the medicine that helped.

He'd had a lot of time to think. Quietly at Johnny's side.

One day, he'd get to go swimming again and he'd drag Johnny with him.

He watched Johnny as he sat on the pier. Feet kicking at the water. Watched as Bobby talked to him, Dutch, as they both came and went. As he put on sunscreen. As Johnny shoved them into the water and walked off. That playful way they always had among one another. As Dutch swam out to him and asked him out of curiosity if Daniel knew how two guys had sex with one another. Wondered if Dutch was flirting or had his eyes on someone. But he could help. He did know the answer to those questions. He probably got the best sex-ed talk out of all the kids in Jersey. By the way Dutch turned red he wondered if maybe it hadn't been an earnest question but just a casual one. Like a kid who wanted to know where babies came from only to double-check that they came from people and not a stork until after you gave them the details. Oh well. He now knew everything.

He swam until it was time to come back in, until Johnny came back to the pier and waved at him. Calling him quietly back to shore. The way he stood waiting for Daniel. Like Daniel was a sailor coming back from a long journey, the way those women would stand on the coast looking out at sea waiting for the ship to come in. He swam to Mr. Miyagi and hoisted himself into the boat. He wouldn't make Johnny wait nearly as long.

"Have fun?" Mr. Miyagi asked.

"Yes," Daniel said with a smile as he rowed. "You?"

Mr. Miyagi opened the lid to the cooler, it was full of fish. "Great fishing."

He turned his gaze back to the docks. A jacket was around Johnny now and Tommy was waiting, kneeling. When they got close Tommy helped tie the boat off and held it for Daniel to step off the boat and onto the dock. For Mr. Miyagi.

"Lunch is done," Johnny said to Daniel, offering him a towel that Daniel took.

Daniel gathered up his things while Tommy took the cooler from Mr. Miyagi to carry. They walked back up the dock together and sat at the picnic table. Jimmy hoisted a large tray over to the table with hot dogs and burgers.

Jimmy set it down and then looked up at the house, cupping his hands around his mouth.

"Lunch is ready, get back here!" Jimmy shouted, then turned to Tommy. "Will you get the cooler up here so they can pick their drinks?"

Tommy grabbed their cooler and set it down on the table, popping it open, and slid it across for Mr. Miyagi and Daniel to look at.

"Johnny requested I save a bunch of those for you," Jimmy said.

There were colorful glass bottles in the melting ice water, Daniel didn't recognize them and turned to Mr. Miyagi.

"Oh," Mr. Miyagi said. He very carefully reached in and pulled out a blue bottle. "Thank you Jimmy-san. Very thoughtful."

"What is it?" Daniel asked.

Mr. Miyagi smiled, removing the cover and opening a piece of plastic. "Ramune, Japanese soda." He placed the piece of plastic in his palm and set it over the lid and pushed down. A marble was knocked loose and the soda fizzed.

Daniel looked back in the cooler and grabbed a bright green one and held it up, it was all in Japanese. "What flavor is this one?"

"Melon," Miyagi and Jimmy said at the same time.

"Ah, Jimmy-san read Japanese?" Miyagi asked.

"Oh, no, not really. I've learned all the flavors. I have to for different drinks. My Dad quizzes me on it every year, so that if I take over when I'm older I can explain what every flavor is. But these, because of the marble, were one of my favorites as a kid, so I know them the best."

"Favorite?"

Jimmy dug out a clear one. "I like the lychee one."

Mr. Miyagi hummed his approval and Johnny reached over and grabbed a blue one but it was different from Mr. Miyagi's.

"What flavor is that one?" Daniel asked.

"Blueberry," Johnny said.

Daniel looked at the melon soda in his hand and carefully opened it, studying the piece of plastic and the ball at the top.

"You gotta give it a lot of pressure," Jimmy explained as Tommy grabbed his.

Daniel pulled the piece of plastic apart and put his palm over it and pressed it over the ball. Nothing happened. He frowned. He tried again. Harder. More pressure. The piece of plastic sunk in and he heard the clink of the ball dropping loose into the drink, against the glass, and the hiss of the carbonation. He grinned.

He noticed movement, Bobby and Dutch returning from the house. Holding glass containers, plates, and cutlery.

"And what creation is this from the Browns?" Tommy asked amused as the container was set at the end of the table.

"Lemon tart," Bobby said tapping at it.

Plates were passed around while Jimmy pointed out the food in the center of the table. "We've got American hot dogs, burgers with grilled onions, and some South African boerewors. This is my first attempt at those, so blame me if you don't like it. The butcher guy gave me like an hour-long conversation on how to cook them properly, so I hope I did okay. Also grilled some other veggies, asparagus, potato, Brussel sprouts, bell peppers, zucchini, and eggplant. So eat some vegetables too," Jimmy said, looking pointedly at the guys. "Tommy marinated and seasoned those, so all complaints on flavor go to him."

"Hey," Tommy said with a frown.

Daniel smiled. They were funny. The same, as always.

There was tension. He knew they knew. Bobby was very clearly keeping himself distant. Whole other end of the table. But that was okay.

He moved his leg, pressing it against Johnny's. He was there. They both were. And he was warm. Not hot. Just a normal temperature. Which was a relief.

Spring break was practically over and all his plans were gone but it was okay. It'd be okay. Johnny wasn't pushing him away. The door hadn't shut forever.

The food was good. The company was good.

Mr. Miyagi was hmming, listening to the guys talk.

Once upon a time, he thought Mr. Miyagi was lonely like him. Needed people in his life, just like Daniel did. That they had each other and that was good enough. A sensei and student. Then he saw how other sensei's and students interacted. How Kreese treated Johnny. It wasn't the same. He was grateful it wasn't the same. Daniel and Mr. Miyagi were friends, almost family. It was kind of fun to see him with the ex-cobras. Them tripping over themselves to be polite. Trained. Like Johnny had been. Yes sirs, no sirs. Halfway molded into what Kreese was trying to turn them into.

Mr. Miyagi's atatatata's, gentle no's not sir. A gentle admonish, a gentle shift.

They were different than Johnny. They had sturdy roots, steady homes. And they were like the type of tree that helps a damaged tree continue to grow, supporting it.

"Last year the seniors went to D.C.," Tommy was saying. "Student council is still trying to finalize our plans this year."

"Did they decide where we're going?" Bobby asked.

"Maybe," Tommy said smiling. He picked up his burger and took a bite.

"Maybe? You know where we're going don't you!" Bobby said standing. "Tell me, I gotta know."

"Sit down," Jimmy said.

Bobby sat back down. "You look like you're too pleased with yourself. Where are we going? The Bahamas?"

Tommy shook his head.

"A cruise?" Dutch asked.

"Mexico?"

"No."

"Europe?"

"No."

"We're not going camping, are we? You know the girls hate that. Not all of them, but like some of them will just whine the whole time," Jimmy said.

"No," Tommy said.

"A college town?" Bobby asked amused.

"Not really," Tommy said thoughtfully.

"Canada?"

"No."

"Come on tell us! I gotta start picking out clothes man," Bobby complained. "It's next month. If I need a new wardrobe I got to get on that."

Tommy smiled, eyes falling on Daniel. It was an evil smile. One way too pleased with himself. A Cheshire's grin. A cat who'd caught a mouse.

"New York City," Johnny said.

Daniel felt his heart skip a beat.

No. Of course not. It couldn't be.

Tommy held up a finger gun and winked. "Prize goes to Johnny Lawrence."

"What?!"

It wasn't just Bobby. Daniel had felt the same incredulous feeling sprout up. His home turf. The whole senior class was going to leave sunny California and was heading home with him.

"Mmm New York, good city to visit," Mr. Miyagi said nodding. "Good choice. Far from California. Different."

"Yup we're flying out and so far we've got all the touristy tours signed up. But we're still trying to figure out everything. We're all California locals so I've been trying to find an expert. Someone from the area might be able to give some other advice on things to do. I don't know. Maybe this kid who talks about the area all the time. Might be able to come to some council meeting and give some insight. Maybe after the break is over?"

"Me?" Daniel asked, it was practically a whisper.

"I was actually thinking Mr. Miyagi, I mean he said it's a good spot for a visit. So he must've been there before," Tommy said turning to Mr. Miyagi.

Mr. Miyagi laughed. "Oh no, not an expert."

"Your face is hilarious," Tommy said laughing looking back at Daniel. "Of course you man."

Daniel felt like he was going to burst. They were going to New York. They'd be within a short trip of New Jersey, of Newark. He could drag Johnny over the river, show him the place he grew up in. Could introduce him to his grandparents. They could get real pizza. Eat bagels with lox. Could drag him to his favorite shop to have cheesecake. He could show him Central Park. There were too many things to do.

"Since it's an actual school field trip the teachers want some history and culture and learning and stuff," Tommy said with a sigh. "So the history teacher has requested we stop by Ellis Island and the Statue of Liberty, they're trying to figure out if we can get tickets to a show because parents will want us to go see something on Broadway even though it's as expensive as hell...sorry Mr. Miyagi. They also want us to go to museums. But you've probably been to a lot of it, so I figured you could help give us good advice, show us what's worth it and what's actually just overhyped. That way we don't end up boring you either by going to all the places you've been to a thousand times and are sick of."

"How'd you manage New York City?" Dutch asked. He was grinning.

"I have my ways. I can be persuasive. Did you not listen to me during the debate?"

"Honestly? Fell asleep," Dutch said.

Tommy frowned.

"Hey, I still voted for you."

"I thought you voted for me because you believed in what I was talking about."

"Nah man, voted for you because we're friends."

"I don't look forward to when you start voting in elections," Tommy said sourly.

"You said the same thing when I learned to drive."

"You're a menace to society. Anyway, Daniel, if you're free, after spring break, after school could you come to some meetings?"

"Sure, I'd like that," Daniel said. It was an understatement. He couldn't wait.

"Can't believe we're almost done," Johnny said.

Daniel looked at him, surprised. He sounded so melancholy.

"We've got the senior trip, then prom and then we graduate. Then boom, done, it's over."

"Life not over Johnny-san, just high school," Mr. Miyagi said gently.

Johnny looked surprised but nodded. "Yeah...it's just an end."

"Enjoy it now. Remember later. After everything over."

Daniel studied Johnny. Daniel couldn't wait for school to be over. Couldn't wait to move on. He could do anything. What exactly he didn't know.

He wondered if he'd stayed in Newark if he'd feel sadder about graduating. About everyone splitting up. But his mother had moved them so he'd gotten uprooted early. To feel that shift beneath his feet. To do all his protesting early.

It was in Johnny's eyes, a little spark of sadness.

"What are you going to do after school?" Daniel asked Johnny.

"I...don't know," Johnny said.

That was it. Everything changed after high school. Friends scattered. And those left behind cracked a little.

"Me either," Daniel said. He gave Johnny a soft smile.

Daniel was used to it. He embraced his future of freedom. But he'd gotten used to being a seed on the wind. Johnny had probably never left California. Daniel had traveled across the USA in his mother's old beat-up car that they had to give a running start.

He'd help. Give Johnny a running start. They could do things together. He wouldn't leave. And those ex-cobras, he doubted they'd leave Johnny alone too long. They were, attached as Ali said.

Daniel picked up his soda, listening to the clink of the marble against the glass.

"And that's okay. I think anyway. I like to look at it as freedom. I can do anything. I can work. I can travel. I can go to college. I can just bum around for a bit. I won't have to get up and go to school. I mean I don't particularly like school. I don't like sitting still. I like moving. I like talking. I find it restrictive. You know? It's a chance for new things. But it doesn't mean everything ends. It means I can take the things I like and keep them. I can visit Mr. Miyagi. I can still go driving around LA. You can do the same. I think when you graduate you'll take that Avanti and help them," he pointed his bottle at the cobras, "move into their dorms. You'll hang around campus, visit for fun events, and then maybe you'll drive around. Maybe you'll come to visit Mr. Miyagi and me. Maybe you'll work in a garden shop, maybe you'll work with animals, maybe you'll just stand on the beach looking pretty and people will throw money at you. But you'll be able to do what you want. I'm sure you'll still all meet up at the lodge in the winter and you'll have so much to talk about. How your year went. How classes are going. How your jobs are going. You'll get on your bikes and you'll ride around. You'll go camping. You'll go to bars and meet up."

It was quiet. He looked down at the marble.

"I talked to Ali. We had brunch. It was a good talk. She said you guys have the weirdest friendship she's ever seen. But it makes me think it's deep, you know? Like family. But a family you choose. One that shows up and keeps showing up. She said they hold grudges even when she didn't think they would. Like a dog with a bone practically. They don't give it up. Because you're important to them. And vice versa. I'm sure. I left a lot of stuff behind in Newark. Family, Dad, friends. And none of my friends have reached out. The whole time I've been here. I begged Ma for my new phone number before we left. Passed it around. All the kids I talked to all the time. Only Louie calls. Wracks up Ma's phone bill. But he's family. Blood. It was disappointing. But who knows? It might feel exactly the same if I go back. Like I never left. And it might not. It might be completely different. But you guys. I think you'll call. I think you'll show up. It's that kind of friendship. The lifelong kind."

"Damnit," Bobby muttered

Daniel looked up.

"That was sweet Daniel," Tommy said warmly.

"You crying Brown?" Dutch asked.

"Shut up," Bobby said. He was rubbing his face. He popped open the tart container and slid it down. "Just eat the tart and leave me alone."

Johnny took it, cutting it into slices and moving it onto plates.

"You really think?" he asked Daniel softly. Passing the plates out.

"Yeah. I do."

They finished eating. Mr. Miyagi offered to leave some of the fish so Jimmy could cook them. Jimmy made him take some meat in exchange. Filling up a cooler with stuff from the butcher, vegetables, and ramune.

They invited Daniel to stay the night but Daniel declined. He knew his mother was worried. He'd not come home so suddenly. Just left and Mr. Miyagi had called and told her that Johnny was sick. She'd understood. But he had to check in with her.

Daniel needed to think. Needed to plan.

Johnny was staying. The guys had taken his bags into the Lakehouse and he was holding his bonsai. They'd drive him back Sunday to get his Avanti. But they'd keep him till then.

They'd waved goodbye to Mr. Miyagi and Daniel and left just the three of them.

"After spring break over, when feeling better, Johnny-san come to house," Mr. Miyagi said softly, closing the trunk and handing the keys to the Nash to Daniel.

"Of course," Johnny said.

"We learn kata," Mr. Miyagi said. "Daniel-san and Johnny-san.

Daniel looked between the two of them in shock. It was time? Already? No. Finally. Finally, he and Johnny would be learning together. Finally, they'd be moving forward.

"Know what Kata is?" Mr. Miyagi asked.

"Uh, yeah, it's like choreography," Johnny said.

His blue eyes were wide. He looked stunned. Shocked. But there was hope mixed in there. Daniel grinned.

"Many many many types of kata. We start basic. But Johnny-san must sleep. Must take care of self, hmm?"

"Yes," Johnny said. "I will."

Mr. Miyagi nodded, a little hmm of approval. "Good."

He made his way to the passenger seat door and sat down in the car, leaving Daniel to stand in front of Johnny fiddling with the keys. He should go. Take Mr. Miyagi home. Go home and talk to his mother.

"Hey thanks, it was nice to get to swim. Enjoy the rest of your spring break," Daniel said turning.

Johnny reached out, hand ever so gently grazing his forearm.

Daniel paused looking back.

Johnny's eyes were full of concern, worry.

"Is it okay?"

"Huh?"

"Me. Learning with Mr. Miyagi? Are you okay with that? Learning with you?"

Daniel smiled. "3 months ago? Hell no. Would've used it as an excuse to trip you and take little jabs. But now? Yeah. I'm looking forward to it."

"Really?"

Johnny looked hopeful. The start of it. He'd help that grow. Tend to it. Because he knew what Johnny looked like when he was actually happy. When he was having fun. When he wasn't holding back or hiding.

"Really," Daniel said. He took Johnny's hand and gave it a squeeze. "Training with Mr. Miyagi is different. It's all defense. All inner balance and inner peace. Calming. But it's still nice. Fun. Might be a bit slow compared to Cobra Kai. But I hope you like it. Do you want to learn it?"

He didn't pull his hand away. Maybe he hadn't destroyed things as badly as he'd thought. Johnny had held out his hand to him earlier. Had told him he was still welcome. Kept trying to tell it was okay. That everything was fine. Maybe he meant that.

"I do. I... didn't think I could. I thought I'd have to give up karate completely." Johnny was looking out at the lake. "Thought it was over. That it just ended before everything else did. But I hoped, foolishly, like all other hopes...that maybe Mr. Miyagi would teach me what he taught you. So I could be more like him. More like you."

Daniel's eyes stung. So pretty. So sad. Damnit.

He pulled on Johnny's hand, moving to avoid the bonsai, so it wouldn't get crushed between them, giving him a hug. Arms wrapping around Johnny's torso again. Second time that day.

He remembered. The second day of Johnny being sick. The way he'd woken up. The soft way he'd said, "You didn't leave." In a tone of awe. Like he'd expected Daniel to leave. Like he was used to it. To people leaving. He wouldn't ever do that again. Not in that way. There'd always be a promise of return.

Johnny shifted, presumably moving the bonsai into a safe position and his arm came around Daniel. It stayed there, secure, and then there was that pat pat that made Daniel laugh. That awkward I don't know how to handle this.

"You shouldn't want to be like me. I'm a mess," Daniel said softly.

"Aren't we all?" Johnny asked.

Daniel laughed. He didn't want to leave. But he had to. He took a deep breath, full of Johnny, and stepped back. "I will see you at school. I'm going to take Mr. Miyagi home, get the Ford and then go home. Ma had some stuff she wanted to do. But Monday. School."

"I'll see you then."

Daniel climbed into the car. They'd get there.

He pulled away from Jimmy's lake house and waved at Johnny.

They'd start with kata. They'd learn under Mr. Miyagi, and he'd help right them back up. Back to where they were. And then Daniel would take a step closer. Then another. And he'd take hold of Johnny's hand and he wouldn't ever let go.

Starting Kata

Johnny missed Daniel when he left.

They'd spent so much time together since January that having the weekend and the rest of Friday without him felt like there was a vacuum in his life.

The guys brought all the bedding out of the bedrooms and dumped it on the living room floor. The one with the skylight so they could all sleep there and stare up at the stars. It was nice.

But Johnny wished Daniel was there. He was so used to seeing him. At school. At Mr. Miyagi's. It was too quiet without him. Too silent. Not just in the air. He didn't just miss the noise of his voice, but the way he was constantly moving. All up in Johnny's space. It was lonely. Even with the guys.

"You asleep?" Tommy asked quietly from beside him, rolling over onto his side.

"No," Johnny said.

"Thinking about Daniel?"

Johnny blushed. Was he that obvious?

Tommy laughed softly. As quiet as could be. "You're easy to read when you know what to look for."

Johnny covered his face with his hands.

"You keep looking out the window like a dog waiting for its owner to come back."

Johnny sighed. He hated it. But it was how he felt.

"I've got plans," Tommy said softly. "If you can just go with it."

Johnny glanced over at Tommy.

"I plan, okay?" Tommy whispered. "And I've got two cards up my sleeve. Well thought out. And it might not move the needle much, but it'll give me a better idea of where we are. Or really where you are."

Johnny stared at him.

"I... there are things I noticed at the lodge and they gave me ideas. So just, go with it okay? Don't give up yet. I know you want to move slow. I'm not going to push you. But I'm going to create...scenarios. So don't get mad."

"I'm not going to get mad."

"Don't promise something you can't keep," Tommy said, an amused smile on his lips. "But tell me, what did Mr. Miyagi and Daniel tell you?"

"Oh...uhh...next weekend...Mr. Miyagi is going to teach me kata." Johnny felt bad that he was going to learn karate without them. Away from them.

"Kata," Tommy said testing it out on his tongue. "What's that?"

"Type of karate," Jimmy said pushing himself up.

Johnny sat up as well, concern etching itself into his skin. He felt a hand slap his leg.

"Congrats man," Dutch said sleepily. "You enjoy that."

"You're okay with it?" Johnny asked.

"You need it," Bobby said. "Cobra Kai is over, we're fine."

"Are you...are you sure? I never- We never talked about-" Johnny started.

"Yeah," Tommy said stretching beside him. "We quit because we were done. We didn't want to be around Kreese anymore. And if you were going we were going."

"And like Daniel said today. We don't need karate to be friends. It just introduced us to one another. It's not like we only hung out at karate. We moved schools to all be together. We hang out all the time. So you enjoy those lessons with Mr. Miyagi," Jimmy said.

"And Daniel," Dutch said, tone sickly sweet.

"Thanks," Johnny said softly, laying back down, looking back up at the stars through the skylight. Feeling a little lighter.

It took Johnny a while to pick out what to wear to his first kata lesson with Mr. Miyagi (and Daniel). His mother stopped by and leaned against the doorframe of his room amused. Watching him lay out his clothes.

"Whatcha doing?" she asked.

"I've got kata today with Mr. Miyagi."

"And Daniel?"

"Yes."

"Mmm...so you're trying to figure out what you look nice in?"

"Yes."

"and you're working out?"

"Kind of."

"The sky blue one," she said ruffling his hair with her manicured nails. "Have fun. Be good."

He nodded and changed. She was right. The blues always looked nice. He thought about grabbing his black band, to keep his hair out of his eyes. But he didn't want to go in that box. It'd been such a long time. So he went without.

The drive was peaceful. The skies were clear and sunny. If he wasn't careful that hope was going to bloom into wildflowers.

He parked. The Ford was in the lot.

He wondered where he should go. Into the back? Or through the front? The door opened and Daniel leaned out, a warm smile on his face.

"Good morning Johnny."

"Morning."

Daniel hopped down the steps. Energized.

He took Johnny's hand and led him around through the back to the garden. Johnny set his bonsai on the little stand he was beginning to think of as where his bonsai went when he visited. The perfect spot for sunlight.

Daniel watched him amused.

The doors to the house slid open and Mr. Miyagi walked out. Johnny turned. He bowed. Mr. Miyagi smiled and bowed back.

Mr. Miyagi showed them the steps, the movement in the garden, and Johnny followed. It reminded him of dancing. A cross between the two. Karate and dancing.

Mr. Miyagi made it look easy. Fluid. Everything flowed simply.

It wasn't easy. Not the way Kreese talked about kata. Like it was something simple and unnecessary.

Johnny felt a little choppy as he followed Mr. Miyagi's movements. Focusing on taking what he knew and applying it, trying to find the pattern, the flow.

"Breathe," Mr. Miyagi said softly.

Johnny did. Following the movements. He was surprised that he broke a sweat. It seemed easy. But by the afternoon, his muscles were burning in the nice way a good workout made them.

Mr. Miyagi bowed and they bowed back.

"Miyagi make bento," he said as the two sat down on the wooden platform in the garden, "for lunch."

Mr. Miyagi passed out the boxes.

Johnny opened his carefully taking in the fish and rice, the little salad to the side.

"Thank you, Mr. Miyagi."

The rice was speckled. There was something mixed into it. It was different than normal, rounded into triangles of rice. Johnny took his chopsticks towards it.

"Atatata," Mr. Miyagi said and Johnny stopped looking up. He knew that sound. "Onigiri, no chopsticks, pick up and eat," Mr. Miyagi said picking up his and taking a bite. It all stayed together.

Johnny looked down at the rounded triangles, picked one, and picked it up. It didn't fall apart in his hands like he'd expected. He took a bite.

"Many types," Mr. Miyagi said. "Some have different flavors. This is simple, some seaweed."

Johnny thought of the seaweed he saw on the beaches that looked waxy and slimy. This was different, crunchier. Salty. He liked it.

Daniel was eating his and talking. Feet swinging on the board. He was talking about the New York trip, about the places he'd told Tommy and the rest of the student council they should go to. That they were being given free time for small groups to go places. How exciting it was. How close they'd be to where he grew up. That he'd talked to his uncle and his cousin for six hours so that Daniel didn't miss anything. His grandparents too. Oh, poor Mrs. LaRusso's phone bill. They came up with ideas of places to go and places to eat.

Johnny watched him fondly. The way he was talking with his hands. One hand holding the onigiri close while the other waved about. Then all that focus fell on Johnny and his heart pounded so loudly in his ears.

"What are you excited to do in New York?"

Be with you. See everything through your eyes.

"I trust that you'll make sure we don't miss anything important," Johnny said.

"You've never had dreams of New York?"

Johnny shook his head. "I figured I'd never leave California. New York is pretty far by car. But you know that."

"It is! It's too long! But we got to see the Grand Canyon. And we stopped at all these little things along the way. To try and make it fun. But I was so miserable the whole way," Daniel said with a soft laugh.

"You were uprooted," Johnny said softly. "It's difficult."

Daniel studied him for a moment then nodded taking a big bite of his onigiri. "It is."

Mr. Miyagi nodded as well. "Take while to get used to. But with time, flourish." He motioned around the garden with a smile.

"Yeah, you had a real big uprooting Mr. Miyagi, when did you move?"

Mr. Miyagi thought about it for a second. "When Daniel-san's age, Miyagi arrive in Hawaii."

He had that distant look in his eyes he got sometimes while thinking about the past. Bittersweet. Hawaii was another place Johnny hadn't ever been to. His mother had. Sid took her for their honeymoon. He spent two weeks alone at the mansion. His own honeymoon, full of excitement and hope for the future. The thought that he might have a dad for the first time in his life.

"Is Hawaii nice?" Johnny asked.

"Hai, remind Miyagi of Okinawa."

Johnny nodded, setting his hand on the wood beneath him, to lean against that arm. He gazed out at the garden. Mr. Miyagi probably made this place for himself after. After moving, after war, a peaceful place where he could sit and watch things grow, flourish.

Kreese, after war, opened a dojo. Probably driven by fear of war. Wanting to prepare the youth around him for the nightmares he had.

But Miyagi wanted peace. Not to prepare for another battle.

18. At 18, just a little older than Johnny Mr. Miyagi had moved far from home. And then just a little later probably, gone off to war, to fight for his new country. Johnny couldn't even imagine. But he could imagine wanting to set out roots somewhere, to try and carve out a place of peace.

Fingers touched his. It felt electric, even such a simple touch. He didn't dare move. Didn't want to draw attention to it. Just to savor it.

Daniel was asking about fruit, the stuff he knew about Hawaii. Talking about food. Johnny looked over. He was wondering about Hawaiian cuisine.

Johnny finished his bento and set it aside. The air always felt cleaner at Mr. Miyagi's. He thought it was because of all the plants. Mr. Miyagi said he could make one of the dishes he remembered. He'd only been in Hawaii a short time, before moving to California, before attending college at Santa Barbara University. Johnny tried thinking of a young Mr. Miyagi, new to the country studying in California while war loomed like a dark cloud. It had to have been awful.

Mr. Miyagi stood up. "Continue with kata?"

Johnny blinked and nodded standing up and gathering up the remains of his bento.

"We'll clean up first," Daniel offered, taking his and Mr. Miyagi's bento and walking down the platform towards the house.

"Thank you for lunch," Johnny said before trailing after him.

The kitchen was a bit small for the two of them. Kept them too close. Johnny washed the boxes and the chopsticks and Daniel dried them and put them away since he knew where everything went. Johnny could feel him beside him. the warmth of him, the feel of his arm as he brushed close, his shoulder against Johnny's. His heart was pounding, he tried to focus on his breathing. It'd be so easy to just turn, to tip his head, lift Daniel's chin and kiss him. A soft gentle kiss.

He pushed down the urge. Their last kiss was still sparking ripples of pain. He couldn't.

They returned to where Mr. Miyagi was and worked through the kata. The steps they'd learned before. Johnny knew they'd practice it until they mastered it. Until it was as fluid and easy as Mr. Miyagi's. And then maybe they might learn another. Then maybe they'd spar. It felt like choreography.

It reminded him of sitting on the catwalks during rehearsals with Ali, watching actors dance below, seeing their fights from a different view, the way they spun and lunged, whirling this way and that.

The day ended faster than Johnny expected. He would've thought that doing kata would make the day slow and sticky like molasses. That it'd take forever. But it was easy to get lost in it. Johnny could focus. He could focus on something for a long time. But to do so feeling so utterly calm, so utterly refreshed was new. Breathing was easier. He wondered if it was the kata, or being in Mr. Miyagi's garden doing kata.

He'd practice, at home, in the quiet of his room and he'd know.

Johnny and Daniel bowed to Mr. Miyagi as the sun began to set. Practice over. Training over. Lesson over.

Daniel had dinner with his mother, Daniel was saying, but he was dragging his feet. Not ready to go. Not ready to leave.

Johnny understood. It was like a bubble. Perfect and iridescent and he didn't want it to pop. Someone would have to leave first. Maybe they'd have to go at the same time. It'd be easier. Maybe.

He had to just move. One foot in front of the other.

He could grab dinner at a drive-through. Or get tacos and sit on the beach watching the tide.

"Thank you, Mr. Miyagi," Johnny said.

Mr. Miyagi smiled and nodded.

Johnny turned, just ever so slightly. "Have a good evening," he said.

He picked up his bonsai and headed to the gate. He could leave first. Daniel should have time alone with Mr. Miyagi if he wanted it. He heard steps following him.

"Good night Mr. Miyagi," Daniel said. Daniel was moving ahead of him, pushing the gate open and then holding it open for him, smiling warmly at him. His slowed, calmed heartbeat stirred fast at that look.

"What are you going to do?" Daniel asked him softly as Johnny passed.

"I'm thinking tacos on the beach," Johnny said quietly.

Daniel clicked his tongue in disapproval.

"There's nothing wrong with eating tacos on the beach," Johnny said.

He did it a lot. There was a little shop he frequented. The tacos were cheap. But well made by the little old lady who he thought owned it. He'd had to learn a little Spanish to order them. The first time he'd ordered he'd tripped over the words as he tried to read the sign that she laughed, and he hadn't a clue what he'd ended up with but it was delicious. He was better at it now. Had learned she also made coconut ice cream and he hadn't found anything else like it. He had been slowly working his way through the menu.

"You should come to eat with me and Ma," Daniel said. "She always makes too much food."

Johnny frowned. He really wanted those tacos now. But, he wasn't going to turn down Daniel. He couldn't. It was harder than trying to push a boulder up a hill.

"Okay, but you have to join me for tacos then. You can't disapprove of my favorite taco stand without trying it."

Daniel studied him for a moment then grinned. "Deal. Let's go to my home then. Ma will be happy."

Johnny set his bonsai carefully in the Avanti and followed Daniel's Ford to the Seven Seas Apartment complex.

He felt awkward. He didn't have anything in his hands. He always had things in his hands. Every time he visited the Mills he had something. Flowers, wine, champagne, or fancy cheese or chocolates. He didn't have anything for Mrs. LaRusso. Nothing to give her as an apology for him just showing up on her doorstep. Nothing as thank you for letting me join you for dinner.

He was starting to get antsy. His hands were sweating. He breathed. Bobby had told him he didn't have to be useful. He could just be. He could just try and be good company.

He could offer to do the dishes.

He parked and put the hood up on the Avanti, locking the bonsai in. He hesitated. No, it'd be safe.

He turned, Daniel was watching him with those dark brown eyes.

"You okay?" Daniel asked.

He didn't want to say. Didn't know how to explain that he suddenly didn't know what to do with his hands. That he was used to carrying stuff. Used to trying to make himself useful.

"Are you sure this is okay? Coming over sudden like this?"

He never could, when he was younger have people over suddenly. They didn't have enough food. Their apartment wasn't nice enough. And then Sid...well his friends had to sneak in. Ali came when she wanted. But he never invited his friends to dinner. He'd invited Ali to dinner, but he had to call ahead. So he didn't embarrass Sid by feeding her frozen food. Even though she liked frozen food. Even though she was fine with mini pizzas nuked in the microwave. Sid always wanted her to have fresh salmon or steak. It always became a show.

God his hands were sweaty. He rubbed them on his pants.

Daniel smiled at him. "It's fine. Trust me."

Johnny did. Daniel could lead him off a cliff and he'd follow. His mother would be pissed. But he'd do it. Maybe Mrs. LaRusso would have something for him to do. He'd gotten very good at changing light bulbs. Fixing leaky sinks.

He followed Daniel up the stairs to number 20. Daniel just opened the door. Johnny wasn't used to not knocking on that door. He felt like he was breaking in.

Daniel walked in, saw him standing on the doorstep lost, and grabbed him, pulling him in with a laugh on his lips.

"It's okay," he said again. Daniel turned towards the kitchen, hands-on Johnny's arms. "Ma, Johnny's joining us for dinner."

"Welcome Johnny!" she called turning from where she was at work in the kitchen and grinning. "Come in, come in, make yourself at home! Got about a half-hour left I'd say until it's done."

"Thank you for having me Mrs. LaRusso," Johnny said.

Daniel was tugging on him, pulling him deeper into the house.

Mrs. LaRusso laughed. "Of course dear."

Johnny thought his heart was going to explode. He was so nervous. He wasn't paying attention to where he was going. It smelled amazing though, whatever Mrs. LaRusso was making.

Then a door was being opened and he was dragged along. Daniel's room. He'd been in there once before. When Daniel had been drunk, totally asleep. He hadn't taken as much of it in as he'd wanted. Not the posters on the walls, not the books on the shelves, not the homework on the desk. He'd seen the first place trophy had been moved from the living room. He looked at it.

It was bittersweet. He was proud of Daniel. But not proud of himself.

He wasn't sure if it counted as the worst day of his life. But it was there. High up there.

He took in the soccer ball in the corner. Photos. Daniel and his Mom and Dad. Johnny turned. His closet was open slightly. Johnny could see the white gi, the white hachimaki with the flower on it. A radio sat on the desk. A bonsai sat on one of the shelves. Johnny studied it. It was different from his, a different type of tree. But clearly well cared for.

"Did you do the English homework?" Daniel asked.

He was sitting at ease on his bed. Like this was nothing. Like there weren't a million small pieces of Daniel scattered around the room that Johnny could explore. A million things that were little keys to who he was, parts of who he was and would become.

English.

"It was reading homework right?" Johnny asked.

Neurons weren't firing properly. It smelled like Daniel. Everything.

He'd done the reading. But he couldn't remember what it was. He would come Monday. But right now he was wondering a million things.

What station the radio was set to, if he turned it on would it be loud or quiet? Would it be rock? Would it be pop? Would it be country or rap? Blues? Polka? What did Daniel leave his radio on? What music did he like while he studied?

How dusty was that soccer ball? Could Daniel teach Johnny how to do that trick? The one he'd taught Ali on the beach? Probably not inside. He still didn't know where a good place to play soccer was. Johnny wasn't good at it. But maybe. Maybe they could play together. When Daniel's knee was better. Could you play one on one?

Daniel was worrying his lower lip again. Staring at Johnny.

Johnny didn't know what to do with himself, so he pulled the desk chair back and sat down. It felt weird to stand and stare at a sitting Daniel. Uneven. He looked at the school books on his desk. Pride and Prejudice. Right. He picked up the book.

"It's so boring," Daniel complained.

Johnny blinked. He'd skipped ahead. He'd stayed up late reading it. He hadn't finished it yet. He smiled softly.

"It picks up."

"Does it?"

"It's a romantic drama. About preconceptions and class. "

"Huh," Daniel said. "You don't care that our teacher gave us a 400-page book to read as homework two months before we graduate?"

"No. I'll probably finish it soon."

"Seriously?" Daniel asked, he was leaning forward. "How? Do you sleep?"

"Not much honestly."

"Johnny!" Daniel sounded like Bobby for a second. Scandalized. The sound of a lecture coming. Johnny flicked through the pages of the soft paperback looking for Daniel's bookmark, wondering where he was in the book. He was calmer now.

"There's too much I want to do," Johnny said softly. And nightmares I don't want to have.

He couldn't find the bookmark. He turned to Daniel. "Have you not even started?"

"I tried. First page. It's hard to read. It's all stuffy. Like Shakespeare."

Johnny frowned. He flipped back to the first page. "It's a bit confusing because people go by their last names and so women are all the titled the same. But once you get going..." He flicked on the desk light, it was getting dark in the room. "It is a truth, universally acknowledged...."

Sometimes reading aloud helped. Sometimes he and the guys, before they started going to school together would go to the park after school. The guys would shove a book in his hands and he'd read. They'd take notes. A little study group. They'd do it for math too. Compare notes even though they went to different schools. They'd find the crossover.

He was used to Dutch whining about the reading. A similar complaint about stuffy language, over tricky language. They'd pry it apart together and search for the meaning. The metaphors their teachers were looking for. The hidden meanings. Five heads were better than one. It was a habit now. Someone complained about reading meant someone else was going to read it aloud.

There was a knock on the door and he jumped, startled. He got a glimpse of Daniel. How he'd been sitting with his head in his hands, elbows on his knees staring at Johnny as he read aloud, suddenly pulling back and looking past him. Johnny turned. Mrs. LaRusso was smiling warmly from the open door.

"Dinner's ready."

Johnny looked for a bookmark. Found a scrap piece of paper and stuck it in the book and shut it on the desk. Daniel was up, pulling Johnny along, out of his room and to the dining room table to sit between him and his mother. A small table. Like the one in the kitchen Sid didn't like. Cozy.

A big pan was put in the middle of the table. There was bread set out in a basket and Mrs. LaRusso pulled the lid off the pan. Steam rose. It looked like porridge. It looked like what Mr. Miyagi had made Johnny when he'd been sick. But it was green.

"Risotto," Mrs. LaRusso said. "My spring Risotto. Lots of vegetables and some homemade pesto. How'd your lessons go?"

Daniel talked about kata. Talked about Mr. Miyagi and Johnny ate.

It was comforting food. Something he thought he'd like to eat at the lodge.

Daniel talked about their lunch, explained the onigiri. His mother listened, nodding. Asking questions. Heading out onto tangents about similar foods. That reminded her of restaurants, that reminded her of people, of places, of stories. The conversation was a gentle tug of war. Each going off on things the topic reminded them of. Until Johnny found himself listening to them discussing the museums in New Jersey, the big dinosaur at the entrance of a museum. And if Johnny hadn't been following along, if he'd stepped out of the conversation he would've been so lost. They were talking about the Louies. Johnny ate. Listening. Following the winding paths of their conversations. Watching them jump from one topic to another.

"Oh," Mrs. LaRusso said after they'd been sitting a while, no longer eating just talking. She turned to Johnny and clapped her hands. "I'm so glad you came today. I wanted to send some of these with Daniel to give you. But now you can have them fresher." She got up picking up the leftover risotto and putting it on the counter and grabbing a different container that she brought back and set out. "I made cannoli today. Thought you'd like to try some."

"Thank you Mrs. LaRusso," Johnny said taking one. It looked like a wrapped pastry filled with something white that looked like cream and chocolate chips. He had no clue how to eat it without making a mess.

She smiled at him. Warm. Motherly. She patted his hand gently and asked about progress on the senior trip. Daniel updated her on the information, helping himself to a cannoli. She got up to package the rest of them up while she listened.

Johnny bit into his and as he feared it made a mess. It was sweet, but white mascarpone and cream, what Mrs. LaRusso had said the filling was made out of, covered his fingers. Definitely a faux pas if he was anywhere else. There was probably a reason he hadn't had a cannoli at any fancy diner party.

He wasn't at a fancy dinner party though. He was at the LaRusso's. He licked his fingers clean. He tried again.

It was hard to break habits. To not sit up straight but relax, to not care that he was making a mess. To not panic and look for a napkin and expect to be berated for making a mess. It was a little embarrassing but it was fine.

It was delicious though. She'd said something about ricotta being a normal ingredient.

He felt eyes boring into him. He glanced over. Daniel was staring at him with that dark look in his eyes. The way he had at the last time he'd been there. A look he occasionally caught but didn't understand. He was all stiff, staring. Completely focused and not talking. Thinking probably. But Johnny didn't know what. Mrs. LaRusso was talking while she was in the kitchen. Excited for their senior trip. Talking about her own favorite field trips from when she'd been in school.

The last time Johnny had stared back until his mother had joked that he was flirting. He didn't know what to do this time. Was there a proper way to eat them that he didn't know? Was it like leaving your chopsticks sticking up in your food? Couldn't be. Most cultures frowned on wasting food. A mistake he didn't know? Maybe he should look for a book on Italian customs, but would they be Italian or Italian American? Or New Jersey specific?

They were impossible to eat without making a mess, he looked back at his hands, licked them clean again, determined that there had to be a better way and he'd figure it out eventually. Maybe he'd find a shop that sold them, a bakery and watch other people eat them. That sounded like something only a creep would do though. Someone had to know. He'd missed seeing how Daniel handled it. Daniel had his bottom lip between his teeth again. The way he had when Johnny was reading. The way he just did sometimes.

There was something he'd promised himself that he'd forgotten. He heard the sound of water and turned. He'd promised to offer to help with the dishes. He should've offered earlier. Would it be too weird to get up now and ask, to take over? Probably. There was a perfect time to take over and when someone had already started didn't seem the right time.

Daniel was still staring.

"Do I have something on my face?" Johnny asked, quietly.

"No," Daniel said. It was so little. Usually, he said so much more. He was struggling with something.

Johnny sat quietly. There were a bunch of dinner party topic starters he'd been trained to learn. He never ever thought he'd need to use one around Daniel. Daniel always just talked. He tried to filter through them for any that were applicable. That didn't have to do with local sports teams, gambling, stocks, business, or any of the ridiculous things he'd been asked to learn about.

Was it him? He couldn't figure out what he'd done. Maybe a neutral topic.

"Kata was nice," Johnny said looking at Daniel. "Harder than I thought it'd be."

It was almost like Daniel wasn't there. Physically yes, but like he'd mentally packed his bags and left somewhere else. It took a while for what Johnny said to register. For the wheels to turn.

"Yeah."

"You okay?"

"Yeah."

"You sure?"

"Yes."

Johnny glanced at the clock. He should probably get home. He excused himself from the table, and washed his hands, and then walked to the kitchen to thank Mrs. LaRusso. She smiled warmly at him and told him to come back any time.

He headed towards the door, he turned to see Daniel followed him to the door. He was holding a box of cannoli that he pressed into Johnny's hands as Johnny stepped out of the apartment.

Johnny worried the edges of the box turning back, Daniel leaned easily against his door. Looked like he'd recovered from whatever it was.

"Before finals, or semi-finals we usually meet up and study...if you want to join. We've got a semi-final coming up, so we're spending part of next week at Tommy's after school."

Daniel smiled. "I'd like that."

"Thank you," he said again. "Good night Daniel."

"Good night Johnny," Daniel said warmly.

Whatever it was seemed to have passed. Daniel didn't seem upset with him, which was a relief.

Johnny pulled away from the warmth of the LaRusso's apartment and out of the light that flooded the hall. He headed down the stairs to his car. He unlocked it and set the cannoli gently next to the bonsai. He'd share some with his mom. She'd be delighted.

He breathed deeply. It'd gone well for the most part. He'd been so nervous and it'd been fine. He felt good. He turned on his music. His fingers tapped on the steering wheel to the beat, pulling away from the Seven Seas apartment complex.

Study Dates

Daniel was going to go fishing again. He'd let the line go too slack. He had to reel back in.

He couldn't sit still.

He could be patient, or he thought he could, but he needed to test that foundation again and he'd had a spark of inspiration based on what Johnny had said after dinner.

Something simple to spend more time together.

A classic.

When Johnny was taking a break from kata practice, he sat down next to Daniel on the wooden platform just like Daniel knew he would.

A perfectly executed trap.

Johnny leaned over to see what he was working on.

Math.

"You understood the new formulas?" Johnny asked.

"I do," Daniel said with a warm smile. "Almost done."

Johnny looked thoughtful. "How?"

Daniel tried to keep his grin down.

Caught.

He flipped to a new page in his notebooks and went to work showing Johnny, speaking slow and softly, explaining how to solve for it. Working through a few of the problems.

Johnny sat close, head bent, focused on the page.

Now for the next step.

"Did you bring your homework?" Daniel asked, looking up.

They were so close.

"Yeah, it's in the Avanti."

"Bring it, we'll work on it together," Daniel said with a smile.

Johnny was up and gone.

Daniel waited, letting his grin spread.

He'd missed one of the most obvious plays. He'd been trying all the wrong approaches. In class Johnny paid attention. He took copious amounts of notes. In English, he saw things differently than Daniel. And the teachers always liked what Johnny said, the metaphors he saw deep in the writing, between the lines.

But with math, there was a right answer. Always. And Johnny got it, most of the time. But he didn't raise his hand as fast as Daniel did. And Daniel liked being faster. Liked rubbing it in his face. Used to. Now he could use it to his advantage.

He tapped his pencil against the paper.

Johnny came back with his school bag. He sat down again beside Daniel, taking out his book, notebook, and pencils.

Daniel leaned over, watching him work, practicing what Daniel had just taught him.

He pressed close.

He'd have to be careful.

He'd have to focus.

He couldn't get distracted. He was going to try and not startle Johnny. But he wanted to check on something else. If he was healing.

He'd have to telegraph his move. So he wouldn't scare him. He watched Johnny work.

There.

Now.

He ran his hand up Johnny's back up to his shoulder.

He was blushing, ears were delightfully red, but he wasn't flinching. He hooked his arm over Johnny's shoulder and pointed. Leaning close, speaking softly in his ear. "Gotta start with the parenthesis."

Johnny tried again. Erasing and going back to work. He didn't shy away. Daniel wanted to get up and celebrate. He was healing. He could handle someone touching his shoulders again. An arm around the back of his neck. He wondered if Johnny even noticed how monumental that was. He wanted to tell Mr. Miyagi. But he also wanted to savor it.

Daniel watched Johnny work. Gently guiding him when he messed up with soft whispers in his ear. His shoulders were stiff, but after a while of work, the tension began to leave. He didn't need too much help. And it was hard to not be distracted. He could bite Johnny's ear if he wanted, or his neck.

It was tempting. Very tempting.

Johnny finished his last problem, the last of his homework and let out a satisfied sigh as he shut the book and he leaned back, bumping into Daniel's chest like he'd forgotten Daniel was there.

Daniel didn't know if that was a good thing or a bad thing.

It was amusing with how Johnny stiffened suddenly turning, the blush that had hidden away, scared off by math problems flooding back. Clearly wasn't used to it anymore. Not having the ex-cobras or anyone hang around so close. It was almost gratifying. Daniel almost believed it was because of him. He could dream.

"Thanks," Johnny said after a moment.

He looked thoughtful, which was cruel. So damn close Daniel could kiss him, but he was thinking about something else. Because of course, he was.

"Did reading aloud help? With Pride and Prejudice?"

Oh.

Oh, hell yes.

Daniel pulled away slowly, letting his hand run along Johnny's back. No sudden movements. He turned and opened his bag.

"A trade?" he asked, amused.

He could work with this. He grabbed his book. He pressed it into Johnny's hands and he laid down.

He'd take advantage of this. A new perspective.

Johnny was opening the book. Not paying attention as Daniel put his head in Johnny's lap.

This was how old work should be read. By a hot guy who let you lay your head on them. Daniel would pass English with flying colors.

Johnny read and Daniel listened. It was soothing. Calming. Johnny read well. Not as choppy as their classmates. Not as monotone.

Johnny stopped reading and lifted the book looking down at Daniel.

"Hmm?" Daniel asked.

"Are you falling asleep?"

He was. He was too comfortable. He yawned and stretched.

"Do you remember what's happening?" Johnny asked.

Oh, he was serious.

Teacher Mr. Lawrence.

Daniel's lips quirked into a grin at the thought.

"Darcy's asked Elizabeth to dance and she turned him down, again," Daniel said. He was paying attention. He really was. He pushed himself up. "Uh and there's now a Miss Darcy."

"Darcy's little sister," Johnny said.

"Right." He stretched again. "Where's the romantic bit? Elizabeth hates everyone but her Dad and her sister."

"Ah, we're not there yet," Johnny said.

"Not there yet? Have you finished it?"

"I have," Johnny said, moving the book to one hand, letting his finger be the bookmark.

"How fast do you read?"

"Not fast. I just...read before bed."

"Instead of sleeping," Daniel said with a frown. "You have to sleep Johnny."

"Only sometimes. I do sleep."

There was hesitation. He was trying to bat away the concern. To make it seem like it wasn't anything. But if Daniel looked close he could see how tired he was. He leaned close.

"You gotta sleep."

"I'll try," Johnny said.

Daniel sighed, shifting to lean against him. "Okay."

It was as good as he could get right now. He couldn't just go into the mansion and pull Johnny out of it.

His mother got that he liked Johnny but he had nowhere to put him. And Johnny wouldn't want to leave his mother behind. He couldn't ask him to do that.

They sat for a bit with Johnny reading.

They put away their homework when Mr. Miyagi came back, Johnny returning the bookmark and they practiced kata until it was time to go home.

It became a thing.

They'd do homework together, sitting close. Daniel's arm slung very carefully around Johnny's shoulder, helping him with homework and then Daniel would find a comfortable position to listen to Johnny read.

His newest go-to was laying down on the boards with his legs over Johnny's in his lap. A jacket pillowed under his head.

It was a good excuse, his knee.

He had a better view, watching Johnny read to him, not blocked by the book. Then they'd do kata with Mr. Miyagi.

Daniel was pretty pleased. The weeks passed fairly quickly until it was time for the group study days.

Those were at Tommy's house. And Daniel followed Johnny there, with all his notes and all his books, prepared.

Tommy's house was modest in comparison to the mansions Jimmy and Johnny lived in. But it was about the same size as Bobby's.

He parked and gathered up his heavy backpack. Johnny had his bag slung over his shoulder, bonsai under one arm.

Johnny held the door open for him and led Daniel through the halls to a library.

"Oh thank god," Tommy said. "Bobby and I keep getting different answers. Daniel, I need your help."

Ah, that was nice.

He set his things down in a corner and walked over, watching Johnny out of the corner of his eye while he set the bonsai carefully on a table, notebook in his hand, setting his bag down and sitting next to Jimmy.

Daniel sat between them going over the math problem. He watched them try again. He leaned over, correcting them.

"Are we seriously starting with math?" Dutch complained.

"Daniel has an A in math," Tommy said.

"Seriously?"

"Yeah," Tommy said. "So yes, we're going to take advantage of the situation and get help. Because I for one would like to tack a nice grade on the fridge for the midterms."

"Your aunt offered you something nice didn't she?" Dutch asked amused.

"Hmmm maybe. But hey, Bobby gets money for every A he gets."

Bobby grinned. "I do. And if I'm lucky I'll be visiting UCLA and taking some girls out to dinner with my good grade money."

"Oh god," Jimmy groaned. "Daniel, please, teach us. Get him off-topic. I can't listen about these girls anymore."

"Yeah I'm going to hurl," Dutch complained. "Anything else would be better. Mr. LaRusso, math time."

Daniel grinned.

He could definitely get used to this.

He worked slow.

Checking over their work, answering questions, moving through what they'd learned so far that semester. Watching them do the practice questions the teacher had given them as a study guide.

"I gotta take a break, my brains gonna leak out of my ears," Jimmy said leaning back after they'd finished half. "You mind if we switch gears? Maybe grab a snack? Tommy, what've you got in the fridge?"

"I know how this works," Tommy said looking at Jimmy. "I list everything I remember. You hmm you hah, you decided you'd rather see for yourself. In case I forgot something. Then you just stare in the fridge for five minutes and then grab string cheese. I'm going to save my breath. Just go look for yourself and grab your string cheese."

Jimmy laughed, holding up his hands. "Okay okay, I'll bring back snacks."

Tommy nodded and turned back to Daniel. "You did all the heavy lifting, so what do you want to study next?"

Daniel thought about it. He felt like English was covered, what with Johnny reading to him and discussing the book afterward.

"Let's do history," Daniel said a bit of thought.

Jimmy returned with a tray of snacks.

"Tommy your aunt was saying something about this weekend?"

Tommy stood. "Right, uh, I'll...be back."

Jimmy set the tray down and took string cheese and sat back down. "So what we choose?"

"History," Dutch said, dropping the textbook heavily on the desk. "You're up, Mr. I want to be a fancy pants lawyer."

"Aw heck yeah," Jimmy said leaning forward.

"Wait, really?" Daniel asked surprised.

"Had some eye-opening conversations lately. Plus I like this type of stuff," Jimmy said with a smile to Daniel then turned to Johnny. "Don't worry Johnny I'll get you out of jail pro bono."

"Hey," Johnny said.

"What about me?" Dutch said.

"Nah I'm charging you," Jimmy said with a grin.

Dutch threw an eraser at him but Jimmy dodged.

They went to work. Daniel listened to Jimmy quiz them on what was expected on their history test. Tommy came back after a while a warm smile on his face.

Before he knew it the night was over.

When he was heading towards the door Tommy tapped him on the shoulder.

"Hey, so this weekend we're going to the beach house. We'll do some studying, but my aunt also has some work to do. I was wondering if you'd be okay with helping out?"

Daniel stared. "Uh, what is it? I might not be useful."

"It's a photoshoot. My aunt works for a magazine and has to take some photos for the magazine."

"Listen, I'm not really the most photogenic-"

"Oh, don't worry uh not you. Johnny agreed. Or kind of has agreed," Tommy said. "But I need some help and all the other guys are busy. They won't arrive till lunch. There's all this stuff that has to be carried around and I guess my aunt put me in charge of that. But there's photo assisting stuff. Think you can be there at 7 am? Like I'll make sure we cover your ticket to New York City."

Daniel stared at him in shock. "Seriously?"

"Yeah I mean we have a fund for kids who don't live in the Hills for their tickets and everything to be cheaper. I might actually have to dip into that for Johnny too...depending on Sid," Tommy said. "It's one of the things we've been raising since- oh wow, it's been a while. Parents donate like every year. We use it for prom and the senior trip. Part of my platform was that we wouldn't leave anyone behind for the trip."

"Okay, yeah. I'll be there. 7 am? Where?"

Tommy grabbed a piece of paper and quickly wrote a phone number and address. "Saturday, 7 am. We'll be on the beach. And then afternoon we'll eat lunch and then a final push to study before next week's mid-terms. And then before you know it we'll be in New York."

Daniel took the paper. He said goodbye to the guys and went home.

A magazine photo shoot with Johnny.

Weird.

But it also made sense.

He kept thinking he looked like he belonged in a calendar or something. But Johnny could also belong in a magazine.

He wondered what kind of photoshoot it'd be. It preoccupied his mind most of the rest of the week.

His mind kept going off the deep end.

He wondered what he'd be doing. Holding lights? Running changes of clothes?

He was dying to know by the time Saturday rolled around. He almost hadn't been able to enjoy their study dates. Almost.

It was too early.

His mother handed him a thermos of coffee and he drove out, following the directions Tommy had given him to a private beach.

There was a gate.

He remembered what Johnny had done at the one by the lake. He leaned over and pushed the button.

"Hello?" The voice was too crackly to make out who it was.

"Hi, it's Daniel. I'm supposed to be helping?"

The gates slid open and he drove through.

The house was stunning. Lots of big windows and a beautiful deck and view of the beach. He parked his car and looked around. He spotted the Avanti but no Johnny.

Tommy had said the beach. And sure enough, he could see tables and umbrellas set out, and a tent. He headed down the hill towards it, walking through the sand.

"Hey, uh, I'm here?" Daniel said when he spotted Tommy holding a big bag standing on the beach. He'd been hidden by the tent.

"Ah perfect," Tommy said.

He motioned for Daniel to follow him. They walked through the sand to a rocky outcropping. Johnny was leaning against it in jeans and what barely constituted a white tank top.

Daniel swallowed hard. Oh.

There was a middle-aged woman taking photos.

"So what is this for?" Daniel whispered.

Johnny was focused. Charming smiles. Listening to her speak, following her directions. Subtle movements to change the pose.

"They're preparing for the summer issue. My aunt's been asking him to do photoshoots since we met. It's the blue eyes...it's because-"

"He's pretty," Daniel finished for him.

"Yeah," Tommy said adjusting the bag over his shoulder.

"They apparently do well. It's a bit of modeling. Johnny gets a little bit of his own money. Not from Sid or anyone else. I'll have to show you the other photos. The first time my aunt asked him to do it, I mean those were cute. But when he..." Tommy waved at Johnny. "Grew up, I guess, apparently the readers, of this teen magazine department wanted more like this. I think they use him as like a fake boyfriend in a girls magazine? Where they use his photos and some writer answers questions girls have. Johnny said he doesn't want to know. He's a bit embarrassed by it. Apparently, when he went from a little twig to well this, a lot of guys read it too. Sent in a bunch of questions on how. They had to call my aunt, and my aunt had to ask me. I had to get Johnny's workout regimen out of him. The one Kreese gave him. It was a lot. Like I couldn't have done it. It was like all he did outside of school and classes that entire first year he started."

Daniel kept trying to focus on Tommy. But his eyes kept going back to Johnny. Tommy's aunt was talking to him and he was nodding and he was taking off the white tank and damn those muscles. He was tensing, flexing. He knew because he'd seen what Johnny looked like shirtless, resting, sick. A few more photos then Johnny was walking towards them across the sand.

"What's next?" Tommy called to his aunt.

"Clothing change," she said.

Tommy nodded and the three of them headed towards the tent. Tommy shoved a bottle into Daniel's hands. There was a little divider in the tent and Jimmy threw something white over the divider as Johnny ducked behind it.

"Uh yeah, so you're up," Tommy said patting Daniel on the shoulder. "Skip the face. They don't like that, but the rest- he's gotta glisten."

Glisten? What the hell?

Tommy was gone and Daniel was alone with Johnny. He looked down at the bottle Tommy had given him.

Oil.

Baby oil.

Wait.

Wait.

Skip the face.

What was he...?

Johnny came out wearing white pants. They almost looked like the bottom of a gi.

"Tommy roped you into this?" Johnny asked quietly.

"Yeah," Daniel said. He thought about laughing but it'd be misunderstood. Oh. Maybe... "So you never mentioned you model."

Johnny looked uncomfortable. "Not a lot."

"For an advice column?" Daniel asked with a laugh. "Clearly I read the wrong magazines."

Johnny flushed red.

Daniel grinned stepping forward.

"Anything I should know? Tommy high-tailed it out of here pretty fast. You fight the last person who tried to grease you up?"

"No, I mean I can do it myself. Most of it," Johnny said reaching for the bottle.

"Atatatata," Daniel said holding the bottle out of the way. "I was given a job. I'm going to do it."

Bless Tommy. Hell if Daniel could vote for him he would. They hadn't gone to the same school. But if he went back in time, he'd send a little vote in the mail. Maybe he'd vote for him for prom king.

He opened the bottle and poured the oil onto his hands.

"This going to fry you?" he asked after a moment.

He wanted to start on Johnny's torso. Focus on the muscles there. But instead, he worked his hands up Johnny's arm. Restraint. He was trying.

"I can't stand around too long with it, yeah. I'll fry," Johnny said. "Red as a lobster."

Daniel laughed shaking his head. "Poor guy."

"Some of us don't tan easily."

"Blessed Italian genes," Daniel said with a grin, moving his way up to Johnny's biceps.

Johnny flexed and Daniel felt his mouth go dry. He knew he was blushing. But he was going to do this. And he was going to enjoy every damn second of it. He moved his way to Johnny's shoulder, moving slow, massaging the oil in.

Johnny's whole arm was shiny. Glistened.

Tommy hadn't given him a deadline. Hadn't told him to hurry. So he wasn't going to. He'd drag his fingers across every inch of skin he'd been given to touch.

He was out of oil. He picked up the bottle, poured more into his hands.

He picked up where he left off, moving down from the deltoid to Johnny's pec.

Johnny shivered. He was turning redder.

"It's not cold is it?" Daniel asked working his way down.

Daniel was trying to keep a neutral face, trying to remain calm. He'd seen kids in speech class turn bright red, the way their shoulders and necks reddened. It was like someone had spilled paint on Johnny. His chest was warm underneath Daniel's fingers, red but only to a point.

Johnny was practicing his breathing. Good for him. Learning. Trying not to, what? Go into fight or flight mode?

Now, the question was could he keep it up? If Daniel kept going, down.

He was tense. Flexing.

Daniel worked his way down Johnny's abdomen taking his time on Johnny's abs. Running oil over each one, enjoying the sensation. Looking at them up close.

Maybe he'd get Tommy something nice. Maybe, just maybe he'd bring him back a slice of the New York cheesecake from his favorite shop. After dragging Johnny there.

His fingers brushed Johnny's waistband. He worked his way to his other side, to go up and up.

Johnny was covered in goosebumps.

"You okay?" Daniel asked after a moment, stepping back and looking up.

Johnny was so red.

He poured more oil into his hands. He was probably was really fighting off the urge to either fight or bolt. Embarrassed.

"You're too quiet," Johnny said softly.

"Huh?" Daniel asked.

"Can you talk about something, anything?" It was a plead.

The poor guy looked so damn uncomfortable.

Daniel sighed, he'd been too focused. He hadn't started drooling right? He brushed his forearm against his lips, no, he was good.

"Okay, yeah. You might not like it...all I can think about right now are muscles," Daniel admitted uneasily.

"It's fine, just talk."

Daniel blinked.

No one ever asked him to just talk.

So he did. About muscles. About how he hadn't seen muscles like this up close before. No one in his family really worked out. They were strong. Some of them. But not like this. None of them had abs. He talked about the gym he passed back in Newark. About looking in the windows and sometimes seeing this guy, some big muscle dude doing push-ups and girls sitting on his back giggling. And how it kind of looked like fun. But he wasn't strong enough to do that. He told Johnny about Louie dropping a cat on his back while attempting it and how he'd gotten all scratched up.

He was back up to Johnny's other pec.

He looked about as he moved on to Johnny's shoulder and back down his arm. He saw a stool and pulled it over with his foot.

"Sit," he told Johnny and Johnny did.

Daniel couldn't believe he'd just do as he asked. No fight or protest.

He complained that Louie should've gotten a dog, or hell just a block of cheese from the fridge. Anything would've been better than a cat.

He was dying to know though.

"Think you could do it?"

"The push-up thing?" Johnny asked.

Daniel's hands were working on his shoulders. Damn Johnny was tense. All knots. He'd always wondered what knots really felt like, but this, this was it. He dug his fingers into Johnny's shoulders, wondering if he could take care of one of them or try to while he was there.

"Yeah," Daniel said.

"May-ah-maybe."

That was interesting.

Johnny's head was bowed, hiding. But he was still red. His ears, a tell-tale sign. Maybe.

Who did he think he could lift? Daniel wanted to try it. See if Johnny could do push-ups while Daniel sat on his back.

He chewed on his lower lip.

"Daniel?"

Right. Focus. Damn, he noticed too quickly.

Daniel cleared his throat. "What did you do to yourself? You're practically all knots."

"I... It's not important right now."

"But-"

"Daniel," Johnny looked up at him, head tilting back. The blush had receded a bit. Just a light bit on his cheeks. "Tommy's aunt has a deadline. Ignore the knots."

"How tight you are?" Daniel asked amused. That blush came back and Daniel loved it. "Okay, okay. But this isn't over mister. This is ridiculous. You've got to be one of the tensest teens in California."

"It's midterms."

"Says the guy doing kata and reading Pride and Prejudice to me. You look calm Johnny but your back tells a different tale," Daniel said pressing his fingers into Johnny's skin as he dragged his hands down his back.

"You're not-ah, worried about midterms?"

Daniel grinned. "With a bunch of ex-cobras offering a study group? Nah. I think I'll pass with flying colors. Ma will be so proud. The fridge will be full of my tests," Daniel said. He stepped back, then walked around Johnny taking in his work. He looked magazine ready. But maybe not teen magazine ready. Pin-up calendar ready.

"I think you're good to go, Mr. Pretty boy."

Johnny sighed, then turned to one of the boxes. Daniel wiped excess baby oil off his fingers with a towel.

Johnny held a black band. A familiar-looking one. He held it with hesitation.

"Come here," Daniel said. He took it from Johnny and pushed himself up on tiptoe, tying it around his forehead. He moved the blonde hair over it. "There. They're doing the karate thing, huh?"

"Yeah. Because they had the workout regimen. It's been a part of it ever since," Johnny said softly.

"Well hey, you still do it, it's just a little different now," Daniel said smiling at him, lowering gently back down to his heels.

"Right," Johnny said, a soft smile. "Thanks."

No, thank you. Anytime*.*

"Glad to be of help."

Johnny walked out of the tent to continue his photoshoot. Daniel grabbed the bottle and after calming his heart, waiting for his own blush to fade, knowing it'd be much more obvious in the sun than in the shade, he headed back out.

Johnny was leaning against some rocks, a new pose, moving slowly, adjusting when Tommy's aunt told him to.

"Hey, he's glistening," Tommy said smiling at him.

He took the bottle from Daniel and put it back in his bag.

Daniel watched because there wasn't anything else he could do.

Nothing else he wanted to do.

He wanted copies. Of the magazine. Of the photos.

But asking would give himself away.

After a while, Johnny was walking back and Tommy was sprinting out towards the tent again.

"Hey, you, Daniel right?" Tommy's aunt called.

"Uh, yes ma'am," Daniel said.

"There's a bucket, sitting on the table. Grab it and fill it with water, the ocean is fine. Don't get any sand or seaweed in it. No fish or anything and just wait."

"Yes ma'am," Daniel said. He found the bucket on the table.

Johnny had changed again, jeans. No shirt again.

Daniel really wanted this magazine.

He took off his shoes and headed out to the tide to fill the bucket and stand waiting for whatever he'd be asked to do.

Johnny talked to Tommy's aunt a bit.

Johnny was barefoot and walked out into the water.

"Daniel," she called after a couple of shots. "Get his hair wet."

Did he just throw the bucket full of water at him? He wasn't tall enough to stand over him and dump it. Johnny was too damn tall.

Johnny walked closer to the shallows, he bent down.

"Keep your eyes closed, this is saltwater," Daniel said lifting the bucket.

He tried to pour it gently, the fluffy locks from earlier were doused and water streamed down his face and neck, down his chest.

"Good," she called and Daniel stopped pouring and Johnny blinked his eyes open and stepped back into the waves.

No wonder he'd been good at that first balance practice.

"Towel," she called, still taking photos.

Tommy handed a towel to Daniel.

"Dry off his face," she said stepping back.

Daniel darted into the waves. Hopping as he went.

He dried off Johnny's face and then stepped back again. Back on the sand. He ran a few more errands. All Johnny-related. Mostly she had him fix his hair. A lot. Helped him dry off. Doused him in more strategic water.

Then after a while, she was putting her camera in her bag.

"Okay, we're good. Johnny, good job, hit the showers. Tommy, Daniel good work. Enjoy the study group. I'm going to go get these developed and get them to press," she said slinging the bag over her shoulder.

"You need help taking this all down?" Daniel asked Tommy as Johnny took off in a jog towards the house.

"He's going to wash off the oil. Before he burns," Tommy explained. "And yeah, if you don't mind."

The least I can do.

"Yeah not a problem," Daniel said.

He helped take down tables and carry them back to the house. Helped take down the tent. Gathered up odds and ends.

Daniel grabbed his shoes and socks and carried them back up to the beach house.

He washed his hands and went to the car to get his school work.

"How does pulled pork sandwiches sound?" Tommy asked pulling open the fridge and looking in.

"Uh sure."

"Good, that's what my aunt made or bought, not sure which," he said amused pulling out a dish and setting out buns and dumping some shredded meat into a pan.

The doors opened and the guys filled in with their school books, taking up the seats around Daniel, greeting him warmly.

Bobby had desserts, Jimmy had drinks and it was a full meal and it was full of warmth and friendship and Daniel realized suddenly that he hadn't noticed how much he liked them. How nice it was to see them They were silly, full of jokes, but hard-working and they welcomed him, looked out for him, made sure he was included. Talked to him. And it didn't seem to be out of pity. It wasn't because he was friends with Johnny. But they seemed genuinely happy to see him.

He heard familiar footsteps and turned his head.

Johnny had changed into shorts and a band t-shirt. His hair was wet. He no longer smelled of baby oil or the beach.

He sunk down in the seat next to Daniel and it was nice.

To be included.

To be a part of something.

To be welcomed.

A Step into the Crowd

Being at school at 5 am was unpleasant.

It was sleepy. Everyone was quiet. Still waking up. Dragging their bags to the bus.

Tommy had handed him a clipboard and stood him near one of the entrances to direct people and check them off a list.

Most people had their parents drop them off.

The Mills dropped off Ali, wishing him a good trip and telling her to be good. She smiled at him, dragging her suitcase past him to the bus and he checked her name off the list.

The guys had all arrived early because Tommy had asked them to. The Browns had dropped Bobby off and he was helping the teachers grab stuff. Dutch had picked up Jimmy and was passing out coffee to teachers and the driver. The student council was working, going over their lists, double-checking everything. Tommy stood next to one of the teachers passing out itineraries and lists of numbers for the students.

Mrs. LaRusso dropped of Daniel, her head popping out of the car to grin at Johnny and wish him a good trip.

Daniel looked half asleep, yawning and squinting as he looked around.

His hair was messy.

Too cute.

"Head to the bus, it's over there," Johnny said softly gently placing his hands on Daniel's shoulders and turning him in the direction of Tommy and Dutch who were helping kids put their stuff under the bus.

He watched Daniel sleepily trudge over, watching to make sure he didn't fall over and just fall asleep on the parking lot. He made it, handing off his bag to Dutch and then Dutch turning him around and directing him to Tommy.

He was okay.

He went back to his task.

When it was time to go he jogged back to the bus, everyone was checked off. He compared notes with Tommy and the teacher before boarding the bus.

The guys were all sitting in the same area towards the front so Tommy could be with them but also the council. Daniel was asleep in the middle of the group, red hood up and head leaning against the window. No one had sat next to him.

Bobby tapped the seat for him.

They'd kept it free for him.

He sat down next to Daniel. He had a book bag on his lap. Daniel shifted, moving and resting his head on Johnny's shoulder.

Tommy sat down heavily in the seat in front of them with a sigh. Dutch started softly chatting with him. Heads low and together like they were comparing notes.

The teacher boarded and walked the aisle going over the list one more time.

"Alright, next stop LAX," the teacher said, turning to speak to the driver and then taking a seat behind the driver.

Johnny watched the scenery pass. The bus was so quiet. Quieter than any other field trip Johnny had been on.

He was excited.

He was trying to keep calm.

But without the bonsai, he felt a little untethered. It was probably a good challenge, to be without it somewhere new and let Mr. Miyagi babysit it.

He'd never flown anywhere.

He'd only been in LAX to stand with the staff and the driver, to wish his mother a safe trip as Sid whisked her away somewhere or other.

He hadn't ever really liked it.

Being alone in the vast mansion.

But it was better than having Sid there.

But it was still... quiet. Too quiet. Too echo-y.

But he got to go this time.

In a plane.

He was excited to be on the other side.

Going with his friends.

With Daniel.

To see New York.

He knew some of their class was disappointed that they weren't going to someplace fancier.

The Mills had come over to talk to Sid at the country club, and they'd brought Ali. They complained they weren't going to Paris, or Venice, or somewhere with more art and culture than New York City.

Ali had said that it was better. Less expensive, and started listing off the world-class museums and the culture that could be found.

They frowned, but let it go.

Tommy had given him an itinerary. But he hadn't looked at it yet. He'd wait until they were on the flight.

It was a five and a half hour flight. He had plenty of time.

He wondered if he should pick up souvenirs. Something for his mom, something for Mr. Miyagi. The kids had asked him to bring something back.

He didn't know what a good souvenir was.

He'd have to ask Daniel.

But not now, he was still asleep. Hugging his arm and with his head on Johnny's shoulder. A warm weight.

Tommy turned in his seat, pushing himself up and looking over.

"Hey," he whispered, eyes taking in Daniel, a grin on his face. "We've got to corral everyone when we get there. I'm going with the prez and one of the teachers to get the tickets. We gotta stay as a group. So I need you guys to like keep everyone together, don't let anyone wander off. Okay?"

Johnny nodded.

"We get anything for all this work?" Jimmy asked leaning over the back of the seat behind them. "We're working."

"I thought you all were helping because you loved me," Tommy said with a sigh, dramatically holding his chest, "My poor heart. You're breaking it. Yeah, you get a fancy dinner IOU from the council and the teachers, now shut up and sit down."

"Nice," Jimmy said sinking back down.

The bus idled at LAX as the students got off, sleepy and zombie-like.

Most of them had fallen asleep again on the ride over.

Dutch was helping them grab their bags, as Tommy darted in with the teacher and council to get organized.

Johnny roused Daniel who looked up at him sleepily.

"We're at LAX, time to get our stuff," Johnny said.

Daniel yawned and nodded. He followed Johnny close rubbing his eyes.

They gathered up their bags and Johnny waited for the signal to start herding kids inside. Waited till everyone had their stuff.

Ali stood next to him too. He thought that was weird. She kept staring at him. Was watching. He didn't like it. She should've been with her friends. Should've been asking the teacher if she could get coffee at one of the stands and wandered off with her friends to get coffee and return. Some fancy drink with a ton of sugar and cream. But she was standing close and not moving. Like she was using him as a guide or was nervous.

She'd been to LAX before. She'd spent a couple of spring breaks overseas. She didn't need to worry about getting lost. This was old hat for her. Unless she was scared about something. Which didn't make sense. She wasn't scared of anything. Not that Johnny knew. Daniel's head bumped into his arm.

"Don't fall asleep here," Johnny said gently.

Could Daniel fall asleep standing up? He hoped not. But his eyes were open. He was staring at Ali. Ali was staring at him.

Oh. Strange.

Not the time to think about that.

He focused on everything else. Which was helping everyone else, keeping them focused. Moving in the right direction. Not letting anyone break off from the group. It meant when it was time to go, being handed a stack of tickets and passing them out as everyone headed through. Checking names and passing them out.

Which meant having to pry Daniel from his side.

Which failed.

The first two attempts.

His soft, "Daniel, go on through." was met with a sleepy response of "I'll wait."

The third time, when most of the group was gone Johnny stuck the ticket in Daniel's hand and put his hands on his shoulders, steering him towards the gate and through.

At their gate, he was given a group of ten to keep an eye on. Ten kids plus Daniel who'd curled up in one of the seats. Some wanted to get drinks. He made them leave in groups. Reminded them to come back. Kept an eye out.

He was relieved when they boarded. Looking at his ticket. Looking at the seats. Bobby had the window seat and he sunk down gratefully next to him. Daniel sat next to him. He double-checked Daniel's ticket.

That was where he was supposed to be.

Tommy who sat in front of him with Dutch and Jimmy grinned back at him.

On purpose.

He should have known.

He was surprised though when Ali sat behind him. With two of her friends, Susan and Barbara.

Daniel looked like he was finally starting to wake up. Blinking around, taking in everything, fiddling with the controls above them.

"Where'd you leave the bonsai?" Daniel asked.

"With Mr. Miyagi," Johnny said.

"Have you ever flown before?"

"No."

Daniel quieted when the flight attendants came out to explain the safety features and pre-flight safety briefing.

Johnny watched, following along as the plane drove along the tarmac. When it left the ground he gripped the hand rests tight. It was like a roller coaster with the pressure of being pressed into the seat as they rose into the sky.

There were some bumps and he remembered that they were in fact held up by nothing. There wasn't a track underneath them.

"Johnny," Bobby whispered leaning over.

"Hmm?" was all Johnny could manage.

"You tryin' to crush Daniel's hand?"

Johnny looked down. Under his hand was Daniel's. He quickly let go.

"I'm so sorry," Johnny said. "Is your hand okay?"

Daniel looked more awake. He turned to him and smiled.

"It's your first flight."

He lifted his hand and stretched his fingers. "I honestly was starting to wonder, but your grip hasn't really diminished despite not practicing as frequently as you used to."

Oh god, he must've hurt Daniel's hand. He didn't know what to do. He turned to Bobby who just looked amused. He couldn't ask. He turned back to Daniel. He was panicking. He took a deep breath.

Panic later. Check first.

"Do they have ice or anything on planes?" he asked. "Like should I hail down help?" He held out his hands towards Daniels and Daniel put his hand out. "Does it hurt? Did I break anything? Shit. Daniel, I'm so sorry. Does that hurt?"

He very gently bent Daniel's fingers, one by one. Looking from Daniel's hand to his face, studying for any pain.

Daniel shook his head with each one.

"Johnny, I'm fine," Daniel said gently. "I don't think it'll even bruise. But hey, thanks for checking. Here see?"

Daniel's hand encompassed Johnny's and gave it a squeeze. "See, I'm fine."

Johnny nodded. He heard a snort and soft laughter and looked over. Bobby was laughing.

"Hey!" Johnny said bumping his elbow into him. "You made it seem like-"

"I know," Bobby said. "I didn't expect you to...be so panicked. Just enjoy your first flight man."

Daniel hadn't let go of Johnny's hand. He did that sometimes. He should be used to it. But they were kind of in public. Not alone. All their classmates. Their teachers.

Daniel didn't seem to care. Instead, he just leaned in closer.

"Hey, can we look at the itinerary? Tommy didn't tell me what the finalized version had on it."

Johnny dug around in his bag and pulled out the packet. He held it out to Daniel who put down his tray and leaned over, studying, and flipping through the pages.

"Huh," he said.

"What?" Johnny asked.

"Hold on," Daniel said leaning into the aisle and tapping Tommy on the shoulder. He leaned forward, their heads were bowed and they were talking.

As much as Johnny strained his ears to hear he couldn't over the roar of the engine. It was a long conversation and he leaned back into his seat with a sigh. Daniel still hadn't let go of his hand.

"I know you're going to fight me on this," Bobby whispered. "But I really don't think he holds everyone's hands as much as he holds yours." Bobby laughed a little. "It's almost like he's scared you might bolt."

Johnny thought about it. He had run once.

"He might. I did run...remember the lodge?"

Bobby frowned. "Yeah. You have an excuse for everything don't you?"

"It keeps me grounded."

"Keeps you from moving forward is what it does."

"He got upset when Ali and I were talking. I don't think he's there yet."

"So what you're just torturing yourself?"

"I'm not."

Bobby made an unimpressed sound.

Johnny looked past him and out of the window.

The flight was slow. He got bored. He read.

Daniel talked to Tommy a lot. And surprisingly, Ali.

Johnny couldn't hear what they were saying.

But he was surprised. Something must've changed.

Daniel let his hand go when they were brought a small lunch. He didn't reach for it again.

Johnny was a little disappointed.

He finished his book on New York.

They landed after 3:30 and Johnny couldn't wait to get up and stretch.

Sitting cramped in a little seat for five and half hours had been unpleasant.

Even if it was between Bobby and Daniel.

He now understood why they'd both put in requests for specific seats and why Tommy had given him the look he had when Johnny had said he didn't care.

His legs were too long for the space and they were all cramped.

He understood why Daniel had gone for the aisle. When no one was coming he'd stretch out his legs into the aisle and then pull them back. Probably for his knee.

It was probably too late for Johnny to change seats for the trip back.

When they landed Daniel was practically bouncing on his feet the whole way off the flight.

He kept turning to talk to Johnny. To tell him about how over 800 languages were spoken in New York, and if you listened you could start to pick them out, how it was the first capital in the USA before D.C., about pizza again because Daniel would not let the pizza thing go. Home to the first pizza shop in the states and it's so cheap. Pizza in LA was a crime. He was on a pizza tangent.

When they left the gate and entered the airport he took a deep breath, savoring the air, and just looked so utterly happy.

The teachers took over, led them to baggage claim and Tommy put them in charge of their little groups again.

Johnny watched his ten students while Daniel chattered at his side about New York etiquette, not stopping and gawking, to be prepared for weirdness, that everyone is always moving and going and did Johnny know that there was more coastline in New York than there was in LA? Beaches weren't the same but there was a lot of water.

Johnny grabbed his bag when it came off the carousel and double-checked it was his.

Daniel realized he'd been so busy talking that he'd forgotten to look and had to take off after his in a sort of mad scramble to go get it.

"You okay there?" Johnny asked when Daniel returned to his side.

"Yeah," Daniel said with a sigh dumping his bag at their feet next to Johnny's.

Everyone in their group had gotten their bags and Johnny gave Tommy a thumbs up. They waited for a few more students in other groups to get their bags then headed off to the chartered bus to the hotel.

Daniel spent the time looking out the window pointing things out. Excited like a little kid.

Johnny noticed a lot of their classmates near them were quiet. Had been ever since they started getting off the plane. Ever since Daniel started talking.

He glanced around. They were listening. Looking where Daniel was pointing. Even the girls who Daniel told him multiple times all hated his guts.

Johnny wondered if he should let Daniel know, that he had a wider audience than himself. Then the guys who were yawning nearby.

It left a mixed taste in his mouth. They should've been listening to Daniel all along. Yeah, he talked a lot, but he was full of little facts and interesting tidbits. And this was his home turf. But he liked being the only member in Daniel's audience. Liked the way Daniel would turn to him with a grin, patting Johnny's chest to make sure he was paying attention.

He was. He always was.

As their bus made its way into the city Daniel started pointing out specific buildings. A good place to get lunch, an awful place to avoid, that one had good falafel, that one had good sales and got crowded in the afternoon, that was a good place to get coffee.

The bus was parked and everyone filed into the hotel with their luggage as student council and teachers worked out the keys and checked in.

Johnny took in the high ceilings. It reminded him almost of the country club. The interior design was different, but it had glittering chandeliers.

"Hey."

Johnny glanced at the guys. Dutch was sitting on his suitcase. They weren't looking at him, they were looking at Daniel.

"You happy?" Dutch asked.

Daniel grinned. A big wide smile. He was so fucking happy, how could Dutch not tell?

"I will only be happier when I get my hands on a real slice of New York pizza," Daniel said.

Johnny laughed and Daniel glanced at him. The smile didn't falter. "You laugh now, wait till you have one. "

The teacher came over with their keys and a clipboard.

"Bobby, you're in with Tommy. Here's your key. Johnny here's your and Daniel's key. Dutch and Jimmy, here you go. Go take the elevator to your rooms. The number is on the key. Come back down and we'll meet here before going to our first museum. Got it?"

Johnny held his key, glancing through the crowd at Tommy who grinned at him and winked.

Tommy had worked that out.

He shouldn't be surprised anymore.

Not as Daniel started tugging at him, as the guys started pushing him toward the elevator. Happily chatting around him.

If there was an opportunity they'd take it. They'd put him next to Daniel whenever they could, wherever they could.

Jimmy's arm was around Daniel's shoulders, he made it look easy, was asking him about somewhere they were going, something they were doing.

Daniel was answering, he looked more comfortable. No longer scared to be in a small space with the ex-cobras.

Johnny wondered when that had happened. When he no longer hid behind Johnny. No longer stiffened when they spoke, when they crowded in.

He was glad. His chest felt warm, he didn't like that Daniel was scared of them.

He understood it. But this was better. Daniel among them, like he belonged.

Their rooms were all next to each other and simple.

Two beds.

Johnny was kind of relieved.

Daniel beelined to the bed next to the window and looked out.

He laughed and looked back at Johnny.

"Typical view," he said. "it's of a wall."

Johnny unpacked a little. Cleaned up a little.

Then they went back downstairs, taking a seat on the couch.

Before the guys returned Ali sank down on the other side of Daniel.

Johnny watched her warily. She'd hurt them both. But she made it look so easy to sit down next to them like there wasn't a history there. Like she hadn't taken Johnny's heart and stomped on it like she hadn't hurt Daniel. Like he still wasn't struggling.

Maybe it'd been better for Johnny, for him to have so many months of her ignoring him.

He was able to move on. Even if it was in a weird one-sided infatuation with Daniel that Bobby thought was Johnny torturing himself.

But Johnny was okay.

But Daniel? Daniel was still hung up on that night at the party. Still hurting. Still healing.

He wanted to tell her to go away. He wanted to demand why she was suddenly so friendly.

He wanted to pick Daniel up, move him to the other side of the couch, to shield him from whatever it was that was happening.

Johnny may have apologized, but it didn't mean he'd forgiven her.

But Daniel didn't look uneasy. His shoulders weren't tense. He was talking easily with her. Small things about art.

Johnny had promised himself, if Daniel moved on he'd be fine. He'd be okay. But not with Ali. He didn't trust her anymore.

He leaned against the arm of the sofa and put his head in his hand.

He was too tense.

She was getting under his skin again.

He'd been trying so hard not to snap at her.

Every time girls flocked to him, he wanted to storm over to her and ask her to call them off. To just leave him alone, something she was so good at.

He bit the inside of his cheek. He drew blood.

He took in the vase on one of the tables full of flowers.

He would not know what he'd do with himself if somehow Daniel forgave Ali and got back together with her.

He'd have to take that drive. The drive in the Avanti with his emergency fund.

Maybe go out in the desert and just lay in the sand and dirt and stare up at the stars.

Cornflowers. The Bachelor's button. Hope. Anemone. Anticipation. White roses. It was a wedding bouquet.

He looked around. Curious. Their school group had finished checking in so the loud crowd was gone.

He spotted them.

A wedding party.

A man in a suit looking absolutely delighted, his bride on his arm, coming from one of the banquet rooms.

His heart stung.

He needed air.

They looked so damn happy.

He stood.

He walked out of the front door quickly and quietly.

There was a doorman.

One day, maybe.

One day, but not now.

If he picked a girl it'd be easy. But he hadn't. Or he had.

She'd just left him.

It wouldn't have worked out.

It wouldn't have been a good wedding anyway.

Sid would've taken over. He wouldn't have been able to have his friends there in the capacity he wanted them to be.

It was for the best.

But Daniel might, one day. Maybe with her.

Ali changed her mind about things sometimes.

Maybe with some other girl.

Maybe he was torturing himself.

He breathed deeply.

New York was so different when you were standing in it.

Not on the bus. Not on a plane. Alone.

He breathed again.

It smelled differently.

It was busy.

It was loud.

The accents were different. There were so many of them.

He could step out.

Off the doorstep of the hotel.

Join in.

Follow people wherever they were going to go.

He wanted to see New York.

And he could.

On his own.

The guys would cover for him.

They'd worry.

But he needed to stretch his legs.

He needed to move.

He needed more distance between Ali. Possibly for the rest of his life.

"Hey, kid."

Johnny looked at the doorman. He was holding out a business card. Johnny took it. It had the name of the hotel on it and the address.

"Welcome to New York."

"Thanks," Johnny said.

Johnny looked at his watch. They weren't supposed to leave for another half hour.

He could go for a quick walk.

He had to.

He had to be moving.

He had to do something.

Anything.

He couldn't continue sitting on the couch with Daniel and Ali talking about art.

He took a deep breath and stepped into the crowd and let it carry him away from the hotel.

Paintings and Pizza

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Talking with Ali was comfortable. Now that they were just friends. Now that she knew and he had someone on his team.

Johnny was quiet, but that was normal. He moved his leg, to press his against Johnny's. To tell him he hadn't forgotten about him. To make sure he was still there.

His leg brushed nothing.

He frowned.

He leaned back.

No shoulder to bump into.

He whirled.

Johnny wasn't sitting next to him on the couch. When had that happened?

He turned back to Ali.

"When did Johnny leave? Where'd he go?"

He tried to keep calm.

It was nothing.

Johnny probably saw one of the guys or was talking to someone else. But he couldn't find him as he looked around the room, as he pushed himself up, hand on the back of the couch, searching past the wedding party and the group for the tall blonde.

"He's probably around somewhere," Ali said.

"We're in New York City. This isn't LA. He doesn't know where anything is. He could..." Get mugged, kidnapped, stabbed, lost.

"Hey, just ask the cobras, they're right there," Ali said motioning.

Daniel was up, searching their group.

He wasn't there.

He stopped.

They were friends, but if he told them he'd lost track of Johnny... not even in New York City proper for a full hour and he was gone? They'd never forgive him. He'd never forgive himself. They'd resend everything.

He spun on his heels before they could see him and darted to the front door.

He'd ask the doorman.

"Have you seen a tall blonde? Pretty? Blue eyes. A teen guy? All muscle? He was wearing a blue jacket," Daniel asked in a rush.

He was trying so hard not to panic. He'd promised Johnny he'd stay by his side. And then he hadn't noticed. Hadn't seen him leave.

"Yeah, he's been doing laps."

"Laps?" Daniel asked.

"Yeah, he's tall enough I can't miss him," the doorman said. "Look there."

Daniel stood on his tiptoes and looked the way the doorman was pointing. Johnny was walking swiftly through the crowd across the street. He was listening to his Walkman, weaving through the people like it was second nature. Bright blue in a crowd of black suits.

Daniel let out a deep sigh.

Johnny was waiting at the crosswalk, and then when it turned he joined the group working his way across the street back towards the hotel.

Daniel was going to kill him.

What the hell had he been thinking?

Did he know how dangerous that was?

How much trouble they would've gotten into?

He was going to reach out and grab him when he came past and he was going to chew him out. Field trips were all about the buddy system, and did Johnny not realize that he'd left him behind? He wasn't supposed to go anywhere without Daniel.

He breathed.

Who knew why Johnny had left. And he hadn't gone far. Not far enough for the doorman to lose track of him.

But how long had he been gone? How long had Daniel not noticed?

Johnny was walking towards them. Blue eyes focused, he glanced at his watch. A quick look and then straight ahead. Then he glanced at the hotel, a quick glance, then he looked startled and stepped out of the crowd, pulling his headphones down.

"Daniel?"

Daniel was still pissed. But he kept his hands down at his side.

"What the hell? You- you could've been- Why did you-"

He couldn't pick one. He had too many questions, was too angry. He'd been so worried. This wasn't LA. Where Johnny seemed to know his way around with ease. Where Johnny didn't need Daniel to get around. But this was New York City. It'd eat him alive if he wasn't careful.

Johnny stepped closer.

"I just needed some air. I just walked around in like a figure eight. Around this block and that one," he said pointing.

"I-"

Johnny waited. Patient. Quiet. Fiddling with the cord to his headphones.

Damnit.

Daniel reached out and grabbed his hand, pulling him back into the hotel.

"It's dangerous, this isn't LA," Daniel said. "What if something would've happened to you?"

"I know karate, I think I'd be okay."

"Against a knife?"

"I think so."

Daniel huffed. They were in the entrance, he whirled on Johnny. "While we're here, can you not leave my side without telling me?"

He didn't really have a right to ask that.

He regretted it.

It was too telling.

It was too greedy.

He'd been worried.

He'd been excited, to show Johnny everything, to have him by his side. He'd forgotten what it was like not to have him there.

Johnny was a senior too. He could take care of himself. He had before Daniel.

He didn't need Daniel to fight his battles for him, never had. He sighed and ran his free hand through his hair.

"Listen, I get it, okay? New city. You're free to explore. But like, there's stuff I want to show you. And I can't if you've wandered off and get in trouble with the teachers and banned to stay in the hotel."

"I didn't think you'd notice," Johnny said softly.

"Well, I did. You weren't there."

Johnny looked at him curiously. "Were you worried about me?" There was something in his tone. Amusement.

Daniel didn't like that.

"I was," Daniel said through gritted teeth.

He was still pissed.

He didn't know what to do with it.

So he held onto Johnny's hand tighter. "You think I get in trouble a lot because I rub people wrong? Well, you also get in trouble a lot too. So I got worried."

Johnny looked a little startled.

He'd been playful about it Daniel realized belatedly. Johnny had been trying to be light. To try and brush off his concern. To try and show Daniel that he was okay.

Daniel sighed.

He wondered what had spooked Johnny. What had sent him into doing laps in another city.

He turned, Ali was sitting on the couch still. But the girls had joined her. She looked over at him and smiled.

Johnny stiffened. He felt it like a tremor. He looked back at him.

For a long time, he thought maybe Johnny and Ali might end up together again. He'd worried about it the entire time he had dated Ali. He'd thought about it when she suddenly was talking to Johnny again.

But now.

The look on his face.

The way he was retreating.

The mask was slipping.

He couldn't hide it, not fast enough.

Johnny didn't like Ali. He'd pulled away because of her. He'd left Daniel to sit and talk to her. He hadn't wanted to interrupt.

But he was all bristled. All tense.

"I thought you'd apologized to Ali," Daniel said.

"Just because I apologized doesn't mean we're friends," Johnny said stiffly, turning his head away, looking out the window. He was pulling slightly, away.

Daniel followed him. They found a different couch, one next to the window, hidden behind planters. Johnny sat taking a deep breath while Daniel processed.

Johnny had apologized to Daniel. They were friends.

He'd apologized to Mr. Miyagi and they were friends.

His mother and well they weren't friends but his mother liked Johnny and he thought Johnny was nice to his mom.

But Ali.

Johnny was fiddling with his Walkman. He zipped it into his pocket and leaned back with a sigh, covering his eyes with his arm.

From what Ali had said, Daniel had assumed. Had thought they were good.

"I was wondering where you were," Bobby said sinking down in the other seat, across from them. His eyes narrowed, "You okay?"

"Tired," Johnny said.

Bobby made a sound like he didn't believe Johnny but wasn't going to push him.

"He a flight risk?" Bobby asked Daniel eyes glancing down to where Daniel was holding Johnny's hand.

"Yes," Daniel said flatly.

Bobby looked surprised.

Daniel turned back to Johnny, shifting on the couch towards him.

He had to try something. He'd play the knee card.

He lifted his legs up and hooked them over Johnny's lap. It'd worked once before. It could work again. Johnny lowered his arm off of his eyes and looked down at him surprised. But he didn't move Daniel. Didn't push him off.

"Ali was the only friend I had for like 6 months other than Mr. Miyagi. So maybe I'm a little too forgiving that we're talking again. I mean I messed up too. I wasn't a good boyfriend. She really let me have it when we broke up. And when we talked it over later. I just missed being her friend. Your relationship with her is probably really different or was and it's probably all weird. And you should take your time. Be mad. Be frustrated. Be whatever. But don't you dare go running off into New York City and disappearing."

"Did you run?" Bobby asked leaning forward, his voice dropping to a horrified whisper.

"I didn't run. I walked. Sped walked. In a loop. Figure eights between this block and the next. I kept an eye on the time."

"Johnny!" Bobby admonished.

"I...I haven't slept okay? I'm on fumes. The 5 and a half hour flight being crammed between you two, while I like you two, was awful. I needed to move. And Ali...just was a little more than I could handle at the moment okay?"

The teacher started calling off names and Bobby jumped up when his name was called.

"This conversation is not over," he hissed.

"Damnit," Johnny sighed.

"Did you really not sleep?" Daniel asked.

"Tommy asked us to be at the school early," Johnny said.

Daniel got up a little reluctantly as the teacher worked their way through last names. L's were coming up, which meant both of them.

He tugged on Johnny's shirt. He'd just have to be like glue. Stick to Johnny's side.

The plans for the night were easy. They were going to break into groups.

Their group which included the guys and Ali and several girls would be going with a teacher to the Met. They had a special group thing that Tommy, really student council but Daniel gave all credit to Tommy, had paid extra for.

While the other groups were going to other museums, theirs was going to take the train to the Met where a docent would meet them and they'd get to hang around after the museum closed. A private tour.

Daniel knew Johnny had been in charge of herding students in the morning. Now it was Daniel's turn.

He made sure that Johnny's ticket worked, guided him to the right platform. Kept his hand tight on Johnny's sleeve.

No one said anything.

He made Johnny sit on the train and stood over him, holding onto the bars above. Listening for their stop.

He noticed he was walking ahead of everyone else. They followed him. Like he was a tour guide with a fancy umbrella. His umbrella was Johnny's tall blonde head wearing his blue jacket. Even the teacher didn't stop him from leading the way. Seemed relieved not to have to consult the map. Just followed along, trying to keep their group together.

Returning to the Met was like visiting an old friend.

It hadn't been long since he'd last been. Less than a year.

His mother had scrounged up money, taken them to all their favorite spots before they left.

They'd sat in the Met together in front of their favorite paintings, talking quietly for hours.

He walked up to where they were supposed to meet the docent. The woman smiled at their group and began their tour, walking them through the halls, explaining the importance of the pieces, the work, the history, the meaning, and the artist behind the work.

Daniel let his footsteps slow, and his fingers fall from Johnny's elbow. The back of his hand brushed against Johnny's and his fingers brushed Johnny's.

Johnny's hand moved and Daniel wondered if he was sick of Daniel babying him, of being dragged around New York City like he was a toddler who'd been getting a little too close to an outlet with a pen in hand.

Johnny's hand took his and Daniel glanced at him. His ears were red. He was very slowly moving his hand, interlacing their fingers.

Daniel blushed, heart-pounding too loud to hear the docent talk.

He'd held Johnny's hand a million times it felt like but it was always a surprise when Johnny took his.

Johnny wasn't mad.

He wasn't upset.

He was just trying to find his own footing.

Just like Daniel always was.

Trying to not follow old well-worn paths and carve out new ones. Ones where he didn't start fights but where he just stepped back and breathed.

They followed at the back of the group from one room to the other. They stopped for a while before the large painting of "Washington Crossing the Delaware" by Emanuel Leutze as the docent talked about it.

Daniel tried to breathe calmly.

Tried to force the blush away.

It was always one that his teachers had spent a ton of time on. So he had time. Time to try and get himself under control.

He had time before he could show Johnny his favorite.

The docent was charming. Full of facts. Johnny was listening closely. Or looked like it.

Daniel wondered, not for the first time, if maybe.

Maybe there was a spark there and it wasn't just him that saw it.

He breathed.

Now was not the time.

They were getting close to his favorite.

He wanted to focus on it.

To see it like an old friend.

They moved through the rooms and ah, there it was.

He pulled Johnny to the best spot to see it. Johnny came along with him easily. He glanced at Daniel. Daniel pushed himself up on tip toes.

"This one is my favorite in the whole of the Metropolitan Museum of Art," Daniel said softly.

Johnny studied it quietly. The way he knew he would. After a awhile he spoke, so quiet, almost a whisper. "It reminds me a bit of Mr. Miyagi's garden."

Daniel tilted his head. It was of a lily pond with a bridge over it. Mr. Miyagi didn't have either of those. But it was peaceful and full of nature. Mr. Miygai's garden had a similar feeling as "The Bridge over a Water Lily Pond" by Claude Monet.

"Yeah," he said softly.

Daniel didn't really care about the rest of the Met.

He liked the stained glass.

He liked the art.

He liked the statues.

He liked the books and textiles.

But it was more fun watching Johnny. The way he listened to the docent. The way he studied the art as she spoke. Eyes taking in brush strokes, color choices, the folds of clothing carved from marble.

When they entered the section on Japan they moved slower. Daniel's eyes were drawn to the paintings, the scrolls, the screens, the statues.

"Ah!" Johnny gasped at his side, as if he'd been looking for something and found it, he pulled Daniel along with him. "Look, Ryūkyū islands. " He said pointing to the little placard. "That's another name for Okinawa, where Mr. Miyagi is from."

Daniel looked at him, startled, and then back at the "19th-century robe" hung up. The pattern was different from the others, the coloring brighter with yellows and red.

Daniel had never paid attention before. He'd never noticed it.

They looked for more. There were a few things, a tray, some boxes, but not as much.

Before they knew it Tommy was coming over to them.

"Gotta keep moving fellas. Docent is already in the next room."

They moved, but dragging their feet, trying to quickly scan placards on their way out of the section. Before Daniel knew it their docent was bidding them farewell into the gift shop that had stayed open for them. He let go of Johnny's hand there. It was too crowded, everything for sale piled together. But he kept an eye on him as Johnny gravitated towards patches.

Tommy appeared at Daniel's side again.

"So...pizza joint. I've been begging our teacher to let us divulge from the group and skip the burgers and let us go to some greasy hole in the wall to get pizza and I finally got the okay. But the teacher has to call and let the rest of the group know where we are going and why. So I need you to tell us where we're going."

Daniel thought about it. Dutch was walking past with a map of New York in his pocket. Daniel grabbed it and Dutch whirled.

"Dinner," Daniel explained unfolding the map. "So we're here. There are a couple of great places, but," he glanced at his watch then nodded. "Yeah okay, this one," he said pointing.

Tommy grabbed the map with a quick thanks and headed to the teacher.

"Hey I better get that back," Dutch called.

Daniel smiled and returned to where Johnny was still studying patches, picking one up and then another and putting them back.

"You going to buy one?" Daniel asked.

"I don't think so," Johnny said dragging his gaze away from the patches.

"Anything specific you're looking for?"

Johnny shifted his stance. "It's for my jacket."

It took Daniel a moment, but he remembered the last time he'd seen Johnny's red jacket. The one that used to have Cobra Kai patch. The discoloration.

"I don't know if I want to throw it out or...put something else on it."

"What about this?" Daniel asked tugging on the blue leather jacket Johnny was wearing. It showed off his eyes better. Made them brighter. Bluer.

"It's one of Bobby's," Johnny set the patch he was fiddling with back down. "Oh, looks like we're going," he said.

Daniel looked at the teacher who was motioning for him to lead the way.

Daniel took point again, leading them through the streets to a small pizzeria, arm hooked through Johnny's.

He thought about Johnny's red jacket. What Johnny could put on it.

It'd been like a leatherman jacket. The kind of thing sports kids wore, with a cobra's on twist on it. Maybe they could do something similar. If that was the case, now that Mr. Miyagi was teaching him, it'd have to be a bonsai.

But where would they find a bonsai patch? The bonsai on Daniel's gi had been made by the late Mrs. Miyagi.

It was the only one.

He pushed the glass door open and breathed.

That was so much better.

He motioned for Johnny to sit at one of the tables and walked up to the guy working and started ordering, motioning to the group of ten or so behind him. Telling the guy it was their first time having real New York Pizza. The guy grinned and nodded, filling up plates. Daniel grabbed a few and headed over to where Johnny was and sunk down next to him. He plopped the plate down with a flourish.

"Real pizza. No duck in sight," Daniel said with a grin.

Johnny studied it and picked it up. It flopped and drooped and Daniel laughed.

"You gotta fold it," Daniel said picking up his slice and folding it. Showing Johnny and then taking a bite.

He watched Johnny mimic him and watched him eat. He ate it quickly and Daniel slid another over to him. The guys sat down around them.

"Why's it so floppy?" Jimmy asked.

"Just fold it. It's delicious. I promise," Daniel said.

"Hey we got you two sodas," Bobby said putting drinks down in front of them.

"Thanks," Daniel said.

Some people liked bird watching. Some people went out into the wild and studied animals and stared at them for hours, taking notes.

Daniel liked watching Johnny. And this, watching him try the different basic types of New York Pizza was top on Daniel's list.

His mom made such a big deal out of food. And Daniel got it. A home-cooked meal was full of love and nutrients. But his parents used to take him out to get pizza. They'd walk and eat, talking about everything and nothing. He'd sit in the booths with his friends and they'd talk about school or soccer games and eat the same pizza. It was a different type of love. And it just wasn't the same in California.

And Johnny. Johnny was here. In New York. So close to where Daniel grew up. Eating the pizza Daniel had grown up eating. Greasy pizza that you had to fold because it was so thin and big and cost about the same as a transit ticket.

He wanted to kiss him.

To ask him how he knew that robe was from Okinawa.

What he thought of New York even though he'd only been there less than 24 hours.

If he was feeling better.

He thought it was what he wanted when he was older.

Maybe visiting family. They'd sneak out and come and eat pizza together in a good shop like this one.

If he was lucky, he'd get to keep Johnny by his side for a long time. Maybe they could get an apartment somewhere and Daniel would cook and Johnny would fix things and they'd have a shelf for their trophies and their bonsai. They'd get prints of gardens like the Monet and put them up on the walls, probably have a bookcase full of whatever Johnny was reading. And a comfortable couch so if it was a really good book Johnny could read it to him.

Daniel had to force himself out of the daydream. Of thinking of an older Johnny and him. To pull himself back into the moment, so he could enjoy it.

"So?" Daniel asked.

Johnny cleaned off his fingers with one of the napkins Dutch had dropped onto the table and took a sip from the soda he'd been brought.

He was thinking.

Daniel was going to die waiting.

"It's no duck pizza," Johnny said slowly, a playful smile on his face, "But I see why you like it so much."

"Right?" Daniel asked. "California pizza is weird. A slice, a New York slice, is practically a meal on its own. You get what you pay for but in a good way."

Johnny smiled, that soft one. Listening as Daniel rambled about pizza because he couldn't help it.

"It's probably a good thing you didn't move to Chicago," Tommy said amused.

Daniel whirled. "That is not pizza. That's a pie masquerading as a pizza. "

Tommy laughed.

"What's Chicago pizza like?" Johnny asked.

Oh, this boy.

Let him keep his innocence.

But someone else would tell him.

Daniel sighed and held his hand a couple of inches off of the table.

"It's an abomination. The crust is about this tall. The marinara is on top, all the cheese and toppings are in the middle and it's a couple of inches thick. It's a pie, not a pizza."

"We should try it," Johnny said.

Daniel looked at him shocked. He opened his mouth to say that a true guy from Jersey, who grew up exploring New York City would never ever ever eat a Chicago pizza. It was inferior.

But if he got to go with Johnny?

He'd try it.

He'd visit Chicago with Johnny.

He'd visit anywhere with him.

That daydream popped back up.

Sitting in some Chicago pizza restaurant, waiting over 40 minutes for their pizza. But the wait not being a problem, because they were together.

"I'd try it once. Maybe," Daniel said.

Their way back to the hotel was peaceful.

Everything was familiar.

It had to be what Johnny felt when he was in California.

They checked back into their room at the hotel. Like the lodge, Daniel got ready first and then Johnny took a shower.

Daniel studied the books he'd brought and set out. Books about New York City, history, and art. One was on New Jersey.

Warmth flooded his chest.

Johnny came out and went to his bed, the one closer to the bathroom and door and they set an alarm for the following morning and turned off the light.

Daniel couldn't sleep.

He kept worrying that Johnny would just leave.

It felt silly.

Maybe he'd just stay up the whole night.

Make sure Johnny didn't go anywhere?

That was ridiculous.

But he stood up.

Maybe.

Johnny let the ex-cobras into his bed.

No.

There was no way.

They had two beds.

There was no reason for him to try and crawl into Johnny's bed.

But he wanted to.

He studied the body in the other bed for a moment, chewing on his bottom lip.

He didn't know what to say. What to ask. He knew what he wanted, but it was too weird to say. To explain.

Johnny moved and Daniel froze.

He hadn't thought of anything to say.

He began to panic.

He couldn't explain why he was hovering.

He could make out Johnny in the darkness.

His eyes were open, looking up at Daniel.

He didn't say anything.

But he moved.

He scooted back in the bed and held up the blanket.

An invitation.

Daniel took it.

Fast.

Maybe too fast.

He didn't care. He wasn't going to let Johnny take back that invitation.

He laid down, the warmth of where Johnny had been, and curled up on his side facing him.

Johnny lowered the blanket over them both. There was no escape for him. His back was to the wall. Daniel would wake up if he panicked if he tried to go for some late-night walk. Or...if he had a nightmare because he'd have to get past Daniel first.

"Good night Daniel."

It was very soft. Sweet.

"Good night Johnny."

Chapter End Notes

So the 19th-century robe is currently at the Met, but wasn't in the 80's. Everything mentioned is there now though it might not be displayed at the moment. But I got so excited when I saw it on their list of items that I wanted to include it.

The Melancholy of a Ghost on Every Corner

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

He was still trying to figure out which Daniel was dream Daniel and which one was real. He'd been wrong last time when he'd been sick. He'd been so sure that that had been a dream. But then Daniel had still been there when he woke up, when he felt better, and it hadn't been a dream.

But now again, he didn't know, as Daniel hovered over his bed, fidgeting.

Like a vampire, waiting for an invitation.

Maybe it was a bad idea.

But he lifted his blankets, an invitation.

He could drain Johnny, but he'd sleep better.

Dream Daniel or real Daniel meant not as many nightmares. If it was the real Daniel then he'd wake up with Daniel attached to him, but he'd at least sleep. He'd take either at this point.

Daniel sunk onto the bed next to him. And Johnny didn't move. Daniel would get close eventually anyway, there was no reason to roll all the way against the wall. He'd just get trapped. He didn't know what he expected Daniel to do. But he laid on his side facing Johnny. He wished him a good night and went to sleep.

Must've been the real one.

Johnny woke up with Daniel's head in the crook of his neck. His hair tickling his chin. Daniel's arms were around him. His leg over him again.

It was like Daniel tried to climb over him in his sleep, gave up about halfway through the process, and just stayed there.

His chest was pressed to Johnny's.

It wasn't spooning.

It was something new.

It wasn't bad.

It was gray. The alarm showed they had a couple more minutes left. Johnny braced himself, shutting his eyes, waiting.

When the alarm went off it took Daniel a while to wake up. Johnny felt his complaints, the little grumbles he made, like he'd rather keep his face buried in Johnny's neck.

Daniel heaved a big sigh, the rush of breath warming Johnny's skin, and he twisted, just slightly to roll and turn off the alarm. Daniel sat up in the bed and didn't leave, rubbing at his eyes and yawning. He stretched.

Johnny watched him.

"Don't go back to sleep," Daniel said when he looked over. "We've got a lot to see today."

Johnny nodded.

Daniel pushed himself out of the bed, like he had to give himself momentum, and headed towards the bathroom.

They were up and at breakfast early. The guys sat with them. Half asleep, as they worked on their continental breakfast, drinking coffee.

Daniel was looking more awake. He was going over the itinerary Tommy had brought to breakfast with him.

The other guests who were at breakfast were quiet men and women in suits reading newspapers, no loud classmates.

"Why?" Dutch asked quietly.

"Why what?" Tommy asked.

"Are we up this early?"

"We're going to the Statue of Liberty," Tommy said. "It opens at 9 am, we want to be there early because we've got a tour and a group. The history teachers were adamant that if we were coming to New York that we'd visit Ellis Island. We've got a lot to get through today. So we got to be up and moving. And you get cranky if you don't eat. Which is why you're awake now. It's so you don't start fights with New Yorkers."

Dutch frowned. "You know those carts people use to move heavy things? Like fridges?"

"Yeah?"

"Why can't you just strap me to one of those and wake me up when you've dragged me to where we're going?"

"Because none of us would be nice enough. We'd lose your ass on the subway, or forget and you'd go rolling off into traffic or down into the subway."

"I thought it was a good idea," Dutch mumbled into his coffee.

"You'd die. Don't trust us with that responsibility. You gotta wake yourself up and walk yourself to where we're going," Jimmy said with a yawn. "If we gotta do it, so do you."

"What are you all even useful for?"

"I wonder that myself all the time," Jimmy said.

When the teachers arrived it was time to go. They'd all had breakfast at a local diner and came back with coffees in hand. Tommy went to work as part of the council and the rest of their group filed out to the bus they were taking.

Daniel sat with Johnny, pressing close to him, arm hooked through his.

Is he a flight risk?
Yes.

Daniel really wasn't going to let Johnny out of his sight the rest of the trip. He was going to stick like glue to him. A crowbar probably wouldn't be able to pry him off. Johnny didn't know whether to feel pleased or offended. It was nice. But he wasn't in danger.

It was a little odd to be somewhere so different from California.

It was cloudy.

It would probably rain.

It rarely rained in LA. Rain was an event there. A surprise.

The buildings were so close. People were walking everywhere. There were yellow taxis zooming around. The streets and roads were crowded. The buildings were tall. There wasn't a single palm tree to be seen.

It was weird to not see them. Like something was missing.

Daniel pointed at something, pressing closer, leaning over him to show him something out the window.

They were crossing a bridge.

Daniel was excitedly talking again. They were in New Jersey. The border was in the Hudson. The Statue of Liberty was technically in New Jersey.

It was chilly when they got off the bus to wait by the Hudson for their boat- "Ferry," Daniel told him- and for their guide to start talking.

Daniel was looking around, breathing in the smell of the water. It looked like it was revitalizing him. He was practically bouncing at Johnny's side. Everything was exciting to see again. The pigeons, the gulls, the water.

Their guide was talking about the Hudson River. How it used to have a floating church, that the ecosystem included over 200 species of fish including seahorses, and if they were lucky they might see a humpback whale that the guide joked might've gotten a bit lost.

Johnny thought maybe Mr. Miyagi would like it. All the fish. Maybe he'd catch a 14 foot Sturgeon, older than himself. The thought made him smile.

The river used to be full of oysters that kept it clean and the guide sighed, "One day we'll bring them back. Maybe at the turn of the century. But they used to be our staple food around here."

The Statue of Liberty was huge. The boat was getting close and he heard a click and a snap.

Johnny turned.

Dutch held a disposable camera in his hands and was taking pictures.

"Yo, Daniel," Dutch said. Daniel turned and Dutch took the picture. He gathered up the ex-cobras and tossed the camera at Ali, with a "Doll, you got good eyes. Do us a favor huh?"

She caught it and looked like she'd rather throw it into the ocean. But she sighed and took the photos then held out the camera like it was something disgusting and Dutch hurried to grab it.

He grinned and put it back into his jacket pocket.

When they landed it took Johnny a second to regain his balance. Even though Sid owned a yacht Johnny wasn't allowed on it. He hadn't been on too many boats.

Their guide talked about the statue and he listened. They started asking them about things they might know from their history class which Jimmy supplied. Thankfully.

Their teacher looked nervous. Like if no one answered the guide had the ability to fire him.

They walked around the island. It was colder. Windier.

"We gonna climb?" Bobby asked.

Johnny looked up at Lady Liberty then at Daniel. "I'll go to the pedestal. But you guys can go the rest of the way."

"Okay," Bobby said.

There were 354 stairs to the top. Johnny would drag his heels into the dirt, and hold onto Daniel's hand if Daniel even attempted it. Not with his knee still on the mend.

The guide had said there was an elevator to the pedestal. Which had a lookout. They'd take that.

It took a while.

The guys went racing up the stairs.

The teacher yelled at them. Embarrassed and apologizing to the guide who just laughed, saying they'd exhaust themselves before they made it to the top. They always did.

The doors shut. No one had joined them.

"You could've gone," Daniel said.

"We've got a long day ahead of us. I'm pacing myself," Johnny said. "And then tomorrow. And another flight the next day. I'd rather not be absolutely worthless. Tommy's going to put me to work again."

Daniel was quiet for a bit, chewing on his lower lip. After a while he spoke again, voice soft.

"Thanks."

"I'm expecting you to point out every cool thing in the view," Johnny said. Lightly. Half joking.

Daniel smiled. "Of course."

The doors opened and they stepped out, walking out along the top of the pedestal. Daniel pulled him towards the stone railing and leaned against it. He pointed out the buildings of the New York skyline, then led Johnny to another spot, pointing out the ones on the New Jersey side.

They wandered around a bit before making their way back down and waiting outside. Johnny found a bench and sat down. Daniel sat close to him, he talked about school trips. Told him about what the rest of the statue was like in a soft voice. The tight metal staircase. Telling him it was like being within a hollow metal statue. Because that's exactly what it was.

When the guys returned they slumped down next to them.

"Wore yourself out?" Johnny asked amused.

"That was a terrible idea."

"Since when is that new?" Johnny asked.

"Shush."

The rest of their day went by in a blur.

Ellis Island and back over the Hudson and up to the botanical gardens. Daniel pulled him along to a path lined with cherry trees in bloom. Johnny looked up at them in surprise. There weren't a lot of cherry trees in downtown LA, he tried to think of the last time he'd seen one, if ever. The white and pink petals fell like snow, covering the ground.

The guys chattered around them as they walked, Dutch folding and unfolding his map, and Daniel would lean over pointing things out, telling them where they'd go next. Johnny just took in the beauty. They made their way up to the forest with tall trees overhead. Daniel explained that the trees were over a thousand years old, predating the gardens and the USA as a country and Johnny felt infinitesimal, but not in the way that Kreese or Sid or his childhood bullies ever had. Without panic or fear, just a calm feeling of smallness amongst giant trees.

Daniel led them down to the conservatories and they paused on the boardwalks over the ponds looking out at the floating water lilies and lotuses, the water was dotted with bursts of color, of pinks, blues, yellows, and purples.

"What's that?" Bobby asked when they walked into the tropical ponds. The leaves were over 7 feet.

"Largest type of water lily in the world," Dutch said reading off from the brochure, "Victoria amazonica."

"I could sleep in one of those lily pads," Bobby said eyes wide.

"That does look like a comfortable bed," Jimmy agreed.

Their time was too short at the botanical gardens for Johnny, who bought a few souvenirs before they were all herded back to their bus. They were then dropped off around Times Square where they walked, visiting the New York Public Library and attending a tour that explained its history and architecture and shared part of its collection, a show at Broadway before they caught their bus again down to Coney Island.

They were let loose for dinner with a promise to stick in groups or pairs while the teachers headed off to one of the bars.

Daniel led him to the boardwalk, ordered him a cheesesteak dog and chili cheese fries then led him to a table and they sat down. The guys got tacos from a stand and found them fairly fast, the way they always seemed to be able to find Johnny.

"So what's worth a ride?" Dutch asked, sitting in the metal chair that scraped across the boardwalk as he moved it.

"Astroland is nice. There's bumper cars, a water flume, the cyclone, a tilt-a-whirl, and really a lot more. Depends on what you want to ride.

There are also arcades," Daniel said thoughtfully.

"Nice, we should do the bumper cars first," Jimmy said.

Johnny looked out at the big Ferris wheel with a sinking feeling. The first place he'd ever kissed Ali had been at the top of the Ferris Wheel at Golf 'n Stuff. He wanted to avoid the wheel. Hoped the guys wouldn't shove him aboard with hopes and expectations that he couldn't follow through with.

They finished eating and headed off to Astroland. Bumper cars were competitive but safe. They played a few rounds. Bumping into one another and laughing, the competitive streak burning.

Johnny felt arms reach for him after he got off the ride and pull him through the crowd when it was time to go ahead. Hands-on his arms, leaning close, Daniel's wasn't amongst them. He turned.

Ali had found Daniel. Her hand was on Daniel's wrist. She was leaning forward whispering something. Whatever it was Daniel didn't seem to like it. She said something else to him, she was serious but uncomfortable. And then Barbara was calling out to her and she disappeared into the crowd.

"What do you think that was about?" Dutch asked.

"No clue," Bobby said. "But she sure had been around more again."

"Kind of feels like she might be interfering with our plans, I don't like it," Jimmy said with a frown.

Daniel looked a little stunned and his brown eyes looked through the crowd, searching until they landed on Johnny's. Daniel smiled softly at him and hurried back to his side.

The guys moved out of the way, making space for him in their ranks. He looked melancholy but his hand kept finding Johnny's as they made their way around the park. Talking as they waited to go on the water flume, the tilt-a-whirl, the cyclone. They rode anything and everything. They played games in the arcade. Daniel laughing, beating them at the games he knew too well. Full of challenges that the guys rose up to meet, dramatically complaining when they lost.

But occasionally that look came back, distant, sad.

Dutch took pictures. He asked someone to take a picture of them in front of the Astroland rocket.

Johnny wondered if they'd even be visible or if they'd look alien in the lights of the amusement park.

They stuck together. Johnny had expected them to pull away. But they seemed to notice the melancholy in Daniel. The way he'd get quiet as he looked around. Probably worried about whatever Ali had said. So they rode everything. Even the carousel. Riding on wooden horses.

The last ride they hadn't gone on was the Wonder Wheel, the Ferris Wheel Johnny had been dreading, and they were moving in that direction.

"You wanna go on that?" Bobby asked, the softest of whispers at his side.

The cabins looked big enough for six. If it wasn't just him and Daniel it should be fine. He nodded.

"How many in your group?" the worker asked.

"Six," Daniel said.

The worker nodded and held the door open. Daniel hurried on board slipping to the other side. Johnny sat across from him. The worker waited and Bobby hesitated but stepped forward. Dutch let out a sigh and joined as well. Soon all six were aboard and the door shut.

Daniel started pointing out the buildings, the view. Explaining what each of those twinkling lights actually was.

Then he got quiet, his hands were clasped on his lap, his fingers worrying against one another, not as expressive in the enclosed space.

"This was my Dad's favorite ride."

Oh. Of course.

Johnny had seen the photos.

The photos of Mr. LaRusso and Daniel at Coney Island.

"Good choice," Dutch said. "It's got a great view."

He seemed surprised by this, by Dutch's approval of his Dad's favorite ride, but some of that tension left. Daniel spoke, quietly, like he was walking on unfamiliar terrain. Telling them about his dad. About how they'd come out here with his mother, that it was one of the last places they'd all come to before he'd been hospitalized.

The guys spoke softly to him whenever he stumbled, whenever he got quiet. They weren't letting the conversation falter. Keeping it going for as long as Daniel wanted to talk about it.

Johnny listened in that quiet space, just the six of them in the whole world as Daniel talked about his dad. About what he remembered from their brief 8 years together. The clothes he wore, like the sweater, winters bundled up in his dad's car, going around Newark. Trying to help him shovel snow on the sidewalk or salt the steps so no one would slip. Summers of holding his hand and ordering ice cream at the local shop, playing soccer together. How his dad taught him the juggling trick.

When their ride ended Tommy leaned out and handed the worker a twenty and the worker wordlessly closed the door again and they kept going.

Daniel talked about the soccer matches, his Dad coaching his youth league. Autumns of his parents working together on his costumes. His Dad taking his request and designing them, his mother doing his make-up. Going bowling together, learning to ride a bike, dancing in their apartment, hanging out together with his godfathers, their neighbors. Reading together.

How hard it was to watch someone you thought was strong, solid, and sturdy slowly die in a hospital bed and there was nothing you could do. No way to help.

Johnny got up, shifting into the seat next to Daniel instead of across from him, and the guys adjusted to allow it, moving wordlessly.

Johnny wrapped his arms ever so gently around Daniel and pulled him close. The worker didn't even bother opening their door, just sent them up again and again and again.

Johnny rubbed Daniel's back while he cried, so quietly into his chest, arms wrapped around him, fingers digging into his back, holding on tight. Johnny gently laid his head atop Daniels.

Johnny didn't know what to say. He'd never known his father. The replacements he'd been given, the ones he sought out, were nothing like the one Daniel had had, the one he'd found in Mr. Miyagi.

"We're really going to have to make you teach us that soccer trick," Johnny said softly.

Daniel laughed into his chest.

"Aw heck yeah," Tommy said. "I found a couple of places we could play, and a team we could play against."

"Yeah?" Johnny asked. It'd been a while since he'd asked Tommy. It wasn't something he knew about. Had been dragging his feet because of Daniel's knee.

Coney Island probably had been rough. Being on this trip, no matter how excited Daniel looked, probably was rough. The painful memories around every corner.

"I think it could be fun," Dutch said.

"You know what also sounds good," Bobby said with a sigh. "Ice cream."

Johnny nearly laughed. That was the tactic Bobby used with his little siblings. It was so transparent because he knew what it was, a bribe.

Johnny didn't want to move. He wouldn't. Not until Daniel let go. Until he felt him pull away. He'd stay there until they all ran out of cash to bribe the worker with. But it shouldn't have been a problem. Tommy had probably given the worker more money than they saw in a night. The problem would be when the time came for them to meet with everyone else and go back to the hotel.

Johnny wondered what Mr. Miyagi would say.

He didn't know.

He wasn't as good with that, comforting others, but he could be good at hugging.

Daniel was breathing, that practiced breath. Trying to calm down. Carefully closing up the box he'd opened.

Johnny watched them go over the top again, taking in the city lights.

He wondered if Daniel would notice if he kissed the top of his head. It'd be weird. Too weird. But he moved his head, ever so gently, letting his lips brush the top of Daniel's head. Daniel was so focused on his breathing, he didn't notice. But the fingers digging into his back lessened their grip.

On another round, about halfway through Daniel started to pull back. Johnny couldn't help himself. He brushed tears away from Daniel's face with his thumbs. Rubbing away what streaks were there.

He looked okay. His eyes weren't puffy. They weren't red. His eyes were just a little glassy. No one would be able to tell. Except he was sniffing. Johnny held out his hand, palm facing up.

Daniel stared at it then up at him.

"I was reading," Johnny said softly, "That holding hands helps calm your heartbeat."

Daniel took it, fast.

Johnny interlaced their fingers again. He had read it. It was true. Some science thing. Daniel always did it, and the longer he held Johnny's hand usually the calmer he felt. The better he felt. So he'd return the offer, try to extend that comfort Daniel always gave him.

Daniel breathed deeply, sitting up taller. He looked refreshed in a way Johnny never did when he cried. He always felt gross. But Daniel looked like he'd had a good cry and was ready to go.

Daniel smiled up at him, a small one, and Johnny turned to Tommy. They could get off the ride now.

Tommy turned to the door, waiting for them to reach the bottom again, and motioned to the worker who stopped the ride and let the door open. The guys piled out with Johnny stepped carefully out, Daniel following along, still holding his hand tight.

They walked through the crowd and out towards the boardwalk again. They bought ice cream and worked their way slowly to their meeting spot. Where they and the rest of the group were supposed to meet to go home.

Daniel leaned against him on the entire ride home, holding his hand. The guys stood close on the transit, talking softly to one another.

The way to their room was quiet. The guys were yawning, dispersing to their rooms.

Daniel let go of his hand when they got to their room, as he pulled away from his side to get ready for bed. He showered when Daniel was done. He wondered if Daniel would join him again that night. Or if he'd want to be alone.

He stepped out, dried his hair with a towel, it continued to drip but he didn't care and he made his way to this bed.

The light was still on. Daniel hadn't gotten into either bed, was studying the itinerary, leaning against the wall in his pajamas, chewing on his bottom lip. Johnny crawled into his bed and sat up. His heart was pounding in his ears. He was going to do it. He was going to ask. He was going to try and not seem like a nervous wreck. To not be weird. He pulled the blankets back at his side.

"Daniel?" he said softly.

Daniel had moved on to chewing on his thumbnail and he looked up, meeting Johnny's gaze.

"You coming?" he asked, motioning towards the beds. Oh god no why did everything that came out of his mouth sound weird? Why couldn't he just be normal?

Daniel smiled, seeming amused. He set the itinerary down and crossed over to the bed. He turned off the light and completely ignored his own bed, slipping into the space next to Johnny.

Johnny laid down heart racing. He was such an idiot.

"Goodnight," Daniel whispered softly.

"Goodnight."

Johnny woke to the alarm and a heavy body on top of his. He was flat on his back and Daniel was practically on top of him. Too close. Way too close. His thigh was pressed between Johnny's legs, his arms wrapped around Johnny, head on his chest. He couldn't hide that he was awake. Not fast enough. He was pretty sure if the alarm hadn't woken up Daniel then the sound of his heart pounding directly in Daniel's ear must've.

Daniel pushed himself up, muttering about having to get up early was cruel and inhumane. How people used to just wake up on their own and it was better for them. It had to have been.

He shifted up, hand going close to Johnny's neck. Pressing into the bed, taking his weight, letting it dip next to him. Daniel looked around their darkroom. The alarm was going off still. He seemed a little confused. Johnny wondered if he should be the one to turn it off. Daniel adjusted his position shifting his weight to his knee, thankfully the one on the outside of Johnny's legs. And he shifted back and over, misjudged it.

Johnny acted, arms shooting out to grab him before he slipped off the bed. He pulled Daniel close. And when he knew Daniel wasn't going to fall he reached out and slapped the top of the alarm, turning it off.

"Thanks," Daniel murmured in his ear.

There was really no pretending he was still asleep.

"Small beds," Johnny said softly.

He loosened his grip and Daniel shifted more carefully to get off the bed without falling off of it. He listened to the soft sound of Daniel walking away, towards the bathroom. He rubbed his face and breathed. He could still feel where Daniel was pressed into him. Wondered how much would've been read on his face if Daniel had looked down at him when he was hovering over him. What would've happened then?

He got up and dressed. Tommy had told him to dress nicely. Though Johnny didn't know why. The only thing on the itinerary was Central Park and some free time in groups. Maybe they were going to something like the opera. When Daniel was ready they both headed out to the elevator and down to breakfast. The guys spoke softly, it was too early. They were too tired. Even though not a single one of them had tried to score a drink. Not at the park anyway.

Their entire class made their way to Central Park together. Their teachers handed out pamphlets. Broke them into groups and sent them on a scavenger hunt. Homework.

Johnny turned with his booklet and pencil ready to get to work when hands grabbed his wrists and pulled him along. They rushed, as a group away from the center and towards Alice, and then the hands let go. Tommy took the pamphlet from Johnny and grinned giving a quick nod to Daniel.

"We'll do this," Bobby said taking Daniel's packet.

"Ground rules," Tommy said, eyes hard. "You two have to be back before midnight. Cinderella hours. I am going to get the key from the staff at tweleve sharp and if when I come to your room you are not in there I'm telling the teachers you snuck off. And we'll send out a search party. So you gotta get your asses home by midnight."

"What's happening?" Johnny asked uneasily.

Daniel had a look on his face. All serious. He looked like he was listening to a coach right before running a race. Like he was ready to win a 100-meter dash.

"Daniel's going to show you some places I couldn't get cleared for the field trip," Tommy said opening his bag and pressing a white envelope into Daniel's hands. "Since you won't be having dinner or lunch with us, that's your money for meals and also like transport."

"Seriously? How?" Johnny asked.

"We're going to run interference all day," Dutch said stretching. Like he also was going to go for a run. "Tell the teachers you two are with other groups. That we saw you leave with so and so. All day. Which is why you gotta check in with us when you get back."

"Here's the card to our hotel with our room numbers on it. Call if you get in trouble," Jimmy said handing a business card to Johnny.

"Be safe will you?" Bobby said.

"Go," Tommy said shooing at them.

Daniel grabbed Johnny's hand and bolted. Running through the park like the start of a race had begun. Johnny wanted to yell at him. His knee. His damn knee. He shouldn't be running. What the hell was happening? Where were they even going?

He had been looking forward to Central Park. Walking around, taking in the trees, he wanted to see the lakes, the ponds. But they were running. Down a path and out of the park and skidding to a stop on the sidewalk. The noise of the city suddenly coming back to life. Daniel stopped for a split second, looking around before rushing again, pulling Johnny along straight towards a beaten-up car that was idling. Daniel pulled the backdoor open and shoved Johnny in.

It was not a cab.

It smelled like stale take-out.

Johnny moved aside and Daniel hopped in slamming the door.

Wasn't it Daniel who warned Johnny about hopping into strange cars? Had he somehow dreamed that he'd caught Daniel in the morning? Had Daniel actually fallen and hit his head?

The driver turned, arm on the back of the other seat looking back at them. It was a teen with black hair and blue eyes. He grinned.

"Let's get goin' huh?"

He turned back around and Daniel put his seat belt on. Johnny scrambled to put on his as the teen pulled away from the curb, speeding off into traffic. His accent was thick.

Johnny held onto his seat belt for dear life as the teen cut other drivers off and sped.

Why were they in such a hurry?

They turned suddenly and Johnny scrambled to grab hold of the door before he fell into Daniel.

What the hell?

Who drove like this?

This, exactly this was why Johnny didn't like riding with other people.

Sometimes they gave driver's licenses out to everyone.

Like candy.

Or people just knew how to behave for the test and then were absolute demons when let loose.

Did this guy even have a license?

"Welcome home Daniel," the guy said flashing a smile.

"Thanks, Louie," Daniel said.

Johnny glanced over.

Daniel looked at ease.

Like being shaken around in the back of this car was normal.

Like this was the average way people drove.

Like this was safe.

There was no way in hell this was safe.

There was a hill, a bump in the road, and for way too long Johnny felt himself rise in the air, only the seat belt and his death grip on the door keeping him from slamming his head into the roof of the car.

His stomach rose into his throat, along with all his other organs wanting to escape to somewhere safer but there was nowhere safer for them to go because nothing was safe in this car going at this breakneck speed.

Was this how Daniel learned to drive?

Johnny was never getting in Daniel's car ever again.

Johnny was lucky he hadn't known, that Daniel hadn't killed them both.

This guy was going to kill them.

That was a truck that he darted in front of.

Nearly took off the back bumper.

What. the. Fuck. Was. Happening?

Johnny gritted his teeth.

He was nervous if he didn't that he'd bite his tongue.

Then he'd die.

He'd bleed out in the back of this car, this dirty car, with old take-out strewn around his feet.

Daniel was laughing.

Demon.

He'd gotten into a car with demons.

He'd lost it.

It had to be hysterical laughter right?

Johnny had that happen once. Where he started to panic. Wanted to yell and protest. Ended up just laughing and was unable to stop. It'd been horrifying.

But Daniel wasn't stiff and wide-eyed.

He looked so at ease.

How?

There were inhuman beings that liked to pretend to be human, in all sorts of mythos, lots of tricksters. Maybe Daniel was one of those. And he'd fallen for a damn con.

They were going to die.

And Daniel was just going to laugh.

They were talking.

These monsters he'd gotten into a car with, to be fair he was pushed into the car.

Johnny was never trusting Daniel again.

He'd been right all along. The kid had no self-preservation. Kid. He was older. Damn. Older people were supposed to be smarter.

The guy sitting up front was talking a mile a minute, his hands would leave the steering wheel when he spoke.

If Johnny wasn't frozen hanging on for dear life he would've done something.

He wasn't sure what, opening the door and throwing himself out seemed like one course of action he was contemplating but with their speeds he would not survive. The other was to try and lean forward and take the wheel from the guy and drive the damn car himself. He didn't think that'd go well either.

Johnny tried to focus on what he was saying, but he could barely focus. His heart was pounding in his ears.

They were going over the bridge, over the Hudson and he breathed.

He tried to breathe.

He looked out, past and over into the bay at the Statue of Liberty. He wondered if people got used to being near something so utterly famous that they didn't care anymore. He couldn't think of what it'd be in LA. Hollywood sign maybe? Maybe the Hollywood walk of fame or the Chinese theater? But it wasn't the same. It wasn't some massive landmark you could see for miles. That was just suddenly there. Like the Eiffel Tower or Big Ben. People probably got used to it. Stopped noticing.

Johnny tried breathing again. The name sounded familiar. Louie. Where had he heard that name before? Black hair. Blue eyes. White t-shirt with the sleeves rolled up. He almost looked like a greaser from the 50's. That name.

Daniel was talking and Johnny tried to focus again. He was asking about Nonni. Johnny didn't have a clue who that was.

Louie. Louie. Cousin. Daniel's cousin on his Dad's side. Junior. Louie Jr. His dad was Louie Senior. They lived in Parsippany. According to the maps Johnny had looked at that was about a half-hour away from Newark.

"So who's the blonde?" Louie asked.

"Johnny," Daniel said. He'd shifted forward in his seat, leaning forward, hugging the seat in front of him so he could talk easier to Louie.

"The Johnny you kicked in the face?" Louie asked.

"Yeah, that one."

"Ain't that the same one that beat the shit out of you constantly when you moved to California?"

Fuck. Louie wasn't a small fry. His greaser look highlighted muscles on his arms. Weren't Italians known for something? The mob. They were known for the mob. In New Jersey too from what Johnny remembered.

Johnny was going to die. This guy who drove recklessly was going to get revenge on a feud that Johnny and Daniel had gotten past.

"We're friends now," Daniel said, hand on Louie's shoulder.

"Uh-huh, sure you are. You know no one messes with our family and gets away with it."

Mob. He was in the car with some young punk who was part of the fucking mob. What the hell? Why did Daniel do karate if his family was the mob?

They moved through Jersey City and then were going over another bridge and Johnny spotted a sign for Newark.

Was Daniel taking him home? Why?

They worked their way through the city and down some sleepier roads and finally, Louie slowed down. Daniel's hand was on the seat next to him and leaning over him.

So close.

Johnny thought he was going to faint. But he followed Daniel's hand as he pointed out his old school. Listened as he talked about playing soccer in that field with his Dad and friends. That's the ice cream shop he and his friends would go to after school. Where his dad and he would hang out after a game. That was the best restaurant in town. Daniel had the highest score in that arcade.

"Still do," Louie confirmed.

Daniel grinned proudly and continued pointing things out. The movie theater. He'd snuck in a couple of times with his friends to R-rated movies. Only got caught twice.

His eyes were so full of delight. He was so excited.

They pulled into a parking spot and Louie got out and stretched. He shoved his hands in his pockets. He was trying to make himself as intimidating as possible. Johnny could tell. It was the way his old bullies stood. Before Johnny learned to fight back. Before Johnny stopped running and turned and started punching and kicking back. It was usually the roundhouse kicks that put an end to it.

Johnny was tired. He didn't want to deal with this. This posturing. He didn't want to fight.

Daniel was unbuckling his own seatbelt and stepping out of the car and Johnny was prying his hands from the door and his seatbelt and wiggling his fingers. They were so stiff. He unbuckled his seatbelt and stepped out.

Louie stepped forward, arm coming down on the top of the car moving into Johnny's space.

"You watch yourself, beachboy, I've got my eyes on you."

"Your not my type, but thanks," Johnny said.

He couldn't help it. It was so ridiculous. But it worked. Always worked. Louie stepped back suddenly as if he'd been stung, eyes wide and Johnny moved away from the car. Beachboy huh? That was new. They were always the same. No matter where Johnny was. If he mentioned that Daniel was his type he would probably get fed to the fishes.

He took a deep breath.

Daniel was talking to Louie, animated. Pointing at things, asking questions and Johnny closed his eyes, breathing, feeling the earth beneath him. He was fine. He'd be okay. He wasn't really in danger. And if he was? He opened his eyes. He could run. He'd paid attention the whole way there. He could retrace it. It'd be a pain in the ass. But he could do it. And he had change. He could call the guys to send him a taxi.

He always had wondered what it'd be like to leave California. He'd been enjoying it but it was starting to sour. He flexed his fingers. The feeling was starting to return them. They weren't as stiff. He'd wondered what it would've been like to have gone to school with Daniel in Newark. If their roles were reversed. But it probably would've been the same. Lots of running. Hiding. Time in the nurse's office getting patched up and telling the nurse she didn't have to call his mom, he'd sit through class with a busted lip or black eye, his mom couldn't take time off of work.

Daniel made Newark seem perfect in comparison to California. But the world was the same no matter where you went. It helped if you had connections. It always did. Family or money. Daniel had family. Sid had money. He sighed. Rolled his neck. Whatever the hell this was he'd be fine. Daniel was his friend. Probably.

Johnny looked up at the patch of sky and breathed. He was fine. It was just different. New people who he didn't know. Things he didn't understand. He met new people all the time. At the country club, at the mansion. Louie was probably just being protective. The way the guys did. He heard footsteps and looked at Daniel.

"You okay?"

"Yeah," Johnny said.

He would be.

He'd be fine.

He followed Daniel to the sidewalk and through the doors to an apartment complex. Followed him up the creaky stairs. Louie was ahead, pushing the door open to an apartment and there was talk. A wall of it that the door had just barely contained that filtered out.

Johnny took another breath.

He'd wanted this earlier. He'd wondered about this. It had to be that. It had to be Daniel's family. His friends. One or both. He should've been more careful about what he wished for. But that charming smile. He could fall on that. Even when he felt his absolute worst. Like the time Kreese broke his arm because he hadn't blocked fast enough because Sid had bruised his ribs because he hadn't been paying attention, hadn't gotten out of the way fast enough, and that night still had to show up and smile and be charming to people. On his feet for hours, still had to dance, even though all he wanted was to lay down and sleep off the pain. This wouldn't be that bad.

Daniel turned at the door after Louie went in and looked back at Johnny and smiled. "Hey, so Ma told everyone we were going to be in New York on a field trip and Nonnia demanded we visit."

"We?" Johnny asked.

"Yeah, we," Daniel said motioning between them. "Plus maybe it's self-indulgent, but I kind of wanted you to see everything. Like...I didn't think we'd get a chance again, not any time soon. And everything includes family. Because you will not get better food anywhere in Jersey than through this door."

"Because you and your Mom moved?" Johnny asked.

Daniel had already been smiling, but a blush formed, and he looked impossibly happier.

Johnny's heart fluttered. It didn't matter. Nothing mattered. He'd go wherever Daniel took him. He was so fucked. Sign him up for the mob.

It took Daniel a moment to recover but then he pushed on the door. "I hope you like saltwater taffy, Nonnio is going to give you a ton."

Nonnino, Nonnia. Grandparents? Johnny didn't have any of those. It had to be. Right? Or was it aunts and uncles? He was used to hearing tía and tío or abuela and abuelo. Were they going to be speaking Italian? He didn't know any Italian.

Daniel stopped halfway through the door and reached back and grabbed him, fingers on his shirt pulling him in. He hadn't touched Johnny, the way he usually did. For what felt like hours. Not since they'd gotten in Louie's car. This wasn't even close to how he usually was. It was strange. But he followed. Maybe Daniel in California was a different Daniel than New Jersey Daniel, different than New York Daniel. There were too many Daniel's to keep track of. He was collecting them all like figurines.

Had to be grandparents.

He followed to a living room filled with little knick-knacks and photos. He greeted an old man, Nonnio, and an old woman, Nonnia who smiled warmly at him.

Daniel was introducing him and they were shaking his hand warmly.

Nonnia pinched his cheek and then patted the side of his face. "Look how handsome this boy is, how tall!"

"Welcome, sit, sit, make yourself at home," Nonnino said.

Johnny sat where he was told, on the couch.

Louie hovered, frowning.

Nonnia smacked his arm.

He huffed and sat down next to Johnny, arms crossed, legs spread wide like he was trying to take up as much space as possible.

"Limonata?" Nonnia asked.

"Oh yes please," Daniel said warmly.

Nonnia nodded and walked away towards the kitchen.

Nonnino leaned forward grabbing a box from underneath a table and lowering his voice. He opened the box and a bunch of colorful candies wrapped in wax paper were in it.

"Help yourself," he said.

Daniel leaned forward from where he sat on the other side of Johnny and pointed them out, naming flavors, some Johnny hadn't even a clue what they meant. Like teaberry, or molasses mint. There were a lot of mint, "peppermint, wintergreen, and spearmint," Daniel said finishing up his list.

Johnny grabbed a molasses mint.

"Thank you," he said softly.

"So, what all have you boys seen?" Nonnino asked leaning back comfortably in his chair.

Johnny let Daniel answer. He was leaning forward, so excited to talk to his grandparents. His Nonnia returned, handing them each sweating glass bottles of lemonade soda, the ones Jimmy had ordered for him to give the LaRussos.

He smiled warmly, thanked her quietly.

Daniel told them about the flight, all the places they'd gone, where they'd gone to eat. Which had turned into a heated conversation about whether it was a good choice or not, why hadn't they eaten at so and so's, it was much better, but it was too far away or it had already closed.

The conversation got lost in food. Tangled up and when Nonnino and Nonnia were talking fast about people, places, and things Johnny did not know.

Daniel soaked it up. Like he'd been missing something and they were supplying it. All the updates of the neighborhood. All the news. The conversation bounced around, overlapped. They all spoke with their hands moving and it was exactly like Johnny had thought.

Nonnia occasionally would get up and get food, snacks, fruit, cheese and would hand it to Johnny to eat.

He'd catch Daniel watching out of the corner of his eye every time Johnny stood up to take what she offered him.

It was ingrained. He didn't know how to explain it. You stand when someone important comes in, respect your elder's stuff. Sid made sure it'd been one of the first things he'd learned. To show some respect.

She seemed amused by it. Smiling as he hopped up even though the boys on either side of him didn't.

She just wouldn't stop giving him things.

Food.

Like he was starving.

She didn't even ask if he was hungry.

He had been. But he really wasn't anymore. He was at a loss.

Sid's training didn't include Italian grandmothers.

"Tesoro," Nonnino said with a laugh, "You're going to murder the boy."

"Nonsense," Nonnia said, with a wave of her hand handing Johnny what looked like cookies in a little plate. "Look how tall he is, all that muscle. He must eat."

"Oh," Nonnino said, shifting back in his seat to grab a piece of paper off a nearby table. "Your godfathers wanted me to give this to you."

Daniel leaned forward and took it, flipping open the envelope. He read it quickly then stood up. "Oh! They're home!" he turned to Johnny. "I'll be back. Is that okay?" he directed the latter part to his grandfather who nodded and waved him off.

Johnny watched him leave. Leave him behind, with his grandparents and his cousin who was barely restraining himself.

Nonnia sat down next to him.

"How are you enjoying the East coast?"

"It's nice. Different," Johnny said.

"Of course it is," Louie said sitting up from where he'd been lazing, looking bored against the other arm of the couch. "You can't get away with the same shit."

Johnny stiffened.

"Louie Jr.," Nonnia admonished.

"What? You do know he beat the shit out of Daniel for like 6 months right? Terrorized him? And now, we're what, supposed to believe that Daniel and him are friends? You're feeding someone who hurt family. We don't do that."

Nonnia frowned. "Louie Jr. This boy has been nothing but polite. Whatever happened is between him and Daniel and Daniel would not bring a friend home he didn't get along with."

Louie grumbled arms folding over his chest again.

Nonnino chuckled softly from his chair. "LaRusso's like to talk. We find anyone who is quiet and listens and we latch on. Even you know that Louie Jr. have you even been paying attention? Or is that head of yours just decoration?"

Louie flushed with anger. "I still think it's messed up. He moved across the country and..."

Ah. Louie felt guilty. Johnny got that. "You used to protect him when he got in trouble," Johnny said softly.

Louie stiffened.

It made sense. Louie was bigger. Taller. More muscle. He gave off the air of a bully. It was how he carried himself. It was the way he kept posturing. He probably felt guilty that as soon as Daniel left his sight, his protection, he got punched.

Johnny had gone through this so many times, he knew how to make the bastard feel better. He didn't deserve it but he'd do it. He didn't like Louie. Didn't like the way he crowded Johnny's space with a menacing air.

"You do realize he won right?" Johnny asked. "I've won several times. He also got a lot of good hits in. Always got back up. He never ever gave up. Not in front of me. Ever. He's brave."

Louie stared at him. Then lifted his chin. "Of course he is. He's a LaRusso."

The guy had family pride the way some people did for sports teams. But that did it. His body language changed. He started talking. About school with Daniel. Back when Louie and Daniel went to the same school. Before he moved. Before they both moved. All the childhood adventures. Exploring the local parks. Playing soccer with Daniel's dad. It was warm. Fond memories. And Johnny could see it. A young Daniel running around, biking through the neighborhood, playing soccer, going to camp in the summers, and being so damn bad at half the games but so enthusiastic that everyone was charmed.

Daniel came back after a while. "Hey," Daniel interrupted softly. "You mind driving so I can visit Dad?"

"Sure," Louie said and Johnny followed. Louie slapped him on the back. Hard. Three times. Laughing as he did so.

Johnny smiled, a charming smile. It was strained. He could feel it. He wanted to shove Louie. But he'd be disappointed in himself. And Daniel's grandparents had so many tiny porcelain figurines, he was sure if any roughhousing happened, if a fight broke out, he'd destroy their beloved collection by accident.

He followed Daniel down the stairs and back to the car.

He hesitated.

"Can we walk there?" Johnny asked.

"Easier with a car. We'll go to the florist first," Louie said with a grin.

Johnny breathed deep.

He pulled the door open and braced himself for the scent of stale fast food and the crunch of the wrappers, the stickiness of everything, and the awful awful driving.

They got into Louie's car and he drove to the florist. Daniel's mother had given him money, to buy something nice for Dad's grave. Asked him to stop by and say hi for her.

It was weird. Very weird to bring Johnny along. But when would Daniel get a chance like this again? To be back in Newark? New York was so close. It felt like a waste to go and not visit his grandparents or his Dad. But dragging Johnny along? That was pure selfishness. The rest of their classmates were exploring Central Park, were doing things in the city.

And Daniel? Daniel had brought Johnny home with him. Because he wanted to see it. He wanted to see Johnny on his grandparent's couch, see how he reacted to being given too much saltwater taffy for anyone to humanly finish in one sitting. It wasn't like going home during a holiday. But he'd wanted it. As soon as he'd realized they were going to New York. And Tommy had been so ready to help him figure it out. Didn't make it seem weird. Accepted it like of course Daniel wanted to show Johnny Newark.

Not their whole class. Not all of the guys. Just Johnny.

Johnny was so stiff in the back of Louie's car. He had been on the drive in. Daniel hadn't paid too much attention. Too busy catching up with Louie. But it was the same, as he'd seen out of the corner of his eye earlier.

He wanted to reach out and take his hand. But while Louie was dense as a boulder he couldn't keep his mouth shut. Guys in Newark didn't hold hands. Not unless they were together. And Daniel wasn't ready to explain that they weren't dating. Louie wouldn't get it. Would ask why not? And Daniel didn't know how to explain that. California was just different.

And Louie kept puffing out his chest around Johnny. Like he was a stupid rooster or something and was like we're going to fight. Absolutely ridiculous.

They parked and he watched Johnny stretched his fingers, little wiggles like they were stiff. How hard had he been holding onto the door?

Louie headed to the florist and started telling Daniel about everything else he'd missed. Then he stopped and lowered his voice.

"So what's with blondie? He your new best friend or somethin'?"

Daniel looked up at him with a frown.

"What am I being replaced?" Louie asked.

"It's not the same at all," Daniel said. "We're friends. He's may be one of my best friends in California. Huh. Yeah. But you are family, man."

Louie frowned but nodded, placated. Which was a relief. Daniel didn't want to go through how they were different. Louie sometimes didn't get things. It took a while for the sparks to get the idea going.

"You know he's kinda weird."

"Yeah?" Daniel said stiffly. Louie was family but he better tread carefully. Daniel had left them alone for probably an unrecommended amount of time. He better have been nice.

"Thought I was coming on to him," Louie said with a frown.

Daniel stared at him wide-eyed. How the ever-loving hell? Daniel had been working on trying to get through to Johnny for months. MONTHS! And Johnny spends five seconds with Louie and thinks the guys flirting? LOUIE! Of all people. Daniel wanted to scream. He breathed deeply.

"What happened?"

"I said he better watch himself, I'd keep my eyes on him," Louie said. "And he said thanks but your not my type."

"You tried to start a fight? Seriously?" Daniel was going to burst a blood vessel. He didn't know what he was more upset about.

"He beat the shit out of you."

"And I kicked his ass."

"What's even worth redeeming in him?"

"He's nice! He listens. He's-" Daniel paused, he was not going to yell at Louie in the middle of the sidewalk when Johnny could be right behind him. Oh god. Daniel turned. Wait. Where did Johnny go?

"Where is he?" Panic began to rise.

Dutch had told him he had to keep a hand on him at all times or he'd just disappear. He'd thought maybe it was a joke. Maybe he was getting played. But it was a good excuse in California to keep touching him. And in Jersey? But what if Dutch was right?

"He's about two blocks back," Louie said with a sigh.

"What?" Daniel said. "How can you tell?"

"Blonde and tall. He sticks out. Especially with that blue jacket."

Daniel was tempted to jump on Louie and use him to see higher. "Is he coming this way?"

"He's talking to someone."

"He's talking to someone," Daniel repeated unhappily. "Let me guess," he said sourly. "Some girl took notice huh?"

"You're the one who brought a pretty California boy to Newark," Louie said. "Ah, he's coming this way. He's got someone with him."

Daniel was pissed. Panic dissipated and now he was pissed. He'd already told Johnny not to leave his side and what did he do? Left his side and then picked up a girl. They'd been out of the car five minutes. The hell?

"Oh," Louie said.

"Oh? What the hell does Oh mean?" Daniel hissed.

"I see," Louie said softly.

"Yeah, clearly you see. Tell me what you see you giant."

Louie laughed. "He'll be here in a second and you can see for yourself. You're right, I'm pretty sure he's cool."

What the fuck?

Then Daniel saw him through the crowd. Blonde hair, blue eyes, bright from his blue jacket. He looked concerned. But he wasn't alone. It wasn't some babe. It was a kid. Absolutely sobbing, clinging to Johnny's hand. Johnny stopped next to them and knelt down to the kid.

"Where'd you say you were supposed to meet your mom again?"

The kid hiccupped, rubbing their face and Daniel caught it when the kid said it. He knew where that was. Johnny looked up at him. Damn. Okay.

Daniel knelt down.

"Hey, it's okay. I know where that is. We'll get you there okay?"

The kid nodded sniffing.

"Told you," Johnny said softly, a gentle smile on his lips.

Daniel's heart pounded in his ears. He was good with kids. This kid, how? Did the kid reach out to Johnny? Picked him out of the crowd to help? Or did Johnny see the kid? Hear the sound of someone crying? Either way...Daniel held out his hand to the kid.

"It's close," he said. "Let's get you home huh?"

The kid took his hand, didn't let go of Johnny's. They turned off the main street and walked a couple of blocks to the shop. A woman stood outside fretting. The kid let go and ran straight into her arms.

"Johnny Lawrence helping out lost kids, I feel like I see a new side of you every day," Daniel said.

Johnny looked at him. "Sorry for holding you up. I didn't know where it was."

"Don't worry about it. We're not in a rush?"

"We're not?"

Daniel glanced at him as they returned to where Louie stood. "You thought we were?"

"Well, you ran out of Central Park. With your knee...I thought..."

Daniel smiled softly. "Louie could only be parked so long. And then traffic can be abysmal. My knee's fine."

"You sure?"

"Yeah."

He looked so relieved. Daniel reached out and patted him on the back. Similar to the awkward pats Johnny always gave him.

They walked to the florist and Louie held the door open for them. There was a middle-aged woman working, the same one that was always there.

"Good afternoon," she said smiling warmly. "Long time no see Daniel."

He grinned. "Too long."

She smiled, "Something for your dad?"

"Yeah."

He was a bit surprised that Johnny left his side. But he watched him out of the corner of his eye. Johnny was looking at all the flowers taking them all in.

"You want to make your own?" she asked.

Daniel never did. He didn't know anything about flowers. He'd only tried it once with his mom shortly after Dad died thinking it'd be a good exercise. A good way to express how he felt, but it'd come out weird.

"You do that here?" Johnny said. Interest piqued.

"We do. People have fun, or it has more meaning sometimes when you get to do it yourself. You want to sit and make a bouquet?"

Daniel didn't think he'd ever seen Johnny say yes to something so fast. He was sitting at the counter, all ready to make a bouquet.

"I'm gonna go to the cafe," Louie said. "I can't be in here too long." He sneezed. Point made.

Daniel made his way over to the counter and sat down next to Johnny. She was explaining the process and Johnny was soaking it up like a sponge. The way he did when Mr. Miyagi talked. She set out the supplies and then let him go. There were buckets of flowers around. He got to pick out what he wanted. And he seemed to know exactly what he wanted. Like he knew. Daniel watched him stunned.

He was grabbing white flowers, lilies, and peonies, pink and white carnations. Little blue flowers. Sprigs of green. It was pretty. He was focused. So focused. He really was good with his hands. So full of surprises. Beautiful as he worked. Daniel liked watching him work. Liked watching him pick through the flowers, looking thoughtful. So damn quiet.

"Where'd you learn flowers?" she asked.

Johnny looked up, for a split moment. "My mother used to work for a florist."

Mrs. Lawrence used to be a florist?

Johnny stepped back, looking at the bouquet, then turned to Daniel. "What do you think?"

"It's good," Daniel said.

She laughed. "It's because you don't know what it means." She put her hands on the vase and pulled it closer to Daniel. "Peonies are for healing. Carnations, the pink ones are gratitude, the white is for remembering, lilies are traditional for graves, and the blue flowers are forget-me-knots. It's sweet. Perfect to give your dad. Someone speaks the language of flowers," she said with a smile of approval.

"I didn't know flowers had meanings. I mean I guess I knew roses," Daniel said.

"Each color means something different," she said with a smile.

"The owner of the florist gave my Mom a book. She gave it to me," Johnny said softly, looking a little uneasy under all the praise.

"I'll take it, and give it to Dad, if you don't mind," Daniel said. "I'm going to have to take you with me when I need to go to florists from now on."

Johnny smiled softly, proud but so fragile. Like he could barely let himself feel that. But it was better than it had been. She finished prepping it to set out on the grave and Daniel paid with the money his mother had given him.

Daniel pushed himself from the counter and took his flowers. "Sorry, there's a cafe next door if you want to hang out there. With Louie."

It was only a split second, but Daniel caught the sour look. Johnny did not like Louie. Daniel wanted to laugh. "You both can behave right?"

"I'll be good," Johnny said. Like he was promising he wouldn't get into a fight.

They bade her goodbye and walked out onto the sidewalk. Louie was sitting at the outdoor seating. He waved.

"Johnny's staying with you for a bit. Be nice," Daniel said sternly. "I'm gonna visit Dad."

"Give my regards," Louie said.

Daniel felt bad leaving Johnny, but there were things he wanted to say that he couldn't say in front of Johnny. He went through the gates and climbed up the hill of the graveyard, the familiar path he'd taken countless times. With his grandparents, with his mother, sometimes on his own after school with his soccer ball or their favorite ice cream.

He walked down the rows, past other LaRussos, people Daniel didn't remember, people he liked to think kept his Dad company.

"Hey Dad," he said stopping and brushing leaves off the headstone, clearing away old dried flowers. "Been a long time huh? We moved to California if you can believe it. Ma says hi. She's good. Okay. Likes her job. Likes her coworkers. She's making friends, slowly. I never thought we'd move you know? Newark's where LaRusso's have lived forever. Or like in the area, you know? I was awful to her. Whole ride. A long time after we moved there."

Daniel sighed, sitting down gently holding the flowers in his hands.

"I thought how could we move? Not without you. Couldn't leave you behind. It felt wrong. But I couldn't say that. Couldn't say that moving meant losing all the things that made me feel connected to you still. Which is just so selfish, because before you got sick I'd been such a bad son. I was too cool to hang out with my dad anymore, with my parents. I wouldn't go with you to the movies. I wanted to go with my friends. I wouldn't play soccer with you. I played with my friends. And I've regretted it so much. I pulled away too early. If only I'd known. Maybe I would've gone with you more to do all the things we used to."

He took a deep breath.

"I was determined to hate California. Out of spite. On your behalf. On my own. But it wasn't fair to Ma. And you know what, California hated me right back. I went into it ready for everything to be awful. I got in fights. Not fully my fault. But I know I didn't help. But I got to meet this guy, Mr. Miyagi, from Okinawa and he taught me karate.

Not the stuff I learned at the YMCA, but like real karate. And I competed in this tournament against the guys who were making my life hell and I won. Got a trophy and everything. And man, you would've been so proud. I didn't get on the soccer team though.

"After the tournament the guy who tormented me apologized. He started working with Mr. Miyagi. I brought him with me. He made this bouquet. I like him. Like a lot. It's weird. I'm going through all our interactions since the first moment I saw him and trying to figure out exactly when and how it changed. I don't know but he listens and not just to like humor me. I don't think I've ever had someone pay so much attention to what I say. I always expect him to tell me to shut up and he never does. He hasn't yet. I just....

"Okay so you know my godfathers? I visited them. They left me this letter with nonnia and nonnio saying they were home and that Ma told them I'd be in town, probably with Johnny. And I did and I told them. Told them that I liked Johnny. The way they liked each other. And thanked them for like all their advice and taking care of me as a kid and you know they said it was you." Daniel laughed.

"They said that when you learned you were dying you went to them and sat at their dining table and told them you were dying and wouldn't be there... You wouldn't be there to watch me go on my first date or graduate, you wouldn't be able to teach me how to shave, or teach me how to drive a car, or fix a flat tire or watch all my games and tournaments, wouldn't be there to embarrass me before prom or see me graduate. You wouldn't be able to give me the talk. So you asked them to cover everything, because you thought, because I stared maybe a bit too long at the marble statues at the museums, that you couldn't tell whether I wanted to be the cool guy on the movie posters or if I liked him. But you didn't think Ma would be prepared for all of those talks. Or that I wouldn't be comfortable going to her about it. I mean Ma probably could've gotten some of it. But I think I'm the only kid who got such a comprehensive sex talk."

Daniel rubbed at his eyes and laughed again.

"I mean one of Johnny's friends asked if I knew how guys had sex with each other and so I told him. And man, Dutch seems like the most unflappable of Johnny's friends and he turned so red. It was hilarious. So thanks for that. Thanks for it all.

"Johnny and his friends have let me join them and it's nice. They're nice. I'm no longer scared of them. Not anymore. And like I talked to them about you and my friends here. The friends I had in Newark...I'd mention you and they'd change the subject. They'd get awkward. The conversation dropped. Because they knew, they knew you and they hadn't had a parent die, or anyone they knew die. But these guys from California listened, they asked questions, they let me talk about you. And it felt nice. I cried. Like so much. But they just let me be sad. No "don't cry" or "you'll feel better" or "I'm sure there was a reason it happened" or "he's in a better place now". None of the shit people always say and it was just so nice. Who'd have thought? These kids who bullied me comforting me on a damn Ferris wheel?

"Which yes, I was thinking I might kiss Johnny there but then Ali, who I dated for half a semester, it was fun but she also dated Johnny and that's a whole different mess, and she told me that her first kiss with Johnny was on a Ferris wheel and that maybe our first kiss, if I was going to try and make a move, should not be similar to hers. And that's so damn hard. They dated for two years, how do I carve out a new path that doesn't remind either of us of Ali? Like we went to dinner and the movies and it was so nice. Basic right? Ma got us reservations at this great place. Had duck on pizza and artichokes in a calzone. But Ali and I used to go to the movies all the time and it was hard not to be reminded of her. I don't know how Johnny does it. They dated for so long. I've never had a relationship for two years.

"But I want to. And I kind of want it to be with Johnny. But I can't tell if he likes me. All his friends touch him all the time and I don't know how to flirt any other way. Heck Louie made more of a straight shot that got through to Johnny on accident than I ever have. And that's so frustrating. I mean, Louie?! Seriously? It was probably because he was posturing, but still! Oh. Louie says hi by the way.

"But he's also healing, right? Like his sensei, when he lost, tried to kill him. Like how messed up is that? Ma saw the results of that, heard what happened and after Johnny proved himself to be okay, she's like determined to have him over as much as possible. And she's befriended his mom, whose this fancy rich lady. She scared me at first. But Ma and her have gone out so many times now and she's so happy to have a friend and Johnny loves her so much. Ma is trying to find out if there's a chance you know? Like if I've got a shot. But apparently, all the Lawrence's are just like immune to our ways. It's not working. Just like all my flirting just isn't working. But he's getting better. Like he seems to be healing, and really that's what I should be happy about.

"I think you'd have liked him. He's full of surprises. And he's kind and sweet and thoughtful, and I can't help myself but keep thinking of the future and all these things we could be. When we're just friends. But you always used to say your best friend in the whole world was Ma. And I like that. I'd like that myself you know? I like to think we're getting there.

"Uh, let's see what else. School is going okay. Graduating soon. Which I can't believe. I think the last big thing is prom. I don't think it'll be fun. I mean I don't think I could get to dance with him. Heck, a teacher would probably stop us. And then we graduate and then what? I'm determined to keep him in my life. I...I don't think I want to go to college. Ma will be so upset. Mr. Miyagi will be disappointed. He's like my other best friend. Me. 18-year-old kid from Newark befriended a like 50-year-old war veteran from Okinawa whose also my sensei. But he's full of advice and guidance. So don't worry Dad. He's watching out for me. Pulls me out of things when I start to spiral and calms me down, gives me so many chores to do that you'd probably love him. I think you'd get along. He's quiet. Works with bonsai and goes fishing. He's family, I owe him so much, for everything. "

Daniel sighed, leaning back. "I'm doing okay I think. I think everything is okay. I'm sorry we left you behind. But I promise we'll visit. It just won't be as much as we used to. And I hope you're okay with that. I think...I think you would be. Because you always wanted us to be happy. And I'm sorry. But I love you. Wish me luck with Johnny. I think that's where I need all my luck. Everything else is pretty good right now."

Daniel set the flowers in their spot, smiled fondly, and stood. "Love you Dad."

He walked back down the hill to where Johnny was sitting at the cafe.

Louie was talking, loudly. Daniel could almost hear him across the street. Poor Johnny.

He got a cup of coffee with them, sat and talked with them some more, then they went and hit up all the spots.

He showed Johnny the YMCA where he had been taking karate. They watched part of a lesson from the window and Johnny softly told him, "Mr. Miyagi was a better choice by a million."

They got ice cream, went to his favorite restaurant, got a soccer ball out of Louie's car and Daniel showed Johnny the trick, how to juggle the ball on his knees, how to bounce it from one knee to the other.

Johnny looked so concerned. So worried over his knee. But he listened and he tried. He didn't do great. But he got a couple of bounces and he tried again and again and again. Determined. Beautiful in the setting sun.

Daniel liked teaching him things.

They'd have to do this at Mr. Miyagi's. Or somewhere else. He'd get it eventually and Daniel couldn't wait for the look on Johnny's face the payoff that there would be.

They visited Nonnio and Nonnia one last time. They gave Johnny a bag full of saltwater taffy, Nonnia kissed his forehead and Daniel thought it was adorable.

He wondered if Johnny had grandparents. If he'd known his. His world seemed so small. Just his mother and him, and then the cobras. Daniel would help him expand that. His grandparents would ask about Johnny whenever they called. His Ma would probably fill them in. But it'd be sweet and nice to catch them up on it.

Louie drove them back to Central Park. They still had several hours till they had to be at the hotel and Central Park didn't close until 1 am. Johnny held on tight to the door and Daniel promised himself he'd massage Johnny's hands as soon as they were in the park.

He wished Louie well and watched the car speed off into the night.

He took Johnny's hands as soon as they stepped onto the path into the park.

His hands were warm, soft in his.

He could not let Johnny leave New York without seeing the park.

He showed him all his favorite spots, talked to him about everything. They didn't have enough time to see the Delacorte Musical Clock or the zoo, but that was okay. There was so much more to see. And Louie had dropped them off in the perfect spot near the large iron gates of the Vanderbilt gate so they could start in the conservatory garden. They made their way through the sections of the gardens, starting in the French section walking around the fountain of three dancing girls in the center, and looking at the pink, yellow and purple tulips growing along the edge.

The tension in Johnny's shoulders began to dissipate. He looked at ease in the park. Daniel smiled. He knew Johnny would like the park. And it was nice for it to be just them.

Tommy had explained the assignment. The absolute chaos all their classmates had endured through the morning. Running through every inch of the park on a scavenger hunt. It probably had been a lot of fun.

But Daniel liked this, holding Johnny's hand and walking from garden to garden. Visiting the Italian garden and its wisteria pergola, listening to the birds chirping, and walking along the paths with twisty crab apple trees. Daffodils were in bloom in the English garden along with more tulips, striped orange, and yellow, dark purple almost black and white, and pink ones. Little purple lupine flowers grew lower to the ground.

They wandered out of the garden and down the rest of the park. Past the lake.

"Thanks for coming with me today. I'm sure it was...weird," Daniel said softly.

"It was nice to see all the places you talk about," Johnny said.

Daniel smiled.

"And your grandparents were nice," Johnny lifted up his bag of saltwater taffy. "I don't know what I'm going to do with all of this."

Daniel laughed. "Nonnio can't help himself."

"I'm glad we had enough time to come back here," Johnny said softly.

"Yeah? Was there anything specific you wanted to see? I was just planning to show you the highlights, of what's still open. Sorry, the zoo closed at like 5."

"There's supposed to be 161 trees from around the world. And the castle. We got to see the Alice statue this morning. And the literary walk."

"You did your homework," Daniel said impressed.

"Do you think there's enough time?"

"Of course. And you're in luck," Daniel said with a warm smile.

"They're all in the direction we're heading."

"Was it nice? Coming home?" Johnny asked softly.

"It was..." Daniel didn't know what to say.

It was weird. Something had changed. He was a tourist in his hometown. He'd changed but nothing else had. Louie was still doing the same things. So were the godfathers. So were his grandparents. So were the kids at his old school.

He'd expected something more. Something huge. Not like he was expecting a parade up, on his return. But yeah, he'd wanted a bigger deal out of it. He wanted it to feel like more. But really, showing Johnny around, watching the guys try things, everyone getting excited about things that had been fun.

"Was this boring for you?" Johnny asked.

Daniel looked up at him.

Johnny was frowning. "I mean for most of our class this is all new. We don't know any of this. Like seeing the Statue of Liberty every single time we crossed the bridge was still exciting and novel. But you grew up next to it. We could've gone somewhere else. Like on a cruise or to Paris or something. Somewhere new for you too. Instead of going on an adventure you just played tour guide."

That warmth bloomed up in Daniel's chest.

"I wanted to show you around. I wanted to take you to Newark, show you where I used to live, to walk through this park with you," Daniel said motioning around him. "But you're right it's kind of weird. I think...I think I've changed. I thought my life was in Newark. That I'd been uprooted and I was refusing to grow in California. I didn't want to. I wanted to come back here where everything was familiar. I wanted everything to be the same way it used to be. But it's not. Because nothings the same. The memories are here and there, but they're also like in everything else. Like the stuff Mom and I do. In our memories. He's always going to be there, like when I play soccer or when I go through his old clothes or the photo albums. But I didn't realize how much of my memories were in Newark. Of Dad. I mean I think I was drowning. Haunted by everything. Every street corner we stood on together. So when we left. It felt like we left him behind. But we didn't. Not really. And I tried so damn hard not to put down roots in California that I think I sabotaged myself at every opportunity. Like

I was trying to punish myself for being a shitty son so I just became a worse one."

Johnny's hand tightened around his and Daniel blinked, he used his other hand to brush away tears.

"You're not a shitty son," Johnny said.

Daniel laughed. "I whined. The whole way to California. Complained for months after we moved. I used you as an excuse to not try."

"I beat you up. You had a right to complain and not feel safe in California. To want to go back to somewhere you felt safe. I-I always tried that."

Daniel glanced at him again. He wondered where Johnny felt safe. Why he'd need to...how bad had things been? Daniel remembered the photo of Johnny as a kid. Worn. The few that Mrs. LaRusso had that she carried on her person because they were the only copies she had. She didn't have books full like his mother. She used to work at a florist. What had happened? He shifted his hand in Johnny's, lacing their fingers, rubbing his thumb over the back of Johnny's hand.

"I'm so sorry about that Daniel." There's so much regret in his voice. Every time he said it, it didn't lessen it. Like it was an endless pool with no bottom.

"I know."

"Your Mom loves you a lot you know. I really really doubt she's upset with you over complaining."

"I wasn't just a shitty son to her. I'm working on that. I have time. But with Dad. I was there when he died. But before that, before he got sick, I pulled away. Stopped meeting him to do stuff. Stopped hanging out with him. Wanted to be anywhere I could be but with my parents. And I did the same stuff to Mom when I got to California. I was embarrassed by her everywhere we went. Of her. Of our car. Of our home. Of my bike. Because everyone seemed cooler. Because all I knew, like straight off that night at the beach was the cool kids all lived in Encino Hills and had bikes and fancy radios and lived in mansions and I wanted all these different things at once. If I was going to be stuck in California I wanted to be cool. I wanted to be someone else. Anyone else. But I also wanted to be back in Newark. Where I knew everyone. Where I knew the best place to eat, where I could keep learning karate at the Y, where I could see my grandparents and family whenever."

"Mr. Miyagi is a million times better than that teacher at the Y," Johnny said. It was sour. Like he needed to defend Mr. Miyagi. Which was hilarious because Daniel wouldn't trade his lessons with Mr. Miyagi for all the gold in the world. He laughed. But he loved it. Loved Johnny's need to come to this hypothetical Mr. Miyagi's defense. Totally unnecessary but sweet.

"I wouldn't trade it. I agree. Mr. Miyagi is better and I'm so lucky." He took a deep breath. "I had a point. I always lose my point."

"Didn't want to be in California but came home and things were weird?"

Bless him for listening. For following along with the unorganized chaos of Daniel's mind.

"Right. Thanks. Coming home and seeing Louie and he was the same like nothing changed. But I have. And it's weird. Weird to think I have changed because it doesn't feel like I've changed. Other than being better at karate. Like I didn't notice I'd changed until I came home and saw who I used to be and how I don't fit that anymore. Or like I'm starting not to. I'm sure I'm still a brat to Ma, but like I think I'm getting better. It's- okay- so I once went back to my elementary school after I was in high school and like walked into our school library and around and everything was so damn small and I didn't remember it being small because I'd been small at the time and it like hurt my brain for a minute because it was different. It felt like that.

"And I realized that like this was fun, right? I liked showing everyone how to eat pizza in New York, showing you my favorite art at the museum, walking around to all the tourist spots. And I liked that everyone paid attention to me when I talked. I liked being an expert. But I think, oh god, I think I like living in California. Like I miss Mr. Miyagi and the sun and the garden and driving past the beach. There's coast here and it's different. LA is busy but it's not New York busy. Like I missed a lot and it's nice to be back...to visit. But I think when I stopped paying attention I got comfortable. It liked wormed its way in and I put down roots. Like I like hanging out with you and the guys. And I realized I'm not scared of them anymore. Like I don't like panic as much when they're around. And that's like, I don't know when exactly that happened but it's nice. And I like going on our adventures, exploring.

Maybe it'd have been cool to go somewhere else. But I don't think, if I'd stayed in Newark I would've gotten to go somewhere on a trip like this. On a plane with all my classmates. It was, nice. All of this was nice."

They were passing the great turtle pond, they'd see the castle soon.

"How about you?" Daniel asked. "How do you like New York?"

"It's different," Johnny said. "But this? I like this. I don't know if I'd have enjoyed it as much, without your insider info."

Daniel grinned. "Well prepare to enjoy one of those things on your list."

Daniel waved his hand as they turned the corner and took in Belvedere castle. Daniel remembered coming with his Dad, before it'd opened, when it'd been in disrepair. But it was looking good. It was still open and they could climb up and lookout. Daniel pointed things out with a warm smile, pointed out where they'd come from and which direction they were going to.

Johnny took it in, he looked so peaceful. So different from the car, from walking around Newark. He had to know.

"Was it okay that we went to Newark today instead of staying with everyone else?" Daniel asked as they walked back down and towards Strawberry Fields and the Peace Park Johnny had wanted to see with all the trees from around the world.

"It was. Though..."

He seemed to regret putting that in, the caveat. The complaint.

Daniel had to know, heart racing, what had been bad, all of it? Had it been weird? It was weird. He'd thought it'd be nice. He wanted everyone to meet Johnny. As if they were already engaged. Fifty steps ahead. His brain always ran too far ahead. He wanted to see Johnny interact with his grandparents. With his hometown. To take that little piece of California, one of his favorite parts of California, and fold it into Newark, see how it fit, how it worked.

"Though?" Daniel pressed, softly.

"Can I...could..."

He wanted to ask for something. Daniel blinked. When had Johnny ever asked him for something? Daniel just took things, every step along the way. Johnny's hand, all the space he was given, Johnny's time.

He waited.

Johnny took a deep breath, "If I ever- if we ever come out this way- if your family ever visits...I never want to be in a car with Louie driving ever again."

It'd been such a struggle to get that out. Daniel laughed.

"That bad?"

"Please, not ever, ever again."

Oh god, please really did things for him when it came from Johnny's lips. He smiled warmly at Johnny.

"He drives a little recklessly."

"A little?" Johnny asked, incredulous.

Johnny Lawrence really went all for driving safety huh?

"You weren't scared when I drove you around," Daniel said warmly, voice low, it hadn't ever worked before, trying to flirt, to use that specific tone that had worked with other people.

Maybe Daniel was bad at flirting. But his ego couldn't stand the thought of that. So he pushed it away. He should've taken Johnny along the Bow bridge, it was one of the romantic spots in the park. But this was faster and there was somewhere he wanted to get before it closed. Because he knew Johnny would be shocked. He wanted to see his face.

"You drive like a normal person. You care about your car. Respect it."

Johnny's nose was wrinkled. Like he was thinking with disgust at Louie's car. Yeah, it was messy. Yeah, Louie didn't take care of his car in the same way that Mr. Miyagi had trained Daniel to. The loving respect Johnny heaped onto his Avanti. Night and day.

"Had a rough time with Louie all around huh?" Daniel asked with a sigh. "Sorry about that."

"It's fine. I'm used to...guys like him."

Guys like him? They were walking along the trees now. Johnny was quiet, it was a quiet part of the park. They couldn't be loud.

"Guys like him?" Daniel whispered.

"They don't like me, your cousin had a reason at least...but I'm used to...it's a type. We never get along. I've met lots of Louie's."

Daniel remembered the guys talking about how Johnny always got into fights. How they didn't know who or where. Was it that type? Was that what he meant? He thought Louie was going to pick a fight with him? Daniel wouldn't have allowed it. Would've reigned Louie in. Kicked Louie's ass himself. He sounded so sure. Like it was normal. A part of life. Guys like Louie just didn't like him. And he knew plenty of Louie's.

Had the thing he'd said to Louie that threw him off. That made Louie think Johnny misunderstood and thought he was flirting...had that been to get Louie to back off?

He'd been so distracted by being home. So excited he hadn't noticed Louie being a dick. He tried to remember. He'd seen Louie crowd, Johnny at the car, but he'd backed off pretty quick. That had to have been it. Diffusing the situation with a feint.

"I'm sorry about Louie," Daniel whispered. "I wouldn't have let him, you know."

He didn't know. That was the thing. He didn't know people were in his corner. Every once in a while Daniel got a hint. A moment where a piece of Johnny's life settled into place. Where he understood for a second how much he just didn't know. That Daniel didn't know, hadn't known.

He felt anger rise up. One day, one day Johnny would know he wasn't alone. That he had people in his corner who weren't going to leave, and Daniel was going to engrave his name at the top of the list, it wouldn't get crossed out, it'd be permanent. He'd have Johnny's back. He'd be there if he needed help, even if he didn't ask for it. Mr. Miyagi didn't want him to be out starting fights but maybe it'd be okay if Daniel put an end to them. If it was for Johnny he was sure Mr. Miyagi would understand.

One day.

One day Johnny wouldn't see guys like Louie and go on the defense. Wouldn't expect the worst. Because he'd have Daniel with him to diffuse the situation, or his friends to back him up. And he'd know that.

Daniel would keep him safe.

Johnny would laugh at him if he said it aloud though. Probably.

They looked at the trees, all the different ones, and then made their way down Terrace Drive to Johnny's last request. They pause for a moment at Bethesda Fountain visiting The Angel of the Water and then heading down the straight shot, the only straight path in the park of the Mall. The literary walk under the canopy offered by the twisty American Elms, they stopped to look at the statues of authors, Johnny studying them.

Daniel didn't know all of them. But he always found Shakespeare fun. The way the statue stood looking down at people with his hand on his hip, all serious despite those puffy shorts and tights. Daniel couldn't ever take it seriously. The name "literary walk" made it seem like there were a lot more statues than there were. And Daniel felt a little bad for Johnny who probably had expected more. There were only four. And Daniel only knew who one of them was. But they'd follow the path and get to where he wanted to be.

"I can't believe we fly back tomorrow," Daniel said softly. "You want the aisle seat?"

"What about your knee?"

"It's fine Johnny. I talked to Mrs. Fletcher and she cleared me. For stuff like that."

"You talked to her again?" Johnny asked. He sounded worried.

"It was pro bono, don't worry."

"When did you talk to her? What did she say?"

That was what Daniel had wanted that time before from Johnny. That desire to know. The need. The worry. But now he just felt bad.

"She said it's healing well. I keep it up at home. And not doing gym and whatnot. So like don't worry about our little run earlier today, or the soccer lesson or this long walk. It's fine. I can't do anything like super strenuous. Like playing an actual soccer game, yet. But I'm getting there. Maybe by summer."

"We'll play this summer," Johnny said.

It was like a promise. And Daniel would take it. Whatever Johnny's plans were for the summer, they were going to spend it together. He'd make sure of it. He was sure the guys had plenty of things they'd want to do, to celebrate their freedom. The end of high school. The end to an era.

Daniel wanted to be swept up in the revelry with them. To celebrate in the style they surely would have.

It was a good walk and what they were going to do next, that was going to exhaust them more. Daniel was going to sleep well. And he hoped Johnny would too. To banish the nightmares and just sleep without dreams. Unbothered for the night. It was April. It was coming to an end, but it was still there. A nice overlap between winter and spring. The Wollman Rink, with people skating on the ice.

"Have you ever ice skated before?" Daniel asked leading Johnny down the path to where they could rent skates.

Johnny's eyes were wide, shocked that it was still open. Daniel smiled, proud of himself.

They got their skates, Daniel managed to beat Johnny out, prepared this time to buy their skates. He had the money that Tommy had given him. It was that time of night where the lights were on and it was mostly couples. They were able to put the candy and their shoes in a locker and then put on the skates.

They stepped onto the ice and Daniel turned on it, waiting to watch Johnny. He was prepared for practically anything. Johnny doing that low gravity waddle that first-timers did or for him to skate past like a pro. Either way, Daniel wanted to see.

Johnny stepped carefully onto the ice, brows knit in concentration, and Daniel held out his hands toward him. He would not let Johnny fall, even if it meant both of them going down.

Johnny moved one foot in front of the other, shifting his weight, hand out towards the side, the wall, the way kids did.

Daniel intercepted, took that hand in his. He could do this. He grinned at Johnny with a supportive smile. He'd talk him through it. Tell him what to do. Praise every correct move. Every time he tried. He could skate backward. It wouldn't be a problem. Plus he'd probably look cool.

Johnny looked a little shocked when Daniel caught both his hands in his but that was fine. It'd be perfect.

He started to move, pulling Johnny along with him. Explaining how to do it, telling him he'd had the right idea. How smart. Intuitive. Johnny was so intuitive. Such a quick learner.

He was red. That beautiful blush, but his eyes didn't leave Daniel's. Doing as Daniel said, it was too much power and it'd go straight to his head. Daniel smiled. Explained how to stop, how to move his skates, how to fall without hurting himself, and then they practiced the fun stuff, gliding, and swizzles.

Yeah, swizzles.

Johnny let out a little laugh at it. A puff of laughter rather.

They'd done a couple of rotations.

"You're doing great. I'm going to skate next to you now, think you're ready?" Daniel asked.

"Yeah," Johnny said.

Daniel grinned, let go, and did a flashy spin because he had to, there was no way he couldn't. The fact Johnny was there just made it impossible not to show off.

When he stopped he skated back to Johnny and took his hand. Skating with him.

"See?" Daniel said. "You're doing great. Have you skated before?"

"Not on ice."

Johnny's face was turning pink. It wasn't that cold out, but the ice made it cold. There was music playing and it was like dancing.

He wondered if they could dance at prom. If that'd even be possible. Would Johnny even be going? Would he get a date?

"Your mom used to work at florists?" Daniel asked after a while.

"Yeah, when I was little."

"What happened?"

"The shop went under. Had to shut down, I think I was in kindergarten," Johnny said softly. "It took everything with it when it closed."

Everything?

"It was Mom's favorite job. She liked it. They paid her enough. They didn't mind me hanging around. They liked to teach me the flowers and how to do everything when I was little and hung around. There was a joke, that when I grew up I could work there too."

There was longing in his voice for a place long gone, for a broken promise. A little bitter over what could've been.

Daniel held his hand tighter. He spoke quietly. Told Johnny about his mother's jobs. The ones she hated. The one she'd liked.

"Was the florist before Sid?" Daniel asked softly. "How many jobs did your Mom have before she met him?"

He tried to picture her before Sid. Before the mansion and couldn't. The mother who had such few pictures of her only son, who only had the memories and it didn't make sense.

To his surprise, Johnny told him. All the jobs Mrs. Lawrence had held. For the long term like the florist who'd seen her through her surprise pregnancy and supported her until it went under, to the awful secretary jobs where she wasn't paid enough and her bosses yelled at her for things they didn't tell her to do but expected her to do, trying to clean homes but never finding enough jobs to do so, coming home too tired to move, to the awful waitressing jobs that never paid enough.

Daniel couldn't imagine Mrs. Lawrence cleaning homes, waitressing, on her feet all day utterly drained. Couldn't imagine her as anyone other than the beautiful woman he'd met the first time, so self-assured and confident.

Johnny spoke softly as they skated, talking about his Mom. About their life in Reseda. Their first apartment, smaller than Daniel's. Losing it and moving someplace even smaller. A studio apartment for the two of them. Losing that. The reverse of hermit crabs that line up when they find a large shell to wait for other hermit crabs to appear so they can upgrade to something that fits better. A whirlwind of downsizing until it was just them and their car.

"No matter what Sid does. As long as she's safe and happy. It doesn't matter," Johnny said softly. "That is all that matters."

There was something he wasn't saying. Something he was holding in. Something bad. Daniel sped up, turning back around, so he was skating backward again looking at Johnny. He took the other hand in his the way he had when Johnny was practicing in his own. His heart was aching. How did anyone let Johnny get this far without any sort of comfort? Some sort of care?

"It does matter," Daniel said. "What every he does, he shouldn't be doing. Never should've. Do you not tell your Mom? Does she not know?"

Johnny shook his head. "She's been through enough. I don't tell her. Sid doesn't tell her. At first...he told me he'd send me to military school or boarding school overseas if I tried to tell her. Far away. I didn't want to leave her. Other kids didn't like me. The thought of being trapped with kids who didn't like me...so I just went to all the fancy prep schools he sent me to. I tried really hard. But it never worked. They didn't like me. He didn't like me. Still doesn't. But he doesn't hit me as much anymore. I'm too big. Too strong."

Johnny had a look. Like he kind of regretted saying anything, opening up. But Daniel was going to keep that door open, shove his foot, and then his whole body in the way so it couldn't close again. He'd make his way in and start cleaning. He'd do his best, to find wherever Johnny was hiding and take his hand and pull him out with him.

"Your mother would believe you," Daniel said softly.

"I know. But then...where would she go?"

"Where would you go?" Daniel stressed. "You realize you're the kid right?"

Johnny gave him a look. A look like I'm not a kid. I'm not an important party to worry about.

"I'd drive out of the valley. There's a lot of motels that you can stay at long term, cheaper further from the city."

Oh shit. He'd thought this out. He had a plan, in case. Daniel tightened his grip on Johnny's hands. Why wasn't it something like I'd go stay with one of the guys? Heck, stay with Daniel or Mr. Miyagi? Why was it to leave out on his own? Did he-did he think he was a burden no matter where he went? Daniel remembered how nervous Johnny had been when he'd dragged him home for dinner after kata. Every time he did it his mom loved it but Johnny hovered at the doorstep uneasily. He always had to pull him into the house. Like he didn't know how to just show up somewhere uninvited. To take up space that'd already been offered to him. Like everything was ice over a frozen lake and if he put his weight on it it'd crack and he'd fall through and drown.

He'd expected an I don't know or a I'd figure it out when it came up. Not a plan. Not like he had a pile of them set aside and it changed by the day.

"You know you could go anywhere right? Like to Mr. Miyagi's or my place? Or any of the guys's?" Daniel said softly.

Johnny frowned. "I know but-"

"No buts," Daniel said firmly. "You are not a burden. And you shouldn't have been in the situation you've been in for so long. You deserve to be somewhere safe. Somewhere you feel safe. Where you're not worried about things. Where you can sleep. Have you-have you been sleeping on this trip?"

Johnny nodded. That was a relief at least. Johnny was sleeping. Even though he knew Johnny had been awake when he got up that morning. There'd been no way to avoid it. When he'd nearly fallen off the bed. Which meant Johnny knew he'd slept like an octopus, wrapping himself around Johnny.

Daniel breathed. That wasn't to be worried about now. The takeaway was that despite that Johnny slept. Maybe the cobras were onto something. Johnny slept better when he wasn't alone. The problem was how to continue that away from trips?

He couldn't believe the two of them had been homeless. Had been living in their car. No wonder Mrs. Lawrence only had a few pictures of Johnny. His heart was aching. Did the guys know?

Johnny clearly kept himself in a box, trying to not take up any space other than what had been allotted to him. Every time he'd tried to take up more space he got burnt. Hell Daniel had burnt him for it a couple of times.

There was something he wanted to do. He glanced around, they wouldn't knock anyone down or trip them if they went falling to the ice. He let go of Johnny's hands and slowed, lifting his arms. Johnny wasn't good at slowing down so his eyes widened in panic but Daniel tried to make it obvious as much as possible, he cupped Johnny's face in his hands, pulling him down as he pressed himself up on his skates so he could try and look Johnny in the eyes.

"Wherever I am you are always welcome, okay? No stipulation. No advanced warning. You are not a burden. You never have been. When you graduate, forget Sid. As much as you can. Do what you want. Go camping with the guys. Do kata with Mr. Miyagi. Hang out with me. Don't waste thoughts on the bastard. Take up space. Where you want to. If you're worried you'll fall into bad habits I'll let you know," Daniel said with a small smirk on his lips. He doubted Johnny ever would and he was pretty sure he'd spoil Johnny if he let him. "You don't have to let Sid scare you out of the Valley. And you do know your Mom loves you unconditionally right? Like I may have only met her like twice but it's obvious how much she cares for you."

Daniel let go and wrapped his arms around Johnny's neck, hugging him. Johnny didn't flinch but he did stiffen. "You're going to be okay. We're not going to leave you alone, you know all the doors are open. Just show up. Give it a try. Any of us. Okay? Before you drive off to some motel."

Daniel thought about it for a second.

"Have you had to do that before?"

"No," Johnny said softly. "I got stronger before I got a car. Before I got a car...I slept on the beach."

Damn it. Daniel wanted to file a complaint. Wanted to storm in that mansion. Kick Sid's ass. But he didn't know what good it would do. Other than make him feel better. And disappoint Mr. Miyagi. But maybe Mr. Miyagi would let this one slide. If it was Sid.

They couldn't leave like this. The mess of painful truths Daniel had pulled out of Johnny. He breathed carefully. He didn't want to pull away. He slid his fingers into Johnny's hair.

"Don't sleep on the beach or in your car next time. Don't go to a motel. Come to my house. Okay?" Daniel whispered. "Stay with me."

His mother would understand. She might not let Daniel keep Johnny in his room, in his bed, since she knew he liked him. But she'd understand and let him crash. Wouldn't bat an eye at that. Maybe if he explained that Johnny didn't sleep super well on his own maybe he could get her to cave.

"Okay," Johnny said softly.

Daniel smiled warmly. He lowered back down. He didn't want to pull away. It was so nice.

"Do you want to try a spin?" Daniel asked pulling away a little.

They were running out of time and he had one more stop he wanted to make before they went back to the hotel. He had to show off a little. Needed Johnny to leave Central Park a little happier.

Daniel skated back a little, made sure no one was around, no one was too close, and watched as Johnny stopped, leaning against the wall, eyes on him, watching. Daniel held out his left arm, his right arm behind himself and he swung, pulling his arms into his chest and spinning then he held out his arms, slowing down and stopping with a big grin on his face.

"Physics," he said warmly. "Centrifugal force. Think you got it? Wanna try?" Daniel asked skating over to Johnny.

Johnny nodded, pushing away from the edge. He repeated the way Daniel had moved, face full of focus. Daniel leaned against the edge, elbows resting on it. Johnny moved the way he had, arms out and then pulling them in, spinning. He looked delighted when he stopped. Smiling warmly because he'd done it. Proud of himself. Just like Daniel was proud of him for trying. Heart pounding because there was that smile again. The smile that Daniel loved. He pushed off from the edge taking Johnny's hands in his.

"Absolutely perfect," Daniel said warmly. "You make everything look so easy. You could probably do anything you want. I'm sure you'd succeed."

Johnny was smiling at him. "Physics would be more fun if you taught it."

"Everything would be more fun if I got to teach it," Daniel said.

Maybe he was working on the support beams. Before Johnny would know it there'd be a beautiful house around him. And he wouldn't want to leave. Would stay there with Daniel forever. He just had to use the right materials and not cut corners.

Johnny laughed softly. Damn. Bless Tommy and New York. He didn't want to leave. But at least wherever he was going Johnny was coming with.

"Are you going to prom?" Daniel asked, skating along with Johnny.

"Probably," Johnny said thoughtfully. "The guys won't let me skip. What about you? Do you want to come with us?"

"Yes," Daniel said.

It wasn't being asked out to prom, but it was close enough that he'd take it. And it wasn't like being with the ex-cobras was awful. He kind of liked it. There was always something fun happening when they were around. He wondered if they'd have dates.

"I have this powder blue tux that was my dad's. Ma's been holding onto it for me. Said dad thought I could wear it to my prom. She's been waiting for like...ten years."

He couldn't believe it'd been that long. Ten years since his dad died.

"Powder blue huh?" Johnny said an amused look on his face.

"What sort of fancy thing are you planning to wear?" He asked.

"I don't know. I have clothes for special events. I'll pick something out from that part of my closet."

"Nothing new?"

"No. Sid wouldn't go for it."

Daniel wondered why Johnny didn't just buy it himself. He'd paid for Daniel's doctor's appointment. He clearly had funds. Unless Johnny had asked Sid for money to pay for his doctor's appointment. Putting Johnny in debt to his stepfather on his behalf made his stomach churn. Ask. Don't spiral.

"Did the money to pay for my knee...did that come from Sid?"

Johnny looked at him startled. "Oh, definitely not. Not really."

Daniel breathed a sigh of relief. They did a couple more laps. A few more spins for the fun of it and then traded their skates back in and gathered up their things. Daniel checked his watch. They had just enough time. He was tired. He would sleep well. He hoped Johnny would too.

They walked out of the park and Johnny didn't even ask where they were going. Trusted Daniel to know where they were going, to lead the way. He liked that. The trust that was there.

He walked down the streets of New York City. He knew where they were. Knew how to get to where he wanted to go. He had been tempted to flag down a yellow taxi for Johnny to get that experience. But after his plea to never ride in Louie's car again he wasn't sure Johnny could handle a New York City cab. Not all cabs were alike. But he couldn't promise Johnny wouldn't have to deal with speeding and intense driving.

He led him down through the brightly lit streets. Talking to him about everything and nothing. He was looking for something special. Something important.

There it was.

He pushed the glass door open. It smelled sweet and delightful. There were booths along the wall and Daniel let go of Johnny's hand so they could sit in the booth, his legs stretching out to press against Johnny's. A habit. A need to touch him. It'd be so much worse now. Since he'd turned and found him gone.

A waitress came over, gave them water, and started to offer menus but Daniel knew the best order by heart and quickly listed it off. She grinned at him and walked off.

"What did you order?" Johnny asked.

"Prepare yourself for the best cheesecake in all of New York City. I got a bunch to sample and some to take back and share. But mostly for us. They make a bunch of different flavors. But we'll sample the best of the best."

Daniel grinned. Now if only he could figure out how to get some good lox in the morning before they flew out then he'd mark the trip off as perfect.

The woman returned quickly setting down a plate full of different slices. Chocolate, strawberry swirl, original, one with lemon and coconut, a salted caramel, and a brownie one. It was probably too much cheesecake. But after all the skating they'd done, after all the walking. Daniel thought they could get through about half. Especially if they worked together.

She walked away and then came back with a bag with a box in it. Full of the mini ones he'd ordered to take to share. Maybe to squirrel one away to bring his mom and Mr. Miyagi.

Johnny was staring wide-eyed at the tall cheesecakes in front of them.

"Daniel, there's no way we can eat all of this."

"Johnny, we're champions, not quitters," Daniel said with a teasing grin picking up his fork. "Start with the classic. Learn what New York is famous for first."

Broken Dreams

Johnny and Daniel were unable to finish all of the cheesecake. It was too much. But it was kind of fun to watch Daniel try. So determined. Like he took offense to not being able to finish five tall slices of cheesecake.

They packed their leftovers up in boxes to go and Johnny grabbed the saltwater taffy Daniel's grandparents had given him. Daniel paid out of the envelope Tommy had given him and then they left.

Daniel took his hand again and walked him back through the busy streets of New York City. Led him on the trains, made sure his tickets worked, sat next to him, talking softly the whole way.

Johnny was tired. But happy. It'd been a good day. He'd gotten to do everything he wanted. And on the train, Daniel kept his hand on Johnny's leg.

He stifled a yawn. He didn't want it to end but he looked forward to seeing California again. But first bed. He wanted to shower and sleep.

They got off at their stop and exited onto the platform. Part of the day was supposed to be a free period, broken into groups. Johnny remembered that from the itinerary. But the groups were supposed to be larger than 2.

"Daniel," he said softly.

"Hmm?"

"Thank you," Johnny said.

"For what?"

"Everything. It's been fun. New York, Newark."

"I thought you didn't like Newark."

"I wanted to know and I got to know. So I liked it."

Daniel looked at him, amused. He leaned in close, arm hooked in his. "You think you could get up a little earlier tomorrow?"

"Depends."

"Bagels and lox for breakfast? There's a little place about a block from the hotel. There," Daniel said pointing.

"How early?" Johnny asked.

He wanted to sleep. Thought he could sleep. If Daniel was there. Scaring off his nightmares.

"Our flight is in the afternoon, check out is at 11. Let's ask Tommy when we have to be out of our rooms and then I'll let you know."

"Okay," Johnny said.

They made their way through the hotel doors, a greeting to the doorman, and then straight to the elevator. Johnny yawned again.

"Don't worry, we just check in with Tommy and then you can be off to bed soon sleeping beauty," Daniel said pushing the door for their floor.

He pulled Johnny along by the hand to a door and knocked. The door opened after a while and Daniel let go of Johnny's hand opening the bag he was carrying. Bobby opened the door and looked at the two of them.

"Looks like someone's about to pass out," Bobby said amused. "Glad you two survived."

"Wait is it them?" Tommy asked.

Bobby stepped back and Daniel saw the other ex-cobras sitting around the room, but Tommy was up and moving towards the door.

Tommy dropped his voice low. "If anyone asks, you two were with us at the zoo, the Empire State Building, and Grand Central Station." He picked up a bag that was sitting next to the door and pressed it into Johnny's hands. "Your souvenirs. We got you stuff for those kids you babysit."

"Thank you," Johnny said.

Daniel pulled out a box of the mini cheesecakes and handed them over to Tommy. "For you guys, best cheesecake in the city."

"Seriously?"

"Yes," Daniel said with a smile. He liked that the other guys had come to crowd around the door to see what they'd gotten. He could see that they had a card game going.

"Ah," Johnny said shifting the bag in his arms. "Do you want some saltwater taffy to try? They're from Daniel's grandparents." He opened the bag to show a large amount of candy.

"Damn, did you go trick or treating in April?" Dutch asked then snagged out a couple of pieces, unwrapped one, and tossed it in his mouth before looking over the mini cheesecakes. The other guys helped themselves and Daniel handed Tommy the envelope with the rest of the money.

"What time are we leaving tomorrow? From the hotel? I want to get bagels and lox before we leave," Daniel said. "There's a place a block down."

"Oh, that's totally doable," Tommy said. "Hmm. We're leaving the hotel at check-out time. 11. So as long as your back before then."

Daniel looked at his watch then at Johnny. "10 okay for you?"

Johnny looked at his watch. It was midnight. That'd be plenty of time to sleep. He just had to pack up his things.

"Okay."

"Do you guys want to come with?" Daniel asked.

"What is it?"

"Breakfast. Bagels and cream cheese and salmon."

"Sure," Bobby said after looking at the guys. "We'll meet you in the lobby. Now Johnny go to bed before you pass out in the hall."

Johnny nodded yawning again. Daniel laughed grabbing his arm and steering him away towards their room, fishing out the key and unlocking the door.

Johnny nearly flopped on the bed to go to sleep without showering, but he was sweaty and gross from skating and he could feel the city on his skin. So he set the bags he'd been given down on the desk, grabbed his clothes out of his suitcase.

"Go ahead," Daniel said. "I can wait."

"Thanks," Johnny said softly and showered fast. He wanted to sleep as much as he could. But he'd still have to pack. Maybe he'd pack in the morning while Daniel showered.

When he left the room Daniel had already packed. His things were sitting tidily on his bed. He was already in his pajamas, a baggy jersey shirt, and shorts. He looked comfortable.

"I'm setting the alarm for 9:30 okay?" Daniel asked brushing past him, gently touching his arm before dipping into the steamy bathroom.

"Okay," Johnny said. He pulled back the bedding to his bed.

Daniel didn't take long, turning off the lights on his way over. He paused for just a moment looking between the two beds. Johnny had moved towards the wall already, in case Daniel would join him, hoping he would. Daniel took that space without a word, turning off the light, pulling back the blankets, and curling up next to him.

Johnny woke up to the alarm. He'd slept well. The weight and warmth of Daniel helped. No nightmares.

He sat up because Daniel was already up and moving. He got up and dressed while Daniel showered and repacked. Moving the books he'd finished into his suitcase and the books he hadn't into his backpack, putting the saltwater taffy in his backpack and looking over his souvenirs. The stuff the guys had gotten. Plush animals for the kids of animals from the zoo. They'd like it. There were chocolate bars and tea.

A little note on the hotel stationery.

"Thought your mom and you guys might like the chocolates and Mr. Miyagi might like the tea."

Johnny imagined them, in the gift shop trying to figure out what to buy, knowing he had things he wanted to buy and wouldn't be able to in Newark. It warmed his heart. They were perfect. All of it. He started to move it carefully into his backpack. So they wouldn't get crushed if something heavy was set on his suitcase. He zipped up his stuff and looked around. Making sure they'd gotten everything.

Daniel left the bathroom with clouds of steam, drying his hair with a towel, hairdryer in hand.

"All packed?" Daniel asked.

"Yes," Johnny said, slipping past him to finish getting ready and to make sure nothing was left behind in the bathroom.

They took their bags down to the lobby to be watched by the staff behind the desk and to check out early. The guys were waiting. Ready for one last mini-adventure. They followed Daniel and Johnny out of the hotel and down the block to the small shop where they got a big booth and followed Daniel's move, ordering bagels and lox and coffee.

It was nice to sit with them, hear what they'd done the day before. Standing on separate ends of Grand Central Station exploiting the fact there were whisper points and whispering to one another trying to make the other laugh. Wandering the zoo, the animals they got to meet, the view from the Empire State building.

Then they asked what they'd done.

Daniel talked about showing Johnny around Newark. The YMCA where he'd learned karate, visiting his grandparents, having lunch with them, going out to dinner at his favorite place then coming back to New York City, exploring Central Park, ice skating, and getting cheesecake.

"Oh, we saw that the rink was open, no one went though," Tommy said thoughtfully. "Was it fun?"

"It was," Johnny said.

Daniel grinned, arm rising the way it always did that slow movement before it wrapped around the back of his shoulders. "He did some spins. Like a natural. Very impressive."

They looked stunned.

Johnny was about to protest that he knew how to rollerblade, had skated in rinks before in California then realized the shock was because of Daniel's arm.

This wasn't even remotely flirting. Why would that surprise them? They did it all the time.

Oh. Right.

He remembered flinching any time anyone came close to his shoulders or neck. He thought maybe they hadn't noticed. But of course, they'd noticed.

Tommy's hands shot across the table and grabbed his hand in his. He had tears in his eyes. Oh hell.

"Are you feeling better? Healing?"

Bobby smacked his shoulder.

Tommy glared at him.

"I...don't know," Johnny said thoughtfully.

Daniel always moved slow. Maybe because he'd noticed? He could always tell what he was going to do. Plus he slept like that every time they shared a bed, all wrapped up around Johnny and in his space.

"Daniel always telegraphs it."

"Like you do when you fight us," Bobby said with a laugh.

"Huh?"

"When you get pissed at one of us, whenever you'd start a fight, you always telegraphed your moves. As long as Kreese wasn't around," Bobby explained. "Like one of those lions that makes a bigger deal out of everything to let the cubs win a fight, even though they aren't really winning."

They finished breakfast and when they left the shop arms wrapped around him. His eyes widened. Daniel was smiling at him, watching from a distance as the guys came in for a group hug, arms around his shoulders. A hand was on the top of his head, ruffling his hair.

"Okay okay, I get it," Johnny huffed.

"No man. We haven't been able to hug you the way we wanted for months," Jimmy said.

"Suck it up," Tommy said. Watery. Trying to sound tougher than he felt. Was he crying again? Really? Over a hug?

"Too damn long," Dutch said. Was he crying too? The hell? It was a hug.

Daniel was grinning now. Like he was pleased with himself. Proud.

His friends were weirdos. All of them. How'd he get stuck with these ones?

Bobby pulled back just ever so slightly and the little group hug and shifted. Bobby reached out and pulled Daniel in.

Daniel looked shocked. Made a little sound of surprise but then settled into the hug looking absolutely delighted.

They were his idiots. He didn't understand them. But they were his.

It was awkwardly too long. Standing on the sidewalk as New Yorkers passed. Blessedly very few looked at them. Daniel said they were used to weird. He supposed a huddled group of crying teens was just a regular old Monday for them. He'd humor them. He didn't have a choice. He couldn't maneuver easily. He was stuck. But they were right. He hadn't noticed. Hadn't noticed that he'd stopped flinching.

That was a relief.

Maybe he'd fall back into old habits again.

But he'd enjoy it for now. Maybe they were right. Maybe it'd been too long. Maybe they'd been more worried than they'd let on. Hiding behind schemes and plans just how worried they were.

Damn. They were still crying.

"Guys, I need you to move," Johnny said.

"Why?" Bobby complained.

"You've pinned my arms. I can't hug back," he said.

They shifted and he wrapped his arms around their shoulders.

It had been a while.

He'd been keeping his hands to himself.

Just too used to using them for bad things, for fighting, that he didn't trust himself. But they'd been waiting, hurting, worried. He'd forgotten that they need reassurance sometimes.

One of the kids he babysat asked if he was so strong so he could give good hugs. He'd thought it was sweet. Better than saying it was like how animals were bright and colorful to ward off predators.

He'd have to hug them more.

Tommy shifted looking at his watch. "Damn, we got to get moving."

They dispersed, pulling away. Dutch's arm stayed wrapped around his shoulders as they walked. Bobby and Tommy were walking ahead of them with Daniel, talking to him.

"We're gonna keep him," Dutch said quietly to Johnny. "Like if it doesn't work out man, if you don't end up dating. We still wanna keep him around. Like unless everything explodes spectacularly awful. Think you're gonna be okay with that?"

Jimmy's arm crossed to his other shoulder as he came up on Johnny's other side. "He means, him and Mr. Miyagi, we wanna fold them into our little family. You know? Their fights are our fights like your fights are ours and ours are yours. Someone gives them shit we show up."

"We wanna keep 'em," Dutch said. "Even if you don't get to date him."

"Yeah," Johnny said. "I agree."

Because he did. He wanted to keep them in his life. All of them.

Dutch sighed warmly next to him. "He's a good one. Fun."

"Plus because of him, we all passed math," Jimmy said. "Which for some of us was a feat."

"He means me," Dutch said. "My parents nearly fainted when I brought home my grades. Asked if I cheated. Had to show them how I'd done it."

"We might pass finals too. Which is a relief."

They made their way back to the hotel and Tommy put them to work.

Tommy put a clipboard in Johnny's hand, to check off students as they came down into the lobby.

Gave Daniel something to do, to collect keys and take them to the check-out.

He ran back and forth.

Then they got onto their bus. Tommy had a big bag in his hands that he got from one of the teachers and he walked down the aisle passing out little rolled-up pieces of cloth.

Daniel got a white one and Johnny got a black one.

He unfurled it.

Daniel burst out laughing.

The cliche I heart NY t-shirts.

Tommy sunk down back into the seat in front of them after he was done passing them out.

"Can't leave without everyone getting those," he said.

Johnny shook his head amused, taking off his jacket and pulling the shirt on over his other shirt. "You did this so you wouldn't lose us as a group huh? Just tell staff look for the teens wearing I heart New York t-shirts they're all going back to California."

Tommy grinned at him. "Hey, it was either this or like neon yellow with all our school info on it. And like Senior Field trip 1985 on the back. But I was a little worried about creeps."

Daniel wiggled into the white shirt next to him. "You know, I don't think I ever got one of these before. Even though I lived so close. Just never thought about it."

"I'm glad," Tommy said, looking pleased before sinking back down into his seat.

The way back to California was faster.

The weird paradox of time.

Johnny thought some of it was because he'd slept better the night before. Because everyone was more awake, talking more.

Daniel was talking to Bobby a lot. Swapped seats with him, sitting in the middle so Johnny could stretch out his legs in the aisle.

Johnny started to protest but Daniel just belted himself into the center seat looking at him with that stubborn look he got sometimes. He kept his hand on Johnny's leg for the flight and Johnny still gripped the arms as they took off but was relieved that Daniel's hand wasn't there to get crushed.

He read for most of the flight back.

He wanted to hear what Bobby and Daniel were talking about but the sound of the engine was too loud. It required too much focus and he kept losing most of it. So he gave up and read.

About halfway through the flight, Daniel shifted, resting his head on Johnny's shoulder and falling asleep. Johnny made sure not to move, trying to be as comfortable as possible, but unsure if his shoulder was comfortable. Shoulders were kind of bony. But Daniel slept easy.

Bobby grinned at him.

He was surprised when they landed in LAX and the sun was still up when they walked out of the airport and to their bus to take back to school.

The time difference was bizarre. Even though they'd been in the air for over 5 hours they'd landed only a couple of hours after their flight left.

At school, parents were waiting.

"Tommy, why couldn't you have set this up so we wouldn't have school tomorrow?" Jimmy complained as he grabbed his stuff and set it aside, taking the clipboard Tommy handed him.

"Cheaper," Tommy said with a sigh. "Hang in there. Teachers promised to be gentle with us tomorrow. Probably expect lots of movies."

"So sleeping at school," Dutch said. "That's nice."

Johnny spotted the old station wagon pull up and gently tapped Daniel's shoulder. "Your mom's here," he said when Daniel looked up at him.

Johnny waved at Mrs. LaRusso who was scanning the crowd.

Her face broke out into a smile and she waved back. Daniel looked to where Johnny had pointed. Saw his mother waving and waved back.

Johnny remembered the chocolate the guys had given him and opened up his bag to pass a bar to Daniel who looked at it surprised then grinned up at him when he turned around.

Daniel grabbed his duffle and threw it over his shoulder, swinging it around so it was mostly on his back before leaning forward and giving him a hug.

"I'll see you at school tomorrow," he said before pulling away and saying goodbye to the guys, to Ali who was getting into her parent's car who gave him a little wave in return and then taking off towards his mother and her car.

Tommy came over after Daniel had left, throwing an arm around Johnny's shoulder and resting his chin on Johnny's shoulder.

"Did it go well?"

"Yeah."

"Did you have fun?"

"I did."

"I'm glad. Dutch wants to be in charge of prom. As a heads up, he's tamed his plans from what they were. But it should still be fun. Won't tell me what he has planned though. Bobby is going to be a pain about it."

Johnny frowned. "What do you mean?"

"The girls he met at the party all want to come. School said he can only bring one. He's trying to get us each to invite one as our date, but they'll totally just hang out with him," Tommy sighed deeply. "He's a lucky bastard."

Johnny laughed. Tommy sounded so sour. He reached out and patted his shoulder. Left his hand there. He could try to be more like Daniel. More comforting. The way he used to be. Like it was easy. He knew he could never be on the same level as Daniel. But he got so much comfort from him. He might as well share it.

"I'm freeing you early," Tommy said. "Thanks for all your help. I know you want to get to Mr. Miyagi's and get your bonsai. Maybe even drop off those gifts to the kids. Start sharing your souvenirs."

"Really? You'll be okay?" Johnny asked.

"Yeah. I won't let the other guys leave early. It'll be fine. I'm sure you need to escape and get some fresh air. Thank you for all your hard work."

"Thanks for all of your work," Johnny said.

Tommy laughed pulling away, hand to his chest. "It's nice to be recognized. Have a good evening Johnny."

Johnny nodded handing back the clipboard and grabbing his stuff heading over to the Avanti. He felt a little bad, it was over. But he was excited to see the faces of the kids, of Mr. Miyagi, his mother. To give out the gifts, to see his bonsai.

He drove to the kid's house early. He knocked on the door. He felt a little awkward. But the kids came running. Like he was Santa or something. Like they were excited to see him.

A total 180 from how surly they'd been when Mr. Miyagi had dropped him off the first time.

Their parents were home and smiled at him as he knelt down to give them their souvenirs and wish them a good rest of the week. He thought maybe as they threw their tiny arms around his shoulders that maybe people, even kids just needed people to listen to them. To try and meet them where they were. To pay attention.

He never would've thought kids would've liked him. Trusted him. But they did. And it gave him hope for the future. Because kids were pure. They weren't warped. They could see the good in people. And maybe they saw some good in him that he hadn't noticed. He'd protect that.

He wished them well, waving goodbye and heading back to his Avanti so he could drive to Mr. Miyagi's.

Tommy was right.

He had been craving a drive in the Avanti.

The feel of the California air on his skin, the wind in his hair, the smell of LA, to be able to watch the palm trees as he drove.

He needed to be cut loose.

He'd liked New York, liked seeing it with Daniel and the guys. But it just made home so much sweeter. Like he could appreciate it more.

It hadn't changed. He liked that.

He made his way to Mr. Miyagi's, parking and digging through his bag for the tea and the little souvenirs he'd gotten. Daniel had given him cheesecake to give Mr. Miyagi, since he knew Johnny would see him first.

Johnny knocked on the door. Mr. Miyagi called him in and he took off his shoes and walked out to the back porch where Mr. Miyagi sat drinking tea in his garden.

"Good evening Johnny-san," Mr. Miyagi said without turning. Knowing in that way he did.

Probably his footsteps. It's how Johnny usually knew.

"Welcome home."

Johnny smiled softly. He sat down next to Mr. Miyagi.

"Good evening Mr. Miyagi. We got back a little bit ago from New York. Got you some stuff."

"Have good time?"

Johnny nodded. "Daniel showed us a lot. Everyone listened to him. They don't normally, so it was kind of nice to see everyone else listening. He'd make a good teacher I think. The teachers even let him lead the way to where we were going. We went to so many places, and then on Sunday got some free time. So I went with him to Newark. It was interesting. Different. He knew his way around everywhere. Was more...confident. Like as soon as we stepped off the plane. He was ready to go. His grandparents gave me saltwater taffy, do you want some? They gave me way too much."

"Meet Louie?"

"I did. Mr. Miyagi, never ever get in a car with him driving," Johnny said seriously opening the bag with the saltwater taffy and setting it between them.

Mr. Miyagi laughed. "That bad?"

"Awful driver. Thought I was being kidnapped by the mob. I don't know how he got a license," Johnny said. "I'm glad Daniel drives better. That it's not like a family thing. Oh, uh these are from Daniel. His mom picked him up. I think they were going to have dinner or something, so since I'd come by first I wanted to make sure you got them. They're from his favorite cheesecake shop," he said opening the box Daniel had given him for Mr. Miyagi and setting it on the table, and then getting out the tea. "And this is from the guys," Johnny said.

He couldn't bring himself to say it was from him.

He had a gift for Mr. Miyagi that he'd picked out himself. A mug that looked like it was painted in watercolors, from one of the souvenir shops and set it out on the table next to the tea. "And that's from me."

Mr. Miyagi blinked looking at all the stuff.

"This is too much. Miyagi can't accept."

Johnny shook his head.

"Don't think of it as gifts that are in need of repayment. Think of it as a sentiment. That we missed you. I'm not good at accepting things. Gifts. I always feel like I need to do something to earn it. In return. Because I worked hard and barely got my Avanti. Sid nearly took it back. Same with the bike. But I'm trying to learn to just accept things because there's a sentiment behind them. Like the guys specifically thought of you when they got this tea. Daniel wanted to share the cheesecake, a little piece of New York city with you because you couldn't go with us. And,"

Johnny picked up the mug.

"I saw this in one of the gift shops we went in and it reminded me of the garden. Your garden and it reminded me of you. So I got it for you. You mean a lot to Daniel. Like I know you're his sensei and sometimes sensei's are just people who are running a business. Sometimes they try to mold people into things they shouldn't. Some sensei's have lots of awards and trophies and accolades but they're not good at it. Kreese wasn't a good sensei. But you are a great sensei. Even if teaching wasn't what you planned to do. I think sometimes people find the people they need in their lives. It happens in books all the time. I think Daniel needed someone in his life, someone like you and I think sometimes even the most peaceful life needs a little excitement and chatter and I think Daniel brings that to you. You're friends. Not just sensei and student. And friendship is so important, precious when it's the right people who find their way into your life. Because they're there when you need them. And you, you're there when we need you. It's something I'm grateful for. So please accept," Johnny said softly.

Mr. Miyagi smiled at him and nodded.

Johnny smiled back.

Mr. Miyagi picked up a cup that was sitting on the tray next to him and flipped it over, pouring tea into it and setting it next to Johnny.

They sat and drank quietly in the garden. Johnny is breathing in the clean air.

He told Mr. Miyagi after a while of all the places they went. Mr. Miyagi told him about his trips to New York. It was a quiet conversation. Peaceful.

He pointed out the different flavors of cheesecake, telling him what each flavor was because that's what Daniel had explained. And then as the sun began to set he bid Mr. Miyagi a good evening.

He collecting the rest of his saltwater taffy and the bonsai and heading back to the Avanti.

He got tacos at his favorite restaurant, giving the elderly woman some saltwater taffy. She laughed and gave him ice cream, the coconut ice he loved and he drove to the beach to eat and watch the waves with his bonsai.

When he drove home the light feeling in his heart crashed back down. Sid's car was back. He took all the quiet precautions. Parking the Avanti safely between cars, leaving his gift for his Mom in her office, and then going the backway to his room.

He locked his door, setting the bonsai up high on the shelf and sinking onto his bed with a heavy breath.

All the calm had evaporated on seeing Sid's car. Laying down didn't help. So he got up, practiced kata in his room. Breathing carefully. When his heart didn't pound quite so badly he unpacked.

He showered and went to bed.

He promised everyone he'd sleep. He'd try to sleep more. His door was locked. He'd be fine.

He missed having Daniel next to him. Curled up against him.

Missed the guys. They wouldn't be there that night. They'd be home with their families.

He rolled around a lot, trying to sleep, failing, ears straining for sounds. He sighed grabbing his walkman and popping a new cassette in and laying back down, listening to the music and closing his eyes again.

It took a while. Too long. But eventually, he drifted off.

His bags were packed and he was standing in the drive. Two tall members of the staff stood on either side of him like bodyguards. But not for him. Picked specifically because they were bigger than Johnny.

He wanted to see his mom. But they were pushing him towards a car. A one-way ticket he couldn't read in his hands, but he knew it was far.

He wanted to see his friends. But he was being pushed into the back of a car. His bag was thrown into the trunk. He hadn't gotten to pack it. Had been caught off guard. He didn't know if the things he actually cared for were in there.

He knew the bonsai wasn't there.

He asked the driver if he could at least call his friends, tell him where he was going. But the driver shook his head. Told him to shut up and sit back. The seat belt held him tightly in place.

He tried the doors they wouldn't unlock. He wouldn't get to say goodbye. He wouldn't get to explain what happened. He wanted to know what he'd done. Why he couldn't finish the year with his friends. Why he was being sent away now. What did he do? How could he fix it? He didn't have to be sent away. Where even was he being sent away to?

The driver snapped at him. Wouldn't answer. Just told him to shut up again. Johnny didn't want to go. Not now. Not when he was learning kata with Mr. Miyagi and Daniel. Not when they were less than two months out from graduating. He wanted to be with his friends. He wanted to go with them. After. He pleaded. After he graduated send him away then. Not now. Couldn't he at least have said goodbye to his mom? What were they even going to tell her? Why couldn't he have left with the Avanti?

Somehow he knew the answers. They'd tell her he ran away. Or had gone on a bender and died. It didn't matter just that he was gone and wouldn't be coming back. It'd break her heart. His car would be sold for scraps. Just like the rest of his stuff. To try and make up for the amount of money wasted to raise him. For the amount of time wasted.

He wasn't welcome back. It didn't matter where he went but he wasn't welcome back in the Valley. Sid would make sure he couldn't come back. There was a threat there. That whoever would be watching was told to use whatever force necessary, to not worry because he was just a kid no one would miss.

He protested. His friends would miss him. Daniel would miss him. His mom would miss him.

He was a burden. It'd be better if he just left. Easier on everyone.

He told the driver no. He wanted to go home. The driver laughed. Home? He didn't have one. It was Sid's house. He just lived there wasting valuable space and resources.

Johnny got quiet.

They were leaving the city.

Sometimes he wanted to leave. But on his own terms. Not like this. Not dragged away. Because if he left he could still come back. But taken away like this with no money in his pockets, no car, no clue what was in that bag. How would he get back to his friends? To Daniel? To his mom or Mr. Miyagi?

He had responsibilities. There were kids that looked to him to show up and keep them safe while their parents were gone, animals that needed him.

He struggled with the door again.

He unhooked his seat belt.

He'd kick. He laid down and started kicking the door. The glass. It didn't budge. He knew that it should've. That the glass should've shattered. He was putting his all into it.

The car stopped and the door opened and he was yanked out by his hair. It was the dessert. He'd planned to go here. Sometimes. He'd wanted to see the stars.

The bag was thrown at him. It was heavy and pointy. It wasn't useful things.

The car drove off. He opened the bag.

It was his trophies, including the broken one. His karate stuff and nothing else. The stuff from the back of his closet that he hadn't looked at in months. That he ignored.

He dropped the bag and sunk to the ground.

Sid must've known.

Abandon him anywhere in LA and he'd find his way home.

But the desert?

He wouldn't figure it out.

He wouldn't make it back.

Give him nothing but broken dreams and he'd die.

Johnny jerked awake, throat dry. He got up and drank some water he had on his desk. His hands were shaking. There was a reason he didn't sleep much.

He sighed.

He took the bonsai down off the shelf and set it on his desk.

He'd bought the tools that Mr. Miyagi had, to trim it and help it grow the way he wanted.

He took a deep breath and closed his eyes, imagined the bonsai the way he wanted it to look in his mind. The way Mr. Miyagi had told him, then batted his eyes open and went to work.

He kept at it, whispering to the bonsai as he did until the sun came up until he leaned back and studied it. He was pleased. It looked healthy. Strong. He stretched, rolling the cricks out of his neck.

He got ready to go to school, bonsai under his arm, and headed out to the Avanti.

He ran his fingers over the side of the car. Relieved to see it. It'd just been a nightmare, but still. It was a relief.

He left early and drove until it was time to go to school. Time to sit in his classes with the guys, to fall asleep in the darkened classrooms while the teachers played movies or gave them easy worksheets to do.

To see Daniel.

He needed that.

A little anchor that everything was fine.

What friends are for

Chapter Notes

> We're moving a bit faster. I am changing something again because in the USA prom isn't the last day of school. Graduation is later and I don't think there's any way Lucille would've left right after prom and not watched Daniel graduate. I don't think she would've approved of Daniel dipping after prom and flying to Okinawa instead of graduating either.

Daniel's mother wanted all the details of their trip. Needed to know everywhere they'd gone, was delighted by hearing how the guys had liked everything. Told him his grandparents had called, that they'd liked Johnny.

She smiled a little knowing smile.

She was shocked when he told her about the bouquet Johnny had made for Dad, tears pricking in her eyes, touched.

"I saw my godfathers too," Daniel said after a while.

"Oh, how are they?"

"Good. They said what happened. About Dad," Daniel said. "That Dad asked them to give me the talk on all guy stuff. Including..."

"I know," she said, smiling softly. "That's why you and I only talked about girls. It's what I knew."

"So he knew?" Daniel asked quietly.

"No, but he wondered. Thought maybe. And just in case, he wanted to make sure everything was covered, that all questions were answered because he wouldn't...be able to. And there were things he didn't know that Tristen and Moshe knew. They'd been our friends for...wow," she leaned back thoughtfully, "Since your Dad and I started dating. Like your Dad lived in that apartment complex before we started dating, they'd all gone to school together, became neighbors, and then we started dating, when we married, you know? They've always been there. It's why I call them like once a month. They're family. And your dad got worried, wanted to make sure you were aware of everything. Safe and happy. Kind of like how we told you if you were going to try drugs to do it at home. Why you had your first drink at home."

Daniel leaned back against the couch thinking. His mom was eating the cheesecake, he looked at the clock. Johnny was probably at Mr. Miyagi's. They worked their way through the cheesecakes and he hated to admit it but he liked being home again.

Home had shifted.

It no longer meant Newark only. It now meant California. It meant the tiny apartment he shared with his Mom. It meant Mr. Miyagi's place. And it was nice to come home.

School went by fast.

Johnny fell asleep in their English class when the teacher played the movie. The teacher noticed but didn't say anything.

They'd been allowed to push their desks together. So Daniel had moved his over and shifted focus from the film to watching Johnny, head on his desk breathing gently, sleeping.

It was dark.

He reached out and ran his hand through Johnny's soft hair, took Johnny's hand in his own.

He'd wake him up when class was over.

He'd probably worn Johnny out dragging him all over New York and Newark.

When they had their study group the next week Tommy pulled Daniel aside and pressed a brown bag into his hands. He didn't look at it there. There was something about Tommy's gaze, a warning to not open it yet.

He waited until he got home, to his room.

It smelled like ink when he opened the bag and a teen magazine slipped out. Glossy and bright. He frowned staring at it for a moment. Wondering why Tommy had made it seem like a big deal.

He flipped through it idly, laying down on his stomach on the floor, trying to figure out why until he turned the page and there was Johnny.

The photoshoot.

Tommy's aunt taking photos.

This was it.

This was the finished product of his work.

It hadn't felt like work but fun.

He stared at the first photo then glanced at the text.

They didn't use Johnny's name, gave him another one and there were submitted questions from girls and guys from all over the USA with questions about dating, about working out, about teen life, and some writer wrote out answers as if they were Johnny.

It was kind of funny reading it.

It didn't sound like Johnny.

But the pictures were Johnny.

His heart pounded as he studied each one, comparing it to what he remembered.

The sounds Johnny had made when he'd tried to get rid of the knots in his back. He'd have to try that again. He just didn't know how to pull that off. He'd figure it out somehow.

Maybe he'd do what Johnny did. Maybe he'd go to the library and see if they had any books on massage.

He'd have to get his hands a little more purposefully on Johnny, since now the guys knew they could touch his shoulders and neck again, hang around him again.

They were taking advantage of it, making up for lost time and Daniel had mixed feelings about it.

He liked that Johnny was getting comfort, that his friends were expressing themselves, showing they cared.

But Daniel's feelings were just going to get buried under normalcy like always.

He chewed on his bottom lip flipping the page, oh, the one in the ocean, damn.

Tommy's aunt really got his good side.

He sat up, this was bad.

This was going to go somewhere if he didn't stop now.

He closed the magazine.

He picked up the bag. There was something else in it. He upended it. An envelope fell out.

He opened the envelope.

Photos. Photos from the magazine outtakes. Ones they didn't use, but still got printed.

Daniel flipped through them, damn, why couldn't he just have Johnny now?

Why was it fair for him to be so damn beautiful and broken?

He didn't want to push him.

He wanted it to be like how Mr. Miyagi moved slow, making sure not to damage anything. Slowly teaching him, making sure he was ready first. He wanted to do that too. Take it slow, slowly lead Johnny where he wanted him, but these were like catnip. Pure torture.

He flicked through them. Who knew how many other teenagers had that magazine in their hands. And he felt jealousy rise up a little wave. Were there other teens out there who watched Johnny but not Johnny grow up, who had crushes on him but didn't actually know him?

He wanted every issue.

He quickly put the photos back into the envelope. Later. He was getting too pissed. Not actually enjoying it.

He'd come back to it.

He stuck them in a drawer in his desk.

The next time he was at Tommy's he was standing in the kitchen looking in the fridge. They were taking a break. He'd been told to help himself. He'd kind of expected a fancier fridge. Full of fancier things. But it was surprisingly mundane.

He pulled out a cup of yogurt.

"Need a spoon?"

Daniel turned, it was Tommy's aunt.

"Third drawer from the right," she said motioning.

She was setting her bag down on the counter, getting out Tupperware from her bag, and setting it in the sink.

Daniel retrieved the spoon.

"Thanks."

"Daniel right? You helped on the photoshoot?"

"Uh, yes."

She was digging around in her bag. "Tommy got you the magazine and outtakes, right? The photos we didn't use? You should use that in your resume. LA is a place where it helps to know people and say you have experience doing stuff. Here."

She handed over a thick manila envelope and a business card.

"You can tell people you worked on all of them, lie. I'll support it. Use me as a reference if when you graduate you need one. Tommy's always trying to make his resume look good. Works fairly hard on it. It's starting to look pretty impressive. He said you might want some work experience. There's a reference in there too in a sealed envelope. Sometimes they want it sealed. But use it if you need it. I'll have your name on a sticky note on my desk if anyone ever calls."

"Thank you," Daniel said looking down a the envelope.

"Tommy talks about you guys a lot, I'm happy he's got such close friends," she smiled. Then glanced at her watch, cursed. "Hey, could you tell him I've got another shoot to run to? Dinner's in the fridge."

"Of course."

"Thanks."

Daniel put the envelope under his arm and headed out towards where the guys were.

"Your aunt said she's got a shoot to go to, dinner's in the fridge," Daniel told Tommy, putting the envelope in his bag sinking down in his spot next to Johnny.

"Oh, thank you," Tommy said.

They went back to studying. Daniel wrapped his arm around Johnny's shoulders, that blushing was gone. Damn. It was because the guys were doing it too now that they could.

Days passed.

Daniel forgot about the envelope.

He focused on classes and doing kata with Mr. Miyagi, on trying to figure out how to get close to Johnny in a way that he wasn't used to. He found a book on massage but he couldn't figure out an opening.

"You should try it. Just go for it," Ali said when they met up for coffee.

"What if he says no?"

"He might," she said amused. "But he also might say yes. You won't know until you ask."

"What if he thinks it's weird?"

"Maybe if you explain the tension and the knots and the-" She grabbed his book and pulled it over studying the words. "The healthy benefits of relieving tension." She laughed.

Daniel grabbed his book back. "Hey! I thought it was a good idea."

"It is. You also might put him to sleep."

"That'd also be good," Daniel said softly.

"Just you know, go for the things you want."

He thought about that. Mulled it over on his way home. Dumping his book on his desk.

He sighed.

He opened his desk to get out some paper and saw the manila envelope. He should put that business card and recommendation somewhere nice. So he wouldn't lose them.

He grabbed the magazine, the photos from Tommy and set them out on the desk.

What was he going to do?

He opened the manila envelope and frowned.

He dumped it onto the desk.

Back issues.

You can tell people you worked on all of them.

That's what she meant. She meant to use all of them as a portfolio for some future job. As if he'd been helping prep Johnny for photoshoots for years.

He pushed his chair back away from the desk and got up and paced. He wanted to look at them. All of them.

He was nervous.

Like this was something bad. But teens all over got this magazine. Hell, he'd seen it in the store, he'd just never picked it up before.

Now he knew the photographer. Had worked for her. Oh, living in LA was weird.

If he was going to use it as part of his resume he had to know what he'd worked on. If he was going to lie he had to know what he was going to lie about.

He grabbed all the magazines and laid down on his bed. The covers had some famous movie star or tv star or musician on the cover and all sorts of little tidbits, hints about gossip and highlights on them.

He grabbed the oldest one and flicked it open. Searching past ads and things he didn't care about for Johnny. He almost missed it. Almost skipped past it.

It was the Johnny from the photo he'd seen at Jimmy's in the photo he'd kept. Young, before Kreese had sunk his teeth too deep into him.

He looked like a boy next door. Holding books, wearing some school uniform Daniel didn't recognize. He was practicing magic in one, doing a trick, another in a white gi. But his belt was yellow and he was doing a karate pose. It looked like he was having fun, not serious yet.

The questions were all from girls. Asking how to tell if a boy liked you, how to let him know you liked him, what to expect on a date, how to talk to a boy.

He closed it setting it aside. It was so damn wholesome.

He grabbed the next one. Flipped through.

He found Johnny after his growth spurt. Tall, broad-shouldered, muscular, but still young. His features were not the same yet.

They'd slicked back his hair. It looked like they'd gone to a mall, to the movies, all date cliché spots, hiking.

There was one of him hiking hand held back to the viewer as if to help them up.

All the questions were still from girls. Still the same thing.

One of Johnny at a dinner with a fancy milkshake with two straws. Another was where he was tying on roller skates, skating in the next one.

No wonder he'd been okay on the ice.

Only one shot of him in his gi again. Already a brown belt.

He shut it, heart pounding.

He grabbed the next one.

They were all around the same spot in the magazine and he flipped forward, finding Johnny faster this time.

He was working out. The first couple of questions were from guys. Asking about Johnny's workout routine.

Daniel read it over, had to read it again to wrap his mind around it, Tommy hadn't lied. Almost all he could've done was this. Work out and karate. It was intense.

The next photo was of Johnny snowboarding. He looked cool. He looked cool in all of the photos, the wholesome boy next door gone.

They'd clearly switched gears from targeting only a female audience to realizing they had a lot of male readers.

He flicked through, looking at Johnny on the beach surfing. Sitting around on some steps with a guitar.

Daniel frowned.

What was he? A Barbie doll? One with a million different interests and occupations?

Was this real?

He flicked to the next page and found a fold-out poster.

Okay, ridiculous.

He unfolded it.

Johnny was wearing his black tournament gi. But you couldn't see the cobra patch, it was covered with a real snake. A big yellow boa. It was wrapped around him, had wrapped under his gi that was open at the top its tail wrapped around one of Johnny's thighs, but its head was looking at the viewer, held out easily on Johnny's arm.

It looked so heavy across his shoulders.

It was massive.

But Johnny made it look easy.

Like holding a snake was the easiest thing in the world. But that had been when he'd been a cobra. A black belt probably.

Daniel couldn't tear his eyes away. This was the start of the Johnny he'd first met. The start of when he started believing Kreese, following him, believing everything he said.

And it was hot. Scary and hot. Tough guy photo, but the damn snake, the open gi, the muscle. Daniel's mouth went dry.

He was hella confused about the emotions swirling after seeing the photo. Not even a photo. A damn pull-out poster.

He shut the magazine.

Hell. It was hell. Could he even manage through the next one?

He grabbed the next one. They had Johnny practicing against someone else, sparring. Their face wasn't clear. But after a couple of minutes of studying it Daniel realized it had to be Tommy.

That calmed him down a little. As his blood tried to figure out which way to go. It settled.

Johnny had his car now. The Avanti. He leaned against it in his red jacket and black headband. Looked at ease. Another was on his bike.

They'd picked out shirts that were tight. That hugged every muscle.

Daniel had to look away. He looked at his clock with a frown. It was 2 am. He'd been staring at photos of Johnny since 7 pm.

He carefully put the magazine's back in the envelope.

He set it aside. Damn.

Looking at so many photos of Johnny, blue eyes staring back at him, his heart was pounding. Would he have had the same response when he was younger? If he'd grabbed one of those magazines as a joke? He would've thought Johnny was cool. But would he have the problems he was having now?

Or was that because he knew Johnny? Because he liked him? Because he knew what he looked like while studying, focused and intense? Because he knew what he sounded like when he was reading aloud to Daniel in the quiet of Mr. Miyagi's garden? Knew the way he moved while practicing kata? Knew the way it felt to sit in the Avanti, to watch him drive it, fingers gliding over the steering wheel, always so more at ease there than almost anywhere else.

Because he knew what those muscles felt like under his hands, the sound Johnny made when he dug into them with his fingers? Because even though it'd been months he still remembered the ghost of their kiss, added it in his dreams and fantasies to the feel of Johnny's arms around him, the way they'd been on the bike, the time he'd caught him. The way Johnny had clung to him in the closet at Jimmy's.

His godfathers had warned him to be careful with lust. That when you're young it's hard to tell what is lust and what's love. Because everything is all mixed up and shaken up and everything feels so very important. And Daniel knew, knew from the beginning that it'd been lust at first. He could admit that to himself in the quiet of his room. That being caught, of watching Johnny on the roof, in the ocean, it'd all been physical. But like everything else it shifted. It was blooming in that foundation. It wasn't just attraction anymore. Not just curious chemistry or hormones that kept his hand busy.

He cared an awful lot, had for a while before he'd taken stock and realized it. Not just because he wanted to touch Johnny, but because he liked spending time with him, liked learning more, liked his friends, liked who he was when he was with Johnny. Most of the time, sometimes he tripped all over himself and made mistakes, but he liked the way Johnny made him feel. Liked the person Johnny seemed to think he was. Worth listening to. Worth spending time with. Worth wanting to be more like him.

All those daydreams, all those thoughts of a future, of cooking for him. It'd been hints of where his heart was, he just hadn't wanted to think about it. It was a lot. How much he wanted that future. How much he really really meant everything. He wanted Johnny in his life long term, forever.

He turned off the light with a sigh. He was in over his head.

His mother set out his Dad's blue suit for him. It was powder blue. He'd been given a time. Not much else. Just was told to be ready. Dutch told him.

He expected all the guys would have dates. He'd even expected, last minute for Johnny to have someone on his arm. Some girl from school. Despite Ali's promise. Maybe some girl would just find him and snap him up.

His mother took a thousand photos of him in the suit and followed him out to the front. Where the guys were supposed to meet him.

She kept playing with his hair. Tucking it behind his ear, messing with it. He swatted at her but not hard.

She stopped when they pushed the gate open and saw the guys.

Black suits, waiting. He was going to stick out amongst them for sure.

"Mrs. LaRusso," Bobby said stepping forward. "As thanks for all the food that you keep sending with Daniel for us, we got you flowers."

Daniel nearly laughed, his mom looked so touched as they handed her possibly the biggest bouquet he'd ever seen. They were dorks. But she was happy and that was nice.

She shifted them in her arms, the camera still in her hands. He knew the question bubbling up. The where were all the girls? Wasn't prom supposed to be a date thing? He was wondering it himself.

"Bobby had like 12 girls he wanted to invite," Jimmy said with a sigh. "We decided it'd be better not to invite them. Apparently, Bobby would feel too bad if they couldn't all come."

"But there will be plenty of girls to dance with at the dance," Dutch said, grinning. "Oh, Mrs. LaRusso what time does Daniel have to be home by?"

"Oh, um." She frowned thinking. "2 am?"

"We'll make sure he's home by then," Tommy said.

"Did you get a picture with Daniel?" Johnny asked stepping forward, handheld out for the camera.

"Thank you," she said delightedly.

Daniel wanted to go.

Wanted to get the night going.

Over with.

He'd talked to Ali about it. She didn't think he'd get a chance to dance with Johnny so really it'd just be torture. The only girl that might dance was Daniel was Ali. But he wanted to dance with Johnny instead. He didn't want to watch Johnny dance with girls.

But his mother was excited. So he wrapped his arm around her and smiled as Johnny took the picture. The guys filled up the space around them after one and his mom seemed delighted by it. They'd be over for dinner soon. Daniel wouldn't be able to keep it small dinners with just Johnny. Maybe that'd be okay though.

Dutch ran forward taking the camera from Johnny and pushing Johnny into the group next to Daniel and taking another photo. Then the guys pulled away and it was just Daniel and Johnny and his mother. And then they were in the back of the limo and Johnny was sitting next to him.

"You gonna wear that for graduation too?" Dutch asked after tapping the glass to let the driver know they could go after they'd waved goodbye to his mom.

"Yeah, I think so."

"Johnny said it was your dad's?" Tommy asked.

"It was."

"That's nice."

It wasn't said sarcastically, but warmly. He liked sitting with them in the back of a limo. He never thought he'd get a chance to be in one. It was kind of cliche but fun.

The school was decorated with fake stars and Dutch slammed his hands down on Tommy's shoulders.

"Good job man."

"Thanks," Tommy said smiling, looking around at the decorations with a hint of pride.

They were on time, but Daniel was surprised that so was the rest of their class. It was packed.

He expected people to be late. To filter in through the night.

He tried to remember how the Halloween dance had worked out.

A band was playing on a stage and people were dancing.

It was different than Halloween where he'd hidden behind his costume and got to dance with Ali.

He wouldn't get to dance with who he wanted this time. He was prepared to be miserable.

They didn't get very far into the gymnasium before they dispersed from his side.

All but Dutch who threw an arm around his shoulder.

"Are you still into Ali?" Dutch asked.

Daniel looked at him startled. "No. That's-no-definitely not."

"Okay. Who you votin' for?"

It felt like a complete one-eighty and he stared at Dutch trying to put two and two together.

"Listen, man, I'm not good at playing like a fairy godmother or whatever. But I'm trying to make at least one dream come true tonight and like I had a list of them I was going for and like almost all got vetoed but one."

"I was going to vote for Tommy," Daniel said after a moment. The thought of Dutch as a fairy godmother was hilarious and it took him a moment to get past the image and not burst out laughing.

"Perfect. You do that," Dutch said squeezing his shoulders and dipping into the crowd.

Daniel sighed.

He'd kind of hoped Johnny would stay by his side, but he was out talking to people too. So he wandered over to the ballot box and wrote down Tommy's name, folded it, and dumped it in.

He spotted Ali who smiled at him but didn't come over either.

He wandered over to the refreshments table and had some punch and ate a cupcake.

The music was good. The decorations were nice.

It just wasn't where he wanted to be.

He found a different table and sat down in a chair with his snacks and his drink and played with the confetti on the table.

The band paused for a break and a teacher walked onto the stage.

"Usually there's an order to these things, but we've had a request to change up the schedule."

The other guys came over to where Daniel was and Dutch looked so absolutely excited.

Daniel got up, Dutch did a little drum roll on Daniel's arm bouncing in place. Daniel looked at Bobby who just shook his head amused.

"It looks like it's unanimous as everyone got here early and already cast their votes. So we're going to announce the prom king and queen early."

Johnny was walking across the stage, carrying a piece of paper up to the teacher.

The teacher flicked it open and read.

Bobby wrapped an arm around Daniel's shoulders and leaned against him.

"Prom Queen is Ali Mills," the teacher announced.

"You should know before we all got here, before we were friends, Tommy went to the elementary school and the middle school that was attached to this one. Like ninety percent of the school knows him. Has forever."

"-Tommy-"

"And he's been in love with Ali since preschool. He only talks about it when he's drunk. How they talked about their favorite detective series on like the first day and became like best friends. Were all of elementary school, and most of middle school. But Tommy's aunt and uncle didn't do the country club stuff. Thought it was a waste of money," Bobby said as a crown was placed on Tommy's head.

He looked surprised and touched, happy.

"The poor guy is a planner. He likes everything to be perfect. We didn't know until it was too late. Until we'd already gone with Johnny, supported him to strike first. Tommy didn't stand a chance," Dutch said quietly at his side. "And Tommy's loyal. He picked Johnny over Ali. Suffered quietly, alone. Watching his friend fall in love with the girl he'd loved for like ever. And her fall for him. Or well, we thought she had."

The students were spreading out in a circle and the band was playing a slow song as Ali and Tommy stood across from each other. Tommy held out his hand. Ali laughed and took it, wrapping her arms around his shoulders.

"And then well that exploded and damaged the shit out of Johnny and Tommy couldn't forgive her. His childhood best friend hurt one of his adoptive brothers. It was a mess," Bobby said.

"And then she moved on to you, so fast," Dutch sighed. "A random guy from out of state. It was like salt to a wound."

"So that's why he was so nasty at the tournament," Daniel said softly.

"Yeah, it wasn't really you. Kreese just exasperated everything. Always made it so much worse," Bobby said softly. "Misplaced anger and a lot of pain."

"And then she dumped you for a UCLA guy. He said he's realized that maybe it was for the best, never getting the girl. He saw the results she had on both you and Johnny. But man I couldn't let it go."

"He never can. So he got everyone to come early. So we could get this over with."

"The guy can't graduate without getting a romantic moment with the girl he's loved since he was like five," Dutch said with a sniff. "It's so damn sweet. He's such a sap."

"Says you," Bobby said with a laugh. "Mr. Campaigning to get those two as king and queen of prom for like months."

"Listen there was so much shit I wanted to do tonight and y'all clipped my damn wings. So I had to do this."

"What about Johnny? Is he going to be okay, with-" Daniel motioned out towards Tommy and Ali slow dancing, talking softly to each other smiling.

"He'll be fine. He knows they're friends. He just doesn't know the long-held feelings there. And it's good for Tommy. Hopefully, it'll help him move on," Dutch said warmly.

Jimmy walked over, stretching. "Damn you really pulled it off."

"We pulled it off," Dutch said with a grin. "Just think of what I could accomplish if you didn't always nix my ideas."

"We'd all be in jail if we didn't reel you in," Jimmy said with a frown. "Just because you're good at this from time to time doesn't mean you should let it go to your head."

The song came to an end and Johnny was walking back with Tommy, an arm around his shoulder talking softly with him.

"Alright," Dutch said with a grin. "Time to go boys."

"Go?" Daniel asked.

"You want to stick around?" Dutch asked eyebrow raised.

"Not really," Daniel said.

"Perfect, back to the limo," Dutch said gently pushing on his shoulder.

"Where are you guys going? You just got here," Ali said, following, calling out.

Dutch turned, from where he was herding the guys out. "The only dance worth dancing was done. There's no point sticking around if we can't all dance with who we want to, with who we like, we're going to do something fun we can actually all enjoy huh? Enjoy your night your majesty."

Daniel caught sight of Ali frowning at that, brows furrowed.

Then her eyes widening. "Wait! Dutch! What the hell does that mean? Come back here!"

Dutch just laughed pushing them out and into the hall.

Daniel sat in the back of the limo with the guys.

Tommy looked so happy. So pleased. And Dutch was grinning in response.

They parked and Dutch threw a bag over his shoulder herding them out.

Daniel laughed when he stepped out into the parking lot of Golf 'n

Stuff.

"Really Dutch?" Bobby asked amused.

"Hey man, it was this or Disney, and Jimmy wouldn't let me buy tickets."

"The park closes at 10 pm. It wouldn't be worth the price," Jimmy explained with a frown.

"We'll just have to go this summer," Dutch said amused.

It was fun.

Dressed up for mini-golf, for playing the games in the arcade, exploring the park.

And then Dutch dragged them over to a locker room outside of the water park. Dumping his bag down on the ground.

"I brought towels and swim trunks from the shop. Keep 'em I'm not taking them back," he said with a laugh.

Daniel stared at him wide-eyed. They were going on the slide he'd seen almost a year ago.

"Really?" Daniel asked.

Dutch studied him for a moment then grinned.

"Hell yeah man. Don't tell me I managed to like also grant a wish for you?"

"I wanted to go on those slides the first time I came here. But it never worked out."

Dutch brought his hands down on Daniel's shoulders, looking serious and like a coach about to tell a player to get their head in the game. "Well, tonight's the night."

Daniel took his powder blue tux off very carefully in the locker room, hanging it up in the dry cleaning bag Dutch had given him and changing into swim trunks.

He'd been so bummed at the prom but this, this was a million times better.

The slides were delightfully full of rushing water and the splash they made when it spit him out was all the pool fun he'd been promised for the entire trip to California all rolled into one.

And Johnny was in the water with him.

Splashing him back.

Laughing.

Playing games with everyone in the water.

It was everything he'd wanted and just hadn't known.

To just spend time with his friends, with Johnny.

Walking into a Trap

Johnny tried desperately to hold onto every moment, to be present, to not let it slip through his fingers. But before he knew it he was walking across the stage and accepting a diploma case that didn't actually have his diploma in it and graduating with Daniel, because of their last names, right next to each other.

His mother cried. Squeezing his face in her hands, embarrassing him but it wasn't that bad because Mrs. LaRusso was in tears as well and Daniel was whining to his mom as she took photos. They got photos with the guys and just them. Mrs. LaRusso even got a picture of Johnny and his Mom and he tried to remember the last time he'd gotten a picture with her. Hoped he'd get to have a copy.

Sid hadn't come. And Johnny wasn't going home. Bobby had invited him to spend the summer with him, been adamant about it, almost a pain.

"You're coming to stay with us this summer."

No budging. No getting out of it. And with how Sid had been blowing up over the past month there was no good alternative. Sid had been complaining about a summer with a lazy teenager who'd graduated. About Johnny being a leech. About all the things he should be doing instead.

Johnny had just quietly packed his bag with clothes, emptied out his emergency fund, grabbed the keys to the Avanti, his Walkman, and bonsai.

He didn't really need much and he was ready to go stay with the Browns.

He assumed he wouldn't spend all summer with them. He could go stay at Jimmy's lake house, or Tommy's beach home. But he kissed his mother's cheek and promised he'd be okay, told her he had fun plans with the guys. He assumed he did, even if he didn't know what they were. Since they'd switched over to get him together with Daniel, they stopped telling him things.

Surprises they said.

Johnny wasn't sure if he could handle any more of their surprises.

Mrs. LaRusso gave him a hug, kissed the top of his forehead, and dragged Daniel off to a nice lunch and Johnny got in the Avanti and drove to Mr. Miyagi's.

It was done.

It was over.

He knew he should've felt relieved but he felt untethered.

They'd tried to invite Mr. Miyagi but he said he was busy. It was a little disappointing. But Johnny wanted to talk to him, see him before he went anywhere.

The kids he babysat were off at camp and the animal sanctuary had gotten an influx of middle school and high school student volunteers.

No one needed him.

It was weird.

It felt like the end of everything and he wanted to make sure Mr. Miyagi was still there. Hadn't just up and disappeared like Mary Poppins now that he and Daniel had graduated.

Hadn't disappeared like a summer's dream.

He found Mr. Miyagi carrying lumber from the back of his truck and Johnny hurried out of his car to his side.

"Ah, Johnny-san," Mr. Miyagi said with a smile, letting Johnny help.

"Hi, Mr. Miyagi. What are you doing?" Johnny asked lifting the wood, not caring about his suit.

"Building guest house," Mr. Miyagi said. "Lots to do."

"Can I help?" Johnny asked.

Mr. Miyagi glanced over at the Avanti. Saw Johnny's suitcase in the backseat.

"Johnny-san going on trip?" Mr. Miyagi asked with a frown, showing Johnny where to take the wood.

"I'm going to stay with my friends over the summer. Things at home are a little...well... I graduated," Johnny said.

Mr. Miyagi hmmed with a frown. He had Johnny hold the pieces together as he hammered the nails in, a single swing of his hammer, and the nail would slide right through, it was impressive.

After the basic structure was together. Johnny had taken off his suit jacket and set it aside. Mr. Miyagi showed him how to hammer the wooden parts of the walls and then left to make a call.

Johnny worked for a while in the peaceful quiet of the garden.

He heard the sound of a car approaching. He heard Daniel already talking fast before he was even out of the car, complaining. Working his way into the kitchen, talking with his mouth full, eating something, still complaining.

Johnny didn't catch what.

He was taking a break when he heard them approach.

"-how come every time I have a problem, you have work for me to do?" Daniel asked. He didn't sound happy.

Johnny heard Mr. Miyagi laugh. "Cosmic coincidence."

He felt bad listening so he got up moving out towards the front of the house through the gate while they practiced breathing exercises.

His mom had given him a graduation cake. It was silly he thought, but sweet.

He had wanted to share it.

Bobby wouldn't be interested. Would've taken some but also would've complained about him bringing something sweet into his house that was already overflowing. It was summer so it was probably all citrus and fruit pies, tarts, and cakes and the Browns.

He'd hoped Mr. Miyagi would eat some with him. But now that Daniel was there it'd be the perfect time to share it. He got it out of his car looking at the bouquet his mother had also gotten him.

He was still puzzling over it.

Amaryllis Pride

Basil Good Wishes

Chamomile Patience in adversity

White Chrysanthemum Truth

Dill Powerful against evil

Edelweiss courage devotion

Tansy declaration of war

Sunflower adoration

It was the weirdest bouquet he'd ever seen. And he didn't understand it. Which was a first.

He always understood his mother through flowers and she always understood him. But the Tansy and the Dill were such strange choices. And white chrysanthemums were kind of funeral flowers. Not always, but mostly.

Was it because school was over?

He didn't know.

There was an underlying message and an overarching one.

The overall one was I'm proud of you, love you, good job.

But the underlying one was of danger and warnings and he didn't know what to do with that. How to handle it.

The cake was easier. It just said congratulations on it.

He carried it into the house.

Mr. Miyagi was in the kitchen making iced tea.

"My mom got this for me. I thought we could share it," Johnny said setting it down on the counter.

"Mmm," Mr. Miyagi said with a nod. "Good. Help Daniel-san."

Johnny nodded and headed back outside to where he heard the rhythmic hammering. Daniel was breathing deeply and hammering gently to get each nail steady and then with one sure swing would get the nail all the way through in one go. He really did learn fast.

Johnny picked up his hammer and went to work at his side.

"So, what's wrong?" Johnny asked after a while.

Daniel jumped, like he hadn't seen Johnny, lost in his own world.

"When did you-? How long have you-?"

"I was here before you," Johnny said amused. "I helped put the structure together.

"Today?"

"Yes, with Mr. Miyagi's help."

"Damn the two of you work fast."

"Well with us working we could probably finish it today," Johnny said.

Daniel nodded thoughtfully. He sighed and ran his hands through his hair. His shoulders slumped.

"Ma got a job in Fresno. We move tomorrow."

"Oh," Johnny said feeling a pain shoot through his heart. That was a three to four-hour drive north. Practically in the desert.

"Whole summer spent in Fresno. What even is the point?" Daniel complained. "I graduated and we're moving again already?"

"There are catacombs," Johnny said.

"Huh?"

"In Fresno. There's also sunken gardens and uh it's near Yosemite."

He'd gone once with the guys. A weekend trip. It wasn't too far, but it was farther than Johnny expected Daniel to be over the summer. It was like the sand of time he'd tried to hold onto. Daniel was going to disappear into the desert before he got to tell him anything. And what even would be the point?

He felt a little sick.

Daniel sighed, hammering away. "It just sucks."

"Yeah."

After a while Daniel spoke again, calling out to Mr. Miyagi. "What are we making anyway?"

"Guesthouse," Mr. Miyagi said carrying out a tray of green iced tea and slices of cake.

"You expecting company?" Daniel asked amused.

"Ah, refugees," Mr. Miyagi said handing them each a glass of ice tea.

Daniel shook his head fondly mumbling to himself then looking at Mr. Miyagi, "That's great from where?"

Mr. Miyagi grinned. "Fresno and Encino Hills"

Daniel set down his hammer and turned slowly, repeating what he'd heard back to himself. "Wait, Fresno? You mean? Wait, Encino Hills?"

Daniel turned to look at Johnny. Johnny looked back at him equally surprised.

Him? Did Mr. Miyagi mean him? Both of them?

"What happened in the Hills?" Daniel asked.

"Johnny-san all packed in car. Talked to Mother. If want, stay here too."

"Thank you, Mr. Miyagi," Johnny said, breathlessly stunned.

Mr. Miyagi turned to Daniel and smiled softly. "Miyagi talk to Mother last night too."

"And she said I could stay in here?" Daniel asked motioning to the structure they were building.

"If like," Mr. Miyagi said.

Johnny looked at the hammer in his hands. He got to stay. He was invited to stay. And Daniel wasn't leaving. He could spend his summer with Mr. Miyagi, helping him out and doing kata with Daniel in the garden. He wouldn't have to worry about being in the way at the Browns or staying by himself at either Tommy or Jimmy's extra homes.

Places where he couldn't be useful.

He wasn't supposed to think like that. He chided himself. Useful wasn't supposed to be the point.

He liked the Browns, but they liked to do family vacations every summer, Bobby and his siblings. He'd be in the way. He wouldn't be able to afford it. He couldn't let them treat him all summer either.

It'd be their last year for it before Bobby went to college he didn't want to be the random extra in the way of their precious family moments.

He could still see the guys. There'd still be time. But this...this was so much better. And he'd be with Daniel.

A mailman dressed in blue walked in with a white envelope decorated in red and blue around the edges. International mail.

He spoke and Daniel responded.

Johnny had never seen Mr. Miyagi get international mail. It had to be Okinawa.

"Okinawa?" Mr. Miyagi asked stepping towards the man with a confused look, taking the envelope from him and reading it.

"Yes, sir. Would you sign here, please?"

Mr. Miyagi looked shocked in a way Johnny had never seen, signing on the clipboard and then walking away looking at the envelope taking glasses out of his pocket to read it better. He walked to the edge of the platform and sat down, opening the envelope and reading it carefully. The mailman left and Daniel walked over carefully sitting down next to Mr. Miyagi.

Johnny sat down his hammer and followed. Whatever was in that envelope. It would change things based on the heavy way Mr. Miyagi had sat down. The way he'd looked so surprised.

He'd left at 18 for who knows what reason. Any part of his past could come up suddenly out of the woodwork and then what?

"What is it?" Daniel asked when he couldn't wait any longer.

"My father, he's very sick."

"Your father? I didn't know he was still alive."

"Do you need to go back to Okinawa?" Johnny asked.

Mr. Miyagi looked around the garden and nodded. "Have to get passport."

"I'll go with you," Daniel said. "Let me just change."

"I'll work on this," Johnny said motioning toward the partially completed guest house with a sinking feeling.

Could they stay there with Mr. Miyagi gone?

Would it mean Daniel was going to Fresno anyway?

Well no matter what it was silly to have a partially finished building. Had to be some sort of code violation.

Mr. Miyagi nodded and Daniel turned, following Mr. Miyagi out of the house and towards the cars to take him to the passport services.

Johnny had a passport.

Left it in his car, in case he decided to go south to Mexico sometime.

He never had, but he liked having the option.

Sid had promised to take him practically everywhere. Especially when he'd been dating his Mom. He'd gotten him a couple of passports, the promise always that they'd go somewhere, the three of them. He'd always kind of hoped they would. Kind of hoped they wouldn't.

He had never been at Mr. Miyagi's by himself.

It was so peaceful. Too quiet.

He heard the sound of the car leave and he went to work. Hammering boards in place, moving on from one to the next.

He wanted to get as much done as possible so Mr. Miyagi wouldn't worry. Maybe he could offer to house sit. Water the plants in the garden, get the mail. Stuff like that while Mr. Miyagi was gone.

Maybe he wouldn't.

If Daniel was also there it seemed a moot point. Daniel would do all of that.

Unless his Mom made him go to Fresno.

She probably wouldn't want Johnny alone with Daniel for however long Mr. Miyagi would be gone. He couldn't blame her.

He didn't know if Mr. Miyagi would resend his offer.

Johnny figured it was okay either way.

He'd been looking forward to it for the grand total of ten minutes it'd existed. Dashed apart by tragedy. Mr. Miyagi should visit his dad, should talk to him, help him get better.

Which might mean....oh what if Mr. Miyagi never came back?

The realization that that was even a possibility brought Johnny to a still. He looked around at the garden and the house.

What would even happen to all of it without Mr. Miyagi? What would happen to him?

He'd only been learning for two months. He felt like he had years worth of learning to gain from Mr. Miyagi.

But that was selfish. It was his father.

Johnny didn't know his. But he'd seen the pain in Daniel whenever he talked about his dad.

The look in Mrs. LaRusso's eyes. An ache that never really went away.

He took a deep breath in and a deep breath out and went back to work.

He finished one wall, then another, completed the pieces Mr. Miyagi had taught him to do, and then sat down on the wooden platform.

He took one of the slices of cake and ate it and drank the green tea, the ice had all long ago melted, but it was still cool.

He wondered what he'd do now.

Back with the Browns, he guessed.

Same as when he'd arrived, he washed his plate and took everything back into the kitchen.

He put the tea in the fridge and the cake he put back into the box. Maybe he'd meet up with the guys and ask them to help him eat it. That way he wasn't bringing a cake to the Browns.

But it could wait. Wait until he was sure Mr. Miyagi was okay. See if he needed anything.

He heard the crunch of the sound of a car on the drive and turned, hurrying out to the front and down the steps. Daniel looked thoughtful and was frowning.

Had they given Mr. Miyagi his passport? Had they not? Or had he too realized there was a chance Mr. Miyagi might not come back? That this could change everything?

"Did you get your passport Mr. Miyagi?" Johnny asked when no one said anything.

It felt like his heart was in a vice. He kept trying to keep calm. But he'd reached the end of the road and it was a cliff. There was no way back, no space to turn around. He hadn't made plans. He didn't know what came next.

"Hai," Mr. Miyagi said.

"He has a next-day flight ticket," Daniel said softly.

Johnny wasn't surprised. But it still stung that it was so soon. Mr. Miyagi set his things down and walked out to the back and they followed.

"You finished the walls," Daniel said in surprise looking at Johnny.

Johnny was still in his suit shirt, sleeves rolled up, he was sure he looked like a mess. Still dressed up from graduation while Daniel had changed out of his blue tux and was dressed casually. He felt like a mess.

"Yeah. I didn't know what he wanted me to do next," Johnny said.

He knew roofing, but he didn't know if Mr. Miyagi wanted something different.

"Very good Johnny-san," Mr. Miyagi said walking around it with a look of appraisal. He turned back and looked at them. "Dinner hmm?"

Mr. Miyagi cooked and Daniel quietly explained to Johnny that Mr.

Miyagi had left home because of a girl. Because the girl was supposed to marry his best friend, an arranged marriage.

Daniel looked uneasy chewing on his thumb thoughtfully, brows furrowed.

They sat around after and Mr. Miyagi showed them pictures of Yukie and Sato while he packed, explaining how he'd challenged their traditions in front of everyone, the whole village, saying he loved Yukie, should get to marry her anyway, against their parent's wishes. He got a faraway look in his eyes and they filled with unshed tears. He cleared his throat.

"Of course, Sato feel disgrace. So, challenge Miyagi to fight to save his honor."

"And you lost?" Daniel asked.

He looked so sad, so concerned. They both did. So upset. This was goodbye. And the conversation and everything was so heavy. Johnny didn't know how to help either of them.

"No. Never fight. Next day, leave Okinawa forever."

Johnny tried to think of what he would've done in Mr. Miyagi's shoes. But he couldn't.

He realized in that situation he was Sato. Bobby would've been the one to run away and not fight him. Out of love for both him and Ali. Thankfully Bobby had never liked Ali.

He wondered if he would've fought Bobby over Ali. If she'd fallen for Bobby instead of Daniel. Bobby knew him too well.

But maybe Sato and Mr. Miyagi knew each other the same way.

Instead, Johnny had fought Daniel.

Marriage hadn't even been official on the table yet just partially planned, permission given to ask.

But Daniel had been a stranger...being a teenager in love was messy no matter where you lived. But to fight your best friend. Johnny would've regretted it. Would've missed Bobby every day. Would've been miserable.

Mr. Miyagi looked miserable.

Daniel was asking about love. Confused as to why Mr. Miyagi left.

Johnny got it though.

When he thought Ali was coming back for Daniel he couldn't sit around and watch it. He'd gone for a jog in New York City to avoid watching it. The pain of watching someone you liked with someone else.

He wondered if he'd challenge some girl for Daniel's heart down the road.

He didn't have the courage.

No wonder the guys were always so pissed at him. They wanted him to be the hero of his own story, wanted him to get the guy and have a happily ever after, they just were reading the wrong novel, he was the villain of his own life.

It was a tragedy, not a romantic drama. He'd accepted that when the florist closed. When he tried to make friends and got beaten up instead.

"Daniel-san, in Okinawa, honor have no time limit."

Johnny frowned. Did that mean-?

Unlike with Johnny's hypotheticals, instead of Sato waiting at the gate like he expected his adult self to do for a Bobby who'd left, full of apologizes and warmth and missing his childhood best friend, that Sato was waiting for Mr. Miyagi to return to fight him? To jump him when he got off the plane on his way to visit his sick father? Mr. Miyagi? The nicest guy Johnny had ever met?

There was injustice in that. It was unfair. After all the pain Mr. Miyagi had been through.

Sato should've come through earlier, if he had the honor of being Mr. Miyagi's best friend he should've been there for Mr. Miyagi's wedding, should've offered condolences and support when Mr. Miyagi lost his wife and son.

Mr. Miyagi was walking into a trap, knowing it was a trap. Knowing that he had no other choice. And he was doing it alone because he always had.

Johnny felt that flicker of anger, the fight he'd managed to quell rise, sending his blood boiling. He couldn't go alone. They couldn't let that happen.

Mr. Miyagi wouldn't start the fight. He was too nice. He wouldn't put an end to it either. Because of the way Mr. Miyagi spoke. He still loved his friend. Even if his friend was even more bullheaded than Johnny ever had been.

From Daniel's heartbroken expression Johnny wondered if Daniel had reached the same conclusion.

Daniel got up slowly, talking about helping his mom pack. Mr. Miyagi told him his taxi would come at 6 pm.

Daniel promised to be there and was heading out the door.

"We'll make sure to see you off Mr. Miyagi," Johnny said.

It looked like they wouldn't get to live in the guest house. That Mr. Miyagi wouldn't be coming back. That Daniel was going to Fresno.

Johnny followed Daniel out to his car.

"It's ridiculous," Daniel said when he heard the crunch of Johnny's shoes on the ground. "He can't go by himself."

"I agree."

"But I don't know- I mean I have my college money, I could-"

"Don't," Johnny said.

Daniel whirled. "Johnny, I swear, don't you dare try and stop me from trying."

There was that danger, that anger in his tone, a fight rising up.

"Don't use your college funds," Johnny said softly. "Let me try to get us tickets first okay?"

He didn't have a lot of his emergency funds left, but he could try. He thought he could get tickets. He knew a place that helped book stuff.

Daniel deflated at that, looking at him, searching his face for something before stepping forward and leaning his head against Johnny's chest. "He can't be alone through this. You need people next to you when this type of shit happens."

He was thinking about his dad.

Johnny gently wrapped his arms around his shoulders. If Daniel was going he was going. He'd figure out how to pay for it. It'd empty out the rest of his funds. But he'd get them there and back. And he'd figure out what to do after that.

"We'll try, see if he's okay with us coming along. Do you have a passport?"

"I don't," Daniel said.

"Then talk to your Mom, pack, and then go straight back to the passport services in the morning. I'll get us tickets tonight. I'll drop them off in the morning so you've got proof of your flight like Mr. Miyagi had and can get a rush on it."

Daniel looked up at him, eyes all glassy. "What if he says no?"

"Then we'll have tried. Which is all we can do," Johnny said.

And he'd waste all of the rest of his money in a heartbeat for Mr. Miyagi and Daniel. He probably wouldn't get it back. But for the chance to make sure they were okay, that Daniel wasn't alone watching Mr. Miyagi go through what he'd been through, the hardest time in his life that wasn't when he'd been terrorized by Johnny, then it'd be worth it.

Daniel nodded and headed to the Ford to leave and go see his mom.

Johnny looked at Mr. Miyagi's house. His bonsai and his suit jacket were still in the garden. His cake, mostly uneaten on the countertop.

He didn't have time.

He got into Avanti and made his way to the travel agent he knew, the one his mom liked. The one that'd give him a good deal he hoped on two economy round trip tickets to Okinawa.

It'd been a lot. Two round-trip tickets. Last minute. But the travel agent knew his mom, listened to the story he told, and nodded, sending the proof of the flight to the passport services so they'd be ready for Daniel when he arrived in the morning with all his documents, so they knew to make him that passport asap.

He asked the agent if he could borrow the phone to make a few calls.

He called Bobby first.

Bobby answered like he'd expected.

"Johnny where the hell are you? You okay?"

Johnny explained what had happened. How he might be going to Okinawa. He might not be. But he'd booked his tickets, his and Daniel's, and that Mr. Miyagi was going straight into a fight without back up and how he had to try.

"Okinawa? Seriously Johnny? You're following Daniel to Okinawa?"

"I have to."

"He has to he says. How long are you gonna be gone?"

"I don't know. I might not even be let on the plane. Mr. Miyagi may say no."

Bobby sighed, that deeply disappointed sigh he had. "Would you have left and gone to Fresno? You know what hold on a second."

Johnny listened as Bobby messed with the phone. Heard a couple of clicks and then the sound of the other guys on the line, coming on one at a time as Bobby added them to the call.

Johnny frowned.

Bobby caught them up that Johnny was ditching them to follow Daniel to Okinawa for the summer.

"That's not exactly-"

"You'd fucking follow Daniel off a cliff wouldn't you?" Dutch asked.

Johnny frowned. "I'll go wherever he goes if he'll let me. As long as I can."

"I knew you had it bad, but damn Johnny," Jimmy said. "This isn't New York. It's a whole other country."

"You don't even speak Japanese," Tommy said.

"Mr. Miyagi is walking into a trap," Johnny said stiffly. "He can't do that alone. And Daniel watched his own dad die, sick and unable to do anything. It's going to hurt him. I can't let them go by themselves. Not when I can do something. I can...I can try and help."

"See?" Bobby said with a sigh. "He was supposed to come to my house and instead he's eloping."

Johnny flushed bright red. "I am not."

"You better not," Dutch said sourly.

"I think it'll be fine," Jimmy said after a while. "I mean why not? You said yourself you might not even get anywhere. You might not even make it on the plane. And if you do...an adventure like that? You shouldn't pass it up."

"Jimmy you traitor," Bobby said.

"Hey," Jimmy said and there was something in his tone that Johnny couldn't place. "Johnny won't be going alone. He'll be with Mr. Miyagi. He'll be fine. And heck I think we've got contacts in Japan. I'll get their info and get it to you Johnny, in case you get into trouble. It might be for the best honestly."

The guys were quiet and Johnny wondered why. Why it'd be for the best. He couldn't place the change or the reason why.

"Johnny," Bobby said after a while. "You call us as soon as you know what's happening. I'll have them put an international calling card with your ticket tomorrow. You let me know ahead of time when you're coming home okay? I want to know what's happening. That you made it there okay. That everything is okay. And heck so we can tell Mrs. LaRusso Daniel's okay."

"Okay," Johnny said. Then he remembered the garden and his bonsai. "Could you guys do me a favor?"

There was a snort of laughter over the phone in response.

"Could you watch over Mr. Miyagi's house if we do get to go? I wanted to...if Daniel was going to Fresno and Mr. Miyagi was gone...I was going to go and water the plants and clean and check the mail. Keep it nice in case...in case he came home. I left my bonsai there. Can you guys check in sometimes? On my bonsai? On Mr. Miyagi's place? Make sure no one breaks in or destroys anything?"

"Sure Johnny."

"Don't party there. Don't break it. Okay? Just keep it nice. Please."

"Of course."

Johnny relaxed his shoulders, relieved. "Thank you."

"Promise us you'll try and be careful okay?" Tommy said.

Worry was in his tone. He'd be out of range. Away from them, for the first time in the entire course of their friendship.

"I'll do my best," Johnny said.

He couldn't promise he wouldn't get in trouble. Trouble usually found him.

He exchanged goodbyes and hung up, then called up the LaRusso's.

Mrs. LaRusso answered quickly, her voice tight when she said, "Hello?"

"Hi Mrs. LaRusso, congratulations on the job in Fresno, sorry to call so late. Is Daniel around?"

"Johnny. Thanks. Yeah, he's up still, packing. I'll get him."

Daniel voice came after a moment, "Johnny?"

"I got our tickets for tomorrow, should be the same flight as Mr. Miyagi," Johnny said. "Did your mom say you could go?"

"Yeah," Daniel said, there was relief in his tone but worry was still in there.

"Do you have a pen and pencil? I've got your flight info here, so you can take it to the passport services in the morning. We got it set up so they can emergency rush your passport. They'll have your flight info but you'll need it and some other info to confirm it's you. Our return ticket is open-ended, so we just come home whenever."

"You really did it? Got us tickets? Damn you're amazing Johnny," Daniel said.

Johnny felt his skin get warm. It was nothing. It wasn't special. It was him being selfish, worried. But he was pleased that he'd impressed

Daniel, made him happy, helped him.

It took him a moment to gather himself again enough to focus. Until after Daniel said he had his paper and pen and was ready.

Johnny went through his flight info, the ticket info, and itinerary and had Daniel read it over, confirming.

"Do you want me to come to get you in the morning?" Johnny offered. "To take you to passport services? To wait with you?"

It'd taken Mr. Miyagi and Daniel forever to get through that line. The thought of Daniel there alone, worrying about their flight time and the uncertain future ahead, concerned him.

"Really?" Daniel asked.

"Sure."

"Thank you, Johnny."

"Okay, I'll see you in the morning."

Johnny hung up and hesitated. Should he call his mom? He didn't want to talk to Sid or the staff. It was late. She might not have been awake still. He looked at the clock. He'd ask the guys to tell her. He felt bad. But if he called and Sid answered? That'd be so much worse.

He gathered the information the agent gave him and thanked her. He checked the time.

There was one library he knew still open and he drove out to it.

It stayed open all night for college students working on finals.

He'd gotten a card from them when he was younger and he wandered around through the stacks, gathering up books on Okinawa, maps, cultural information, and travel guides, grabbed a beginner's language book on Japanese.

He picked a corner desk and with some scrap paper they left out for students started studying.

It wasn't easy.

The language had a completely different alphabet. He struggled to follow the guide as he wrote.

They had tapes. He tried a few of those, quietly mouthing the words, repeating after the tape.

It might all be pointless. But he'd try to cram as much in as he could.

He liked the library because of the tall ceilings and the quiet peaceful atmosphere amongst all the books. There were no fights in the library. No bullies. No Kreese, no Sid. But also no friends, no Mr. Miyagi or Daniel. It was a neutral place.

He didn't use it often as a place to spend the night. Afraid that if he did so too often they'd revoke his library card or call the police.

But if he stayed up all night studying? That'd be something different. He'd just look like the college freshman trying to cram for finals.

He breathed, working on his Japanese.

It was unfamiliar and he tripped over a lot. But he kept at it.

He took breaks, flipping through the books on Okinawa, reading.

Then he'd switch back to studying.

It wasn't sticking.

He'd switch back to reading.

He had to be able to help Daniel and Mr. Miyagi and that meant not being absolutely useless in a country he'd never been to. He'd have to be the strong and sturdy one for both of them. He had to learn something. Even if it was just the basics. Even if he sounded ridiculous.

He'd have to be able to ask for help if someone hurt Mr. Miyagi or if he and Daniel were on their own.

When the sun rose he glanced at his watch rubbed his eyes and checked out what he could, putting them into his bag and hoping he wouldn't get too big of a fine if they were in Okinawa longer than a month and he made his way down the steps to his Avanti to go get Daniel.

Daniel looked like he hadn't slept much either when he opened the door to apartment 20. Mrs. LaRusso was up and packing, running around with last-minute errands. She looked frazzled.

"Everything okay?"

"Yes, I just start very soon," Mrs. LaRusso said. "Everything's a bit rushed. Thanks for taking him, Johnny. I would but I don't have time."

"Of course Mrs. LaRusso," Johnny said.

"Come in and eat before you two go," Mrs. LaRusso said, rushing off towards the bathroom to grab things that she threw into her suitcase.

Daniel pulled Johnny in by his shirt, frowning as he looked at the fabric in his hands.

Johnny hadn't changed. His rumpled suit shirt from graduation.

"You wanna shower first? Change?" Daniel asked, glancing at the clock. "We've got time."

Johnny hadn't even noticed until that moment. Had forgotten how gross he felt. Too stressed about trying to cram as much Japanese into his head as he could, but it was like pouring water into a strainer. It kept falling out. It wasn't sticking.

He did want to shower. Bad. Now that he noticed. Now that he remembered he'd spent yesterday in the same clothes building part of a guest house that he'd almost got to live in. He was probably disgusting.

"Yeah, if you don't mind," Johnny said.

"You got that bag in the trunk still? I can bring it up." Daniel offered. "And then I'll make us breakfast.

"Thank you," Johnny said and Daniel smiled patting him on the chest. "Ma, Johnny's going to shower before we eat breakfast okay?"

"Okay! Clean towels are in the cabinet Johnny!" she called from her bedroom.

Johnny nodded and dipped past towards the bathroom to shower all the sweat and dirt away. Their shower head was short. Not built for tall people. He had a feeling there'd be a lot of that in his life. When he wasn't at the guys' places or at Sid's. Bending down to make sure he was getting clean.

There was a lot of stuff in the shower. Lots of little bottles. Like the LaRusso's had some intense regimen. Just the two of them had more than his mother did.

Johnny had four things. He blinked water from his eyes lifting up bottles and reading the tiny print, trying to figure out what was what. It was all unfamiliar. He clicked open bottle caps and sniffed. Floral. Lavender. That'd put him to sleep, he could try and sleep on the plane but not until then. He grabbed another. Citrus. He squinted again. Looking the bottle over until he found body wash on it and went with it.

The door opened.

"Grabbed the same bag as before. Just going to drop it off on the inside of the door," Daniel said.

"Thanks," Johnny responded.

He was half tempted to ask about the bottles. Ask for help. But the door shut.

There was a big bottle in the corner that looked familiar. He picked it up. Shampoo. Okay. That was easier. He sniffed. It smelled like shampoo. A sweet one. That'd be fine. Just as long as he wasn't using any bedtime stuff or calming scents.

He needed to be alert.

It took a while to figure out everything but soon he felt better, cleaner. And he stepped out, wrapping a fluffy towel around himself and digging around in his bag for a change of clothes. Shorts. Okinawa was going to be hot. A white t-shirt. It was going to be a 16-hour flight, with a transfer in Tokyo.

Whatever he picked he'd be wearing for a long time.

He dried his hair a little with the towel and hung it up. Wondered if he should wash it. They didn't have time.

He picked up his bag and stepped out into the LaRusso's apartment.

Daniel glanced at him when he heard the door. He was pouring coffee into mugs, setting out plates of eggs and toast.

"Not much," Daniel said apologetically. "But Ma's in a hurry and so are we."

Johnny didn't know how to tell Daniel that he could've poured him a bowl of cereal and Johnny would've loved it. He sat down at the dining room table and Mrs. LaRusso came out and sat heavily in the chair next to him with a sigh. She smiled at him and patted his hand. "You guys got everything? All packed?"

"Yes, Johnny nodded. Not mentioning that he already had been packed.

"Great."

Daniel set the food out before them and the coffee. Mrs. LaRusso held the mug in both of her hands and breathed it in with a warm sigh.

"Thanks, kiddo," she said with a smile.

"Of course Ma."

Daniel set creamer and sugar out and she added a splash of cream in and a packet of sugar. Johnny added a little bit to his as well, feeling Daniel's eyes on him.

"Be careful okay? In Okinawa. You two listen to Mr. Miyagi alright?" Mrs. LaRusso said looking pointedly at Daniel.

"Ma!" Daniel complained. "We'll be good."

She laughed.

Johnny ate his breakfast, he hadn't realized how hungry he'd been. He hadn't paid attention to a lot of things. Been too focused. Before they left he brushed his teeth and then helped Daniel carry all his bags out to the trunk of the Avanti along with the one Daniel had carried in for him.

He drove Daniel to the passport services when it opened and they stood in line. He couldn't believe there already had been a line.

They moved slowly. Daniel talking quietly about his mother's job in Fresno. How at least Okinawa would be nicer than that. Better to spend his summer on an island then in the middle of the desert. Johnny had to agree. It was slow going, the line. It took forever. But eventually, they got through. They took Daniel's photo and then they had to wait for the passport to be completed.

Johnny kept an eye on the time. They were going to be late. They wouldn't be able to meet Mr. Miyagi at his house. Daniel's legs were bouncing. He was chewing on his nail watching the clock as well.

"Damnit, he's going to think I bailed on him," Daniel whispered.

"We'll make it in time," Johnny said. "Before they close the gate."

Daniel glanced up at him. "You think so?"

"We gotta," Johnny said.

The man called out Daniel's name and he jumped up, rushing to get the passport and they ran. Ran to the Avanti and Johnny drove fast. As fast as he dared.

He dropped Daniel off with their bags and their passports and tickets so he could go get in line for the two of them and rushed to find a good parking spot for his Avanti.

He pulled up the hood, locked everything, and ran. Ran across the roads back to the international departures at LAX, finding Daniel and hurrying with their stuff to the desk. The agent handed them back their passports and their tickets and an envelope the guys had promised him and they ran with their bags to their gate.

Johnny could see the back of Mr. Miyagi's head. Slowly moving through the gate towards the door, disappearing.

They continued running.

Johnny's heart was pounding in his ears. Daniel was running ahead, sprinting with his boarding pass in one hand and bag in the other.

"Hey, Mr. Miyagi! Wait up! We're coming with you. My mother said it's okay. I mean, if it's okay with you," Daniel said coming to a stop in front of Mr. Miyagi. Full of hope.

Mr. Miyagi held up his boarding pass and the forms he'd need for customs. "Very expensive ticket," he said with a frown.

"Well, no, no, no. Johnny paid. It's all taken care of."

"What about prepare for college?" Mr. Miyagi asked.

"It doesn't matter when I go," Daniel said.

He was desperate Johnny could tell. He'd thought Mr. Miyagi would be delighted immediately upon seeing him. That it'd be smooth sailing. Not this awkward conversation they were having.

"I mean, Mr. Miyagi, you're more important than college. You're more important than anything to me. I mean... When I need you, you're always there for me."

Johnny felt his heart sink. Maybe Mr. Miyagi wouldn't let them come with him. Then what would he do? What would they do? Would he drive Daniel to Fresno so he could be with his mother? Did he have enough gas in the Avanti to get him that far? He didn't think he did.

"Mr. Miyagi, we'd like to be there for you, like you've been there for us. To help, if it's okay with you," Johnny said. "We don't think you should be going through this alone. We'd like to go."

Mr. Miyagi shook his head. Maybe he could tell. That Johnny was prepared to fight on his behalf. That his veins felt like lava. Was trying to stop him from making a mistake.

Prepared to walk into the trap alone to see his father.

To say goodbye to them, possibly forever, awkwardly in the hall leading to the plane.

Daniel was still trying. Trying a different tactic. Trying history. Trying to discuss the chance to learn about Okinawa. And Mr. Miyagi seemed pleased at this, a delighted and amused smile on his face. Daniel held up the book he'd bought on their way over. Smiling at Mr. Miyagi as the stewardess walked past to warn him they were closing the gate. Daniel tried one more plea and Mr. Miyagi smiled handing over the boarding pass to the stewardess and Johnny hurried to get his ready.

They'd been given permission. He was so relieved.

They made their way aboard. Mr. Miyagi's ticket was for the middle seat, 32-B and Daniel sat at the window wanting to see Okinawa when they landed, to watch out the window and Johnny sat at the aisle stretching out his legs, trying to sleep.

Daniel curled up by the window reading facts about Okinawa, trying to find Tomi village on the map. Unable to.

After spending his whole life in California Johnny had now within the space of a few months been on two flights. Had flown to New York City and now he was crossing the ocean over to Okinawa. He almost couldn't believe it. Almost thought it was a dream.

He wondered what Okinawa would be like. All the reading he'd done. All the studying and cramming wouldn't prepare him. Just like it hadn't for New York. Eventually, after some gentle coaxing, Daniel closed his book and tried to go to sleep.

It was uncomfortable in the seats. Loud. But eventually, Johnny fell asleep. Too exhausted to stay awake.

Here if you need me

Daniel wanted to stay awake for every moment of their flight. Wanted to look out and enjoy every passing cloud and the moon in the sky over the ocean. He wanted to see everything there was to see and burn it into his mind.

He couldn't believe they were going, all three of them to Okinawa. He'd get to see where Mr. Miyagi grew up. Might get to see the man who taught Mr. Miyagi karate. His sensei's sensei. Like his sensei grandfather.

He liked that. But he was sick. And that...that was not good.

They might run into Sato and Yukie. Then what?

How would Mr. Miyagi handle that? He'd married and had a kid and lost both of them and then would see his childhood sweetheart with his childhood best friend. The pain in that brought all his excitement to a pause.

Daniel thought about that morning. That morning felt like another year.

Johnny showing up on his doorstep in that dress shirt, the sleeves still rolled up to his elbows from the day before when he'd been helping build the guest house.

Johnny had no care for his clothes. That expensive suit. He wondered if that happened when you were a rich kid. But then again, Johnny hadn't had much before. Had been homeless before Sid.

He had so many questions.

He kept coming back to being so tired from helping his mother pack, from packing himself. Trying to figure out what to pack, what to leave behind when he didn't have a clue how long he'd be gone. And then while he was setting up the coffee maker there'd been that knock at the door and he'd found Johnny.

He knew Johnny was coming to get him. He just hadn't expected him at that moment. And he'd been thrown. Disheveled Johnny was new. Hair messy and sticking up. Shirt wrinkled and unbuttoned. Had he slept in it? Had he not slept at all? Where had he gone? What had he done?

Mr. Miyagi said the guest house was for them.

What did that even mean?

What was happening in Encino Hills that Johnny also needed a place to crash?

He remembered the feeling of the shirt as he pulled Johnny in. It was high quality. Practically silk. He looked stunning even the next day in the same clothes. But the flight was going to be so damn long. He'd be miserable. But Daniel filed that image away with all the others. Just like had when he'd seen Johnny unbuttoning the cuffs of his shirt and rolling up his sleeves before grabbing the hammer again while they worked on the guest house.

He couldn't believe it had been yesterday. So much had changed.

Yesterday he'd graduated.

Yesterday his mother dropped the bombshell that she got a job in Fresno with an immediate start date and that they were leaving. Even though he'd graduated high school, even though he was 18, like she couldn't trust him alone in the apartment by himself for the summer. And for a moment it felt like his world was ending. He'd be away from everyone he cared about again.

Just him and his mother.

He didn't want to be uprooted again.

He wanted to take charge of his life, to stop letting people send him spinning in the wind, grabbing his hand and dragging him along. He wanted to choose his own destiny.

He wanted to go to Okinawa with Mr. Miyagi and he'd been prepared to empty out his savings. Ready to fight anyone who stood in his way, because no matter what happened, no matter what Mr. Miyagi had been there for him and he'd fight to stay by his side. He'd help him through what was bound to be an awful trip home. Painful and harsh in ways Daniel probably couldn't even fathom.

He'd almost fought Johnny. Hadn't listened. Had been too wound up. And then like a prince Johnny had offered a solution that wouldn't empty out his savings. That wouldn't upset Mr. Miyagi or his mother.

Instead, Johnny paid.

Daniel would make it up to him. Would figure it out eventually. He hadn't even asked. He just said he'd come with and Daniel was grateful.

He hadn't wanted to spend his summer without Johnny. It was why Fresno had been so horrible.

He'd argued with his mother about it for an hour after he graduated and Johnny had driven off. And she'd looked at him in that motherly way.

"Have you even told him? Have you even tried?"

Like she'd let him stay behind if he confessed and told Johnny how much he liked him. Like that would be the one thing that she'd let him stick around for. That bumming around with the guys wasn't enough. But love, she'd cave for love.

But he wanted to plan it out. If he was going to tell Johnny he wanted it to be sappily romantic. Like so obvious that Johnny couldn't brush it away. Would have to look at Daniel and see him and see all the work he put in and all that he meant. He had to be clear in the clearest possible way and a deadline of "we leave tomorrow" was not enough time. Putting that much pressure on it would crumble everything.

He'd thought he'd be cool about it. Give Johnny time to think it over, to realize how much he might like Daniel in his life, and maybe he'd be willing to give something new a try. Give Daniel a try. But rushing it and saying "I leave tomorrow" had felt like a bad move on all fronts.

And then Mr. Miyagi had the guest house set up. Or started. Ready to put him to work building his own space. A space not just for him but for Johnny too. And the world felt perfect, full of endless possibilities. With Johnny at his side and they'd get there eventually. Eventually, he'd tell Johnny and it'd be nice and perfect and romantic. The most romantic thing he'd done in his life. So romantic that Johnny would fall for him immediately.

He wasn't sure if that's how it worked.

He doubted it.

But he could dream.

And now-now Mr. Miyagi was going through a pain Daniel was intimate with, and he couldn't let that just happen. Now the three of them were together. Daniel would help Mr. Miyagi and pull strength by having Johnny close.

He'd be ready, ready for anything Okinawa threw at him. They'd get through it together. Though he was worried about what Mr. Miyagi had told him. How Sato knew the same karate because Mr. Miyagi wanted Sato to learn with him because he asked for an exception. A true feeling created from friendship only destroyed in the most horrendous way. That a fight in Okinawa meant to the death.

Not referee.

If Sato was still pissed about his honor from well over 40 years ago then either he or Mr. Miyagi would die. Which meant he and Johnny might be returning home after two funerals. And that hurt so badly. He wanted to talk to Johnny. But Johnny's eyes were shut just like Mr. Miyagi's and Mr. Miyagi was between them.

He couldn't reach over and hold his hand.

He hated the disconnect, even though he loved Mr. Miyagi like a father.

He hated that they were potentially heading into a situation where he'd have to beg Mr. Miyagi to run away from a fight. Where he might have to fight on Mr. Miyagi's behalf. He'd do that. Kings used to do that right? Send their squire into a battle on their behalf. He'd do it. He'd fight someone to the death for Mr. Miyagi and it'd be an honor.

He didn't think he'd win though. He'd fought tooth and nail against Johnny and barely won. And Johnny had been learning for what, five years or something like that? And whoever Sato picked would've been learning since they were a baby. Or he'd be fighting Sato himself. He curled his fingers against the armrest with a frown.

Maybe everything would be okay. Maybe Sato would let things go. Maybe Mr. Miyagi's father would get better and live to be 200 years old or something. He'd read that the people of Okinawa lived long lives. And then Mr. Miyagi would live to be almost the same age. And he'd get to keep both of them in his life for the entirety of it. And he could just enjoy Okinawa with Johnny and learn about it from Mr. Miyagi.

Oh, but things were never that easy. His life was never that easy. They were walking straight into the open maw of a shark. They'd be eaten alive and they'd know that that's the path they'd chosen.

He slept off and on the flight. Mostly looking out the window thinking. Getting the snacks and drinks when the flight attendants came by.

He was hopped up when they landed. Talking and asking Mr. Miyagi about a million things.

Johnny walking beside them taking it all in but not in the same way he did when they were in New York. Not just enjoying everything. He was walking in a way Daniel hadn't seen in a while. It was almost Cobra Kai Johnny. Shoulders squared back, eyes scanning ahead and around. As if he expected ninjas or something to drop out of the sky and attack them. But Daniel was clinging to the hope that it was water under the bridge.

After all, Mr. Miyagi had left. Sato had gotten the girl and the whole damn island. What more could he even want? He'd gotten everything Mr. Miyagi could give.

He hadn't even been able to find the village Mr. Miyagi had mentioned on the map. No matter how many times he tried. He was getting worried. What if it really was an awful terrible trap? What if the village was gone and Mr. Miyagi was walking into a showdown at noon? Death by karate? And Daniel was there to escort him? He couldn't handle it. He wanted to grab Johnny's hand but Mr. Miyagi had found his name on one of the signs outside and was talking to some guy in an open white shirt with a gold necklace who was being all polite and friendly and Mr. Miyagi was introducing them. Chozen.

Maybe things would be okay. Maybe everything would be fine. Then the guy tried to crush his hand and he felt Johnny rather than saw him stepping closer behind him. Making himself large. Looming.

Chozen let go of his hand, eyes raising to Johnny, leaving Daniels and taking him in an amused smile on his lips. "Nice to meet you. I hope your stay is a pleasant one."

Daniel slipped into the backseat.

Johnny nodded, "Thanks." before quickly following Daniel into the car, not shaking Chozen's hand.

Johnny was close suddenly and Daniel breathed in massaging his hand. He caught a whiff of a familiar shampoo. He'd nearly forgotten. Johnny had showered at his place. Smelled like him. It was dizzying for a moment, almost enough to make him forget that Chozen had tried to crush his hand. Tried to do that stupid macho thing where you squeeze someone else's hand till their hand was sore. It was so stupid. Was it a warning of danger or was it because there was a USA airbase on the island?

As they drove Daniel felt uneasy. Everything Mr. Miyagi asked set off alarm bells. They were apparently going the wrong way. How did they know they were going to be there? Maybe they were going to die. They were being driven off somewhere to be murdered in broad daylight.

Johnny patted his knee a couple of times. A little pat pat pat. Daniel looked at him. Looked at Mr. Miyagi. Both were looking on guard. Mr. Miyagi didn't seem too worried. But Johnny was tense, ready to go. Ready to fight or run Daniel wasn't sure.

They pulled into a dark building and Chozen's whole demeanor changed, ordering them out and calling for his uncle, throwing their bags out onto the ground.

Johnny stood next to him Chozen's uncle came out of a room, wearing sunglasses in the dark. Mr. Miyagi smiled warmly at his old friend. Then that smile fell, crushed by Sato's words and Daniel worried, looking between the two. Would a fight happen now? How dare he call Mr. Miyagi a coward. Mr. Miyagi was the bravest person Daniel knew.

He wondered if Johnny would snap. The tension in him was worse than Daniel had ever seen. His hands were in fists at his side. Daniel stepped next to him, letting the back of his hand brush against Johnny's, not taking it, trying to keep him calm. Keep himself calm. He needed to be grounded, knew Johnny probably needed it too.

Sato made his demand. His snide comments that Mr. Miyagi would die a coward and then got into the car they'd just exited and Chozen tossed his book on Okinawa onto the ground and drove off. Mr. Miyagi gathered his bag and walked off. Daniel grabbed his bag and followed, a million questions for him, hearing Johnny follow.

Flagging a taxi had seemed hopeless. But somehow Mr. Miyagi managed it. They'd been taken in the wrong direction from Tomi village which just felt unnecessarily cruel. Mr. Miyagi's father was also Sato's sensei. For a man all hung up on honor he should've let Mr. Miyagi go straight to see his father, Sato's sensei. He couldn't wrap his mind around it. The cruelty in such a small action. They'd been flying for over 16 hours. Mr. Miyagi had probably hoped to have been home by now, spending time with his father.

Daniel was pissed. He could tell Johnny was.

They made it to Tomi village at night. They dumped their stuff outside and took off their shoes and Mr. Miyagi knocked on a door, greeting a girl their age whose eyes took in Daniel and then flicked up to Johnny, and Daniel felt his heart sink.

He hadn't even thought about it. That Johnny's blonde hair and blue eyes in Okinawa was going to stand out. That his height and muscles would draw the attention of every girl they saw. Kumiko was cute.

She showed them the way to Mr. Miyagi's father and she translated what was said when Mr. Miyagi's father awoke. It was so beautiful, heart-crushing.

Mr. Miyagi and his father talked for a while. Kumiko translated from the doorway for them. He heard his name mentioned, heard Johnny's mentioned and Kumiko glanced at the two of them, taking them in again like she was puzzling a math problem or something.

"What'd he say?" Daniel asked again.

"You're his students...and..." she turned back to the room, listening intently brows furrowed. Mr. Miyagi's father was talking now and the conversation continued. She smiled softly. "You've had a long flight. Let me show you your room."

Daniel frowned but followed, he knew that couldn't haven't been all that had been said but he was too tired to puzzle over it for too long. She got bedding from a closet and unfolded it onto the floor. One big blanket and another on top and two pillows. Daniel stared at it for a moment then stared at Kumiko. The floor. They were going to sleep on the floor.

"It's traditional," Kumiko said looking at him.

"Like Mr. Miyagi's father," Johnny said.

Right. A sick old man was sleeping on the floor. So would they. He wondered if there was a bed in the whole place.

"Yes. Like Miyagi's father," Kumiko said with a smile.

Damnit. Why did Johnny have to be so stunningly beautiful?

"Thank you Kumiko," Johnny said bowing ever so slightly to her. "Is there a phone I could use?"

She smiled and bowed back. "Of course."

Daniel wanted to grumble. He was all tense and upset. She was going to come in and sweep Johnny off his feet before he got a chance to do anything. He wanted to complain about everything. But he wasn't going to. Johnny wasn't.

He sighed walking off to the small bathroom Kumiko had given them directions to and prepared for bed while Johnny followed Kumiko with a card in his hand towards the phone.

When he got back Johnny was unpacking his bag, listening to his Walkman, lips moving along with whatever he was listening to. He paused it when Daniel got back and Johnny left to shower. Daniel pulled back the blanket and laid on the floor looking up at the ceiling, rolling around trying to get comfortable, but too antsy to do so.

He was in Okinawa. In the house, Mr. Miyagi grew up in and he was unhappy. He was on the floor. Johnny was flirting with a girl he'd just met. He lifted his hands and pressed the heels of his palms against his eyes.

Johnny came back before he realized it. Hair wet and turning off the light and slipping into the bedding next to him.

"It's more comfortable than it looks," Johnny said quietly in the dark.

Daniel rolled over to look at him with a frown. There was a cushion to the bottom blanket. Almost like it was a comforter rather than just a regular blanket. It was thicker.

"You're okay with this?" Daniel asked.

"Better than the beach."

It took a moment and then Daniel pushed himself up. "How often?"

Johnny blinked at him in the dim lighting. "Huh?"

"How often do you sleep on the beach? Is that where you slept before you came to my place? Why didn't you just come to my place?"

"Oh, no I didn't sleep at the beach... yesterday night? Was that yesterday night? I stayed up at the college library. I didn't sleep. I sleep on the beach sometimes if Mom isn't home."

"Why didn't you sleep at home?"

Johnny shifted uncomfortably. "I wanted to study."

"Study what?"

Johnny rolled over getting his Walkman and set it carefully on the bedding between them. He placed the headphones ever so carefully over Daniel's ears and hit play. Daniel was confused for a moment until he heard a woman speaking Japanese.

Hello. Kon'nichiwa.

Thank you. Arigatōgozaimashita.

Daniel's eyes widened looking at Johnny. He'd been studying Japanese. Cramming for their trip while he'd been sleeping, trying to sleep. He wondered what else Johnny had done at the library.

He pushed the headphones off of his ears.

"I thought...I could be more helpful if something happened, if I could speak a little."

Helpful.

Daniel put his hand on Johnny's shoulder. "Just being here is helpful," Daniel whispered. That anger, that tension, the concern fled.

"I got a bunch of books," Johnny said pulling his backpack over.

It sounded heavy. He remembered trying to help Johnny carry it but Johnny waving him off. He thought it'd been because his precious Walkman was in there. But now, he realized it was because it was full of books.

Johnny set out books on Okinawa, culture, and history and guides to Japanese. There was even a little book on Okinawan.

Daniel picked it up curious.

"Wait, what's this?"

"The local language," Johnny said.

Daniel couldn't read it in the dim light but he frowned. "I thought they spoke Japanese."

"They do, but they also speak Okinawan. Their native language."

"Have you picked any up?"

"It's not sticking. Some of it's gendered." Johnny said with a sigh. "I keep repeating one of them to myself over and over and it's sticking but that's it."

"Which one?"

"The greeting is haisai. That's for guys. I think it's sticking because it's easier than all the different ones in Japanese."

"Haisai," Daniel repeated gently setting the library book back into the pile.

There was something he'd tried to remind himself, a thread he lost distracted by Johnny's attempts to study and make himself useful and then he caught it, grabbed hold of it, and whirled on Johnny. "You said you sleep on the beach. How often?"

Johnny sighed looking so uncomfortable. "It was before I got the Avanti usually. When things were bad. When Sid was drunk and Mom wasn't around. It was better to just not be around. And I like the beach. Sometimes like a week."

The look on Daniel's face must've said more than he'd managed to figure the words out to express because Johnny continued. "I had a sleeping bag," he said. "I mean I got a sleeping bag eventually. It really wasn't that bad. This is nice okay?"

He was upset that Daniel was prying, wouldn't let it go, was making a big deal of it. Daniel didn't want to let it go. But he was tired.

"Sato is a jerk," Daniel said softly.

"Yeah."

"Who does that?"

"Sato apparently."

"As a previous dog with a bone grudge holder, would you have, if I hadn't won, if you hadn't decided to apologize, if Kreese hadn't- would you've held a grudge for over 40 years?"

Johnny laughed. A snort of a laugh. Like it was the most ridiculous thing. "Only in a different universe. Maybe. How about you?"

Daniel hadn't thought he held grudges. Not like that. Not the way the cobras did. But then he remembered trying to get even every step of the way, sometimes when everything was uneven he tried to make it even when he had the upper hand. He wondered if Johnny hadn't apologized. If he hadn't come around, if he hadn't let Daniel get to know him... oh hell he'd still think Johnny was an utterly evil monster. Would've held onto that belief for forty years. Until he was, oh god, well over fifty.

Hating Johnny for that long sounded exhausting. He'd have had another life. But Johnny, with this level of hurt and pain, without anyone trying to help him? He'd be a mess. And Daniel wouldn't have know. They'd have hate each other, would clash every time they met until something happened. The wound would've festered until they'd both gotten so used to it that they'd never have noticed.

"I'd like to think I wouldn't, but I would," Daniel said softly after a while, laying down again next to Johnny. He didn't want to think about that possibility.

"Forty years is a long time. And for Sato to hold onto that, it's poison."

Johnny made a thoughtful sound. Partially like he agreed, partially like he was thinking about it.

"But Mr. Miyagi's Dad is Sato's sensei too. You'd think there'd be some respect there. Something, it just..." Daniel didn't know how to say how pissed he was about the whole situation.

Johnny held out his hand. Daniel stared at it then remembered what Johnny had said on the Wonder Wheel at Coney Island and sighed taking his hand.

"It's disrespectful," Johnny said softly.

Daniel didn't know what he'd do if he'd been in Okinawa alone. Didn't want to think about it. He kind of hated that it worked. A calming breath and Johnny holding his hand.

Was this how it was going to be? He'd just hold his hand out when he was pissed and Johnny would take it and it'd calm him down?

The thought was hilarious. Hold my hand instead of holding me back when I want to fight.

"Who'd you call?" Daniel asked.

"Bobby. He's going to tell your Mom you made it here okay."

Daniel hadn't even thought about his mother. He put his other hand on his face. He wasn't focused. He felt like he was being pulled every which way. Battered along.

"It's okay," Johnny said.

Daniel looked at him.

"Focus on what you need to. I'll try and take care of everything else."

Daniel felt like when he'd been punched in the gut. Air gone. But not in a painful way. The urge to kiss Johnny came over like a tidal wave. He lost focus. It scrambled any coherent thoughts he had. He squeezed Johnny's hand gently.

He remembered the panic he'd felt when Mr. Miyagi got his letter when he learned he was leaving and how lost he'd felt and how Johnny had laid out a plan, cleared out a path. Got him here.

Was that him trying to be useful? Helpful? His learning Japanese, or trying, staying up all night in the library was for him and Mr. Miyagi.

To assist? Because he knew? Knew how hard this was to be in Japan worried he might lose Mr. Miyagi but also not wanting him to be alone in the face of tragedy.

He couldn't remember who'd said it, he felt like someone had told him, whispered in his ear how loyal Johnny was to his friends. Maybe it'd been in one of Dutch's long conversations. Something about how Johnny showed up when you needed him if you were his friend and put in the work.

He remembered something about Dutch saying if Johnny had been a girl he'd have married her? Him? Remembered the quiet things the guys said about Johnny.

Was this that? A strong bond of friendship that Johnny would be steady and helpful and supportive when the world felt like it was crumbling beneath your feet? Was it because he was used to navigating through all the awful things life threw at a person? So he could walk that road easily and hold Daniel's hands, guiding him from one safe spot to another?

When Daniel's dad had died, when he was dying he'd felt so alone in the world. His friends had pulled away. Louie had been around, awkwardly trying to cheer him up. But it'd just been him and family, a family that was hurting at the same time. Would his life have been better if he'd found and befriended Johnny earlier?

"Daniel?"

Daniel blinked back tears and let out a shaky breath. "Thanks," he whispered.

"Try to sleep. Wake me up if you can't. If you need something."

Daniel nearly laughed. Johnny was the one who usually didn't sleep. Hadn't he just admitted to not sleeping before they'd left? Like he'd stayed up all night studying? But he was so sincere.

"Okay," Daniel said. "Good night."

"Good night."

Daniel breathed deeply, he didn't let go of Johnny's hand and Johnny didn't pull his hand away. He was there. Breathing softly next to him, falling asleep at his side. It'd be okay. Daniel would be there for Mr. Miyagi and Johnny would be there for the both of them. Solid and sturdy. Ready to fight if need be. Ready to help if need be.

He thought Johnny fighting would terrify him. Upset him, but it was comforting in a weird way. To know there was somewhere there prepared to have his back if things went south, which it looked like they might. With the way, Chozen had zeroed in on him straight off the plane.

He had someone to listen and go over the confusing mess they'd found themselves in. Someone to take care of the small details he wasn't thinking of that were actually huge. Like telling his mother he'd made it safely in Okinawa. She'd understand. But it blinded him that he'd forgotten. That it'd slipped his mind.

He glanced over. Johnny was fast asleep. The exhaustion from not sleeping and sleeping fitfully on the flight knocking him out.

Daniel lifted their hands up gently watching Johnny, studying for any change, to see if he'd wake. He was out like a light, a log, whatever, he wasn't going to wake up.

Daniel brought Johnny's hand up to his lips and kissed it ever so gently.

He'd tell him, one day, when this was over. When the ground beneath his feet was sturdy. He'd plan it out and it'd be the most romantic thing he'd ever done in his whole life. And he'd be there for Johnny when he needed him, the way Johnny was there for him now.

He held Johnny's hand gently to his chest, feeling the comforting weight of it.

He'd try to make sure they had some fun on this trip. Some bright spots in between the pain he felt was surely to come. Because Daniel had willingly given up his summer for this. Was prepared to stay as long as need be. It was better than Fresno. But Johnny could've been with the guys. Could've been doing whatever. But he was here. Sacrificing his final summer before his friends went to college. The last time they'd be all free together and in the same place, where their lives were aligned and instead he was in Okinawa with Daniel and Mr. Miyagi.

He brought his other hand to his chest, hugging Johnny's arm.

He'd figure out how to make it up to him.

Some day.

Somehow.

Mirrored

Johnny woke up at 7 am too hot. The blankets were gone, kicked off at some point in the night.

Daniel was hugging Johnny's arm to his chest, having pulled Johnny close in his sleep, curling up against him. Practically spooning again. It was just too damn hot to be close to anyone. He pushed himself back a little hoping just a little distance would help but the air was heavy, humid.

He didn't want to wake Daniel but he needed to extricate himself. Needed to start moving his stiff limbs.

He managed to get part of his hand arm free. He could feel Daniel's pulse beneath his hand, the steady thrum of his heart, like a drum. He moved slow and then his arm was free and he was sitting up next to Daniel.

Maybe he'd get them some water. Something cold with ice. He wondered if they even had that. They were close to a US airbase. You'd think they'd have all sorts of stuff. But Johnny felt like maybe they wouldn't. Had a bad feeling about the airbase, he expected a lot of guys like Kreese to be around.

He got up carefully and quietly pushed the door open, stretching and trying to work out the kinks in his neck and shoulders.

Maybe he could get breakfast going. Make sure they ate. Get the day started.

He found Yukie and stopped.

"Haisai Yukie-san," Johnny tried.

Her eyes went wide and she grinned. "You're Johnny?"

Johnny nodded. Wracking his brains for the Japanese he'd been trying to learn.

"Mizu?" He hoped that was right. Water.

She laughed, delighted in the grey morning light, and nodded. She was holding a basket of laundry to do and set it down gently hooking her arm through Johnny's and leading him through the sprawl of the house.

"Sleep well?" she asked opening the fridge and pulling out a container of water that she poured into a glass and handed him.

"Yes...arigato."

He frowned wondering if that was right. Gato in Spanish was cat. Would the little amount of Spanish he knew get mixed up with the Japanese. But she nodded like she understood.

"Miyagi sensei say you like to help. Want to help make breakfast?" Yukie asked, rolling up her sleeves and tying them up with white strips of fabric.

"Sure, yes," Johnny said setting the water down after a sip.

She smiled at him.

"Make Asa soup and..." she looked at him thoughtfully. "mmm donut?"

"I'm um not a good cook, but I'll help," Johnny said washing his hands and drying them off.

Yukie gathered the ingredients she needed and set them out. She opened up a container and dumped something into a bowl of cold water.

"Asa," she said with a smile.

She handed over a block of tofu to Johnny. She made a chopping motion with her hand. "Small," she said holding her fingers together to show how small while she went to work over a pot with little flakes.

Johnny took the knife and carefully chopped the tofu up into small cubes.

"Hai," she said with a grin taking the tofu and the asa and adding it to the soup, adding a few more things, and then letting it sit.

She cleaned some rice to cook and then turned back to Johnny. She got out flour and baking powder and brown sugar and an egg. She measured everything out and set it out. She pointed at the flour and baking powder "Mix," she said and then pointed at the sifter.

Johnny got that, dumping them together, mixing the powders together, and then setting them over a bowl and sifting until the result was a mountain of fine powder. He followed her instructions and miming, adding egg and sugar and oil and creating little balls that he placed into the fridge when she told him to.

She was making something else, balancing her time between the two. Watching him make the balls while she made something savory. A type of rice dish with stuff mixed in. Something green and leafy. Vegetables. Some meat. She worked fast, sure of herself in the kitchen. No recipe card in sight.

She tapped him gently and pointed to the kettle. He filled it with water and set it on one of the unused stovetops to let it come to a boil.

"Five," she said motioning towards a cabinet and Johnny got out cups, carefully setting them out. "Tea, for three. Coffee for you and Daniel?"

"Uh, yeah," Johnny said.

He got out the coffee, an instant powder, and carefully spooned some into the bottoms of two of the cups. He got out the green powder she was pointing to and spooned it to the bottom of the other three cups, stopping when she told him to. She handed him a wooden whisk when the kettle whistled and showed him the movement with her wrist, a flick. He went to work, pouring hot water into the cups and whisking the way she'd told him to until it was at foamy, working his way through. Until the tea was a deep green and well mixed.

The coffee he mixed with a spoon, pouring sugar into both of their glasses and a little bit of cream.

Then the oil she'd poured was hot and she tested it with a little flour. "Get the dough," she told him setting a bowl of water down next to the pan. "Wet fingers so it doesn't stick."

Johnny did as she told him and then one by one dumped them in. They floated, bobbing around in the oil, flipping themselves over.

"Sata Andagi," she said with a smile.

"Ah, Johnny-san, good morning," Mr. Miyagi said as he came into the room. "Helping Yukie?"

"Yes, Mr. Miyagi," Johnny said.

Mr. Miyagi smiled at him and talked to Yukie in Japanese. Too fast for Johnny to even try and pick a word out. He caught nothing, focusing on the donuts with the chopsticks Yukie had given him.

Mr. Miyagi sat down at the table on the floor, on a cushion and Yukie set out his breakfast for him, his tea, smiling that bittersweet smile Johnny had noticed the day before. Full of love and heartbreak. 40 years of unrequited requited love.

It made Johnny's heartache.

What life would Mr. Miyagi have led if he'd done as Daniel had suggested? Taken Yukie and run to Alaska or somewhere else. He couldn't imagine Mr. Miyagi in Alaska, it was too cold. But maybe somewhere else warm. Would Yukie have met the same fate as Mrs. Miyagi? Or would they have gone somewhere else, outrun the war? Would that have meant that Mr. Miyagi's father would've gotten sick with no one to tell Mr. Miyagi because no one would've known where he'd gone?

There might not have been a Mr. Miyagi in the valley. Which meant no one to stop him from hurting Daniel. Would he have still been a cobra then? Would he have brutalized Daniel until he was broken beyond repair? Would he have still been under Kreese's thumb, a mini soldier his entire life?

He wanted to think he wouldn't have. Wanted to hope that he was a better person, even without Mr. Miyagi's gentle interventions. But he didn't trust that he was.

The world would've been a much darker place without Mr. Miyagi, without him in Johnny's life. There'd be no garden. No bonsai waiting for him to return. Just the never-ending ping pong between Sid and Kreese until he warped into a monster with no return, until he broke.

He felt bad, but the course Mr. Miyagi's life took, all the pain and heartbreak, had brought him into Johnny's life, had changed it for the better and it felt selfish to be grateful for it. Because of Mr. Miyagi he was alive, healing, able to spend time with Daniel, and was learning kata.

He owed the man so much.

He'd thought he owed Kreese. Thought he owed Sid. Thought they'd held out hands to him. That Sid had taken him and his mother in from the cold, though LA wasn't cold. But had given them food and shelter and a place to lay their heads.

He'd been so damn grateful that everything Sid said carved its way into his heart. Became a reality. That he was useless. That he was worthless. That he was in the way. That he shouldn't be seen or heard. That it was his fault his mother had struggled. If she hadn't had him then she would've been better off. That he deserved every beating he got. Because people knew. Knew from looking at him how worthless he was.

It seemed like a reality, when no one at school wanted to be around him, that Sid was doing him a favor. Telling him the harsh truths of reality. That way his hand would come down on Johnny's shoulder, all smiles like he was comforting him, like this was just the way of life.

Some people had things that made them useful. Sid had money and power. His mother had her looks. Johnny had nothing.

And Kreese. Kreese had taken that and molded him like clay. If Johnny was nothing Kreese would make him into something. Something powerful. A machine to be reckoned with.

It gave Sid pause. Made him change his tactics. And for a moment when Ali said yes to dating him, he felt like he'd finally found that spot for himself. He could make himself useful, a worthwhile person through her. He could be a doctor's husband. He could smile and charm at her side. Trophy husband sounded silly, but it was all Sid expected of him. The one time Johnny almost hit him, telling him he'd be just like his mother. But Sid had sensed the danger and had backed off that time. Walking away with laughter and booze on his breath.

His mother deserved better. But Johnny didn't know how to help her. Couldn't even help himself. Drowning. Like the time Sid had seen him sitting by the pool and kicked him in. Before he'd learned to swim. Having only learned to stand in the waves. Early on. Sid had crouched at the side of the water.

"Sink or swim, gotta learn yourself."

So he had.

Anytime Sid pointed out a flaw he tried to fix it. Learned how to swim at some free kids swimming classes. Then learned to surf. Then was told he was stupid so he spent all his free time at the library. Was told that it was pathetic he couldn't play music like the other kids in the country club so he learned guitar, the drums, whatever he could. And Sid broke everything he could. Every time Johnny started to get the hang of it.

And now he'd graduated, he didn't think he'd live long enough to do so.

Sid seemed surprised about it as well. Just saying a huh when his mother told him that the ceremony was coming up at an awkward dinner.

Johnny plucked the donuts from the oil and set them out on the paper towels Yukie had set out.

Not only had he graduated, he'd made friends. He'd found a new sensei. He'd left California. He'd left the USA.

He was carving his own path. He'd been thrown violently from the one he'd been on but he'd gotten up, dusted himself off, and was going his own way. Away from the path Kreese had set him on, the one Sid expected him to take. The grass was tall on his path. He didn't know where it was going. Couldn't see. He had to figure it out, but it was freeing. He could breathe better. Felt lighter.

Johnny set some of the donuts in a bowl and on the table and Mr. Miyagi smiled at him. Like he was good. Like he wasn't replaceable like Sid and Kreese had told him. Like if he slipped up and fell there wasn't another person waiting in the wings to take his place. That there was enough room for him to be there and maybe Mr. Miyagi was glad he was there. He'd do everything he could to live up to that, to be worthy of Mr. Miyagi's approval.

Mr. Miyagi and Yukie finished eating, talking warmly to one another, and then left. Yukie to work on laundry and Mr. Miyagi to go to the family dojo.

Johnny worked on putting breakfast together for Daniel and himself. Dropping some ice in their coffee in the hopes it'd be a little cooler and then walking his way down towards the room they'd stayed in.

Daniel was up, talking to Yukie who told him where Mr. Miyagi was.

Johnny wondered if he should turn around and take the tray back to the kitchen. It felt silly now. Daniel's eyes met his, then took in the tray and smiled, walking over.

"Mornin'," Daniel said, "What'cha got there?"

"Breakfast," Johnny said. "I was gonna..." It felt weird to explain he'd planned to bring it to Daniel so he didn't have to get up yet. Could take his time. Give him another moment to breathe before preparing for the day, for whatever was to come. "Where do you want to eat?"

Daniel looked around. They were on a wooden platform that overlooked the garden, like a porch but it connected all the rooms. An outdoor hallway.

He motioned towards the floor and sat down dangling his legs off the edge holding out his arms up towards Johnny, offering to take the tray and place it down between them so Johnny could sit next to him.

"How'd you sleep?" Daniel asked as Johnny took his spot at his side, the tray between them.

"Okay, until I got too hot. You?"

"Took a bit to fall asleep but was completely out until maybe twenty minutes ago," Daniel said picking up the cup of coffee and breathing it in with a sigh and his eyes closed. He was wearing a nice pink shirt that he'd left partially unbuttoned.

Johnny wondered if he should apologize for not being there when he'd awoken. He'd gone to bed telling Daniel he'd be there and then wasn't when he awoke.

"Hey, so what is all of this?" Daniel asked when he batted his eyes open again, sipping his iced coffee.

"Asa soup," Johnny said pointing. "Okinawan donuts, and some rice mix thing that Yukie made. We uh, I honestly don't know."

Daniel studied him for a moment and laughed. "You don't know what any of this is do you?"

"I don't. I haven't a clue what asa is. I don't know what anything in the rice is. I just know the donuts because I made them and it was all familiar things though the sugar was kind of different. She just sort of showed me what to do."

"You made the donuts?" Daniel asked, surprised but seemingly pleasantly so.

"I tried. They kind of do all the work for you. Just roll over so they fry evenly," Johnny said.

It'd been fascinating to watch. As one by one, they'd just slowly roll over like they were trying to get an even tan. No work from him was needed.

Johnny picked up the bowl he had made for himself of the rice dish and ate while Daniel tried the soup.

"I think," Daniel said thoughtfully. "That asa must be a type of seaweed. It's similar to what Mr. Miyagi makes sometimes."

"Really?" Johnny asked swapping over to the bowl of soup.

He tried it. It really did taste like seaweed. Like the soup Mr. Miyagi made. Which made sense in retrospect. Mr. Miyagi was from Okinawa.

Daniel's brows furrowed as he tried the rice dish, working his way through, puzzled, trying to figure out what the flavors were, rooting around the rice to look at what had been added to it.

"There are vegetables and meat, I can tell what some of them are, but there's something else that I just can't place."

Johnny looked at him amused. "You're actually stumped?"

"I am."

"Unbelievable. Never thought I'd live to see the day where Daniel LaRusso was at a loss when it came to food."

Daniel's lips quirked into an amused smile. "It's gotta be something I've never had before. You'll see. We'll ask Mr. MIyagi and then I'll know it, I'll never lose it again."

"This might happen a lot, Dorothy. We're not in Kansas anymore."

"Clearly, Toto," Daniel said with a laugh. He popped one of the donuts in his mouth and looked at Johnny surprised. "Huh, not what I was expecting."

Johnny frowned grabbing one to try it. It was good, crunchy on the outside, and like a sweet bread on the inside.

"It's good," Daniel said quickly. "It's just not what I think of when I think donut."

"Yukie called it something else....um...hold on...what was it? Sata Andagi," he said.

Daniel nodded, thoughtful and quiet. Normally Johnny panicked when he got quiet. Worried. But this. All of this was so much that Johnny understood.

They finished their breakfast and he took it to clean up promising to meet Daniel and Mr. Miyagi in the dojo.

He arrived in the dojo in time to hear Mr. Miyagi's rules of the dojo. For defense only. Rule #2, learn rule #1.

He laughed, softly. So simple. It fit well with Mr. Miyagi. The opposite of Kreese's. All about striking and fighting. But Mr. Miyagi's wasn't a fighting karate. Defense and calming. He showed them a little toy and then promised to show them around the town.

It was so different from anywhere Johnny had ever been. Everyone was working outside. Going about their lives all so close together.

He paused outside of the Shinto shrine listening to Mr. Miyagi chuckle as he talked about the man playing an instrument Johnny had never seen before, sitting on the steps, children sitting around watching him.

He smiled at them, calling out a greeting.

They watched Kumiko teach other kids an o-bon dance that Daniel explained from his readings. Johnny had run into it too. He watched the steps. The way they were all holding hands and moving. A simple routine.

And then she was looking over and smiling at them, at Daniel.

Oh.

A black car arrived and Chozen stepped out looking pleased as punch, a predator, ready for a fight, itching for one as Sato followed. As Sato laid out his challenge and Mr. Miyagi batted it away. Until cries echo through the streets. Cries for Mr Miyagi. Cries from Yukie, running after them, breathless taking both men in, pleading for them to come with her and like that they're all running back, Kumiko in tow back to the house, like this was it. The end, like they had to beat out the clock before the last bits of sand fell loose and free.

Johnny watched as the elderly Miyagi took Mr. Miyagi's hand and Sato's and brought them together over him, a final request. So clear, so loud that Johnny felt almost like his ears were ringing. But when he died Sato yanked his hand away and Johnny frowned, what Sato was saying didn't match with his actions.

His respect for his teacher didn't outweigh his honor. His honor seemed to be the only thing he cared about. The only thing that mattered to him.

Johnny couldn't figure it out and Yukie started sobbing and the sound was heart-wrenching.

Johnny looked at Daniel who looked thrown, lost, in so much pain and struggling to stay tall.

Mr. Miyagi's head was bowed as Sato brushed past them all.

Johnny reached out to Daniel, taking his hand in his.

He remembered what Daniel had said.

He'd been holding his Dad's hand when he died. The way Mr. Miyagi had been. Holding his hand and Sato's.

He wanted to reach out and pull Daniel into his arms. But he knew Daniel was trying to figure out how to comfort Mr. Miyagi. So he just held his hand and waited. Waited to be told what to do. To see what he could do. How to help.

Yukie would probably need help. They'd have a funeral. Some sort of ceremony.

He remembered when Sid's dad died. Wearing black, people trying to give him comfort and how it pissed Sid off more. Because it was supposed to be about Sid. Not about Johnny. Johnny and his step-grandfather didn't have a relationship. But people assumed because Sid had kept up appearances. Made it seem to anyone looking in that Johnny was a part of his family, even though he wasn't.

He'd gotten a black eye and a busted lip when no one was looking. Had thought he'd still make it to Ali's. But there was no hiding his face. The amount of alcohol Sid was drinking had spelled so much danger that Johnny fled.

Sid had started breaking his own shit. He never broke his own shit. Priceless vases shattered. Priceless paintings were ripped up. The air was heavy and thick. He ran away before that storm found him again.

Before it struck like lightning.

His mother had been with Sid's mother, helping her through it all and that left Sid without any control. No restraint. And Johnny wondered if his mother had been home if it'd have been worse. Or better. If he'd have been safer.

They slowly filtered out of the room to give Mr. Miyagi the space he needed and Johnny pulled Daniel into his arms without a thought, once they were out of sight.

There was a tremor in there. Tears on his shirt. Daniel was quiet, hiding his face.

Johnny rubbed his back.

"It's okay, cry all you need. I'll be here as long as you need, as long as you wantm" Johnny said softly, whispering.

Life was unfair. Johnny knew this. Had known this for so long.

He was thinking that if Sato hadn't been such a dick that Mr. Miyagi could've had more time with his father. Could've spent more time with him. He'd had less than 24 hours to be with his father to try and cover 40 years of missing one another, of separation but love. To catch up and heal all the pain. And they would've had more time if Sato hadn't played his games. If Sato hadn't been a dick from the start about his honor. If he'd reached out at some point in the long years and said hey it's fine, come home sensei/your dad misses you. But he was stubborn.

Johnny knew stubborn. But he liked to think the him that existed now wouldn't go that far. Would always know some things were off-limits. That he had his own code that'd stop him from making such horrible mistakes. From being to blind to see it.

He was so angry on Mr. Miyagi's behalf, at how stubborn Sato was being.

He didn't understand how Daniel was holding up, what was holding him together.

When he gathered himself enough, pulled himself back together from where he was coming apart, Daniel pulled away.

Kumiko told them of the plan. To dress nicely in black or white and to pay their respects by the river.

Daniel dug around in his bag in their room frantically trying to find something nice ranting that he hadn't packed for this. He hadn't thought. He'd hoped that it wouldn't happen. And all he had was a white button-up and black pants.

Johnny put his hand on Daniel's shoulder.

"That'll be fine. I'm sure," Johnny whispered.

Daniel leaned back against him hands coming up to his eyes again.

"I don't have the right shoes. Just brown ones. It doesn't fit. It doesn't match."

"The important thing is that you're there," Johnny said.

Daniel looked up at him, those glassy brown eyes full of tears. "Really?"

"Yeah. As long as your by Mr. Miyagi, that's what's important."

Johnny hadn't packed a suit either. But he'd packed a black button-up. Black pants. His shoes weren't much better. But it'd be fine. He just had to be there. For the both of them. They changed and walked to the river carrying lanterns. Daniel walked with his shoulders back and head held up, but watching Mr. Miyagi, ready to be there if he needed.

Sato was with them and Johnny wanted to yell at him. To ask why? Why was he showing respect if he didn't care enough to uphold that final request? The casual cruelty of it all made his blood boil.

The sky was heavy with rain. With storms in the air and Johnny just wanted it to rain. Wanted to stand in the rain, let it pummel him. Maybe it'd relieve some of the tension in the air. The pain. He stood behind Daniel and Daniel would lean back against him as they waited by the river, as people placed their lanterns in the water, watching them float downstream, bobbing in the water.

They trudged home quietly and it waited until they got home to rain.

Johnny stood out in it.

Long after Daniel and the others had gone inside to have tea.

He stood amongst the bonsai and breathed, practicing kata in the rain.

Daniel had said he was okay. Had patted him on the chest walking after Mr. Miyagi and Yukie, to sit with them and listen, to be there.

Johnny felt like he was in the way. It was better to be outside. Close but not in the way.

He breathed in and out, practicing the movements Mr. Miyagi had taught him. He needed to calm down. It wasn't about him. The whole trip was about Mr. Miyagi. And in turn on a smaller note Daniel. Because it pissed him off didn't mean he needed to act. He had to get himself under control before he lost it, socked Sato in the face, and ruined everything.

Disappointed Mr. Miyagi, scared off Daniel.

A tiger can't change his stripes Ali said in his head.

But he wanted to desperately.

He wanted to show that when things got rough he didn't immediately fall back on Cobra Kai.

He stepped through the grass and mud, not caring for his shoes. Not caring for the silk shirt. All of it was bought with Sid's money and if it was ruined so be it. He didn't care. Nothing Sid gave him was worth anything.

The Avanti he'd worked for. Hard. He'd worked in his free time at the country club running around for people to get their golf balls, lugging stupid golf clubs across the green. A job Sid thought was useful for a couple of summers as part-time because it made him look good. Like he was teaching Johnny self-sufficiency and self-reliance.

It was his, he'd picked it out himself. His Mom had gone with him to get it, hand on his shoulder, so happy and bright, helping supply the rest of the cash. Sid's money, but not his money. A gift from Sid but not really. He claimed it was his gift. But it was all his Mom.

Everything else, Johnny didn't care. The fancy clothes, the fancy shoes, it was all for show. It was all just a costume Johnny wore, for a role he'd been cast in that he'd never asked for. Never wanted.

A fake prince in a fake castle, playing pretend. A show for the rest of the world that everything was good and nice and perfect and that sometimes Cinderella gets the prince and gets to live happily ever after, unless she has a son. Then suddenly it's all different and fractured and fairy tales aren't real and the boy is just lost and twisted up and forced to bend into cookie cutters not meant for him. Like the stepsisters in the original story trying to marry the prince with their bloody feet because they'd been told to alter themselves to continue the façade until it was obvious to everyone that it was a lie.

Stupid Altar of Honor

Daniel listened to Mr. Miyagi and Yukie talk, sitting with Kumiko. He tried to think of ways he could help. Ways to help ease that pain. But he didn't know what to say. He was too stunned still. So he listened until Kumiko tapped him with a soft whisper that they should let the two of them talk alone. They walked along the wooden boards as it rained. In quiet silence, unsure what to say.

Kumiko hovered at the edge of his room looking in for a moment uncomfortable before she noticed the books Johnny and Daniel had brought and it broke whatever kept her at the doorway. She sat on the floor next to the books flipping through them. Daniel followed taking a seat.

"Ah! They have photos of the O-bon festival!" she said, a smile breaking out in delight. She picked it up to show him, before bowing her head flipping through the other pages, from one to another, studying them curiously. Then she set the book down and looked around at the other books. Something caught her eye and she lunged forward grabbing it out of Daniel's bag.

"We don't have this one," she said.

Daniel caught on too slow what she'd grabbed, the magazine he'd packed. He tried to reach for it.

"Kumiko, it's not that interesting, really," Daniel said feeling himself redden.

His heart pounding in his chest. If she opened it he was screwed. He didn't have a good excuse.

She laughed holding it out of reach, turning to look at it closer.

"Wow, it looks old. Not interesting?" she asked studying him amused.

Johnny could be anywhere, be back any second. He didn't want him to find out.

She opened it and it fell on the page it always did because it was the page that Daniel always opened it to.

Kumiko's eyes widened looking up at Daniel in surprise. "Miyagi sensei didn't say Johnny was famous." Her voice was hushed, shocked.

"That's not, it's not like that," Daniel whispered, voice tight. "He just models for it."

He realized belatedly he should've passed it off as if it was Johnny's as if that was his bag and not Daniel's. He couldn't believe this was happening.

Kumiko turned the page and she turned bright red. Johnny shirtless, flexing, all muscle. She flipped past it in a hurry with a little shocked sound. "I didn't know they printed this sort of thing," she breathed. Then she let out an awkward laugh. "Maybe it's why I haven't seen it before."

She looked down at the page, one of the ones past Johnny's photos. She looked up at Daniel. "The other pages look new," she said then flicked back to where the magazine opened. "Favorite page?" she asked.

Daniel felt himself turn bright red. He didn't have a good excuse. He thought if he used it for a portfolio like Tommy's mother said, he'd say it was because it was partially his work. But it sounded flimsy. It'd sound worse based on how Kumiko was looking at him. If he said he was the one that made Johnny look like that he wondered if she'd even believe him. Believe that he was the reason Johnny glistened in one photo, why he was dripping in another. Why his hair was laying that exact way.

He didn't know why he'd even brought the magazine. Before he left it'd been chaos. Absolute madness with his mother trying to pack for work and him trying to pack for Okinawa, unsure of how long they'd be gone. A couple of days? The whole summer? They kept tripping over one another. A flurry of movement and panic.

Did they get everything?

Which one of them needed a passport? What was needed for a passport?

Did his mother have her license? All the info she needed for her new job?

Did he need food?

What were they going to do with all the eggs in the fridge with both of them gone? The milk?

What did one pack to go with their sensei home, to stand by his side while he tried to spend time with his sick father?

He'd hoped everything would be okay. That it wouldn't be the same as what had happened to him.

He'd never been out of the country before. He'd grabbed the magazine because it was...well it felt silly after he'd gotten to Okinawa with the actual Johnny.

Kumiko looked closer at the page, the blush on her face receding. Reading the text. "Why does this say Johnny's name is Ken?"

"I think it's a joke," Daniel said. "Like the doll, Barbie? Who does everything, like she's an astronaut and a vet and a teacher and what not? Well her boyfriend is Ken and like they have Johnny playing like all these different parts, like in the past issues he's a surfer and playing guitar and skating and doing karate and all this other stuff."

Oh, he should've shut up. He shouldn't have said that. Shouldn't have mentioned the back issues. That he'd seen them. He sounded like a creep.

"Er, I think that's what they're going for but I don't have a confirmation on that yet."

She studied his face. "You like him?"

Daniel blushed darkly.

Oh god, what if Johnny was nearby? Where the hell was he? What was he doing? He didn't want Johnny to find out this way.

His heart pounded in his ears. He wondered if someone could faint just from someone reading you like an open book, so clearly that you couldn't hide.

She made it sound so simple.

His mouth had gone dry. He was going to die of embarrassment. Why did he hate himself so much? Why'd he bring the magazine with him? Of course he got caught.

"Have you told him yet?" Kumiko asked, peaking carefully at one of the other pages, blushing, and closing it again.

"No. Listen Kumiko, I will, eventually, but right now." He took a deep shaky breath. "Right now Mr. Miyagi's the most important thing. If he needs anything I want to be focused. And I don't think right now's a good time to tell him."

He tried to be serious to get his point across.

Kumiko nodded, clearly getting the severity of it.

"Daniel, you know, O-bon quite romantic. We'll have it soon. If you're still here. You get to dress up, dance together."

Daniel thought about it. He wanted to dance with Johnny so badly. Wanted to pull Johnny flush to him, show off the dancing he knew. He remembered the kids dancing, hands held, moving in a circle. It wouldn't be the same, but it might be nice. Might be romantic. Maybe if things worked out in a nice way. Maybe if Sato wasn't hovering like a dark cloud then he could give it a try. Could dance with Johnny and then tell him. He wasn't sure if it'd be as romantic as he wanted it to be, but he could try it.

"Maybe," Daniel said. "If we're here that long, maybe I'll give it a try."

Kumiko smiled at him and then stood wishing him a good evening and leaving the room.

Daniel lunged for his magazine that she'd left setting out on the tatami mat and quickly moved it to the bottom of the bag, burying it under clothes and everything else he'd brought, heart pounding in his chest.

He was worried about when Johnny would arrive, if he'd see.

He wondered if Johnny was okay. He got up and ready for bed then curled up in their bed and waited.

Too late for comfort he heard a knock and Daniel looked out. Johnny was hovering in the door, not coming in, soaking wet. His black shirt was open and water was streaming down his chest. He watched it, the rivulets running down his neck, down his collarbone, down his chest, and disappearing behind his shirt. His clothing clung to every inch of his chest it tried to cover. He could make out everything. It was just a shirt, he'd seen Johnny without one, but dripping wet in his nice clothes was new.

Johnny was running his hand through his hair, pushing wet hair away from his forehead and face and Daniel's mind went blank. He didn't know where to look, he wanted to look everywhere.

"Could you slide me my bag?"

It didn't register at first. It was like there was a disconnect. All coherent thought had left, fled, to watch Johnny lean against the frame, dripping wet.

Daniel sat up and turned slowly to find Johnny's bag, struggling to focus, and slide it across the room towards him wordlessly.

Johnny caught it and headed off in the direction of the bathroom.

Daniel felt laughter bubble up, warmth blossom in his chest as he fell back on the bedding. He was already soaking wet and he was still going to shower. It seemed so silly. He felt like he understood it but Johnny was essentially just swapping water for water and it was kind of delightful. He covered his face in his hands. Trying to settle the buzzing of his skin. Breathing.

He'd felt so bad all day. And Johnny just had to show up dripping wet and it felt like maybe everything would be okay.

What even had he been doing? Had he fallen in the water? Or had he stayed out in the rain the whole time? Was it because LA didn't get a lot of rain? Was Johnny like some plant living through a drought? He had to soak it all up?

Either way part of Daniel worried Johnny would get sick. Wanted to chide him for not taking care of himself.

But the look of him, blue eyes completely unaware of the effect he had on Daniel. Daniel taking in every single spot that shirt clung to, burning it in his memory was almost too much to handle. He wanted to pull him into the room, help him out of his wet clothes, follow the streams of water with his tongue.

He kind of got why Johnny hadn't come in, why he'd hovered. The tatami mats didn't look easy to clean. He probably didn't want to get them soaking wet.

Daniel wouldn't have even thought about it, would've thrown his wet clothes onto the floor without hesitation.

He really needed to get ahold of himself. He tried the breathing exercises Mr. Miyagi taught him. Moving his hands as he did so.

He'd missed Johnny. Was just delighted to see him again. Relieved.

He remembered leaning back against him while everyone put their lanterns in the water, pulling support from him. Feeling close to him, waiting in case Mr. Miyagi needed him, unnerved by how at ease Sato looked. The way Johnny had held him while he cried. Like he knew how hard this was for him and not just Mr. Miyagi.

Johnny returned after a while without his wet clothes and in dry pajamas. His hair was wet but no longer dripping and Daniel kind of missed it.

He took his spot next to Daniel after turning out the light.

"You okay?...shit...right, stupid question," Johnny said.

Daniel wondered if in this moment, in this case, on this trip, he could do something before he went to sleep. If Johnny would let him, if he'd understand or if it'd be weird, if it'd be awkward, if Johnny would push him away.

He didn't think he could sleep. Didn't think it'd even be possible with the way his mind was buzzing. The way it kept circling back to watching Mr. Miyag's father's hands fall from his, the way his father's hand fell out of Daniel's. That moment when he knew he was gone. So clear that it was over. That the world was forever changed but would keep going as if Daniel's world hadn't fallen apart.

He'd keep it tame. He reached out wrapping an arm around Johnny and burying his head against his chest. Johnny didn't respond, but an arm came down after a while, didn't push him away just a little pat, a little awkward one like always before it settled around Daniel's shoulders.

"Do you want to tell me about it?" Johnny asked quietly.

Daniel did, but he knew he'd just keep talking all night, crying. He didn't want that. He wanted to be able to greet the morning with a plan, an idea on how to comfort Mr. Miyagi, and the only way to do that was to think. If he talked he'd spin himself around in circles in his own pain unable to get out of it. He wouldn't be able to do what he felt was necessary.

He shook his head, not trusting that saying even no aloud wouldn't start the waterworks that had welled up again.

Johnny's hand moved and Daniel wanted to reach out and grab it and make it stay.

But it came down again, gently on the back of Daniel's head, fingers running through his hair, soothing.

Out of anything he'd ever possibly expected it hadn't been that.

He wondered if it was one of those other science things Johnny had read.

It sent a shiver down his spine and he shut his eyes. It was nice. Thoughts faded out of his mind as he focused on the sensation, of Johnny playing with his hair, his breathing, and the steady sound of Johnny's heartbeat.

Daniel woke up to the gray of the morning. He couldn't believe he'd fallen asleep. He had moved in his sleep. More on top of Johnny than he'd been when he'd fallen asleep, his leg thrown over his hip.

He lifted a hand and very gently pressed the back of his hand to Johnny's forehead. He didn't feel too hot. Which was good. It meant all of his time in the rain or water the night before hadn't gotten him sick.

The air had cooled off a little from the rain. He didn't want to pull away but he wanted to find Mr. Miyagi.

He had an idea of what he wanted to say. And he needed to make sure he was okay.

He carefully rolled off of Johnny and covered him with the blankets, tucking him in so he would stay warm, before grabbing a piece of paper and pen to leave him a note, changing and heading out.

He didn't want Johnny to worry. Like he had the day before. But unlike yesterday, unlike Johnny just being in the kitchen, he might not be in the house somewhere.

Who knew where Mr. Miyagi would be? Who knew when he'd get back?

He felt bad, but he also thought that Johnny would understand.

It took a while to find Mr. Miyagi, but he did, out of the village and on a rock overlooking the sea, shoulders slumped, emanating mourning and pain. Daniel knew what that felt like.

He sat down on the rock next to Mr. Miyagi and talked about his dad. How he'd felt like a terrible son for pulling away and not being there, but how much it meant, he was sure, to show up in those final moments and be there to hold his hand before he passed. He shared his pain, the way he felt now, more positive, but still with that pain, because it would never leave, but he would learn more about it, learn to live with it.

Mr. Miyagi listened as he talked, looking out at the ocean until his eyes were red and filled with tears. Daniel wished Mr. Miyagi was a person who took comfort in hugs. But he didn't reach out. He knew the best thing he could do was to just sit there and be by his side, saying the things Mr. Miyagi needed to hear. That Daniel needed to say.

He thought about how much pain he'd held onto thinking he'd been such a terrible son, for so long, until he left and returned and that trip back to Newark with Johnny, talking with the guys, it reminded him of all those moments that told a different story. One where even though he'd been wracked with guilt, he'd been a kid, and his dad probably knew that.

Understood.

Just like he was sure Mr. Miyagi's dad understood, was proud of him for sticking to the defense only use of karate and going out into the world, making his own way, even if it had hurt. Even if he missed him. Because parents wanted a better life for their kids. And Mr. Miyagi's dad had raised the most resilient man with a heart of gold. A man who helped random talkative kids who got his name wrong. Who fixed things and brought beauty to the valley.

If they'd had had more time, Daniel had a list, a list of things he had wanted to tell Mr. Miyagi's dad. Of all the wonderful things Mr. Miyagi did. How much he owed him. How much he meant to him. How proud he had to be.

Mr. Miyagi keeping up the family tradition, fishing in another sea, one facing the direction of Okinawa. Another Miyagi in a long line of Miyagi's, a master of karate who only used it for defense and a fisherman, even though he had set down roots so far away.

Daniel wondered if maybe it wasn't just habit or some enjoyment that he found peaceful, or if fishing was something he did to feel closer to his dad, to his home. Across the sea thinking, maybe, just maybe his Dad was out fishing too. And they were fishing at the same time together even though there was an ocean between them.

After a while, they went for a walk. Mr. Miyagi showed him the cannery, telling him tales of him and his father. Walking him around and pointing things out. Telling him stories. It was nice. He looked a little more sturdy. Like walking through it with Daniel helped. Like the way, Daniel knew showing Johnny everything had helped. It helped to just have someone to be there and listen. And on the walk back to the house Mr. Miyagi stopped and looked at Daniel.

"Important to tell people how feel."

Daniel nodded. He understood that. Wishing he'd told his father more often how he felt. Trying to make sure he always told his mother.

"Understand Daniel-san?" Mr. Miyagi looking at him seriously.

"Of course Mr. Miyagi," Daniel said.

Mr. Miyagi studied him a moment then nodded. After brushing off Chozen's taunts Mr. Miyagi spent the day with Yukie. Daniel left them alone. He didn't want to interrupt. And Daniel wanted to see Johnny.

He looked around the house and couldn't find him. He wandered through the town for a while and still couldn't find him. After setting off a small fight in town by breaking a fake weight he wandered the beach wondering where Johnny could've possibly gone. He wandered back into town and heard music coming from the Shinto shrine and walked over wondering if Ichiro was still playing.

There was Johnny's blonde head. It was bent and his brow was furrowed in concentration. He held the instrument that Ichiro had been playing the first time they'd been walking through town with Mr. Miyagi. There were kids around him, hyped up, excited. Sometimes Johnny would falter and a little girl would climb up the steps and lean over him.

"Almost! Like this!"

"Arigato."

The kids would giggle and his mini teacher would pat him on the shoulder and he'd try again. She would nod along as he played. It happened a few times and then when he got it right, a run-through correct they cheered.

"Perfect!" Ichiro said. "Again!"

And Johnny obliged. Playing the song they'd taught him and Ichiro clapped a beat and sang. The kids applauded when he was done. Climbing up the steps and over Johnny, hanging over him like he was a jungle gym.

"Johnny play a new song?"

"Do you know another song?" he asked looking up at the girl.

She turned to look at the other children and Ichiro and they spoke rapidly in Japanese. They seemed to come to an agreement and the kids crowded around Johnny telling him what to do, the order to play. Johnny practiced once, twice, and then satisfied that he'd gotten it they stood in the grass. Ichiro sang again, clapping a beat, but this time there were whistles and shouts added to the singing. The kids danced in the grass slowly and purposeful.

The last time Daniel had seen Ichiro he'd just realized his carrots had been undersold. The difference, with how he was helping the kids teach Johnny songs and singing was so peaceful. A precious moment in the fragments of pain their trip was littered with.

Daniel watched as Johnny played. Eventually, Johnny looked up and his eyes met Daniel's and he smiled, small, tentative, it was a questioning smile.

Are you okay?

Daniel nodded. Ichiro followed Johnny's gaze and caught sight of Daniel and rushed over pulling him through the torii gate. He held his hands up, hands closed, and swayed them above his head as he moved. Easy steps they were dancing. It was clear they wanted him to join.

Daniel followed along, moving to the beat the way he'd been shown. Listening to the shouts, whistles and singing, as Johnny played.

They got him to play another, and another, and then Johnny very carefully handed the instrument back to Ichiro bowing his head.

"Arigato Ichiro-san," then he turned to the small child who'd taught him, "Arigato Yuna sensei."

She beamed up at him absolutely delighted at the title and Johnny bowed his head once more to them all before stepping away from the shrine and towards Daniel.

They walked together through the town, quiet.

"What happened to your shirt?" Johnny asked after a while, pointing to the rip in Daniel's shirt that was wrapped around his waist.

"I was practicing the drum technique and did something incredibly dangerous," Daniel said with a sigh.

He told Johnny about his morning, not going into full detail, but the basics, talking to Mr. Miyagi and then walking around and talking with him more. Then he told Johnny about the cannery and the drum technique. How Mr. Miyagi used to practice avoiding the hooks and how he'd tried with this safety-looking cork on and ended up in the ocean, but then tried again when Mr. Miyagi wasn't looking without a cork. And the shirt thankfully was the only thing that got pierced.

Daniel tried to laugh it off. A brush with death.

But Johnny stopped walking.

Daniel turned to him. Johnny's eyes were wide and he looked horrified.

"Why?" Johnny asked a breathless whisper.

Daniel frowned. "I-" He sighed.

He folded his arms across his chest and looked away.

"Sato's given Mr. Miyagi 3 days to mourn. Chozen is taunting him. Karate here is...there's no referee. I'm worried okay. I want to master anything Mr. Miyagi teaches me in case. In case I have to use it. In case..." he stopped.

He didn't want to say it. It felt like bad luck to say it. To say that he feared Mr. Miyagi might not come home with them. Would either figure out a way to stay with Yukie or Sato would kill him. Because even if Daniel begged him to fight back Mr. Miyagi would not kill Sato. It just wasn't who he was. If they fought Mr. Miyagi would die.

Johnny cupped Daniel's face in his hands. "We'll be here. I'm here. I've got your back, okay? You don't need to rush to master karate again. Mr. Miyagi will go home with you."

He looked so serious. Like he believed it. Like it wasn't just what Daniel wanted to hear.

Daniel wrapped his hand around one of Johnny's wrists, not pulling it away. "And how do you know that?"

"Because if there's a fight to the death I'll do it in his place," Johnny said.

Daniel yanked the hands on his face down and let them go. "What? Why? No!"

"I'm the only one who studied Cobra Kai," Johnny said. "It's meant for this type of thing. I-my hands are already dirty. You and Mr. Miyagi shouldn't have to-Kreese taught us how to fight in this way. And I'm used to street scuffles where someone wants to hurt me. I know how to fight for my life. I'm used to that, so I won't be scared."

"No."

"Daniel-"

"No," Daniel said sternly, a tone he'd picked up from his mom. The no arguments tone.

His heart was pounding in his ears. This was what happened when he left Johnny alone. He'd look absolutely peaceful and sweet and then in his head he was already digging his grave and had made his peace with it. It was that same dark vein of thought that Daniel caught every once in a while. A little river that if he didn't keep an eye on he'd find Johnny bobbing away down it. Where he didn't believe there was anyone in his corner, which meant he didn't think anyone would miss him. The math added up in his head. But it didn't in Daniel's. If Daniel was going to fight he was going to not give up, he would win. But Johnny was prepared to lose.

"We are all going home. Together," Daniel said. "Mr. Miyagi will figure it out. He'll find a way out of fighting Sato. You did not come on this trip to die."

"I-"

"No Johnny. No. No dying. Promise me," Daniel said holding out his hand, pinky extended.

Johnny stared at him, more protests on his lips. "I can't promise that. We might get into fights even if we don't want to, even if we try and avoid it," he whispered.

"Fine, promise me you'll look for alternatives. That you won't just throw yourself into the fight as a sacrifice on some stupid altar of honor."

Johnny sighed, shoulders slumping, and held out his pinky, shaking his head but hooking it through Daniels. "Fine."

"Besides," Daniel said with a smile looking up at Johnny. "You're not part of Cobra Kai anymore. You're Miyagi-do now. So you should be practicing the drum technique with me," Daniel picked up the drum holding it up and spinning it between his fingers.

Johnny laughed softly, it was the smallest laugh, but Daniel would take it.

Beni imo

There was something lonely waking up and finding Daniel gone. But reading over his little note made sense. He couldn't be upset about it. It was why they were there after all.

Gone to find Mr. Miyagi. See you later today.

-Daniel

He moved slowly. Later today could mean anything. Could mean dinner or that night. And Johnny didn't want to interrupt. So he got ready. Read a little, tried to practice Japanese and Okinawan again, and joined Yukie for breakfast. He wandered through the village with her, carrying baskets and things she needed to be moved from one point to another. It seemed like it was vegetable day or something. Selling them.

Chozen stood at a little booth with his friends weighing out the vegetables.

It was confusing to Johnny how the whole process worked. A fishing village that no longer could fish because Sato overfished the waters. Wasn't it also Sato's home? Wasn't he worried about the people? And then he owned the land they borrowed to grow their vegetables? Yet they sold their vegetables back to Sato? Did they make any profit? It seemed meager.

"Ah coward's student," Chozen said when they arrived, snide laughter in his voice. "Why'd you pick a coward to teach you? Want to be a coward?"

Yukie was measuring out her vegetables and Johnny frowned.

"Been to war Chozen?" Johnny asked.

"No."

"Do you think survivors of war are cowards?" Johnny asked.

"No."

"Then how is Mr. Miyagi a coward?"

Chozen frowned at this. Looked more pissed.

"Mr. Miyagi survived war, more pain than you or I could imagine. And he chose kindness. To help people. If I could become even a fraction of the man he is, it would be an honor," Johnny said, voice steady, stressing the word, holding Chozen's gaze.

The way Kreese had taught him. He knew it was intimidating. Knew it held a challenge, a dare.

Chozen scoffed like what Johnny said was silly, but Johnny saw a flicker there like it didn't go through as deeply as it had. As if a seed of doubt had been planted.

Yukie patted Johnny's shoulder and he glanced over. She had her cash, her basket, was ready to go.

"Kindness is weak," Chozen said. A desperate need to get the last word in. "Kind men will always die, will always lose."

Johnny took her basket for her nodding his head. He understood the underlying threat and he looked back at Chozen. "Not if I can help it."

He hoped the warning would scare him off, that it'd give him pause, that his muscle and the return of the threat, the fact he didn't back down would reign him in.

Yukie hooked her arm through Johnny's. Patting it as they walked back towards the house. "Chozen-san, always hmm...angry. Was...angry baby."

Johnny laughed and she looked up at him smiling. He helped her around the house. She gave him errands to run. Asked him to drop something off at a house down the street, to pick something up someplace else. She'd drawn him a map of the village and would mark off where he needed to go, what he needed to do.

Every door he knocked on felt awkward. Filled him with panic. What would he say? What would he do? His Okinawan was awful, his Japanese as well. He didn't know enough and no matter how much he tried to practice on his way to his destination it always fled as soon as soon as the door opened. But without fail they'd take one look at him and go "Ah!" and dip into their house or walk past him into their gardens and talk quickly to him.

He'd hear names.

Yukie.

Miyagi.

Just by looking at him, they knew why he was there. And they'd press whatever he was to pick up in his hands or take whatever Yukie had given him to give them and then they'd bow and smile at him and he'd leave more confused but relieved.

Yukie always thanked him, very seriously whenever he came back. Like he was helping her take a lot off her plate, even though she still looked so busy.

After lunch, she motioned out to the village.

"Go, have fun," she told him, gently squeezing his arm.

Johnny nodded and left. He wandered around for a bit, wondering where Daniel and Mr. Miyagi were, hoping they were okay. Hoping Chozen and Sato were leaving them alone, that they were somewhere talking about their shared experience and healing.

Children were running around but they came to a halt in front of him. They talked amongst themselves, crowding around staring up at him and then one walked forward, a little girl.

"USA?"

"Yes," Johnny said.

The kid frowned and pointed at the airbase.

"Oh, no," Johnny said. "Mr. Miyagi is my sensei."

The tentativeness faded at this and hands grabbed his pulling him along.

"I'm Yuna," the girl said.

"Johnny."

"How tall?"

"Over 6 feet."

"Feet?" noses wrinkled at this followed by giggles.

"Girlfriend?"

"No."

"How old?"

"17."

"So old!"

"Married?"

"No."

They seemed disappointed by this.

"Can you swim?"

"Yes."

"Can you surf?"

"Sort of."

They were more impressed by this based on the chatter it instilled.

"Can you fish?"

Johnny thought about it. It seemed simple enough.

"No."

They were absolutely stunned by this. Stopping in the middle of the street from where they were pulling him along to look up at him wide-eyed.

"Miyagi sensei teach what?"

"Karate."

"Ohhhhhh."

"Can't eat karate," one kid mumbled with a frown.

"I thought you didn't have a lot of fish?" Johnny said.

One of the kids sighed like someone much much older and wrinkled their nose with a deep frown. "Few fish. Mostly vegetables."

"Do you like vegetables?" Johnny asked.

"No."

"I like carrots," one said.

"I like beni imo," another said.

"What's beni imo?" Johnny asked.

"Purple potato."

"Purple?"

Yuna nodded with a big smile. "Delicious."

"I'll have to try it."

She nodded enthusiastically.

"Can you play music?"

"Some."

"Sanshin?"

"What's a sanshin?" Johnny asked.

And that question got them moving. They were pulling him down the street to the shrine where the guy from the day before had been sitting and playing a string instrument. Ichiro, Johnny remembered.

The kids talked to Ichiro and he looked at Johnny and then back down at them and smiled nodding his head. He got up and patted the spot he'd vacated. They pulled Johnny forward and he sat. Ichiro handed him the instrument. It was light in his hands. Looked like it was made of snakeskin. It only had three strings.

"This is a sanshin," Yuna said climbing up next to him. Ichiro took a little black claw off his finger and passed it over.

"This is a bachi," she said passing it to Johnny. "Use to play."

"Like a pick for a guitar," Johnny said.

She nodded. Johnny held it carefully in his hands and Yuna corrected the way he held it, the way his fingers curled around the neck, over his hand to strum it a couple of times. She spoke to Ichiro trying to decide something and then seemed to come to an agreement. They worked him through the cords, teaching him a song. Then he played it again and again and again. Until they were satisfied. Then they taught him another, and the process continued until they deemed the songs he learned good enough. And then Ichiro and the kids sang and danced. They looked so happy. Pleased with him. It was nice.

After a while he felt eyes on him, watching. He looked up, out past the shrine grounds, Daniel. His shirt was tied around his waist, he was wearing a black tank top, arms crossed. Johnny was glad to see him in one piece, unharmed. Ichiro called out to him, he was pulled in and Johnny watched, amused as they taught him the dance they'd been doing for a while. His little teacher had called it Kachāshī.

After spending the afternoon walking around talking they returned to Miyagi's house and Daniel changed. They ate dinner and returned to walk around, feeling the need to give Mr. Miyagi and Yukie more time alone. Johnny wondered if Mr. Miyagi's father had survived if it'd have been the same. Leaving to give him time to catch up. Forty years was a long time, they had so much to talk about. And Daniel still wanted to learn the drum karate. Focused as he swung his arms, thoughtful. Johnny watched him. He was trying to help him puzzle over it. Understand it. Going through everything Kreese had taught him to try and find something he knew. Trying to think of what he'd seen in the books he'd read. But it was different.

He heard light footsteps behind him and turned, Kumiko was coming forward curious. She laughed telling them it looked like an o-bon dance and showed them the moves to the dance, singing softly as she did and telling them to follow her.

Johnny did, it reminded him of kata, he knew it wasn't smooth or as fluid as hers, but it was worth trying. Then he heard the kids giggling. He spotted Ichiro behind them and Yuna called out from the fire.

Johnny excused himself from the dancing lesson to walk carefully around the vegetable patches to the fire where Ichiro was motioning for him to come. Around the fire sat people he recognized from his day's errands around town and they greeted him warmly.

"Beni imo," an elderly woman said slowly, smiling and putting potatoes in his arms.

"I told them you wanted to try," Yuna said grinning up at him. "For you and friends."

Three. He bowed his thanks and turned in time to watch Chozen kick Daniel and for him to go down.

Johnny ran.

He heard Chozen.

"You insult my honor again, and I kill you."

Kumiko grabbed a tomato and threw it at Chozen's back as he walked away and Chozen stopped stripping out of his shirt and throwing it back.

"If you want to fight, why don't you come back here and fight me?" Johnny called and Chozen paused looking back.

He knew if Chozen came back he wouldn't be able to stop himself. He wouldn't be able to pull back. He'd break his promises. He was doing everything he could to not run after him. To stand between Daniel and Chozen, if he came back and not chase the fight.

Kumiko was checking on Daniel, helping him up asking if he was okay.

"He insulted my honor."

"How is this honorable? I don't think you know the meaning of the word."

A hand fell on Johnny's shoulder and he turned. Daniel was holding his arm across his stomach. He searched Daniel quickly, for additional injuries but it just seemed to be the one.

"Ignore him. He's not worth it," Daniel said softly.

Johnny felt some of the anger die, he should get Daniel home safe instead. Patch him up.

"Bye-bye baby," Chozen said with a little wave walking away with his friends, laughing.

"You going to be okay to walk back?" Johnny asked softly.

"Yeah," Daniel said. "What'd you get?"

"Oh!" Kumiko said clapping her hands together. "Beni imo!"

"What's that?" Daniel asked taking the one Johnny handed him.

Johnny handed the other to Kumiko who smiled up at him before turning to Daniel.

"Sweet potato."

"Apparently it's purple."

"That's right!" Kumiko said.

"Purple," Daniel said with disbelief open his up and shaking his fingers as the hot steam hit them. "Oh man, this is hot."

"Pulled straight out of the fire, sorry should've warned you," Johnny said, carefully peeling his the way Kumiko was. It really was purple on the inside.

"What color are your sweet potatoes?" Kumiko asked.

"Orange," Daniel said looking at it.

They were walking slowly back to Mr. Miyagi's home and Daniel was leaning against him. Curled inward still a little bit. But he was eating and talking with Kumiko while he ate. They were complaining about Chozen.

"Yukie said he was an angry baby," Johnny said.

Kumiko laughed and Daniel grinned at that but it seemed the laughter hurt.

They stopped at the gate, pausing when they took in Mr. Miyagi and Yukie dressed nicely across from each other, staring into each other's eyes and moving slowly. Kumiko whispered to them in a voice of awe, explaining the tea ceremony. Daniel was staring at her when she mentioned how romantic it was with a sigh. Johnny finished his sweet potato.

Kumiko was cute. If Daniel picked her, he didn't think he could be mad. She was nice and he liked that she'd thrown a tomato at Chozen. She'd stand up for herself and others. She was brave and strong.

He wondered if Daniel and Mr. Miyagi would stay. Both of them in Okinawa. Mr. Miyagi with Yukie and Daniel with Kumiko. It stung. He'd end up going home alone.

Or maybe they'd try and figure out how to get both ladies home with them. He didn't have any money to do that, to help. He also didn't know how it'd work with immigration or customs. That was more of a Jimmy thing.

They carefully pushed through the gate trying not to interrupt the date happening. In a quiet part of the garden, a hand grabbed Johnny's arm and he turned. Daniel was heading into their shared room.

"Children said you are learning sanshin?" she asked, head tilted looking up at him curiously.

"They taught me a little today," Johnny said softly.

"Did they teach you Kaadikuuu?"

*"*Uh, I don't know. I didn't really catch the song names."

She nodded thoughtfully then sang the way she had before when teaching the o-bon dance. She stopped after a while. "That one?"

"Is it kind of fast?"

She nodded and her face broke into a smile. "That's the one."

"Uh yeah, they taught me that one."

She clapped her hand delightedly. "If you're here for o-bon you will have to play."

"Okay, if we're still here, I'll uh, try."

"Good," she said hand patting his arm. "Tomorrow we all go sightseeing okay? Tell Daniel?"

"Oh, really?"

She smiled. "Of course. I'll drive you, show you all the highlights."

"Thank you, Kumiko."

"Of course."

"Kumiko, is there something for bruises? Something for Daniel to feel better?"

"Oh!" she said, "Yes, we've got something, I'll go get it wait here."

She darted off through the house and came back with a basket. In it was gauze, tape, water, a small towel, a bowl, and a tin. She opened the tin to show him, it contained a green powder. It looked an awful lot like the tea he'd made the other day at breakfast.

"Mmm, so you mix with water, make a paste, put on the skin, wrap gently, and then should feel better in the morning, okay?"

"Uh yeah, I think I got it."

"Hope Daniel feels better tomorrow. Good night Johnny," she said pressing the basket into his arms.

Johnny turned towards the room he shared with Daniel with the basket. He carefully pushed the door open. Daniel was standing in the room, arm still holding his abdomen.

"Hey, Kumiko gave me some stuff to help," Johnny said. "Though it looks like tea. Want to find a comfortable spot?"

Daniel looked at him. It didn't seem to click.

"So I can apply it?" Johnny continued. "It's easier when someone helps you when you're injured, makes sure you get it right. Unless you want to hover awkwardly in front of a mirror trying to do this yourself? I figure it'd take a while and this way you can be comfortable."

Johnny sat down next to the bed, it was the only comfortable spot. "You could change first into what you want to sleep in and we'll put this on." He picked up the tin.

"Okay," Daniel said. "I'll get ready for bed then."

Johnny nodded. "Let me know if you need any help."

Daniel laughed softly, then hissed at the pain it caused. He gathered his stuff and left.

Johnny set out the things Kumiko had given him mixing the powder with the water. It fizzed and foamed. It wasn't tea. It definitely didn't smell like tea either.

Daniel came back and put his hand on Johnny's shoulder leaning on him as he sunk down onto his knees next to him. Johnny turned, holding out his arms to see if he could help. He wrapped an arm around Daniel's back and helped lower him down with a grunt of pain.

Johnny shifted forward, sitting in seiza, which was so familiar but a way he hadn't sat in months that he almost felt like he was back in the dojo. He focused on Daniel. He hesitated. Should he lift up Daniel's shirt? Ask him to do it? If it hurt to move, then he should do it, but it felt...a little too intimate.

He wished Daniel would talk. Wouldn't just watch him. But he was in pain.

"I'm going to lift up your shirt a bit, is that okay?" Johnny asked.

Daniel nodded.

Johnny pushed himself forward a little and very carefully lifted up the top of the t-shirt Daniel had picked for bed. His abdomen was a dark red. He folded the hem of his shirt up carefully letting it rest on Daniel's chest. Any worry about awkwardness fled. He had a job to do. He picked up the bowl with the green paste. He dipped his hand in, it was weird. A little warm, a little cool, tingly.

"Uh, it's warm and cold,"

"Okay," Daniel whispered.

Johnny carefully placed his hand over Daniel's abdomen. His fingers ghosted over the red mark on his stomach and lower ribs, coating it in the green, trying to be as gentle as possible.

"You'll let me know if it hurts?"

Daniel let out a snort of laughter again. "Johnny you're barely touching me. It's fine. Like Ma's rougher when I'm wounded."

Johnny looked at him then back down.

"I'm not made of glass, like I kicked your ass, you remember that right?"

"I do...I just... I can't hurt you again," Johnny said softly.

Daniel let out a huff of air. "Fixing isn't hurting."

Johnny nodded, all the red was covered in green paste and he cleaned his fingers off with the towel and a bit of water before getting the gauze. He'd done this part a lot. Too many times.

"Can you lean up a little or sit up?" Johnny asked. "I can help."

Daniel brushed off his hands, carefully pushing himself up with his arms so Johnny could wrap the gauze around him. He'd lost count long ago of how often he'd had to patch himself up. It was so familiar he could probably do this in his sleep or with his eyes closed.

"I'm sorry," Johnny said.

"For what?"

"Not being there. I shouldn't have left to get the beni imo."

"It's a purple sweet potato," Daniel said. "I'd have been mad if you hadn't gotten us some. And what you wanted us both to be beaten and bruised tonight?"

Johnny frowned. "No, I..." He sighed taping it off the end. "What did Chozen mean that you dishonored him?"

"He was cheating people when they were selling their vegetables. I went with Ichiro, helped him get his carrots there, and then Chozen and his goons weren't paying attention and I tried to help by like setting it up for Ichiro and the weights flew off as if he had the worlds heaviest carrots and I picked one of the weights up and snapped it in half and a fight broke out. People were pissed. Chozen was pissed at me."

"But you showed the truth," Johnny said gently pulling Daniel's shirt back down and covering him with the blanket as he laid back down.

Daniel gave him a look, amused with a hint of annoyance.

"Yeah, I'm the bad guy. I ruined his little scheme."

Johnny shook his head with a frown. "I went to that stand today too, didn't even think to check."

"Why'd you go?"

"I ran errands for Yukie all day, one of the errands was selling vegetables. I talked with Chozen. I thought the amount she got was pathetic, but I don't know how finances work in Okinawa alone how much vegetables go for." He sighed rubbing his face in his hands. "What is wrong with him?"

"That's the question right? Him and Sato, I don't get either of them."

Johnny felt a hand on his arm and he looked at Daniel.

"Go do your shower if you're gonna."

Johnny looked around for the time, it was getting late. "Yeah, okay. Uh, Kumiko said she's taking us sightseeing tomorrow, so we want to be ready early for that. She's driving."

"You look like you ate something bitter. I doubt she's as bad as Louie," Daniel said giving his hand a squeeze.

"Yeah, you're right. Want me to get you anything?" Johnny asked.

Daniel looked thoughtful for a moment then shook his head. Johnny put away the rest of the supplies and grabbed his things to head to the bath. He stopped next to the phone, pulling out his international card and calling the number he'd memorized over five years ago.

"Hello?" Bobby asked, he sounded tired.

"Hey," Johnny said. "Checking-in as promised."

"Yeah? How's island life treating you?"

Johnny wondered not for the first time how much he should say. He'd told Bobby the day before that Mr. Miyagi's father had died. Bobby had gotten quiet at that. To say what had happened that day, it was almost like some bizarre confessional. Like Bobby was already a priest or whatever religious guy he wanted to be.

"Johnny?" Bobby asked a tinge of worry.

"Daniel got into a fight today, I wasn't there to stop it," Johnny said softly.

"He okay?"

"I think he will be but-"

"Johnny you can't always be watching him and keeping him safe."

"This guy won't leave him alone and his uncle won't leave Mr. Miyagi alone."

"Sato right? And Chozen?" Bobby asked.

"Yeah."

"What did you do today?" Bobby asked.

Johnny sighed leaning against the wall, "I helped Yukie run errands. Went to practically every house in the village. And then some kids wanted to talk, I met a kid named Yuna who along with this guy Ichiro and the other kids taught me how to play a sanshin."

"What's a sanshin?"

"It's like a 3 string instrument, twangy,"

Bobby laughed softly. "Okay and then what? Where was Daniel?"

"Out talking with Mr. Miyagi."

"And then?"

"Well we met up later and the kids made him dance. And then after dinner, we went for a walk and ran into Kumiko who showed us the steps to the o-bon dance. Yuna and the other kids and Ichiro were around this fire and called me over and it was all these people I'd met throughout the day and they gave me beni imo, it's a purple sweet potato."

"Purple?"

"Purple," Johnny sighed rubbing his face. "And then after I got these potatoes I hear a fight happening and high-tailed it back and Chozen had kicked Daniel in the stomach, and he fell to the ground almost immediately. And Chozen didn't fight me. Didn't turn around and...I mean I baited him, but he didn't, and I tried to help, right? There's this green stuff for when you're hurt that they've got and I. Bobby I did this to Daniel all the time, and it was so hard for him to move like he was in so much pain that even laughing hurt and I keep thinking I did that to him before. He's been in the same or worse situation before and it's my fault and I should've been there, I promised I'd have his back and I failed, and the way Sato and Chozen are, what if they're like Kreese? Or if it's like Halloween? Where that impulse control is just gone like someone broke the breaks? Karate here is to the death Bobby, death. I don't want to come back home alone."

"Breathe the way Mr. Miyagi taught you, Johnny," Bobby said softly. "I wanna hear it. That deep in-breath, that slow out. Right, just like that. Again....one more...yeah, how's that?"

"Better," Johnny muttered.

Bobby laughed, "You sound bitter about it. You trust Mr. Miyagi right?"

"Of course!"

"So you gotta trust that he knows what he's doing."

"But Bobby-"

"Don't but Bobby me. The guys like what 50 something? Lived through a war and countless tragedy. He beat Kreese. He can handle his hometown. As for Chozen, he probably won't let it go. Not until he hits like a brick wall or something. What was that science thing? Man is my brain already leaking out everything I learned? College is going to be hell if that's the case. Newtons law of motion. Right? Why was that so hard to remember but I have feeling the mitochondria being the powerhouse of the cell is going to be locked in there until I'm 70 at least. Sorry, right, okay so don't be that brick wall. Promise me you won't be that brick wall. Because the other law was something about an equal amount of damage hitting both things. Aha! I remembered it. Take that! Okay so third law right? Every action has an equal and opposite reaction. So if you play the damn brick wall you're going to get hit pretty damn hard. Use strategy okay? I know, not really a cobra kai strength. Kreese didn't really teach strategy, just brute force. But keep trying to resolve things peacefully. Distract. Do not engage."

"Yeah," Johnny said softly.

"Promise me something okay?"

"Depends on what."

"Don't beat yourself up over this. There are going to be moments where Daniel gets hurt that you can't protect him. Like are you going to get upset every time he gets a papercut?"

"..."

"Johnny I swear-"

"Maybe," Johnny mumbled.

"Oh my god, you sound like a surly toddler. Dude, go get some sleep and like think about it okay? You know Daniel can handle himself. He can take a hit. He can take a lot and you know that. So calm down, shower, breathe and get some sleep."

Johnny sighed. "Have a good day Bobby."

"Yeah, good night Johnny."

Johnny hung up and continued to the bath.

Bobby was right.

He was right an uncomfortable amount of the time.

He knew Daniel could handle himself. But seeing him hurt was awful. Knowing he'd been so close to helping but had failed ate away at him.

He sighed rubbing his face. He couldn't see a good end to this.

No matter what Bobby said.

Unless something knocked everyone off the track they were on it was going to turn into a nightmare.

He wondered if they could just run. If he could just grab Mr. Miyagi, apologize to Yukie, and fly home.

He doubted it.

Mr. Miyagi probably wouldn't allow it. And Daniel wouldn't leave without him. And Johnny wouldn't leave Mr. Miyagi behind.

He'd have to wait for an opening. He'd seen Chozen waver, even just a little, maybe he could get them to change course somehow.

Save everyone some heartache.

If only.

Picnic by the Sea

Daniel woke up feeling better. Miyagi's medicine usually did that. Though it had been kind of nice to have Johnny do the application instead of Mr. Miyagi. They'd have to work on the guilt Johnny still held onto. Daniel was past it. Ready to move forward but Johnny was still looking down at all of it having not taken a step forward. Having not realized Daniel was further ahead of him waiting.

He pulled away from Johnny and pushed himself up, it didn't hurt to move. And in the shower in the morning the bruise was barely blossoming. It was like magic.

It was tender but it didn't really hurt too badly.

Smelled awful.

He was surprised Johnny hadn't requested a different room. Relieved he hadn't. Just had slept by his side like normal.

He dressed and did his morning practice.

On his way back he noticed a large bouquet sitting on the front steps.

He picked it up. They were all white flowers. There was a card. Daniel read it over.

"Dear Mr. Miyagi,

We're so sorry to hear about your loss.

We want to express our deepest sympathy.

If you need anything do not hesitate to reach out.

It's only a 16-hour flight.

Sincerely yours,

Tommy, Bobby, Dutch, and Jimmy"

Daniel carefully put the card back in its envelope. It wasn't for him and he was still touched. Touched that they knew and that they'd reached out, figured out how to send flowers to Mr. Miyagi from so far away.

He wondered how they were spending their summer. He expected they were on the beach, drinking around bonfires, challenging each other to race into the waters. Maybe they'd done some road trip somewhere.

Whatever they were doing was more fun and exciting than what Daniel and Johnny were doing. Less painful for sure.

He carried it back in towards the kitchen, to put it somewhere where Mr. Miyagi would see it.

Johnny was up, talking with Yukie and helping her serve breakfast. She smiled at him as he set the bouquet in a vase with water. Moving it to make sure the envelope was visible.

"Practice?" she asked.

"Yeah," Daniel said taking his seat at the table. "It's so nice, everything is so peaceful in the morning."

"Kumiko said she's taking you to sightsee today?" Yukie asked.

"Yes," Johnny said. "Do you want us to bring you anything while we're out?"

Yukie laughed squeezing Johnny's arm. "No no! Have fun!"

"Yeah, Johnny. Let's just have fun today huh?" Daniel said amused. "You know you're allowed to have fun sometimes right?"

Johnny gave him a look and Daniel burst out laughing. So absolutely serious. They'd work on that. Between Kumiko and Daniel, together, they'd make sure Johnny had some fun. Make sure he had some good memories of Okinawa.

Daniel was looking forward to it.

They finished breakfast and Johnny got up to help clean up but Yukie swatted at his hand and shooed them out.

They greeted Mr. Miyagi outside working on repairs and then Kumiko drove up with a small rusty white car.

It was tight, the three of them. Daniel sat in the middle hand falling on Johnny's thigh out of habit.

Kumiko caught it and her eyes flicked up to Daniel and she smiled at him, knowingly and amused and Daniel worked hard to fight off the blush. He didn't know how to explain that things were just different in California. That he'd missed it. That he liked being all up in Johnny's space.

There wasn't a lot of it in the car and Johnny had sat with his arm along the back seat behind him, his other arm along the side of the door, facing towards them as much as he could and he didn't know how to tell her that Johnny having this open at ease body language was so important, not just because it meant Daniel got to lean up against him, but how much he'd progressed through the months.

It'd take him forever to catch her up on every little thing. How much of a compliment this relaxed Johnny was for her driving because with Louie he'd nearly snapped in half he'd been so tense.

He talked instead about Okinawa, asked her questions. And she laughed, hair whipping in the wind as she drove answering his questions and telling him about life on the island. About Okinawa before it was Okinawa. Before Japan or the USA had taken over. The Ryukyu Islands.

They visited a castle and raced to the top and Daniel realized Johnny was pulling away.

He'd seen Johnny run, knew he was fast, he should've won, but he'd let them win, a tie for the two of them. He noticed he walked behind them like a chaperone, like a third wheel.

He had to keep reaching back and grabbing Johnny pulling him towards them, to walk with them while Kumiko talked.

Kumiko caught it, catching Daniel's eyes and raising an eyebrow. She helped. She'd pull him along too. Not letting him fall behind, hooking an arm through his. Talking to him, asking him questions. If Daniel didn't know that Kumiko knew he'd have been worried about the way it looked so natural for her to hold his arm and talk to him. It was more concerning how Johnny looked at her, listened to her, how she laughed at his jokes.

He made it look so easy. Kumiko didn't understand Daniel's jokes. But Johnny spoke slowly, explained his jokes and she was delighted. And he looked so damn pleased with himself.

She drove them north along the coast and it was so beautiful he couldn't stay upset for long. The skies were clear and beautiful and the water was so blue. The air was so clean.

"You know Shō Hashi, now we go to a spot famous from Shō Kei. Did your books mention Shō Kei?" Kumiko asked with a smile on her face.

Daniel frowned trying to place the name. He shook his head.

Kumiko nodded parking and hopping out. She opened the trunk grabbing a large bag that she threw over her shoulder and led them out to the coast. She turned and pointed and they took in the almost green ocean that slowly darkened to a rich blue and the cliffs.

"It looks kind of like an elephant," Daniel said staring out at the formation. There was a hole in it and a curve like the trunk of an elephant.

Kumiko laughed. "Right? Shō Kei, once said this spot was big enough for 10,000 people to sit here," she said walking out to the vast expanse of the field.

She opened her bag and pulled out a cloth that she unfurled onto the grass and sat down, taking off her shoes and curling her feet under her opening her bag and pulling out boxes.

"You packed a picnic?" Daniel asked taking off his shoes and sitting.

"Mmhmm, I thought it'd be nice to get far from Naha and Tomi Village, somewhere...mmm...quieter?"

Daniel laughed. She was right there wasn't a helicopter flying overhead every five seconds.

"Very hard to find quiet. There are 32 military bases on the island and they cover a fourth of the island," she said with a sigh. "But here it's quiet and peaceful. Ah, this is very popular with US soldiers, maybe you will like this?" she said handing each of them a box.

"What is it?" Daniel asked.

She had a mischievous smile on her face. He glanced over at Johnny who was carefully opening his box. It looked kind of like the bentos Mr. Miyagi had made them from the outside. Kumiko was pouring them drinks into little cups she'd pulled out of her bag and humming while she did so.

"Oh! It smells like Mexican food," Johnny said.

Daniel looked back at him, his blue eyes were large and full of surprise.

Kumiko laughed. "Recent invention by Matsuzo Gibo he created it last year and it's kind of strange but all the soldiers love it. It's called taco rice."

"Taco rice," Daniel repeated to himself opening the box. It smelled like what he'd find back home. Chopped tomato, lettuce, cheese, and beef, and below it, peeking through was rice instead of a tortilla. "How do you eat this? Tacos are like handheld food," Daniel asked studying it curiously.

Kumiko unwrapped a cloth and handed him and Johnny spoons.

"Kwacchii sabira" Kumiko said with a grin. "Mmm Okinawan phrase...I'll have a feast."

"Kwacchii sabira," Daniel and Johnny repeated.

Daniel glanced at Johnny who seemed fairly happy with his taco rice. He remembered Johnny telling him he had a favorite taco stand and would eat it on the beach. And now he knew Johnny also sometimes slept on the beach. He was starting to realize Johnny lived on the beach more than anywhere else. Or had.

There was a nice breeze and the wind played through his hair. Kumiko was asking him about California and the ocean there, about the beaches. Johnny was telling her about the sandy beaches and the sun and the palm trees.

"So what's this?" Daniel asked after a while lifting up his cup.

"Shikwasa juice."

It was tart and sweet. A citrus fruit he realized after a sip.

It was nice. To sit in the field on the cliffs overlooking the sea with Kumiko and Johnny. A nice break. A moment without Sato or Chozen. Just friends having a picnic.

"Johnny do you know how to surf?" Kumiko asked.

Daniel turned to her in horror. She was not going to ask about the magazine was she? Had she not understood? Had he not made it clear how embarrassing it was? That he hadn't meant for her to see it. Hadn't even meant to bring it. He just spent so much time looking at it, it'd become a habit. A bad habit. A terribly embarrassing habit. And she was going to tell Johnny about it and he'd heave to run off the edge of the cliff and dive into the ocean.

"I surfed for a bit in middle school," Johnny said.

Daniel looked over at him. He had thought all of the things in the magazines were props. That maybe they'd just handed him things to make it seem like he could do them. A Ken doll that could do everything for the readers to project upon. But Johnny could surf? Had surfed? Did that mean he could do everything in the magazines? That it wasn't just for show? Daniel didn't know what to do with that information.

"Why did you stop?"

"My board broke."

Daniel had seen surfers wipe out sometimes while he'd been on the beach training with Mr. Miyagi. Had felt the strength of the waves on him while trying to balance. He could only imagine being out trying to surf and a board snapping because of a wave. It had to be awful to be battered around like that. But exhilarating every time you caught a wave. Maybe like snowboarding or skateboarding. But on the waves, with the ocean, somewhere Johnny liked to be.

Kumiko nodded thoughtfully. "Hmmm, they can be expensive to replace."

"Yeah," Johnny said softly.

"You are learning sanshin...do you play other instruments?"

"I studied guitar and the drums for a bit."

"You stopped?"

Johnny looked uncomfortable.

"Yeah," he said softly.

"Why? Yuna said. "You looked like you had fun learning sanshin."

"They broke."

Daniel felt cold rush down his spine. A sinking feeling. Maybe the ocean hadn't broken Johnny's board. Maybe it hadn't had a chance to get old and worn and for the ocean to take it away. Maybe something less of a force of nature had snapped it. Something evil.

"Sid?" Daniel whispered before he could catch himself, stop himself.

Johnny looked up surprised, almost like he'd been cornered, caught in a lie he'd never expected anyone to see through. It was more of a confirmation than any words Johnny could say.

Daniel wondered if he could get one free pass from Mr. Miyagi to attack first. Wondered if that could be the exception for this one situation. If Daniel was ever given a time machine the first thing he'd do would be to find Johnny as a kid and make sure he got to go somewhere else. Somewhere safer, away from Sid. Away from Kreese. The problem was, those two led him to find the guys, and led him to Daniel's life. But he wanted more than anything to keep Johnny away from Sid and Kreese for the rest of his life. Put himself between them. Tell them off.

Both seemed willing to throw the first punch. Maybe Daniel could just bait them and get around the defense only use of his karate and not disappoint Mr. Miyagi. There had to be a grey area there.

Kumiko looked between the two of them.

"Who is Sid?"

"Johnny's stepfather," Daniel said more venom than he expected.

He didn't deserve the title. He knew Johnny never called him that. Just called him Sid because father wasn't a word that should've ever been associated with Sid, but it saved time, saved the explanation of the intricacies. He had several more choice rude words he wanted to toss in there, wanted to rant, feeling riled up about it.

Was that why every single issue of the magazine had Johnny doing something different? Why he was like a Ken doll? Because he'd find a hobby and then Sid would destroy it? Everything but karate? No wonder Johnny was so protective of his bonsai. Scared Sid would come in while he wasn't looking and kill it, break the pot and rip the plant to shreds.

When they got home Daniel wasn't letting Johnny go home. He wouldn't let Johnny go back into that house alone. If his mom came back from Fresno he'd ask if Johnny could stay with them. If he got to live at Mr. Miyagi's in that guest house he'd make sure Johnny stayed there too. No excuses, no worries about being in the way, or letting him pull back. He'd hold Johnny's hand and make the place theirs so that Johnny had a safe space to stay.

Ah, Refugees.

Shit. Did Mr. Miyagi know? Was that why Mr. Miyagi had them build the guest house? Because he knew how bad Sid was and was trying to give him somewhere to live that was safe? Had he realized Johnny was in need of a place to lay his head at night that wasn't his car or the beach?

Daniel needed to do something nice for Mr. Miyagi. For taking a look at the two of them in vastly different situations and saying those two boys should stay here, I don't have space for them so I'll build them a space.

Daniel wanted that so badly. To go home with Mr. Miyagi and Johnny and live in the guest house with Johnny.

Kumiko looked at him surprised then leaned forward and gently patted Johnny's shoulder.

"I have a cousin with a surf shop. If you are here long enough, we can go surfing," she said smiling warmly at him.

"Don't expect too much," Johnny said. "It's been a long time."

"Maybe like...what is the saying? Like riding a bike? You'll remember when you're on the board."

Daniel smiled softly. He wanted to see Johnny surfing. Thought it might be a fun way to work on balance. Something Johnny was impressively good at. Mr. Miyagi would approve of it. He wondered if Mr. Miyagi would be good at it.

After their peaceful and leisurely picnic lunch, Kumiko drove them back south, back towards Naha. She promised to show them around, explaining the busy city near the airport.

The city was busy. Crowded, noisier. She found parking for her white car and they got out wandering around.

"It's so hot," Daniel complained, his shirt sticking to his skin. He pulled on it with a frown.

Kumiko looked at him and grinned then grabbed his hand and Johnny's and pulled them down the busy streets to a little shop. She pulled them in and it felt like they'd stepped foot back into the USA. It looked like an old-school diner with English everywhere and little bits of Japanese and Okinawan.

It took Daniel only a second to catch on and he pulled out his wallet stepping forward.

"What flavor should we get?" he asked Kumiko.

He'd win this time. He'd treat them.

Johnny was distracted, looking around, it was a perfect time.

"Salt," she whispered to him with a grin.

"Salt?" he asked looking at her incredulously.

She nodded so sincerely. He sighed and motioned with his head for her to grab a seat with Johnny. She smiled, hooking her arm through Johnny's and talking softly to him, pulling him over to one of the booths.

"Three uh salt?" Daniel said walking up to the counter.

The guy nodded going to work. He looked over to where Kumiko and Johnny were sitting. They looked so at ease around each other.

If only this could've been their trip. A vacation overseas meeting a new friend who showed them around. A trip where Johnny and Daniel could just wander around trying new things, exploring, learning.

He wondered if they could do it again someday. Come back to Okinawa or go somewhere else.

They'd plan it next time. So there'd be actual time to study and Johnny wouldn't stay up all night at the library studying. They'd talk about the things they wanted to do and come up with a plan of what they wanted to do.

One day maybe.

He'd add it to the list. It was always growing. He couldn't believe

Chicago and its thick pizza was still on the list, but it was. All sorts of places back home and now he was expanding the places they could go.

He'd save up, treat Johnny to some nice trip eventually.

He wondered what it'd be like if Kumiko visited them in LA. He thought of her meeting the guys and the thought was kind of funny. He wondered if they'd behave or not.

If she'd be thrilled.

They'd for sure show her around everywhere just like she was showing them around.

He wanted to reciprocate it. It'd be fun to have international visitors. He could cook for her, have Johnny help. He liked teaching Johnny how to cook, liked watching him work, liked showing off his own skills.

They could pick her up from the airport and show her the palm trees and the Hollywood sign and go to games and maybe visit the tar pits and go to amusement parks.

He paid and put his wallet away.

In small moments he could forget. Forget that they were in Okinawa because of Mr. Miyagi's father had died. That Sato had only given them three days and they were running out of them. That they probably shouldn't be out and about doing whatever they wanted. That they should've grabbed Mr. Miyagi and run to the airport.

But Mr. Miyagi probably wouldn't go for it. To come home just to bury his father and then leave again.

To meet Yukie again and then leave her behind.

It'd be too painful.

Daniel would've fought tooth and nail if anyone had tried to ship him off the day or two after his Dad had died. He couldn't ask Mr. Miyagi to do that.

The worker gave him his ice cream and he walked over towards where Kumiko and Johnny sat.

Johnny looked surprised. "I don't have-"

"My treat," Daniel said pushing a cone into his hand and sinking down next to him, pressing in close. He hooked his arm around the back of the booth behind Johnny. "But don't thank me, Kumiko said we had to try the salt flavor."

"Salt?" Johnny asked.

"Yes!" she said with a grin. "It's very popular. Actually salt is a big thing here. We have 150 different types of it."

"150? I thought there was only one type of salt. Table salt," Daniel said with a frown.

From a quick glance at Johnny, it looked like he also was struggling with the idea.

"We also flavor it. So you can get something like chocolate salt," she said with a smile. "But this is just basic salt ice cream. Try it! It's delicious!"

Daniel still had some reservations but Johnny was digging in, his tongue dragging across the ice cream, head tilted slightly for a better angle and he looked like he liked it.

Daniel felt something cold on his hands and realized his ice cream was melting.

His heart was pounding in his ears. He had to stomp down the desire to lean over and kiss Johnny, to feel that tongue on his own again, thinking about how it might feel elsewhere.

He had to look away or else he'd make a mistake. He'd make a fool of himself in front of Kumiko and in public and now was not the time or place.

He ate his ice cream. It worked. It was delicious. Salty and sweet. Delightfully cold.

Kumiko was talking about something but Daniel couldn't focus. It took a while longer to get calm again than he'd expected.

The whole trip he felt unbalanced. Like he'd tripped on the way off the plane and was still hopping, trying not to fall flat on his face.

It was only in the mornings or evenings when he was practicing that he felt grounded.

Johnny was talking softly at his side and Daniel wanted to listen. Tried to focus. He was talking about snow. About going into the mountains a couple of times of a year to snowboard with his friends. Was talking about his friends fondly. What they wanted to do, the ones that knew.

They'd finished their ice cream and looked ready to go, ready to take the conversation on the road.

"What do you wanna do? What are your dreams?" Daniel asked Kumiko.

"Okay, I'll show you my dream," she said leading them across the street and to a window display with TVs in it, motioning to the woman behind them to change the channel.

Daniel tried guessing what she wanted to do. Each guess was wrong and Kumiko laughed at each silly guess like she was finally starting to understand his jokes.

Soft classical music played and the laughter ended and Kumiko pointed.

"No, there," she said.

A ballerina was dancing on the screen.

"That is my dream," she spoke in awe of a dream that seemed out of reach. Daniel wondered why asked where she was studying.

"No schools for this kind of dancing in Okinawa."

No wonder she sounded so sad. Her dream was out of reach. Unless she could go elsewhere.

He wondered if they could take Kumiko home with them. There were so many dance studios in LA. He was sure the guys would know of a good one or would be able to find her a good one. She could use it like a study abroad. She would become a famous dancer one day and they could go to her shows, cheer her on from the audience, throw flowers at her when she came out to take her bow.

He turned hearing someone calling Kumiko's name, pressing a flyer into her hand.

"Come to the dance tonight, oh bring your friends," the guy said after taking Johnny and Daniel in with a smile.

He darted back off into the crowd with his flyers to pass more out as Kumiko looked at them. "Like to go to dance?"

But Daniel had caught sight of something across the street that made his veins fill with ice.

He mumbled something about Sato's dojo, about needing to see it.

He heard Kumiko's warnings about Chozen but he had to see it.

He had to know what Sato's dojo looked like.

The dojo of a man who was destroying his own sensei's life. Who'd chased off his best friend over 40 years ago.

A man who sold off parts of his heritage, who sold away all the fish in the sea, who made the villagers rent land from him to sell their vegetables, a man who took a defensive karate taught from father to son and taught it the military service members from the USA after a terrible war had ended. A man whose greed seemed to know no bounds.

Would it be like the Cobra Kai dojo? Mats on the floor, mirrored walls, and trophies in cases everywhere? Would there be a cardboard cutout of Sato like there had been of Kreese? What did the fighting style look like? A warped corrupted version of Mr. Miyagi's karate?

He walked up to the window and watched as Chozen taught, had four men attack him at once, one holding his hands behind his back and he quickly knocked them all out.

Daniel felt his heart sink.

How were they going to win against that? If Chozen wanted to kill him he'd have to fight with everything he had.

He'd have to master the drum technique.

He turned to Kumiko. "He's not bad."

"He's Sato's number-one student."

Daniel turned to look at Johnny who was looking into the studio, watching. He wondered if Johnny could do that. If that was something Kreese had taught him. How to fight groups of people with his hands behind his back. Or maybe he'd learned how to take those styles of hits early on. As a kid.

It had been a bad idea, he realized suddenly. To try and do some investigation, to try and see Sato's dojo and watch Chozen teach.

Johnny too had been a bad man's number one student.

He reached out grabbing Johnny's hand, pulling him away from the window, away from Sato's dojo.

It wasn't the same. But it was close enough to worry Daniel about where Johnny's head would go.

Johnny came along, hesitating only a moment, before following Daniel, not pulling his hand away as Kumiko led them down one of the pedestrian market streets in Naha and away from Sato's dojo and Chozen.

Away from danger.

Breaking Ice

The marketplace was crowded and full of souvenirs and clothes. Kumiko pulled them into a shop full of what looked an awful lot like the same style shirt that Chozen always wore.

"They look like Hawaiian shirts," Daniel said.

"Kariyushi shirts," Kumiko said with a smile, she grabbed one off the rack and held it up to Johnny, studying it and looking from it up at him than shaking her head and putting it back.

"Oh! these ones are bashofu!" she said feeling the fabric between her fingers.

"What's that?" Daniel asked.

"The fabric is made from banana plants," she said with a smile. "We've been doing it since the days of the old kings. Before Japan. Before USA. We actually have a lot of traditional textiles...let's see," she hummed walking past to another section looking around.

She grabbed one again and held it up to Daniel and then nodded her approval before looking around some more, glancing from the rack to Johnny. "I think we'll do bingata style. It's more colorful."

She studied it for a moment, picked one, and draped it over her arm.

"This is very nice Kumiko, but-" Johnny started.

He couldn't afford the shirt she'd picked out for him. He couldn't afford anything anymore. Maybe a single postcard was about it. She looked so excited, he felt bad.

"No no," Kumiko said waving Johnny off. "Gift, hmm? Besides, I'll get a better deal than you," she said confidently walking over to the seller, talking to her rapidly in Okinawan.

Johnny felt a little at loss. He didn't know how to repay her. But she did indeed get a better deal from the looks of it and the big smile on her face, heading towards them with her bag of shirts.

She looked down at the flyer, still in her hand that she'd been given by her friend thoughtfully. "Fifties style. Hmm. Let me think where we can find that."

She hooked her arms through Johnny's and Daniel's and pulled them back out into the busy marketplace, walking in and out of different shops, talking to the owners asking for what she was looking for.

It was nice to look at everything, it was all so different from what he was used to. It was a maze. He tried remembering. He usually was fairly good about direction, navigating unfamiliar places, but he had no clue where they were in the marketplace or how to get back to where they'd been if he got lost.

But Daniel held his hand and Kumiko pulled the both of them along, checking back to make sure they were still with her every once in a while, talking about the market and one shop or another having the best of something. About that one had a cat that everyone liked to visit and sure enough there was the cat and they stopped to watch it sleep amongst the wares completely uncaring of them being so close. She pointed out little souvenirs, explained which ones were popular and why going through the history of everything.

Then she was talking about dance. Her eyes lit up about it as she looked through stores, keeping the conversation going in between conversations with the shop owners. Telling them about the different dances they hosted some times in Naha and how it was different than the ones she did for o-bon. She talked about teaching the kids, how their parents trusted her to make sure they knew what they were doing and how it was hard but rewarding because it was dance and not everyone got to find jobs similar to their dreams, even though it wasn't exactly her dream. Daniel asked her questions, soaking up everything she said.

Johnny wished he had more money. If he hadn't spent it all getting them there, he could set up a scholarship or something for her so she could study somewhere and join a troupe. All he could do however was carry her bags.

She told them she was getting really good deals on her shopping and not to worry. She'd bought a poodle skirt and something for her hair. Her costume was put together. She was looking for something for them now. Looking through button-up bowling shirts and leather jackets.

"Aha!" she said pulling out a black one. She took the bags out of Johnny's hands and handed them to Daniel. "Try this one," Kumiko said pushing it into his hands.

Johnny could not afford a black leather jacket and he doubted it'd fit. His shoulders were broader than most people he'd seen around, other than the service members and he hadn't seen many of them in the marketplace.

But Kumiko was looking at him expectantly, eyes all bright.

So he tried it on. It fit.

She clapped her hands delighted. A guy walked over, the shop owner, and leaned against the rack of clothes talking to Kumiko.

Daniel walked up to him, shifting the bags in his arms and reaching up to fix his collar.

"It does look nice," Daniel said quietly, thoughtful. "Do you actually want to go to this dance?" he asked.

Johnny looked up, past Daniel at Kumiko, she was laughing at something the salesperson was saying and then back at Daniel whose hands were on the edges of the jacket.

"She's spent all day showing us around, taking time to play tour guide for free for us. She likes to dance. I think we owe her, to take her out and make sure she has fun. Make her feel like a princess, you know?"

Daniel's head was tilted, studying him, mulling it over.

"It's the least we can do," Johnny said. "I know how to dance, do you?"

Daniel laughed. "I've been my Ma's dance partner for years, I can definitely dance." The statement was delivered as if Johnny has issued him a challenge on par with asking if he knew how to cook Italian food.

"Then we have nothing to worry about. We'll give her a night to remember," Johnny said softly.

He knew how to be a gentleman, had taken plenty of girls out dancing at Sid's request over the years, before Ali. Had spent his middle school years as an escort for girls doing cotillion at the country club. The parents loved it. Where all the focus was on them and he was just an accessory.

This would be different, but he could still dance. And he'd make sure Kumiko had fun. It was the best thing he could do to thank her for everything. Even if he didn't leave with the jacket. He'd find something. He had some jeans in his bag, he could roll up the bottoms and put on a plain t-shirt and it'd be the same, almost.

Kumiko walked back to them with a big grin on her face. "Okay!" she said holding out a bag. "Got a huge sale! You can wear this tonight."

Johnny took off the jacket and stared at her in surprise.

She smiled at him. "Don't worry," she said. "We'll have lots of fun."

She took the jacket and put it in one of the bags with everything else and Johnny took them back from Daniel and her. She hooked her arm through Daniel's. "All that's left is to find something for you."

"I don't need anything, it's fine." Daniel protested.

"Must look nice for dancing," she said with a big smile.

Johnny followed them through the crowd for a bit.

He let his pace slow. It was almost like a date. If he just stopped walking it could be one. If he just let himself disappear into the crowd they could continue their date without him. He could find Mr. Miyagi who was supposed to be in Naha getting a replacement part for the fridge and he'd see them later.

He wondered if he could return the jacket. But it was a gift and he wanted to go. He hadn't danced for fun in...a long time and he was curious what a fifties-themed dance in Okinawa would look like.

He stopped walking.

They turned the corner.

There was a statue. One of those he saw a lot and hadn't had a chance to see it up close. He wandered over. He studied the carving in the stone. It was an animal he just couldn't decide what kind of creature it was. What it was supposed to be.

"It's a Shīsā."

Johnny turned. The damn island really was too small. Driving had made it seem like it was vast.

"There's always two of them," Chozen said pointing to the other on the other side of the path. "This one," he tapped the stone of the Shīsā they stood in front of, "is to keep bad things away." He motioned again to the other "And that one's to keep good things in."

Clearly, it wasn't working.

Chozen shoved his hands in his pockets. He was wearing a white shirt with a red and black pattern. "So where's the coward and the baby?"

Johnny frowned, he thought they'd cleared up the coward thing.

"Daniel is actually older than me."

Chozen blinked in surprise and then laughed. "So you're baby?"

"He's stronger than he looks."

"Uh-huh, sure. Tell me, why do you call that coward sensei? He didn't teach you for this," Chozen said reaching out and squeezing Johnny's bicep. "No way a coward taught you."

"Mr. Miyagi saved my life," Johnny said. "He's no coward. He gave me a bonsai. He's been there when I needed him, and he's teaching me what I need to learn."

"A bonsai," Chozen said with a laugh. "I could get you a bonsai, would you call me sensei then? Is it that easy?"

Johnny sighed, he'd just completely brushed over the saved his life part. Only hearing what he wanted. "I'm lucky to have him be my teacher."

"Yet you hand out the title sensei so easily. I heard you gave it to a child. A little girl. If a little girl could be your sensei then I for sure could be your sensei."

"What could you even teach me?" Johnny asked.

Chozen's fingers were digging into his arm, a challenge he was sure. But Johnny didn't think he'd fight out in the open like this. Johnny wouldn't have.

"So many things," Chozen said. "Come to my dojo and I'll show you."

"Isn't it your uncle's dojo?"

"He's rarely there, it's practically mine. I teach men stronger than you all the time. They're always so ready to learn, to work hard, they call me sensei because I earned it. Because I mastered something and have courage. I do not run away from fights and my students don't either. You don't look like you'd run," Chozen said standing tall, getting into Johnny's space.

"Oh I run," Johnny said. "I run all the time."

Chozen laughed. "I mean from a fight. I want to see how you'd fight. What your last sensei taught you."

"He wasn't honorable. He doesn't deserve that title."

"And a girl and a coward do?"

"Yuna was teaching me how to play the sanshin. Mr. Miyagi is teaching me karate and how to fix things."

Chozen looked thoughtful for a moment before, "Your sensei's time is running out. Jump ship before it sinks with you on it."

"How would that be honorable? Wouldn't that be cowardly?"

How did he not hear himself? How did he not realize nothing he said made sense? Was he that twisted up? Had Johnny been?

Chozen frowned shaking his head. "You've picked the wrong side."

"You just don't know them. You're too...angry," Johnny said. When he'd been angry it'd been so hard to see fact instead of fiction. It felt like the whole world was against him. "Right? Like everything is shifting under your feet and changing and you just wanted everything to stay the same? Life changes and you've got to adapt, if you stay angry, Chozen you will destroy yourself. It'll burn you up."

Chozen laughed, "Don't worry about me baby, but come to the dojo if you change your mind. I'll give you a real lesson in the Miyagi style karate."

He walked away back into the crowd and Johnny frowned. It never seemed to get through. But people only heard what they wanted to hear.

He should've told Chozen to leave Daniel alone. Should've tried to be a little more intimidating.

But he was trying to keep his promise. To follow the Miyagi-do rules. Not to start fights.

He didn't want to let Mr. Miyagi down. He didn't want to fight.

He looked through the crowd trying to remember which way Daniel and Kumiko had gone down. He remembered a bit and headed in that way.

He saw Daniel through the crowd, hopping up trying to catch sight of something through the crowd, he was facing the other way. But it was easy to pick him out of the crowd.

Johnny walked up to him and then stopped.

"What are you looking for?" Johnny asked.

"A tall blonde idiot that got lost in the crowd," Daniel said stopping his jumping and turning towards Johnny with a frown. He smacked Johnny' on the arm, "What even happened? You were right behind us and then you weren't, didn't we already talk about this in New York? Do I seriously have to hold your hand every second?"

Johnny wanted to say yes. Wanted to always be by his side. But one day Daniel would pull away and he'd have to let him.

"I'm sorry for worrying you."

Daniel held out his hand. He looked angry. The way he thrust his hand out between them palm up.

"I should've told Kumiko that you do this. You worried her too you know," he said sourly.

"I'll apologize to her too," Johnny said holding his hand over Daniel's, hovering, hesitating.

If Daniel knew would he be so willing to hold his hand? If he knew that Johnny liked him more than a friend? It felt like he was taking advantage of Daniel's friendly actions. Maybe sharing a bed with him was also too much. Torturing himself by being a wolf pretending to be a sheep. Daniel let out a huff of air and caught Johnny's hesitating hand in his own.

"I swear-" Daniel sighed sounding almost like Bobby for a second, enough to make Johnny homesick and amused at the same time. "Listen, I don't know why you're pulling away, but stop it. Everything is fine. Okay? I mean it."

Daniel turned and pulled Johnny along towards where Kumiko was coming out of a shop. She had another bag on her wrist and she looked up at him with a look so full of relief that Johnny felt awful.

"I'm sorry, I wanted to look at the Shīsā. It's not a good excuse, I'm sorry for worrying you."

Daniel's hand tightened around his.

"I should've mentioned he's a flight risk," Daniel said with a sigh. "No matter where we go I lose him at least once."

Daniel looked up at him with a frown, brows knit, "Is it out of your system now? I don't want to make this a habit. Okay? I'm going to have to get you one of this kid leash backpacks if this keeps up."

"Kid leash backpacks?" Kumiko asked curious and confused.

Johnny looked at him horrified. It wouldn't happen. He would run for the hills.

Daniel laughed. "It's for parents whose kids keep wandering off."

"Ah," Kumiko said like she understood, but her brows were still knit in confusion.

She hooked her arm through Johnny's on the other side, tight. They walked together out of the market and back into the busy street. They stopped by Kumiko's white car and put their shopping in the trunk, before continuing on down the street.

"Maybe we'll run into Mr. Miyagi out here," Daniel said.

"Oh. Why would he be here?"

"He said he had to come into town to get a part for his refrigerator or something."

"Oh, I know that store. It's right around the corner."

There was a shop they were getting near with a lot of noise coming out of it. Daniel slowed bringing their group to a standstill. He clearly wanted to go in.

Kumiko clearly didn't from the way she was gently trying to pull Johnny away from the place, to keep going to where Mr. Miyagi surely was.

But Daniel was going in, was pulling Johnny in, which meant they all were going.

They made their way through the loud crowd. Johnny spotted one of Chozen's friends catch sight of them and leave through the door while Daniel was taking it all in.

Johnny frowned.

This wasn't going to go well.

They should leave, should heed Kumiko's advice.

That guy was going to bring Chozen and then who knew what would happen.

A bar fight?

It had the atmosphere of a bar.

And if Chozen taught all the service members in town who wanted to learn how to fight they wouldn't get any sympathy.

They'd pick Chozen's side.

They'd be outnumbered.

They found their way to a table with a wooden platform with slots in it full of sheets of ice. They watched a guy slam his hand into one, shattering it and then bouncing away wincing and holding his hand.

It was like breaking boards, but ice instead. But he did it wrong.

The next guy who went up was all hyped up. Ready for brute force, standing wrong and unfocused.

Kumiko was standing behind them, holding onto their shirts like she was trying to pull them away but almost too scared to move.

Daniel's eyes flicked over the guy readying himself to go. Everyone was making bets.

"This guy's standing wrong," Daniel said turning to tell Kumiko.

Did Daniel not realize they were right next to the guy? Did he not realize that they were in a bar full of military guys and they were all drunk in the middle of the afternoon? Blowing off steam and Daniel was telling them they were standing wrong.

Johnny moved, stepping in front of Daniel. Daniel kept talking. The guy hit more of the ice than the first one. But Daniel wouldn't stop talking.

Now of all times he couldn't stop. Couldn't get him to talk most of the trip. In weird moments where he just stared. But now?

The guy heard him. Was whirling around, ready to see if Daniel could put money where his mouth was. Then there was Chozen rushing towards them like a bull blocking their exit with his friends. The crowd wouldn't let them leave. Not without a fight. Not easily. While they were focused on Daniel, Kumiko slipped out through the crowd.

"I'll do it, leave Daniel alone," Johnny said.

"No no, he's the one who seems to know best, he's the one to try it," Chozen said smiling darkly down at Daniel.

Like a cat toying with a mouse.

If Daniel messed up he could break his hand.

If he wasn't ready, he could shatter the bones.

But Daniel was smart. He always knew what he was talking about. No matter how worried Johnny was, no matter how thrown Daniel probably was by Chozen's sudden appearance

Daniel would know what to do. It was basic board breaking. Just a little different. With a twist.

Daniel was telling Chozen he wouldn't do it. He was trying to avoid confrontation. Trying to avoid a fight. The way they promised they would. To try and stay safe. Probably catching that look in Chozen's eye, that this wouldn't go well.

If Daniel lost he'd be hurt.

If he won Chozen would be more pissed.

"You have a choice, broken ice or broken neck."

"How is that a choice?" Johnny asked, trying to step between them, to get Daniel some breathing room. "Neither of those is a good option."

Chozen didn't look at him, staring at Daniel, not letting Johnny get between them. "This doesn't concern you baby."

Daniel glared up at Chozen. He looked pissed.

"He's got to break all three right?" someone asked.

Everyone was taking bets. Betting against Daniel because of his small frame. If Johnny had money he'd put it on Daniel winning.

"Wrong!" Chozen said hand shooting out to point at the person who was in charge of the bets. "All six," he said slowly like it was the best idea he'd ever had.

Daniel looked at the ice, calculating as the bets were being collected.

Johnny wondered if he should try and grab Daniel and run. He could hide Daniel behind him.

"All bets in," the man called while Chozen laughed.

"Not all bets. Not yet," Mr. Miyagi said coming through the crowd followed by Yukie and Kumiko.

Chozen stood out of the way for him. Almost like he held some respect despite how much he talked. But he still was looking down at the two angrily. Still in a fighting bull mode.

Daniel smiled at Mr. Miyagi, shoulders relaxing totally relieved to see him. "Boy, am I glad to see you here."

"No worry nothing. Miyagi fix everything." Mr. Miyagi said softly.

He shifted slightly between Chozen and Daniel now that there was space, following where Chozen had moved. Chozen wouldn't have a clear shot anymore and some of the tension left Johnny as well.

"What odds?" Mr. Miyagi asked looking around.

"Three to one he does not make through ice," Chozen said sounding too pleased with himself.

"How many pieces?"

"Six."

Daniel dropped his voice to a whisper, jerking his head to the door, recommending they leave.

It made sense, Mr. Miyagi didn't fight. Kumiko had said this was a bad place. Mr. Miyagi would surely walk them out. But there'd been something about saying he was going to place a bet that gave Johnny pause. Reminded him of Mr. Miyagi at the Cobra Kai dojo looking up at the All-Valley tournament poster and recommending they have a truce till then. Make everything fairer.

Mr. Miyagi knew how to swerve from what you expected to do.

Mr. Miyagi pulled out a thick pile of bills and held it up as he spoke, looking Daniel in the eyes as he did so.

"$600 say he breaks all six," Mr. Miyagi said.

It was that faith he had in Daniel like last time. Like all the times before that Daniel could do things Daniel wasn't sure of. But this time Johnny had a feeling Mr. Miyagi was right. Daniel knew how to stand, knew all the basics of what to do, had watched those before him fail. Daniel was stronger and smarter than people thought and maybe even more than he knew.

"I cannot cover that," Chozen said.

"You are covered," Sato said walking in.

Why was this island like this? It was bigger than a person would think and yet they were always tripping over one another. Always running into one another. Like magnets, only Johnny desperately wished for more space. For everything to be different.

Daniel also looked horrified. But Johnny knew if he could've he would've done the same thing. Put all his bets on Daniel.

Yukie came over with Kumiko and they stood next to Johnny. Kumiko looked so nervous and clung to his side. He gently patted her shoulder.

"It'll be fine."

"How do you know?" she asked.

"You know how we looked in the dojo and saw Chozen fighting? How it showed off how he knew what he could do? Strategy?"

"Yeah."

"This is like that. But for Daniel. He doesn't really like fighting. He likes karate, he likes studying it. And he knows everything he needs to do."

"But the other guy was bigger and he couldn't."

"The difference is Daniel," Johnny said smiling at her. "He's smart and much stronger than he looks. Besides does Mr. Miyagi look nervous?"

"No."

"Then we shouldn't be either right?"

They watched Daniel walk up to the ice with Mr. Miyagi, how he took a moment to breathe, to center himself, the way he stood. It was the right stance, the form was correct, as long as his movements were confident he'd be fine.

He moved fast, a quick strike with a shout and his hand went through all six sheets of ice.

The ladies on either side of Johnny let out cries of joy, squeezing his arms.

Johnny watched Daniel, the look of surprise and delight on his face, surprised that he'd done it. Like he underestimated himself, underestimate his strength and his knowledge. His hand found Johnny's and he gripped it warmly.

A look of did you see me?

Of course he had, Johnny hadn't taken his eyes off of him.

He followed them to collect Mr. Miyagi's winnings and to head out the door.

The problem was if this would be like throwing oil on a fire.

Winning would be seen as a slight. Even though Daniel had been backed into a corner, not allowed out except to do as was requested. By doing it, and not only doing it well but by winning money out of it...it would be like a thorn for Chozen and Sato.

It would make them angrier.

Even though it wasn't something Daniel had asked for. He hadn't wanted to do it. Had just been curious. Had just talked. And it got him into trouble.

There would've been no winning. And even though Daniel looked so happy, Johnny knew it'd been like poking a bear.

Chozen and Sato wouldn't realize it. Wouldn't take a break to notice that the anger there had been their own doing.

They'd fight back, it'd be worse.

Daniel grabbed Johnny's hand, pulling him towards the door of the bar where Johnny had hesitated, wondering if he could break through to them, to tell them to change course before things got worse.

He'd glanced back at Sato staring straight ahead upset in just the barest tic of his jaw and Chozen looking pissed.

Daniel was talking a mile a minute to Mr. Miyagi as they stepped out into the sunlight. Mr. Miyagi handed a large wad of the cash over to Daniel with a warm smile.

Johnny heard fast footsteps behind them and turned. Chozen looked like he had a thousand things to say but looked so pissed that he couldn't get a single one of them out.

Johnny realized there was nothing he could say. Chozen was too pissed. Anything would lead to a fight.

He turned to notice that Daniel and Kumiko aware of the danger but not worried. Both of them looked at Johnny and hooked their arms through his pulling him along towards the Chinese food that Mr. Miyagi said they'd get for dinner with the winnings.

"Hey Daniel," Johnny said. He had to say something before the day got too far gone from them.

"Hmm?" Daniel asked as they crossed the street.

"That was really cool."

Daniel looked up at him and grinned. He looked so damn happy, so pleased that Johnny for a moment could bask in the warmth of it and ignore the storm cloud he knew was brewing.

An Island Both Big and Too Small

The sun stayed up so late in Okinawa in the summer. After a dinner in Naha they rode back in the two cars to Tomi Village and Daniel felt great. The sun was shining and the skies were clear and blue.

It was almost like winning the All-Valley again. With the odds stacked against him and surprising everyone including himself. But this time they'd won money and Mr. Miyagi had split it with him and he hadn't had to fight anyone. Just ice. He'd done more than all those big military guys. Guys who could barely break one or two.

And Johnny. Johnny told him he'd been cool. Johnny. The epitome of a cool guy.

He wanted to remember this day for the rest of his life. He'd learned a new trick he could do, wondered if he could replicate it again back home. Impress his mother and the guys.

He went to the dojo after they got back to study the pictures of the Miyagi's past on the walls. That jubilant feeling dissipating.

He wondered if they taught the way Mr. Miyagi did. What did people do before cars? What was there to clean in the same way? Windows?

He wondered if they would be as worried as he was for Mr. Miyagi.

They were running out of time and Mr. Miyagi had made no move to get them going, to get them home. That deadline would fall on them and it was going to be awful. No amount of cool ice breaking would save them.

He wished all these old Miyagi teachers could tell him what to do. How to help Mr. Miyagi.

"Oh, Daniel-san, I thought you have date," Mr. Miyagi said slipping out of his shoes at the door.

"Yeah I was just waiting for Kumiko," Daniel said turning.

She'd promised to bring him the thing she'd bought for him while he was out looking for Johnny.

Mr. Miyagi's smile faltered for a moment, just ever so brief that Daniel almost didn't notice.

He didn't think about it as Kumiko appeared with his shirt for the dance, and before he knew it he was back in Kumiko's car wearing it, worrying about Mr. Miyagi, worrying about the fact Mr. Miyagi had told Chozen he was a farmer, worrying about the destroyed garden, the end of his time of mourning.

He leaned against Johnny who was wearing a soft t-shirt under the black leather jacket with his jeans that he'd rolled the cuffs up on.

He hoped Johnny could keep Kumiko happy because he felt awful. All the good had been sucked out by worry.

Kumiko was dressed in a poodle-style skirt with snowflakes on it and a white collared short sleeve shirt and looked so happy. Daniel wanted to be happy with her but he just couldn't.

"Could you dance with her first?" Daniel asked Johnny quietly when they walked into the dance club. "I need a moment."

"Yeah. But you sure?" Johnny asked.

Daniel nodded giving Kumiko a weak smile. "Johnny's going to be your first dance if that's okay."

She nodded, grinned up at Johnny, grabbing his hand and darting into the crowd. They moved across the floor and Daniel leaned against one of the walls.

Johnny was light on his feet, spinning Kumiko around. She was laughing. Having a blast. And Johnny looked charming, made it look easy.

Daniel got himself a soda.

He thought it'd bother him, watching them dance.

But it wasn't like school with all the girls. Johnny made it sound like it was their duty to dance with Kumiko and show her a good time.

They were friends. Becoming good friends. Johnny needed all of those he could get.

And she knew. She knew Daniel liked Johnny. Had caught on so fast it was almost suspicious. Though Daniel didn't know how.

Maybe he just couldn't hide his feelings as well as he thought.

His mother knew after all. Had noticed almost immediately but hadn't said anything.

Which just meant the only one it wasn't obvious to was the most important person and he didn't know how he felt about that.

Johnny's eyes met his from across the room.

A check-in.

He'd been doing that a lot since they got in Okinawa. Searching for Daniel, catching his eyes and raising an eyebrow, a quick check.

A quick and wordless you okay?

He wondered how he did that. Knew how to check in with someone from across the room. It was so easy to read, so easy to know it was for him. All that concern.

Daniel raised his soda in cheers and gave him a nod.

Johnny could dance. He knew that. Had seen him with Ali. But that had been basic. Simple.

This had more moves. He was keeping up with Kumiko and it was impressive.

Daniel wanted to take Johnny dancing somewhere where the two of them could dance. He thought maybe Johnny would be the easiest dance partner he'd ever had.

He already studied him every moment he could. He was sure that that'd translate well to dancing.

Kumiko really was a dancer. As couples moved around the floor none danced quite like her. And all tired much faster than she did.

Daniel caught a slight shift in Johnny's shoulders. He was starting to tire. But he'd keep dancing with her as long as she wanted. It was just how he'd been trained. It soured something in Daniel's stomach.

He'd finished his drink and hurried out to trade and let him rest.

He walked quickly across the floor catching Johnny's eyes and nodding holding his hands out ready.

Johnny spun Kumiko across the floor straight into Daniel's arms.

"Hope you don't mind," he said with a small smile.

She was so happy, it was infectious and Daniel liked dancing. Liked looking out and catching Johnny's eye from across the room, showing off. Maybe he needed to blow off some steam and maybe this was perfect.

He felt better moving to the music.

He liked knowing Johnny was watching him. Every time he looked out for him he was there, sitting and watching, blue eyes on him, like he was the only one worth watching in the place and it made him happy.

Gave him hope that things like this worked. Maybe a day like this where they'd had fun and he'd broken ice and showed off, where he got to dance was better than taking Johnny out on dates in California or New York. Maybe it was clearer.

He didn't know. But he hoped. And it was nice to have hope after what had felt like a hopeless couple of days.

When Kumiko finally tired they walked towards where Johnny was sitting.

"Feeling better?" Johnny asked.

"Yeah, much," Daniel said.

"You guys want drinks?" Johnny asked.

"Yes, please," Kumiko said.

Daniel grabbed Johnny's arm pressing some cash from his wallet into his hand. He half expected Johnny to fight him about it. It looked like he was about to, and then he didn't.

"What do you guys want?" Johnny asked.

"Melon soda," Kumiko said with a smile.

"I'll have what she's having," Daniel said smiling at him, so tired but finally relaxed.

Johnny nodded walking off to go get their drinks.

He wondered if maybe when they went back out on the floor if he could get the courage up to ask Johnny to dance. If he acted casual about it. Acted like it was the most normal thing in the world and not something that made him feel weak in the knees.

"Are you going to ask him to dance?" Kumiko asked leaning forward, voice low and conspiratorial.

"Thinking about it," Daniel said.

"He's a very good dancer," Kumiko said with a smile.

"Yeah? Better than me?" Daniel asked, teasing.

"Different," Kumiko said with an amused smile. "You have different styles, but they're both very fun."

Daniel sighed letting his hand fall to the table between them. "If only it was that easy."

"Could be, if you just ask. You won't know unless you ask."

"Okay, yeah, you're right," Daniel said sitting up a little taller. "I'll ask."

A beer bottle slammed onto their table making them jump.

Daniel looked up feeling his heart sink. It was Chozen. What the hell? He'd seen Chozen three or maybe four times that day. It was like a damn curse. Why wouldn't he just leave them alone?

He looked too at ease. Too pleased with himself. He had something slung over his shoulder.

"Hey," Kumiko said standing up. "That's Johnny's jacket."

Daniel looked again. He was holding it over his shoulder like a prize.

"What did you do to Johnny?" Daniel asked worry and panic flooding through his veins.

Chozen grinned grabbing Daniel's shirt and hauling him up, across the floor, and slamming him into a wall.

"We made a trade," Chozen said with a grin. "I promised I wouldn't kill you today. I didn't however promise not to take back my money."

"Did you hurt him?" Daniel asked between gritted teeth.

"Tell me, why does he hang out with you? What's so interesting?"

"Did you hurt him?" Daniel asked again.

His patience was fleeing.

"Barely touched him," Chozen said.

Daniel didn't like that.

He tried to see past Chozen, out into the dance hall to see if he could make out Johnny.

He felt like if there'd been a fight he would've heard it. But Daniel hadn't seen Johnny fight since the All-Valley. Not since they'd fought.

He worried that Johnny wouldn't fight back. Wouldn't defend himself. And that that promise he'd made Johnny make would hold him back.

He worried they would've just crowded in, hit him, and walked away, like they always did to Daniel.

Chozen stepped back. One of his friends had grabbed Kumiko and covered her mouth so no one would hear her shouts.

His other friend landed a hit to Daniel's abdomen while he was distracted, worried about her.

"Don't worry we'll take your friends home," Chozen said taking Daniel's wallet and removing all the cash, tossing it to the floor.

He laughed, counting his money.

Daniel only had a moment. He could take the cheapest shot of his whole life and then he'd have to get Kumiko free and they'd have to run. They'd have to find Johnny fast.

Chozen was distracted, wasn't on guard. He never seemed to expect Daniel to do anything.

Daniel was sick of it. Tired of Chozen. Tired of his friends ruining his days, his nights. He didn't want to see him anymore.

He picked up his wallet, curled his fingers into a fist, and struck.

Chozen crumpled to the ground and Daniel stood grabbing the money.

Kumiko slammed her foot on the guy holding her's foot.

Daniel hesitated only a moment.

He couldn't retrieve the jacket, it'd fallen under Chozen. It'd be too dangerous.

He'd have to try some other time to get that back.

He grabbed Kumiko's hand and ran.

"Look for Johnny. We've got to get him and run. Get your keys ready," Daniel said. "Chozen's going to be pissed. We don't want to be here when he gets back up."

"There!" Kumiko said pointing.

Daniel took off with her in that direction she'd pointed.

There was Johnny.

He was holding drinks, three bottles of cold soda and it looked like he'd been cornered by a group of women.

"Sorry ladies, we got to go and he's got to come with us. Pardon," Daniel said grabbing Johnny's hand and pulling him along.

He'd have to check later. To see if he'd been hurt. There wasn't time.

"What happened?" Johnny asked as they ran outside.

The sun had finally gone down and it was starting to cool off just a little.

"Chozen. He's pissed. Run," Daniel said spotting the car.

"What? But he said-"

"Yeah, I don't think we should trust anything he says."

"Maybe if we talk-"

"Johnny I punched him in the dick he's not going to want to talk," Daniel said letting go of Johnny's hand to hop over the back of the car and slide into the seat so he could pop the door open.

He looked back at Johnny, he could see Chozen running out of the club, hand cupped between his legs and looking furious. Angrier than Daniel had ever seen.

Daniel grabbed Johnny's arm, pulling him in next to him, practically into his own lap, then leaning over, shutting the door.

Kumiko slammed her foot on the gas.

Johnny's hand was on Daniel's thigh, struggling to regain his balance from where he's been pulled into the car. But when Kumiko had floored it he'd fallen into Daniel. He was still cradling those three drinks to his chest and Daniel reached out, hooking his arm around his chest, holding him up before he face-planted into Daniel's lap or into Kumiko.

"You okay?" Daniel asked.

Johnny's face was so close to his as he tried to regain his balance. It would've been probably mean to point out to Johnny that he was so good at balance until he just wasn't. And it delightfully seemed every time Daniel was there ready to catch him.

He wanted to say something cheesy about falling for him that he was pretty sure would just completely miss the target and Kumiko would laugh and Johnny would just stare at him confused. If only it ever got through. He could be so smooth. But he'd already tried most of the traditional styles of flirting.

"Me? What about you two?" Johnny asked.

There was worry in his eyes, concern, as he pushed himself back with his one free hand to sit down next to Daniel.

"Kumiko stomped on the guy's foot," Daniel said throwing his arms along the back of the seat now that Johnny was settled.

"Wait they grabbed Kumiko?" Johnny asked, incredulous.

"And tried to take the winnings from Daniel," Kumiko said. "And so he got a good shot in."

"I got the money back, but I didn't get your jacket back," Daniel said with a sigh. "Why'd you give him your jacket?"

Johnny sighed settling the bottles in his arms and twisting off the caps and passing them down to Kumiko and Daniel.

"He asked what I was doing there by myself. I said I wasn't alone. He asked where you were because he had unfinished business. I told him to leave you alone. He asked what he'd get for leaving you alone. His hands were on the jacket so I said he could have the jacket if he left you alone. Should've known he couldn't keep his word. Kumiko I'm sorry for losing your jacket for nothing."

"It's okay, I'm just glad you're okay," Kumiko said taking a sip of her drink as she drove. "I was worried."

"Are you okay?" Johnny asked.

Kumiko grinned at him. "I got to dance tonight, nothing can ruin that. And I'm not hurt."

Daniel hooked his arm around Johnny's shoulder, feeling the soft fabric of his t-shirt beneath his arm, drinking the soda Johnny had gotten them.

"We're fine. But how about you? How are you feeling?"

Johnny sighed, a deep breath and he nodded. "Frustrated, but the important thing is your okay. You'd think with the number of times Chozen keeps getting stung that he'd learn to leave you alone. He keeps underestimating you."

Daniel grinned. "We're just going to have to stick with you from now on when you go off to get us drinks or food. Because for some reason that's always when Chozen chooses to strike."

"Right?" Johnny said with a sigh, leaning back against Daniel's arm. "Is he just watching until I walk away from you two to show up? Also how many times have we run into him today alone? Why is this island so big and small at the same time?"

"I was wondering the same thing myself," Daniel said amused, relieved that Johnny was okay.

"Is it always like this?" Johnny asked Kumiko.

"Not for me personally!" she said with a laugh. "It is usually very peaceful. But it's kind of exciting having you two here."

She seemed sincere about it. Now that the danger had passed. He wondered if he could use the money he'd won to buy her a ticket home with them. Wondered if he should offer.

"I hope we don't leave it in a mess for you," Johnny said.

"What do you mean?" Kumiko asked.

"I don't know if Chozen's the type, but I'm hoping he doesn't start picking on you because you hung out with us. After we leave."

"I won't let him," she said with a grin holding up her arm and flexing her bicep.

Daniel laughed.

"He doesn't fight fairly," Johnny said softly.

"Then I won't fight fairly either."

She sounded so sure of herself, so at ease.

Johnny nodded sipping his drink.

"So what were the ladies talking to you about?" Daniel asked.

"Oh, everyone asks if I'm part of one of the bases and then when I say I'm not they tend to be more excited. They wanted to know what we were doing and if we were having fun and were recommending things."

"They weren't asking you to dance?" Daniel asked a little surprised.

"No, but I think I got invited out to a couple of different things. I was given a bunch of business cards."

"You'll have to show me sometime," Kumiko said with a smile. "It might be fun to take them up on it. You look like a model, they might've thought you could model for them."

"Everyone wants to put you to work," Daniel said with a laugh.

"You think it was jobs?"

"You have a popular look," Kumiko said glancing at him warmly.

Johnny looked thoughtful as if he actually was contemplating getting a job in Okinawa.

Daniel leaned his head back and took in a deep breath.

The sky was full of stars. Outside the city, as they made their way down dirt country roads back to Tomi village it was so clear how many stars there were. Daniel tilted his head towards Johnny, giving his shoulder a gentle squeeze.

"Hey, look up."

Johnny did.

"Wow," Johnny said in an almost breathless whisper.

"Yeah."

Daniel had never seen so many stars before while driving. He'd never had a convertible until recently. Hadn't even thought about it. Hadn't looked up the whole time they'd been on the island. It'd been cloudy most of the time threatening to rain.

"The sky is so clear," Daniel said.

"You don't have this back home?" Kumiko asked.

"Too much light pollution," Daniel said.

She pulled to a stop and Daniel dragged his eyes down. They were in the village outside of Miyagi's childhood home.

"Goodnight boys," she said with a smile. "Thanks for dancing with me."

"Of course," Daniel said.

"Thank you for showing us around all day," Johnny said smiling at her.

He turned to open the door, getting out, and held it open for Daniel who hopped out.

They walked through the gate, waving goodbye to Kumiko, and made their way to their room.

"Did you get injured again?" Johnny asked grabbing his stuff to go get ready for bed. To go take his bath.

"I got hit but it wasn't as bad this time, no need for any nursing this time," Daniel said smiling at him.

Johnny nodded.

"Good, okay," he said.

He turned to the door then paused looking back. "I know you can handle yourself. I know you're strong. I just can't seem to help but worry. It's one of the things I'm working on."

Daniel smiled softly. "You believe in me?"

Johnny's lips quirked into an amused smile. "Yeah. I do. I'll be back," he said heading off on bare feet towards the bath.

Daniel sunk against the walk to the floor with a big smile on his face. He couldn't stop smiling. The roller coaster of the trip was just constant with its highs and lows. And it'd been a good day overall. Despite Chozen. Despite Sato.

He took off the sparkly coat Kumiko had gotten him and smiled at it fondly. If only Johnny still had his jacket. It was the only real loss of the day.

Daniel had learned his lesson. He wouldn't keep all his money in one spot. He pulled his wallet out, separating some of the cash and sticking some of it at the bottom of his bag.

He hung up his jacket and laid down.

He bolted up hearing Sato yelling for Miyagi. He leaned over and opened the window, looking out.

Why? Why now? What was wrong with Sato? He'd waited 40 years, couldn't he wait another 40? Another day? Couldn't he just let Mr. Miyagi die of old age eons from now? And damn, there was Chozen. Seriously why couldn't they escape him? Why was he always there? Had they been right behind them on the road? Did Kumiko get home safely?

Daniel hopped up.

He'd have to try and warn Mr. Miyagi.

What if they found Yukie? Chozen hadn't seemed too likely to hold his hand around Kumiko, would they be the same around Yukie?

Why were they like this? Daniel couldn't handle it anymore. He was going to give them a piece of his mind. Ask them what the hell they were doing there in the middle of the night like some creeps.

He'd demand Chozen give him back Johnny's jacket if he didn't want to get hit again.

He hurried down the stairs turning on the light, pushing open the door, pissed.

Chozen's friends grabbed him and pinned his arms behind his back. He struggled against them, trying to break free. Surprised. But still too pissed to just stand there.

"Where's Miyagi?" Sato shouted as if Daniel wasn't right there.

"I don't know," Daniel said.

Sato looked angry and Daniel slammed his foot into one of the guy's feet but he twisted Daniel's arm harsher behind his back as Sato walked away. Chozen stood there holding a spear looking like he'd just been given the best news of his life..

"Come here. I want to show you something," Chozen said motioning towards Daniel with the spear.

Daniel was pushed forward and watched, struggling as Chozen took the spear and started trashing Miyagi's family dojo.

He came out with a big grin and Daniel was let go and pushed to the ground.

"Your sensei teach you how to fight with spear, huh?"

"No," Daniel said shaking his head, hands up ready to fight.

He heard footsteps.

"Too bad," Chozen said tossing the spear towards him.

Johnny caught it before Daniel did.

"I do," Johnny said holding the spear in his hands easily.

It looked like he'd almost made it into the bath. His hair was slightly wet, his skin looked wet, and he'd only bothered to put his pants back on, shirtless and barefoot.

"Does your word meaning nothing?" Johnny asked. "I thought you promised me you would leave Daniel alone."

"Promised not to kill today," Chozen said stepping into the dojo and grabbing another spear. "But now, after midnight, new day."

He flicked the spear in his hands looking too pleased.

"Johnny don't," Daniel said standing up.

He didn't like the way Chozen was looking, didn't like his body language. He was out for blood tonight.

Chozen laughed. "Your sensei only teaches cowards, come, show me what your last sensei taught you."

Johnny thrust the spear forward towards Chozen who blocked it.

"Isn't this your heritage you're destroying?" Johnny asked motioning towards the dojo with his head.

"Nothing of the cowards is related to me," Chozen said lunging forward.

Johnny parried.

"Without Miyagi you wouldn't know karate. You owe his kindness everything," Johnny said. "Just like me."

"He did not teach you this," Chozen said trying another stab from above that Johnny blocked pushing them back and into the damaged dojo.

"No, true. But this is the only time I've had ever had need to use this," Johnny said. "It's not usually useful."

Daniel wanted to follow, to continue watching, to try and figure out how to help, but Chozen's friends were trying to rip plants out of the garden. He rushed forward to try and stop them. There were two of them so one would fight him while the other destroyed the bonsai, throwing them through the shoji screens.

It was desperate fighting. Trying to stop them but making almost no progress. Only slowing down the amount of damage they could do.

"Enough," Mr. Miyagi said taking out the other one.

Chozen walked out of the dojo holding his spear. "Ah, the coward."

"Fight between Miyagi and uncle, not boys."

"Fight with me," Chozen said rushing forward.

Daniel scrambled out of the way as Miyagi caught the spear, kicked Chozen, and snapped it in half.

He saw Johnny in the doorway, breathing hard but looking okay, not bleeding. The panic that had welled up settled.

Chozen looked pissed but was the equal playing field seemed too much. He kicked over a stone lantern and left with his friends.

"You okay?" Johnny asked, he was holding his arm.

"Yeah," Daniel said. "What happened to your arm?" He looked closer, it looked wrong.

"It's nothing too bad, I just need to pop it back in place," Johnny said, he was so pale. "I'm just not sure where a sturdy enough place to do so is."

"Atatata," Mr. Miyagi said hurrying over. "No do self. We do. Wait a moment. Sit sit."

Mr. Miyagi turned to Daniel. "Yukie should be awake, go tell her."

Daniel nodded hurrying off to find Yukie. She was in the kitchen cleaning up broken pots. "Johnny's shoulder is dislocated, Mr. Miyagi said to come get you?"

Yukie looked at him in surprise and then nodded. She picked up a basket and put it in Daniel's hands and started filling it with things, walking down the hall and adding more before they headed back outside. His shoulder looked back to normal but Mr. Miyagi had his hand on Johnny's arm.

He looked up when they arrived.

"We make bath hmm?"

Yukie handed him an ice pack and some cloth.

They settled the ice onto his shoulder and made a sling that they set aside.

Johnny looked up at Daniel. With his good arm, he reached around in his pocket and pulled out a card.

"You mind calling Bobby for me? I promised I'd call every night. I don't want him to freak out. Tell him I'm fine. It's not that bad. He wrote his number on the card, like I'd ever forget it."

Daniel took it and hovered. He didn't want to leave Johnny. He still looked pale but Yukie and Mr. Miyagi were taking care of him.

He took the card and headed off to the phone. He read the instructions and dialed.

It rang once.

"Hey man, where the hell have you been? I got shit to do," Dutch said.

"I thought this was Bobby's number," Daniel said with a frown.

"Yeah, it is. But he had things to do today. So I'm phone sitting for this call. Daniel man where's Johnny? He okay? Why are you calling? You okay?"

Daniel sighed, leaning against the wall and sinking to the floor with the phone. "He's getting his shoulder taken care of. It dislocated."

"Did you dislocate his shoulder?"

"No! Chozen- did anyone tell you about what's going on?"

"Yeah Bobby's been giving us little briefings like every day. I know who Chozen is. What'd the bastard do this time?"

Daniel sighed and explained that Chozen had come by to trash the place on Sato's behalf to give Mr. Miyagi a message and how Johnny had run out and taken on Chozen. How he hadn't seen what had happened but that Chozen and his friends eventually fled after Mr. Miyagi appeared and then Johnny had been holding his arm.

His heart was still pounding. He couldn't calm down. He was too wound up. Too worried.

What if Chozen had killed Johnny? What if Mr. Miyagi hadn't come when he had?

"Hey man, you want us out there?" Dutch asked, voice breaking through the spiral. Soft and gentle.

"I-no, I think we're coming home soon," Daniel whispered. "I think we'd miss each other."

"Well, you call this number when you know you're coming home and your flight info. We'll do something fun. And if you change your mind, let us know too okay? We can be there."

"Thanks," Daniel said softly.

"Don't worry too much about Johnny okay? Just talk to him and baby him if you're worried," Dutch said with a laugh. "Thanks for keeping an eye on him and letting me know. I'll pass the info along. You okay though Daniel?"

"Yeah just worried."

"Of course man. But you know, he's there, go bother him. You'll see if he's okay or not."

"Okay, uh thanks. Have a good day."

"Thanks, man, night."

Dutch hung up and Daniel put the phone back on the receiver.

He sighed standing up and walked back out to the yard.

Yukie and Mr. Miyagi had cleaned it up, moving things, and set up a big wooden tub full of hot steaming water.

Johnny was sitting in it with his back to Daniel. Yukie was setting out things on a table she'd brought out.

She looked at Daniel and smiled. She grabbed his arm and pulled him closer.

"Needs help, hmm? Be gentle," she said motioning to everything she'd set out. "Finish, put this on the shoulder and then ice and bandage. Don't let him use hurt arm, okay?"

Daniel nodded, not trusting himself to speak.

She smiled patting him gently on the shoulder. "I go help Miyagi sensei replant bonsai."

She left and Daniel walked quietly towards the wooden tub they'd set up.

The water was cloudy, milky, there were herbs or something in it. It looked like the baths his mom would make herself after a particularly rough day with the stuff one of the neighborhood ladies would give her.

He didn't know whether he was relieved or disappointed. A mix of both.

"They turning you into a soup?" Daniel asked amused.

Johnny jerked as if he hadn't noticed Daniel come up beside him and Daniel watched him flush bright red.

"Don't know. Mr. Miyagi said it'll help me heal faster. Yukie though might have been laughing as she made it. They were talking in Japanese, so I don't know-" he said.

"So what happened?" Daniel asked looking around at the stuff.

There was a chair, he pulled it over, behind Johnny. He recognized the soaps and shampoos from the bathroom. There was a pitcher of warm water. He scooted the chair back a bit more, coming up with a game plan.

"He slammed the spear into my shoulder," Johnny said. "And pop."

Daniel shuddered. "He didn't stab you?"

"No."

"Lean your head back okay?" Daniel said.

Johnny did as he asked, looking up at him.

"Close your eyes," Daniel said.

He didn't think he'd get soap in Johnny's eyes but he didn't want to chance it. He also wanted a reprieve. He was still all shaken up and didn't want Johnny to see it or that his hands were shaking.

He lifted the pitcher of warm water and ran it over Johnny's hair until it was all wet. He grabbed the shampoo and poured some into his hands and went to work shampooing Johnny's hair.

It was calming in the quiet of the garden with Johnny leaning his head back and eyes shut. Like moments ago it hadn't been full of Chozen and Sato demanding blood, destroying plants and bonsai and history.

He breathed deeply.

Johnny looked peaceful, at ease, as if he hadn't just gotten into a fight with someone with a spear out to kill. Like he felt safe, like his guard was down, the way Daniel only usually saw while Johnny was asleep when he wasn't having nightmares.

He almost didn't want to break the spell, the quiet. But questions were bubbling up.

"Kreese taught you how to fight with a spear?"

"Yeah," Johnny said. He hadn't moved, nothing had changed. Still totally relaxed.

"I called and talked to Dutch instead of Bobby," Daniel said. "Told him what happened."

"Thanks."

He was speaking so softly. So quiet as Daniel ran his fingers through Johnny's hair for longer than he probably should've. Longer than necessary. Letting his fingernails gently run along Johnny's scalp, the way a good haircut was like. A massage almost.

He was so relieved that Johnny was okay. So relieved that he felt hot tears prick in his eyes as he looked down at him. He poured the warm water over Johnny's scalp, rinsing away the soap, and worked in the conditioner. He didn't want to think about what would've happened, what could've happened. Knew he was lucky.

He felt tears running down his cheeks and brushed them away with his arm.

There were just so many things he didn't understand and things he didn't have the energy to explore.

He wanted to go home. To be home with Johnny and Mr. Miyagi.

He wanted that daydream that he'd had only a few days ago. Living at Mr. Miyagi's with Johnny.

He'd thought about how to tell Johnny a thousand times.

He thought about walking with him along the beach at sunset with a picnic. Then thought the wind would get sand in it and ruin it.

He thought about taking him to an amusement park. Not Golf 'n stuff. He thought about telling him, timing it with the nightly fireworks after a busy day.

He thought about going hiking and telling him after a swim near a waterfall.

But now...now he just wanted to tell him as soon as they got home. As soon as the danger was over. As soon as they were safe and out of reach from Sato and Chozen.

Blue eyes opened and looked at him. He felt a hand reach up and brush away tears. It was yet, so it didn't really help. Daniel almost laughed.

"Hey," Johnny said softly. "What's wrong?"

"I'm just relieved you're okay."

"There's nothing to worry about. I am okay."

"Close your eyes again."

"Why?"

"I don't want you to see me cry right now."

"But I've seen you cry before."

"That's not the point, just close your eyes."

Johnny sighed and shut his eyes. "I think I wasn't in danger."

"What do you mean?" Daniel asked rinsing the conditioner out and combing his fingers through Johnny's hair to make sure it was all gone. "Sit up."

"I don't think Chozen wanted to kill me," Johnny said lifting his head and sitting up.

Daniel gently pushed him forward a little.

Daniel scoffed. "Just you huh?

"I think he just wanted to spar."

"Why do you think that?"

"He had an opening and he didn't take it," Johnny said.

"What?" Daniel asked horrified.

"I heard a crash and got worried, wanted to make sure you were okay. I was distracted. He could've killed me but didn't. Just pinned me. Told me to focus on the fight I was in. Kreese would've done worse than a dislocated shoulder. And I think even that was an accident."

Daniel frowned studying Johnny's back.

He thought about the way he'd seen Chozen interact with Johnny. The way his tone was different when calling Johnny a baby than when he'd said it to Daniel. The way it'd irked him, pissed him off. How he'd looked so pleased carrying around Johnny's jacket. Like he'd won something.

"You think you could stay away from Chozen?" Daniel asked voice tight, pissed.

Johnny laughed softly. "Haven't we been trying to avoid Chozen? Haven't we been failing? It's a big island and yet he always just shows up."

Daniel wondered if Johnny had noticed.

Popular type Kumiko said in his head and he sighed.

Johnny shivered.

Daniel had forgotten how close he was, that his breath was on the back of Johnny's neck.

There was no way in hell Daniel would lose to Chozen. Not on this front.

He ran soapy fingers up and down Johnny's back. His shoulders were pink, he looked up. Johnny's ears were red.

It reminded him of the beach, the photoshoot. But there was no one here to tell him to hurry up. No excuse Johnny could have to tell him to hurry.

"Hey, could you lean forward a little bit more?" Daniel asked, pulling the stool closer to the tub.

Johnny pulled his knees up to his chest and then leaned forward against them, being gentle and careful of his arm and shoulder.

Daniel remembered the book he'd checked out what felt like years ago.

He'd avoid Johnny's hurt shoulder.

He pressed his fingers into the knots that he knew would be there and they still were.

Johnny ducked his head into his arms his ears were red again.

"This-ah-again?" Johnny asked and the waver in his voice sent a thrill through Daniel.

"Yup. Told you it wasn't over. You said it was because of midterms. Clearly not," Daniel said as he worked.

He remembered that last time Johnny had told him to talk.

Wondered if that'd help.

If he'd let Daniel get away with this if he talked. It seemed counterintuitive. Like if Daniel talked Johnny would push him away faster. But he'd give it a try.

He talked about the drum technique that always popped back up in his head. How he had to think there was another move related to it, he just hadn't figured it out yet.

He hadn't said it aloud till now. Hadn't tried to work through it and as he dragged his fingers down Johnny's back, watching him shiver he tried to work through it.

He was tempted to go lower. But he didn't. Johnny would not let him do that. Definitely not.

It helped to talk about it. Let him reorganize his thoughts by voicing them out loud with a captive audience. Even if Johnny wasn't really responding.

He thought he'd massaged most of the knots out, as good as he could get them in this moment with one of Johnny's shoulders hurt. He gently placed his hand on Johnny's good shoulder as warmly as he could.

"You can sit up now."

Johnny did so like he was waking up, slow and languid.

Daniel grinned.

He didn't know what he'd expected but for Johnny to practically be putty in his hands after suffering through it was a delight. He pushed his chair over to wash Johnny's arms, being so careful of his injured one.

Johnny just stared at him with dark eyes. He looked so tired, but in a relaxed way. Like he was so relaxed he could fall asleep right there.

He wondered what he could get away with now. He gently ran soapy fingers along Johnny's chest, up to his neck, pressing his hand to the side of his neck and smiling at Johnny.

He didn't flinch, just shivered again.

Daniel was practically leaning over the bath, closer than he probably should've been.

"You want me to wash everything?" Daniel whispered, voice low, the flirty tone that never worked but he always hoped would.

Daniel's hand began to trail back down, and after a beat, as if it took him a moment to figure out what Daniel had said, Johnny's hand shot out to grab his wrist, stopping him.

He was bright red. More awake.

"Nope, I've got it. Thanks."

Daniel laughed softly. "Okay, you let me know when you're done then. I'm going to go find a towel or something since I don't see one out."

Johnny nodded his head and Daniel walked off heart-pounding but pleased.

He found the towels and Johnny's things that were in the bathroom still. His bag with all of his clothes in it. He shouldered it heading back down to the garden.

Johnny was washing his face.

"You done?" Daniel asked.

Johnny splashed water on his face trying to get rid of the soap and it was so close to watching a kid in the tub that Daniel laughed.

Johnny looked at him after brushing water from his face. He nodded.

Daniel set a pair of sandals down on the ground outside the tub and held out the towel. He looked up at the night sky, at the moon and the stars.

He heard the water as Johnny stood up, the rush of it.

Felt Johnny's hand on his shoulder using him for balance, leaning into him as he stepped out of the tub.

He misjudged it, trying to use his injured arm and hissing in pain.

He stumbled forward a little with a curse falling into Daniel who wrapped the towel around him as he caught him.

"Forgot?"

"Yeah," Johnny said as Daniel shifted him over to the chair.

"Let me get that medicine on your shoulder," he said looking at the paste Yukie had made for him.

He dried Johnny's shoulder, rubbing it on gently, covering it and then setting the icepack on top.

He was surprised it was still cool.

"I've got it from here. Thanks," Johnny said dragging his bag over next to him with his foot.

"You sure? You nearly fell over."

"I'm just tired. Mr. Miyagi gave me some medicine and I think...I nearly fell asleep."

"You gonna fall asleep putting your pajamas on?" Daniel asked amused.

"No. I can handle that," Johnny said with a frown.

"You sure?" Daniel asked.

"Yes."

"Then I'll go get ready for bed and see you there," Daniel said gathering the stuff Yukie had set out, putting it back in the basket, and carrying it back to the kitchen.

He grabbed his own stuff from their room and changed and waited, worried. Wondering if he should go back and help Johnny. But right before he hurried out the door he heard familiar footsteps and watched the door slide open as Johnny set his bag down.

He had managed it. Barely. It looked like he'd given up on a shirt. He took off the sandals and dumped his bag on the ground walking over. He sunk down onto his knees on the bedding next to Daniel who reached out for him as he shifted to sit.

"You going to be okay to lay down? How can I help?"

"No clue," Johnny said. "Won't know until I try."

He laid down so slowly, with such focus and control, like it was easy to lay down at the speed of a snail. That core strength at work and without his shirt Daniel watched the muscles working, all tense as Johnny laid himself down, abs clear and defined, shifting to try and find a better position. He found it eventually and Daniel grabbed the blankets pulling it over them.

"Wake me up if you need me," Daniel said.

Johnny made a sound that sounded amused.

"What?"

"I'm pretty sure I said that just a few days ago."

"You did didn't you?" Daniel asked with a laugh. It felt like years ago. "Well it still stands, wake me up, okay?"

"Okay," Johnny said softly.

Daniel watched him as his breathing slowed, as he fell asleep, wondering how best to keep himself from hurting him in his sleep. How to sleep so he wouldn't bump into Johnny's shoulder. He wasn't tired. Maybe he wouldn't be able to sleep, too worried. After Johnny fell deeper into sleep he got up and walked out to practice. Staying close so he could hear Johnny if he needed him. If he woke up.

Chapter Notes

Johnny's shoulder ached. He'd slept stiffly and without dreams.

He woke up to find Daniel already awake sitting next to him. He was flipping through his Okinawan book with a frown. He looked over at Johnny.

"Morning. Are you okay? What can I get you?"

Johnny pushed himself up with the arm that wasn't hurt and Daniel leaned over hooking his arm under him, helping him the rest of the way up.

"I'm okay," Johnny said.

"How about a shirt? Can I get you a shirt?" Daniel asked.

"Yeah, okay."

Daniel smiled grabbing the new shirt Kumiko had bought him, a turquoise blue with a loud traditional print.

Johnny got one arm in easily on his own but Daniel took over after that helping him get his sore shoulder through the other and buttoning it up.

"You're not going to give this to Chozen right?" Daniel asked.

There was teasing in there but he also seemed a little pissed. That motherly tone Bobby got sometimes.

"I don't plan on it," Johnny said.

Daniel buttoned it all the way to the top.

Johnny was pretty sure he could've figured the buttons out himself. But Daniel had that look in his eyes, a stubbornly determined look.

Daniel retrieved the sling Yukie had set out for him and helped adjust it so it was more comfortable.

"Listen, I already packed. I was going to go for a walk, but do you need help packing?" Daniel asked. "Or with anything else?"

"No, go for your walk," Johnny said. "I'll be fine," he added when Daniel hesitated.

Daniel nodded heading out.

Johnny waited till he left and sighed looking around the room. He was glad they were leaving before things got more dangerous. Before someone died.

Still, he didn't want to leave the island. Yukie had promised to teach him how to make goya champuru but it looked like they'd ran out of time. He'd known they would but he'd kind of hoped that common sense would've struck Sato.

He carefully pushed himself up and finished getting ready for the day and finished packing, carefully moving all of his books into his bag and his Walkman. He looked at his wallet and dumped it on top.

He heard a commotion outside and sighed moving his bag to the door.

Kumiko had told them it was a peaceful village but he didn't think it was. It was a lie.

He walked carefully down the stairs.

He'd have to get help with his bag. It was too heavy with the one arm and he knew if he tried to use the other it'd just make whatever Yukie and Mr. Miyagi had made for his injury go to waste.

He went to the kitchen and ate breakfast.

He heard commotion around the house.

It didn't sound like fighting so he didn't investigate.

He made himself a coffee, taking the time to enjoy the simple waiting of the water to boil on the stove, measuring out the instant powder into his cup and breathing it in.

His mother used to drink instant when he was growing up. He remembered sitting in their kitchen in the mornings while she made it.

Now she drank imported stuff. Fancy beans from around the world.

Stuff Sid got her. Stuff Jimmy sometimes sent home with him when they had too much or wanted a discerning palate to try.

His mother always laughed about that. Thought it was sweet when his friends said stuff like that.

She'd lean over and whisper in his ear, "It's like an illusion."

He wondered what she was doing.

He hoped she was okay.

He should've told her where he was going. He should've just sucked up whatever Sid would've said when he answered the phone.

He should've tried.

He missed her.

He took a deep breath shaking his head, opening the fridge, and taking out the creamer.

He always got that way when he was hurt. He didn't tell her he was hurt but he always wanted to be near her when he was.

He'd stopped seeking her out though and just buried the feeling after a while. After he realized she couldn't take time off of work to come to get him, that it was easier to not tell her, to not worry her.

Later he when she could come, when she had the time and freedom to do so he realized Sid would watch like a hawk, ready to pounce if he said a word. If he even tried.

He added a bit of sugar and took his coffee out in the garden. It was still trashed.

It'd looked better when he'd gone to bed in the night, but in the morning light he saw the pulled-up plants and shattered bits of the pots. It was painful to look at. Plants couldn't defend themselves. They'd done nothing to deserve the destruction they'd endured.

He walked down the hall to where he knew Yukie had taken the bonsai to replant them. There were lots of them, ancient small trees that made him miss his own. They looked like they'd be okay. It was a relief.

"Ah, Johnny-san," Mr. Miyagi said.

Johnny turned. Mr. Miyagi was wearing his black clothes again. Similar to the one's he'd worn to his father's funeral, like the black gi Johnny wore for tournaments.

There was a sad look in his eyes and Johnny felt tears well up in his eyes, felt his heart sink.

"You're ready to go right Mr. Miyagi? All packed to go home with us?" Johnny asked.

He knew he wasn't. But he had to hope he'd misunderstood. That there was a chance.

Mr. Miyagi shook his head stepping into the room and putting a hand on Johnny's shoulder.

"Miyagi sorry things not work out."

"There's got to be a way," Johnny said. "You always know what to do."

"Made deal. Sato destroy whole village or fight Miyagi. Miyagi agree to fight if no matter what villagers get title to village. Village safe. You and Daniel-san go home."

"We don't want to go home without you. I promised Daniel that all three of us would go home together. That we'd figure out a way."

"Miyagi wish could keep teaching. But Miyagi not worried. Johnny-san and Daniel-san become good men. Kind men."

"You promised you'd always be there. If I...If I lost my way."

"Johnny-san, Miyagi always here, even when not here. You remember all teachings. Remember to care for all life. All life precious. When lost look at bonsai, remember you care for it. It grows because you care. Go to sanctuary, care for animals, babysit kids and see that heart is not evil. Do kata. Do breathing. Go fishing. One foot in front of other. Keep going Johnny-san. Miyagi proud. Very proud of Johnny-san."

"It's not fair Mr. Miyagi. None of this is fair to you. How is honor worth more than life?"

He couldn't stop the tears, gave up trying to brush them away.

"Life is more important. So Johnny-san live. Hmm? Live long good life. Watch over Miyagi's garden. Keep eye on cars," Mr. Miyagi sighed.

"Johnny-san listen. Miyagi not live without regrets. Miyagi have many. Miyagi wish come home sooner. Miyagi wish reach out earlier. Wish known Yukie waiting for Miyagi. Waste so much time. Johnny-san promise Miyagi to not make same mistake. Talk. Tell how feel. Take chance so not live with regrets like Miyagi. Okay?"

Johnny nodded brushing tears from his face.

"Really understand?" Miyagi asked.

"I do."

Miyagi nodded and took a deep breath and bowed.

Johnny bowed back feeling the tears well up again.

Johnny watched Mr. Miyagi leave and set his coffee down.

He had to find Daniel.

He searched high and low, throughout the house until he found him standing outside the house looking upset and withdrawn.

He looked up at Johnny.

"Hey, Kumiko said to meet her, let's go."

"Do you want to-"

Daniel shook his head but took Johnny's hand and walked with him through the village, pausing to watch Sato in the shrine and heading out towards the docks.

He knew what Mr. Miyagi had meant.

His heart pounded in his ears.

He had to say something. He couldn't spend forty years not saying anything.

If Mr. Miyagi could face death so bravely then he could just be honest.

Daniel led him into a building that looked run down, where Kumiko sat. She was all dressed up and Johnny wondered if he'd interrupted a date.

She took them in with a smile until her eyes fell on the sling Johnny's arm was in and her eyebrows shot up.

"Chozen," Daniel said quietly shaking his head as an answer.

Kumiko frowned looking at Johnny.

It seemed she didn't want to talk.

He hadn't seen Mr. Miyagi or Yukie talk when they'd done their tea ceremony.

He thought it was supposed to be romantic.

He felt himself falter.

The bravery he'd gathered slipping away as Daniel sat across from her. It looked picture perfect. Sweet.

Daniel looked at him, patted the third cushion and Johnny sat down, carefully.

He watched Kumiko move slowly, every step purposefully as she made them green tea. The matcha Yukie had taught him how to make with less steps, informally.

She turned the cup a couple of times and passed it to Johnny with an encouraging smile.

Yukie had made him the tea to try as a treat after he'd asked about it. It was bitter, she'd laughed at the face he'd made when he tried it. He knew it was bitter. Knew he didn't like it that much.

But Kumiko was going through all the work. All the motions. So he drank it.

He couldn't copy her. Couldn't turn it the way she had so he just studied the cup in his hands for a moment then looked at her at a loss.

Did he give it back? Was he supposed to pass it to Daniel?

He hadn't finished it. He didn't think he could politely. He needed sugar or something in it. But that was probably rude.

She smiled a gentle nod of her head towards Daniel.

He lifted up the cup again and turned towards Daniel passing it to him.

Daniel took it with both hands, fingers brushing Johnny's. He smiled at Johnny.

What did they know that he didn't?

They were all smiles.

How were they all smiles? They knew right? Someone had told them that Mr. Miyagi was sacrificing himself for the village? For the good of the lives of his hometown. They were unwitting pallbearers and they were smiling.

Daniel turned the cup in his hands taking a sip and then drinking it all, staring at him like it was a challenge. Like he could handle the bitter earthy taste of matcha without a problem.

Breathe

Kumiko gently moved everything over to him.

Johnny's turn.

He followed the steps she done. It was hard one-handed. He couldn't fold things between his hands. But he knew how to whisk. Yukie had taught him that.

He knew how much water to add from the pot, dragging his fingers across the handle as he put it back the way she had.

Both of them were watching him silently and it was a bit too much.

Kumiko was smiling at him encouragingly, nodding as he did things right, tilting her head as a hint towards the next step.

He'd read about tea ceremonies. How people spent their whole lives learning it and sometimes still weren't considered masters. How samurai used to practice it before battle because it was calming.

Everything had its moment, its place. It was supposed to be zen. Relaxing. And the tea it didn't just taste healthy, it was healthy.

It also had caffeine in it.

Johnny wasn't sure he needed any more of that. Not with the way his heart was already pounding.

He whisked watching for it to bubble, making sure all the powder got mixed, wasn't clumpy.

He'd read that Okinawa had its own tea ceremony, back in the days of kings where it was a foamy tea and he wondered how much whisking was required to make a cloud of tea foam. The book had said it was impossible to drink without getting foam on your nose, which apparently was the point.

He gently lifted the bowl and turned it and set it back down. Then did it again, enough times until Kumiko nodded, and then he passed it to Daniel who was grinning like this was the best tea party he'd ever been to.

Johnny had been to a couple of different tea parties. The ladies of the country club hosted one in the spring. Up till now, his favorite had been with the kids he'd babysat. But, if he wasn't so worried about Mr. Miyagi., if his heart wasn't pounding so loud that he was sure everyone could hear it, then this would've been his favorite.

Daniel turned the bowl staring at Johnny and then drank it all.

Maybe Daniel liked bitter things. He'd make sure the next time he made him coffee to put less sugar in, find out.

Daniel took over making the tea, eyes flicking to Johnny as he did so, as he went through each step.

Kumiko was smiling and nodding.

It was like he'd fallen through to another world. Like Alice through her looking glass. A world where danger wasn't looming. Where the inevitable was only a nightmare that had been blown away by the rising winds.

A world where Daniel was quiet.

He didn't like that part of this world.

Kumiko, though, was a good teacher.

Daniel passed the bowl to him and Johnny was dismayed.

He hated this tea. It needed milk and sugar.

School always talked about peer pressure with drugs and alcohol but never said anything about going to Okinawa and everyone making you drink bitter healthy tea, expecting you to finish the damn cup too.

They were both staring at him expectantly.

Johnny set it down, turned it, and did that a couple of times, meeting Daniel's eyes, and then took a sip.

Still bitter. Still earthy. Still not his thing.

He set it down, turned it the opposite way, and then passed it to Kumiko who looked like she was struggling so hard to not laugh. She accepted it though and went through the motions and finished it off.

That had to be it right?

End of the class.

Good job team, we learned how to make matcha.

Time to go.

But Kumiko restarted the process and Johnny felt his heart sink.

They were going to make him drink more of the tea. Would it be over if he drank all of it? Was that the point?

They'd be trapped doing this over and over again until Johnny finished a whole cup of it?

They'd wait forever.

He would not be able to drink all of it and remain polite. He wouldn't be able to handle the pain in his shoulder and hide the fact he hated the tea.

The tea Mr. Miyagi made back home was better. He liked that.

He'd have to ask Mr. Miyagi what he added...there wouldn't be time.

He wouldn't be able to ask.

Just like everything else he'd want to know. He'd never know.

He felt tears prick in his eyes. He gritted his teeth. He was not going to cry at this tea ceremony.

He took a deep breath.

The cup came back to him. He focused on the bowl, turning it. Breathing as he did so.

He liked this part of it. Even though it'd be easier with both hands.

He liked the slow movements.

It was like kata, like dancing with them learning the steps to the o-bon dance.

Everything was very specific, learned motions, so you didn't have to think, or could just focus on the movements.

He took his sip.

It wasn't like beer. Something that he got used to with additional sips. Or at least not for him.

Johnny didn't regret coming to Okinawa. Didn't regret buying their tickets.

He had good memories of spending time with Daniel and Kumiko, of learning sanshin with Ichiro and Yuna, spending time with Yukie and Mr. Miyagi, of the star-filled skies and the food.

But none of it would make up for that empty seat on the flight back home. For the empty house, the garden without a gentle hand to guide it, becoming wild once more like Johnny feared he would.

How many people would they need to tell? Mr. Miyagi knew so many people. Had changed so many lives.

How would he find the friends that sent Mr. Miyagi mochi for new years?

Would he have to be the bearer of the news?

Would he have to be the one, driving to the sanctuary to tell them that Mr. Miyagi was murdered in a duel in his hometown?

Because that's what it was. It was going to be murder. Premeditated by forty years.

What would he say to the kids who always talked about Mr. Miyagi and asked how he was?

What would he say to the guys?

How was he going to face Daniel after all of this?

After promising him they'd all go home together?

He passed the cup back to...which way was it supposed to go again? Who'd made this cup?

Daniel was smiling at him, all encouraging.

How was he not shattered? How was he smiling?

How had Johnny not known from the beginning how strong Daniel was?

That despite how he looked with his thin arms and smaller frame that he was so strong.

Strong enough to hold Johnny up when he lost his balance.

This would be the second time Daniel had watched a father figure die.

He wasn't falling apart like Johnny felt. Like he still had hope. For some last-minute change of course.

Strong enough to not back down, to keep getting up, to keep looking for solutions even in the eleventh hour.

Johnny passed the cup to Daniel.

He didn't know if it was right, but it felt right.

Daniel took it smiling at him.

Johnny had thought he'd come along because he didn't want Daniel to worry the whole time because he didn't want Mr. Miyagi to face it all alone.

He thought he'd be there, strong and sturdy for both of them.

But it was really Daniel who held him up.

It was Daniel who faced his fears head-on, didn't let the weight of them crush him, who kept turning around and helping Johnny back up every time he felt like he was going to fall.

Every time he needed help.

He really did love him, with all his heart.

Chapter End Notes

Fun fact: tea ceremony usually takes like 3 hours and usually has snacks.
The traditional Okinawan tea/tea ceremony is called Buku Buku, it's a jasmine tea that gets whisked to a foam, you can read about that ceremony here: https://okinawaclip.com/en/detail/1161

Stormy Weather

Everything was awful but Kumiko had told Daniel to bring Johnny and they'd have tea. That it'd be balancing, relaxing, help them focus. Daniel needed something like that.

Johnny was quiet on their walk over and walk to the place by the pier where she'd set up so that they wouldn't be found by Chozen.

She'd dressed up and smiled at them when they entered.

Johnny looked like he was going to leave, hesitating, but he eventually sat when Daniel motioned to the empty cushion.

Kumiko made tea and it was so quiet and peaceful. Johnny was watching her, every move she made like he was studying. She passed him the cup and he took only a sip.

Daniel wanted to laugh. Johnny was struggling. It was the barest flicker that he didn't like it.

They kept doing it, taking turns making tea and passing the cup around a few times,

Johnny only took a sip each time, like he was participating in only the barest of ways.

Kumiko clearly caught it, but seemed to approve of his form. Johnny got it right pretty fast, knew how to use the whisk that Daniel didn't fully.

If he focused on the moment, on Kumiko and Johnny then he could get through it. Could make it to midnight. He could breathe and hope. Hope that something would happen. That they'd solve this problem. Maybe it be at the bottom of the cup. An answer to save Mr. Miyagi.

He was hoping Mr. Miyagi would think of something, anything. But he seemed determined to face it head-on and nothing Daniel said would change it. He'd tried. Tried everything he could think of.

So instead he focused on Johnny, struggling to keep a straight stoic face every time they passed him the cup. Struggling to not make a face.

The tea was bitter but Daniel liked it.

Maybe it was mean to keep torturing Johnny. But he was only taking a sip at a time. And he wasn't complaining. He just dutifully took his sip and did his best with the motions before passing it on. He was so determined to do his best, just like always.

The wind began to pick up and Kumiko smiled at them putting an end to their class, packing everything up with a warm smile.

"I'll go ahead," she said breaking the spell she'd woven and heading out back towards the village.

Daniel stretched, standing up and reaching out to help Johnny up. He took his hand and stood.

It felt almost like finishing a meditation session. Where even though Kumiko had spoken, he didn't want the peaceful silence to end. But the clouds on the horizon looked dangerous and with the broken windows, they needed to head back into town. Somewhere safer.

Johnny followed behind him. It was probably Daniel's least favorite thing. The way Johnny would slow and follow along, wouldn't walk beside him unless he pulled him along unless he hooked his arm through his. Like he had to remind him to be by his side.

Daniel heard Johnny stop walking and turned.

Johnny was looking at the ground with a frown, brows knit.

Daniel walked back to him and Johnny looked up at him. His stance was rooted. Like he couldn't be moved. Like he wasn't going to budge.

He didn't know why Johnny was going to be stubborn all of a sudden. In the middle of an incoming storm, but he would drag Johnny along if he had to.

"I need to tell you something," Johnny said.

"You can tell me later. Those look like storm clouds, we should probably head to the village," Daniel said.

There was something about the way he was standing that brought a pause, stopped him from reaching out to grab Johnny's hand and drag him.

Johnny shook his head, took a deep breath, squaring his shoulders though a little awkwardly, forgetting his injured one and wincing.

"I didn't want to tell you. I didn't want to ruin things. I wasn't ready. I didn't want to scare you off. I've been selfish. And maybe it was wrong. To let things get out of hand. And I understand if you don't want to see me anymore. I can...well I can go if you want me to. I mean- I want to stay and see this through for Mr. Miyagi. And I hope you'll be understanding about that. But if you don't want me to come back to the house I'll understand. I'll find somewhere else to stay tonight. I can't afford a hotel. I don't have enough left. But our flights are flexible and if you want me to fly before or after you I can. I can leave you alone."

What was he saying? What on earth would make him think-wait didn't have enough, did he mean money? Daniel started to open his mouth to speak but there was a silent plea to wait in Johnny's whole stance. Like this was taking all the courage he had and that he was moments from falling apart.

"I wanted to give myself time. To find my footing. To feel like I could become a good person. And I think I'm on the right path. And that I'm getting there. There's a lot of things I didn't think I deserved. Things I wanted. So I didn't try. I didn't go for the things I wanted. I thought you were still hurting about Ali. So I didn't say anything. And now...well Kumiko is nice. I like her, you two could be something for sure. She's sweet."

What the hell was he talking about? Did he really think he and Kumiko were dating? Or were going to be dating? When did he get that idea? How?

"I like you. Not as a friend. I mean you're a good friend. But I like you more than a friend. I am most at peace at your side. I want to stay next to you forever. But I think I'm torturing myself by not saying anything. And I-"

Wait, what? No no, go back. Him? Johnny liked him. Was telling him now?

"How long?" Daniel interrupted, it was the only coherent thought that tumbled off his tongue.

Johnny blinked.

Maybe it'd come off a little harsher than Daniel meant, a little desperate and confused. He hadn't meant it like that. But Johnny let go of whatever he'd prepared, whatever line of thought he was following to answer him.

"Do you remember after you told me to come to school, but there was a day I didn't? I've liked you since then. But you were dating Ali and I- Maybe it was wrong. Maybe I was taking advantage of the situation. It wasn't on purpose. I promise. I just didn't stop things."

That meant-

Daniel tried to think that far back.

That meant Johnny liked him in Newark.

It meant Johnny liked him in New York City.

It meant Johnny liked him on their date not date to Sergio's and the movies.

On that day on the beach, when he did the photoshoot.

When they went to the mountains.

Johnny had liked him at the party, when Daniel had drunkenly kissed him.

It meant they could've-this whole time-wait, if Johnny had liked him the whole time why hadn't-he didn't know.

Johnny didn't realize all the flirting was flirting.

Daniel wanted to scream.

Johnny looked like his resolve was faltering, the courage was failing. Like he was about to run.

Daniel reached out grabbing his hand.

"Don't you dare go running off. Give me a moment," Daniel said weakly, it felt a bit like a rise of panic.

He couldn't focus on anything, there were too many things.

There was so much wasted time. They'd been on the same page and hadn't realized it for so damn long.

Johnny nodded falling silent.

Dinner with Ma. Every single one.

At prom, at Golf 'n stuff.

Reading to him at Mr. Miyagi's, in his room.

He hadn't known.

A bell rang, a steady clanging, in the distance.

The wind was picking up.

It began to rain, a sudden downpour.

Damn it. He had so much to say.

He'd wanted it to be perfect.

He was scrambling to think of the millions of things he had to say.

To grab one of them, any of them.

"What are you two doing? It's not safe here! We have to go," Kumiko called having run back after them. "There's a big storm. Don't you hear the bell? We're in danger."

Kumiko pulled on them, getting them moving towards the village as the bell was rung and down into the village as the wind whipped at them and the sky became dark.

It was so fast Daniel couldn't believe it. He held on tight to Johnny's hand.

The hairpin Kumiko had in her hair was gone and her hair kept getting in her face but she kept dragging them along the path through the village into the building everyone else was heading to.

The one leftover from the war.

They saw Mr. Miyagi and Yukie going in.

Mr. Miyagi stopped pushing them ahead in front of him into the crowded building.

They stood next to the window looking out. There wasn't a panel or any glass so the rain that was pouring came in.

Daniel wasn't sure if it was the safest, but he assumed it was the sturdiest building in the village. He watched as a smaller structure fell over and then squinted into the dark.

"Are those people out there?" Daniel asked in surprise, breaking through all his jumbled thoughts.

"Come. We go help." Mr. Miyagi said.

Daniel nodded then turned to Johnny. "Stay here okay? It's safer here."

"But-"

Daniel squeezed his hand then let go hurrying out into the rain with Mr. Miyagi, Yukie, and Kumiko.

It was a woman and two children struggling to get to the building.

They collapsed in the mud, slipping but together they helped them up and got them moving when the building Daniel had seen Sato in earlier collapse.

Mr. Miyagi and Daniel rushed over.

Why hadn't Sato gotten out of the building? Had he not heard the bell ringing?

A figure came stumbling towards them, Chozen who continued past them in shock saying his uncle was dead.

When Daniel had wished for an intervention on Mr. Miyagi's behalf this had not been it.

They pushed forward seeing the body amongst the ruins.

Sato moved.

He wasn't hurt, just pinned.

Stuck.

Daniel got on one end, trying to lift it. It was too heavy. The wood was too slippery. It wasn't budging.

If Johnny was with them, if his arm was better he thought maybe they could get it.

He wondered if he should go back, get Johnny, but he'd hurt himself with his arm. He'd force it. Daniel knew it.

Heck if he could get Chozen back they might have a chance.

Sato was pissed. Still so angry.

Mr. Miyagi climbed up, taking a deep breath, focused, and then shouted, slamming the side of his hand into the wood. It cracked in half.

Sato stopped talking.

Daniel looked at Mr. Miyagi. He was always full of surprises. Always stronger than he looked. Always knew what to do, even when someone was fighting against him.

He'd still save them.

Mr. Miyagi threw half of the wood pinning Sato to the side, helping him up. Yelling over the wind to Sato to be careful, that he was okay, that he had him. Even after all that time, after everything Sato did, Mr. Miyagi still considered him a friend.

Daniel hopped off the ruins and after them.

In the rain ahead as he squinted he heard someone shouting. A familiar timbre. They heard a scream. Daniel looked up.

There was a kid holding onto the bell tower. Below it was Johnny. He was struggling to get out of his sling, cursing. But the sling was wet and kept sticking.

"Yuna, hang on!" Johnny called up to the child.

She shouted into the wind in Japanese.

"I'm not going anywhere!" Johnny yelled over the wind to her.

She screamed in response.

He muttered curses, trying to lift the fabric to his teeth. He was covered in mud.

It looked like he'd already attempted to go up the bell tower and fell. Hadn't been able to make it up or hang on, with his arm in the sling.

"I'll get the girl," Daniel said nodding to Mr. Miyagi who was looking up at the tower. He nodded, pushing Sato along towards the shelter.

He put his hand on Johnny's other shoulder.

"I'll get her. It's okay," He hurried to the ladder calling up to Yuna. "Hang on! Just Hang on!"

Parts of the tower were falling apart.

He climbed to where she was screaming and the piece they were on, the last of it as it all went crumbling and fell only to stop bell first into a power line.

Sparks flew and Daniel heard Johnny shout something.

He curled his body away from the sparks, taking off his belt and swatting at the power line to get it away before they got electrocuted before it caught on fire.

It fell and he hurried up the rest of the way to get Yuna. He managed to get her to hold onto his back so he could climb down with her.

She sobbed the whole way down until suddenly her weight was gone.

Daniel whirled around to see Johnny. He had her in his good arm like she weighed nothing, not the unwieldy weight Daniel had been struggling with.

She was clinging to his neck so tightly but Johnny just backed away so Daniel had the space to hop down into the mud.

Johnny motioned for him to go, to move towards the shelter ahead of him. The doors opened and Daniel rushed inside, waiting as Johnny stepped in after him.

Daniel was pushed out of the way by a flood of women pulling Johnny into a corner of the room speaking fast.

"What's happening?" Daniel asked as the door was shut behind him.

"They're yelling at him for going out into the storm injured," Kumiko said softly coming up at his side.

"Good, then I don't have to," Daniel said sinking against the wall exhausted.

"He left while we were getting the others back here," Kumiko said with a sigh. "He noticed Yuna was still up by the bell before we did. That she was missing. He fell pretty hard."

Daniel frowned looking at the back of the room. They'd wrapped Johnny in a blanket. He was sitting on the floor, Yuna in his lap.

She was rubbing tears from her face, not budging. He was saying something quiet and she nodded. Her mother with her hands on her hips chiding them both in Japanese in the way mothers did when they were relieved you were safe but still upset you'd almost gotten hurt in the first place.

Daniel had fallen asleep sitting on the floor. He didn't remember falling asleep until Mr. Miyagi gently tapping his shoulder. The storm was over and dawn had broke. Most everyone was gone and Daniel looked around as they left the shelter taking in the wreckage.

"When did the storm end?" Daniel asked. His legs were sore, stiff.

"Don't know," Mr. Miyagi said as they walked back towards the house.

There was some damage but it seemed to still be sturdy.

"Have you seen Johnny?" Daniel asked.

Mr. Miyagi shook his head. "Miyagi fell asleep."

Yukie was already cleaning up.

Daniel greeted her and she smiled warmly then tilted her head trying to look past them.

"Where's Johnny-san?" Yukie asked with a frown.

"He's not here?" Daniel asked.

"No, thought was with you," Yukie said.

Daniel took off his shoes and ran to their room. Maybe he'd made it back first.

Johnny's bag was still there in the doorway. Daniel saw his wallet sitting out and picked it up.

He couldn't have gone far without it.

He opened the wallet. Johnnys driver's license stared back at him, he flicked through the cards they were all library cards to different libraries around LA, the international phone card with Bobby's number scrawled on it, a few loyalty cards, a pass to get him into the country club.

There was no money.

Not a single coin.

No credit cards.

He flipped through again, there had to be something.

Some clue as to where Johnny had gone.

There was a stack of business cards in Japanese and English, something glossy.

He pulled it from the rest.

It was a polaroid of Daniel, wearing his orange puffy coat and hat, his scarf around his neck and he was looking up at something. Deep in thought, at ease, relaxed.

Had he been carrying it around since they'd gone in the mountains?

If Daniel had just looked closer every time Johnny whipped out his wallet to pay would he have noticed, seen it?

He had no other photos in his wallet.

Just Daniel.

There was something written at the bottom in small and careful print.

Daniel LaRusso January 1985, Mountain High

Has good ideas, always listen to him.

He had said something, hadn't he?

He'd told Johnny how he felt?

He felt his veins go cold.

He hadn't.

He cursed setting the polaroid and wallet back down on top of Johnny's Walkman, turning on his heels and running back out of the room.

Kumiko was talking to her aunt and Mr. Miyagi.

"Have you seen Johnny?" Daniel asked Kumiko in a rush.

"No," Kumiko said studying him. "What happened?"

Daniel shoved his feet in his shoes. "I fucked up."

Kumiko frowned. "How?"

"He told me how he felt and I didn't say a thing to him. I didn't tell him. Got distracted by the storm. But everything. I have to tell him before he-well who knows, all his stuff is still here, but I gotta find him."

"Daniel-san," Mr. Miyagi said in a tired admonishing tone. "Always forget, not leave person like waiting."

Daniel froze blinking at Mr. Miyagi.

He'd forgotten he was there.

"Go," Mr. Miyagi said making a shooing motion. "Find Johnny-san."

Daniel nodded swallowing the panic that'd risen back down. He hurried out of the house, turning at the gate and calling, "If he comes here hold him for me please."

Mr. Miyagi nodded and Daniel turned, running down the paths of the village looking for Johnny.

Mr. Miyagi knew.

Had he just found out?

Accepted it so easily?

Important to tell people how feel while can. Understand Daniel-san?

He had known. Had tried to tell him. But Daniel hadn't understood. Had misunderstood. It explained the look Mr. Miyagi had given him when he said he was waiting for Kumiko for their date.

He'd expected Johnny.

Had thought-

Ichiro.

Daniel skidded to a stop.

"Ichiro, have you seen Johnny?" Daniel asked.

The old man stopped and shook his head.

Daniel nodded and kept running, past people trying to figure out what was salvageable from the wreck of their vegetable fields.

Daniel cupped his hands, "Have you seen Johnny?" he shouted.

They paused looking at him and shook their heads.

He kept moving.

How long had Mr. Miyagi known? Before they'd left?

Daniel didn't keep his hands to himself. But since Johnny hadn't ever responded he assumed it was some California thing.

Why hadn't Johnny responded?

What did he think Daniel thought of him?

Or had he?

All that blushing, was it because he liked Daniel?

Not because he was embarrassed, or specifically because it had been Daniel. Ever since that lunch, when Johnny hadn't said a word. How he hadn't looked at Daniel for most of their lunch and then when he had he'd turned bright red.

That had been so long ago.

Shortly after Johnny had gotten his bonsai.

Shortly after he'd apologized.

As if Johnny had sifted through all of the feelings he'd had after everything had ended, the tournament, cobra kai, Kreese, and he'd picked Daniel.

Liking him.

What would he have said if Daniel hadn't run away that one time? If he'd just let Johnny talk? Would he have told him back then?

He'd been so busy focusing on the foundation, the structure that he hadn't even noticed Johnny had already moved in. Been there since the beginning.

He was already making him coffee the way Daniel liked it.

He was already playing music, waiting patiently for Daniel to dance.

Yuna was walking towards him and stopped looking up at him, studying him.

Daniel stopped.

"Have you seen Johnny?" he asked.

She nodded. "Beach," she said pointing.

"Thanks," Daniel said breaking into a run.

Sure enough, there was that blonde head.

He had so many questions. So much to say he felt like he'd burst. But at least he'd found him.

They had time. Time for him to figure out all the words he wanted to say. Time to say it all.

Ebb and Flow

Johnny hadn't slept. Everyone around him had fallen asleep including Yuna who leaned back against him.

He wanted to be awake, alert in case the storm got worse, in case he needed to wake everyone up.

He couldn't sleep.

He'd told Daniel.

He didn't know what he expected but he was still waiting for whatever it was.

Trying to prepare him for anything.

Even if that meant grabbing his bags and going home.

The best he dared hope for was continued friendship.

When the sun rose so did Johnny. He carefully wrapped Yuna in the blanket and set her next to her mother.

He stepped carefully and quietly around the sleeping villagers and walked out into the gray morning.

He took in the damage with a grimace. It would take a lot of work to repair. He couldn't help.

He would be in the way, so he kept walking.

After a while, he heard footsteps behind him and stopped and turned.

Yuna was following him.

"Where are you going?" Yuna asked walking up to him and taking his hand.

"I don't know. I need to think."

"About?"

"Everything."

"That's a lot."

Johnny laughed. "Okay, maybe just to think about Daniel."

"Oh, I asked the wrong question," Yuna said.

"Which one?"

"Have girlfriend. Should've asked, have boyfriend?"

"Answers the same," Johnny said.

Yuna frowned looking up at him. "How?"

"I don't know."

"Then maybe do."

"Do?"

"Have boyfriend."

Johnny blinked down at her.

"It's not that easy."

"No?"

"It's complicated."

"How?"

Johnny sighed. "We used to fight, and-"

"Past."

"Huh?"

"Used to, past. So you don't now."

"Well no but-"

"Johnny-san why'd come here?"

"I wanted to stay with him."

She smiled up at him. "Boyfriend."

Johnny laughed. "It doesn't work like that."

She scrunched up her nose. "Sounds like boyfriend."

"I wish it was that easy."

"Daniel-san," she paused thoughtfully. "smiles when sees you."

"He's just friendly."

She pinched his hand and he yelped pulling his hand away. "Hey!"

"Daniel-san not just friendly."

They were walking down the road to the beach, the storm had knocked all sorts of stuff onto the beach, driftwood, and seaweed. She hopped away, ahead of him, and spun. "Johnny-san friendly."

"I'm not friendly."

"Liar."

"I'm not. I'm mean."

"Not mean."

"I'm scary."

She burst out laughing.

Johnny sat down in the sand and Yuna came over patting the top of his head. "Johnny-san good. Like Miyagi's. Not bad."

He felt tears prick in his eyes.

She clapped the sides of his face between her hands. "Daniel-san lucky."

Johnny laughed and Yuna sat down next to him, leaning against his uninjured side.

They watched the waves crash for a while and then Yuna looked up at him. "Heal fast so play sanshin more."

"Okay Yuna sensei," Johnny said.

She grinned getting up, she gave him a hug and then darted off down the road back towards the village.

Johnny looked out at the tide. It was the same ocean as the one back home.

He sunk a little further down into the sand, laying on his side.

Maybe he'd sleep a little.

The storm had passed.

Mr. Miyagi was safe it seemed.

No one was too badly hurt from what he'd seen.

He'd just close his eyes a little.

"Seriously?"

Johnny blinked awake.

Daniel was looking down at him.

Johnny stared back up at him.

He was too tired.

He shut his eyes again.

"Hey now, you know when you said you slept on the beach I thought- are you seriously going back to sleep? Do you know how worried I was? That doesn't look comfortable at all, seriously? Are you sick or something? Did something happen to your arm?"

Johnny felt Daniel messing with his sling. He was pressing the back of his hand to Johnny's forehead.

"No fever," Daniel said, carefully removing the sling away from Johnny's shoulder, investigating as best he could.

"-m fine Daniel," Johnny murmured.

"Drunk? How could you have even managed that?"

"Sleepy."

Daniel huffed sinking down into the sand next to him. "After everything you couldn't just-why, why here? Why do you sleep on the beach? How are you comfortable?"

"Listen."

Daniel sighed, moving in the sand and falling quiet.

Johnny could hear the sound of the waves crashing, the sounds of the ocean.

He could hear Daniel breathing similarly next to him, following the sounds of the waves.

Johnny breathed with it, the way he always had, always feeling more at peace at the ocean, having not put it together for so long. Matching the ebb and flow to his breath, how it always lulled him to sleep, made him feel safe.

Why he always found his way back to it.

"Johnny," Daniel said softly. "I don't want you to burn. I didn't bring anything with me. You said you turn bright red. I can't believe you actually fell asleep on the beach twice."

Johnny opened his eyes.

Daniel was leaning over him concerned.

"Did you not sleep last night?"

"I didn't."

"Why?"

Johnny gave him a look.

"Oh, right," Daniel said sitting back.

Johnny pushed himself up.

"Why did you leave?" Daniel asked.

"I wanted to give you time and space to think," Johnny said. "You kind of looked like you were freaking out."

"I did?" Daniel asked rubbing his face. He sighed. "Johnny what did you think was happening?"

Johnny frowned, mulling it over. "I thought I was interrupting your dates with Kumiko."

"I-Johnny, Kumiko, and I aren't- we're just good friends. Like you and Kumiko?"

"Yeah?"

Daniel took a deep breath and put his hand on Johnny's good shoulder. "Since before the party?"

"Yes."

"You are right, I did need time to process that, but not-not the way you thought. Why do you think I kissed you at the party?"

"You were upset, drunk, and I was there."

"And every time I touched your thigh? Moved in super close? Held your hand? Touched you?"

"You're touchy. I thought maybe you were touch starved or something."

"Touch starved? What does that even mean?"

"Bobby read about it at his old school. Read it to us at one of our first study groups. It's when you don't get enough physical touch that you need or are used to."

Daniel let out a snort of laughter.

Johnny frowned turning to face him more. "I thought it was the way you'd been in Newark and after months of only having Ali as a friend and girlfriend, and Mr. Miyagi isn't exactly- so I thought that you-"

"Were starving?" Daniel asked burst out laughing. "Is that why you and the guys are always touching? Why it was such a big deal when they could hug you again in New York?"

Johnny looked away with a frown. "Maybe."

Daniel cupped the side of his face, turning it back towards him, letting his thumb brush over Johnny's lips. "Are you sure you're not touch starved?"

Johnny blushed bright red, felt a shiver run across his skin, down his spine.

Maybe he was.

Or maybe it was because it was Daniel.

Or maybe both.

Daniel was smiling. "I've been flirting Johnny. Since the party at least, possibly before that. I broke up with Ali for many reasons, but a big one was that I like you. I was trying to go slow because you were healing. But it was incredibly frustrating that you never noticed I was flirting."

Johnny's heart pounded hard in his chest.

Daniel leaned forward pulling him into a hug.

"I probably looked like I was freaking out because I was doing the math. All the moments that I thought, gosh these feel like dates, only to realize they could have been. Because I was going to tell you I liked you. I had all these plans. I was trying to pick out the most romantic and sappy one to tell you so that you wouldn't be able to rationalize it away. So you would finally see I've been flirting all this time. Hey now, what are you doing? That arm is hurt, stop moving it! You haven't had a chance to let Mr. Miyagi look at it again. Don't damage it."

Johnny paused, he'd been lifting his injured arm up to return the hug with both hands, his other arm resting gently along Daniel's shoulders.

"Was I like this when your knee was hurt?"

Daniel laughed a puff of air on his neck that tickled.

"You were ready to carry me around everywhere. Oh, I'm going to be so much worse. Now, as much as I like sitting on the beach with you, as much as I want to keep talking. We should go back before you burn. Because then I'm really going to be annoying."

Daniel pulled away and stood up, brushing sand off of himself.

Johnny stood up, carefully. He held his hand out to Daniel.

Daniel looked at his hand then up at Johnny with a grin, taking it.

"I should've checked the beach first. Instead of literally asking every single person I saw if they'd seen you."

"What-?"

"They're all out trying to find what's salvageable in the wreckage and I ran past asking if anyone had seen you. They probably all think I lost it."

"How did you find me?"

"Yuna knew where you were."

"Ah, that makes sense."

"I do have another question. Are you out of money? I...looked in your wallet, did you not bring enough or something?"

They were turning the corner into town where it was busy, with people hard at work and they walked into the house.

"Hold that thought," Daniel said taking off his shoes and rushing into the house.

"Ah, Haitai Johnny-san," Yukie said with a smile walking past with a basket.

"Haisai," Johnny said with a bow of his head.

"Breakfast in kitchen, tell Daniel-san."

"Thank you."

She nodded continuing on her way.

Daniel came back with a tube of sunblock.

He squeezed some into his palm then shoved the bottle under his arm.

"Come here will you?" Daniel asked, not stepping down from the raised platform.

Johnny walked over, looking up at him.

"Close your eyes," Daniel said and Johnny did. "Money?"

Johnny shifted uncomfortably. "I'm out."

"Out of money what does that mean?" Daniel asked rubbing sunblock into his skin, his face, and neck.

"I spent the last of it on our tickets."

The fingers on his skin stilled.

Johnny opened his eyes.

Daniel was staring at him wide-eyed.

"How?"

"I got an allowance until I graduated. It wasn't a lot, but I'd saved up since...I was a kid. It was my emergency fund, in case I had to go, or something happened. I spent it all this year."

"You spent it all? On what?" Daniel's voice was tight.

Johnny looked away.

"Johnny, what did you spend it all on?"

"It's not a problem. I can find a job. I've worked before."

"Johnny."

"A lot of small stuff really. It all adds up," Johnny said looking out at the bonsai that Mr. Miyagi had replanted.

They looked like they'd be okay. Like they'd weathered the storm.

"A whole lifetime of savings doesn't disappear that fast because you're paying for gas for the Avanti. Did you use it to pay for the doctor for my knee?" Daniel asked, voice soft and barely a whisper.

"I did," Johnny said looking up at Daniel again. "And I'd do it again in a heartbeat. The doctor, our round trip tickets here, without hesitation."

"I thought you were rich."

"Sid's rich," Johnny said.

Daniel sank down onto the wooden platform.

"Money comes and goes," Johnny said softly. "I've survived not having any before. It's fine. I can find work. Tommy can always help me figure out my resume. Plus I've got a stack of business cards, Kumiko can help me go through those and figure out if they are jobs."

"I have my winnings, from the ice-breaking bet, I can pay you back-" Daniel said.

"No," Johnny said shaking his head. "I don't want your money, I just want you."

Daniel's head shot up looking up at him wide-eyed. "How can I argue when you say stuff like that?"

Johnny was so close he could see that Daniel was blushing, it wasn't as obvious as it was on Johnny, and not when he was in the shade.

Johnny smiled softly.

It looked like Daniel was almost upset that he was blushing.

Like he still wanted to argue.

If it made him happy Johnny could try.

"You spent all your money on me. How can you-"

"Not all of it. I still bought gas. I mean I was driving out of the Valley weekly if not more than weekly. I spent a lot on gas these last few months."

Daniel sighed, reaching out and rubbing a bit of sunscreen on his cheek.

"I missed some," he said softly.

"Ah, you found him," Kumiko said.

Johnny turned.

She was holding a tray of iced coffee.

"You really worried Daniel," she said. "Where'd you even go?"

"He slept on the beach," Daniel said.

"You slept on the beach? Why?"

"It's calming. I was tired."

Kumiko laughed shaking her head fondly and taking a seat next to Daniel. She handed each of them a glass of iced coffee.

"Did you talk?" she asked, head tilted curiously.

"Talk?" Johnny asked.

"Yeah," Daniel said then looked up at him. "She knows."

"She knows what?"

Daniel let out a deep sigh like he was so tired.

Kumiko laughed softly. "That you two like each other."

"You knew?" Johnny asked.

Kumiko nodded. "Do you remember when you arrived?"

"Yeah," Johnny said with a frown.

"Mr. Miyagi introduced you two, said you were his students, good boys, who were also dating just didn't realize it."

Daniel had been drinking his coffee and spluttered, coughing.

Johnny stared at her in shock.

He'd thought Mr. Miyagi knew, at least had seen through him, because he'd told Johnny to talk about his feelings.

But Yukie had been there, which meant she knew.

Which...was that why she'd been laughing when she'd made his bath?

Johnny felt his skin burn.

She'd said Daniel's name while talking to Mr. Miyagi who had just nodded in response.

How many people had it taken?

Johnny didn't want to think about it.

Suddenly remembering the feeling of Daniel's fingers on his skin, massaging away at his muscles, how nice it'd felt. How he'd almost not noticed what Daniel had said or where his hand had been. Flirting. Hadn't noticed he'd been flirting.

Oh god how much flirting had he missed? He'd been half asleep, the medicine had made him drowsy, but, still...

He looked away.

"Did he see the magazine?" Kumiko whispered.

"Kumiko!" Daniel yelped.

She giggled. "Sorry, I just thought from how red he is."

"You traitor," Daniel whispered.

"Magazine?" Johnny asked turning back to them.

"Nothing," Daniel said.

"Nothing?" Johnny asked. "It doesn't seem like nothing," he said motioning to Kumiko who couldn't stop giggling.

"I'll tell you later, some time, maybe," Daniel said looking away.

Johnny sighed shaking his head.

"Keep your secrets then. I'm going to go change."

He took off his shoes and walked up the steps to their room.

He dug around in his bag picking out something to change into that wasn't caked in dry mud.

Taking off the sling was a pain. But unlike the night before there wasn't an immediate rush to try and get out of it.

Daniel wasn't going anywhere. There wasn't a fight or danger. He could change and take his time.

It took a while, but he got it off, hanging it up on one of the hooks on the walls so he could come back to it.

His shoulder hurt.

The medicine Mr. Miyagi had given him had long worn off and falling off the bell tower hadn't helped things. But it wasn't swollen or hot.

Everything was just painful and stiff.

He managed, very slowly and very carefully to change out of his muddy pants and into some more comfortable shorts and put his wallet in his pocket. More out of habit than use. Then went through the painful ordeal of trying to put a shirt on.

He'd given up the night before after his bath.

He'd been too tired and just couldn't figure it out without dull bursts of pain. Then in the morning, Daniel had helped him into the shirt Kumiko had bought him.

He got one arm through and his head through one of his t-shirts and just had to figure out how to get his arm through without the pain.

It was ridiculous that putting on a shirt was so hard.

He'd done it countless times.

Every day, sometimes more than once a day, over bruised ribs and countless other injuries.

Hell, he'd dislocated his shoulder before.

Maybe he'd gotten soft. Maybe he didn't want to just stand tall and suffer through it anymore.

Maybe he couldn't.

Could he just walk around shirtless? That'd be easier.

He took the shirt off with a frustrated sigh.

"Hey," Daniel said.

Johnny turned.

Daniel was standing in the doorway, leaning against it. "Need some help?"

Johnny frowned looking at Daniel.

Normally he'd say no. Normally he'd just keep trying.

He held out the shirt.

"Yeah, the pain medicine's worn off."

"Okay," Daniel said taking the shirt that was balled up. "We can fix that. Step one shirt, step two find Mr. Miyagi or Yukie and have them take a look."

"I'm sorry, this is so-"

"Johnny," Daniel said stepping close, carefully getting his injured arm into the shirt before moving it over his head and other arm, dragging it down his chest, fingers brushing his torso as he did so. "I like taking care of you."

He'd made it seem so easy.

Johnny lowered his head to Daniel's shoulder, pressing his forehead against him. Daniel's arms came up around him.

"Seriously, it's okay," Daniel said softly. "I didn't just say it to just say it when I said a couple of nights ago that I'd help, to let me know if you needed anything."

"Thanks," Johnny said softly.

Daniel's arms were so sturdy.

He didn't want to move.

He didn't want to go anywhere.

He wanted to stay like this forever.

But Daniel stepped back after a while. "Let's go find someone okay?"

Johnny nodded and Daniel walked with him down the stairs and back out.

Kumiko was still sitting, drinking her iced coffee.

"Have you seen Mr. Miyagi or Yukie?" Daniel asked.

"Yeah. They're out that way," she said motioning.

"You mind watching him? He's in a lot of pain," Daniel said.

Kumiko nodded, and Johnny sat down ever so carefully next to her and Daniel left.

"I didn't get to ask," Kumiko said softly "What exactly happened to your arm?"

"Chozen dislocated it, on accident I think."

She wrinkled her nose in a frown. "On accident?"

"He trashed the place, we fought by spear, he slammed down and it popped out."

"And then you fell from the bell tower," Kumiko said in a hushed whisper.

"I didn't get that high up," Johnny murmured. "It wasn't that bad.

"It was very brave."

"It was desperate and stupid," Johnny said with a sigh. "I should've tried to get help."

He pulled out his wallet and blinked, the photo of Daniel was on top.

He blushed lightly as Kumiko leaned over to look.

She scooped it up with a laugh. "You two are exactly the same."

"What?"

She looked at him and then laughed shaking her head, flipping through.

"Oh, are those the business cards?"

Johnny nodded handing the wallet to her.

"Wow, that's a lot of library cards," she said before taking the stack and flipping through them. "Oh, wow."

"What?" Johnny asked.

"Because we were in such a rush I didn't get a good look at the ladies you were talking to. This one," she said flicking up a card. "Is a pottery artist in Naha, she probably was offering you a free lesson. This one works at one of the traditional theaters they do performances. This one is a fancy restaurant. You got a lot of business cards."

"So they're not jobs," Johnny said softly, disappointed.

"They might be, but like you go and have fun and they take photos and use it for advertising."

"So a trade?"

Kumiko nodded. "Might be fun for dates," she said with a grin.

"Do you want to go do any of it?" Johnny asked.

Kumiko blushed lightly. "I thought you just told Daniel you liked him!"

"I did," Johnny said confused. "But your our friend and we don't speak Japanese or Okinawan."

Kumiko laughed softly, "Oh, no wonder you two have struggled so long."

"What?" Johnny asked brows knit.

Daniel came back with Mr. Miyagi.

"Miyagi look hmm?"

He gently rolled up Johnny's sleeve and pressed ever so gently on Johnny's shoulder. Johnny jumped with a hiss of pain.

Daniel grabbed his hand.

"Is it because he fell?" Kumiko asked.

"Fell?"

"He tried to climb up the bell tower to try and rescue Yuna but fell," Kumiko said.

Mr. Miyagi clicked his tongue. "Wait, be back," he said.

Daniel stepped forward cupping Johnny's face in his hands. "Have you been in pain this whole time?"

"It's not that bad."

"Johnny."

It was a gentle admonish, a gentle request for him to be honest.

Johnny shook off Daniel's hands, he looked a little hurt, but Johnny reached out hooking his arm around Daniel, waist pulling him close, between his legs, and rested his head against Daniel's chest once he was close enough to do so.

"Yeah," he said softly.

Daniel sighed wrapping his arms around Johnny, carefully avoiding his shoulder. "Speak up next time okay? I mean I hope there's never a next time, but you shouldn't suffer just because you can. You shouldn't just suffer in silence or alone. You're not alone, okay?"

"Whose Bobby Brown?"

Johnny cursed softly. He'd forgotten to call.

"It's one of our friends back home, he's requested we keep him in the loop," Daniel said, he was rubbing circles on Johnny's back. "Kumiko, I know it's weird, but do you mind calling the number on there and telling him or whoever answers that we're okay? We didn't call because of the storm so he and the guys are probably worried."

"Isn't it really late there?"

"We're 16 hours ahead, so it might be, but they might also be really worried. They just need a quick update. It might not be Bobby, but just whoever it is let them know okay?"

"Okay," Kumiko said pushing herself up and heading off towards the phone with the card in her hand.

"It's okay, see?" Daniel said soothingly, curling over him, fingers running down his back.

"I hope they behave," Johnny said softly.

"The guys?" Daniel asked, sounding amused.

Johnny nodded and winced.

"Ah, Yukie said there's breakfast," Johnny said.

"Are you hungry?"

"Yes."

"Should I go get food?"

"No," Johnny said tightening his arm around Daniel's waist.

Daniel laughed, it was light and warm and Johnny could feel it all around him.

"Do you really like me?" Johnny asked softly. "Not as a friend, or more than a friend? You made it sound like it's been a while too. Did you really? Er-do you really?"

Daniel was silent for a while, an unbearably long time and then he took a deep breath.

"I cannot fix on the hour, or the spot, or the look, or the words, which laid the foundation. It is too long ago. I was in the middle before I knew that I had begun."

Johnny looked up startled feeling his ears burn.

"Did you just quote Pride and Prejudice to me?"

"Hey, I may have been enjoying the view but I was paying attention."

The view? What view? Mr. Miyagi's garden?

"You. You're the view that I like," Daniel said, cupping his face. "One day you're going to catch on faster. But it's kind of worth explaining it when you turn so red like this."

Johnny hadn't even said anything aloud, had his questions and confusion been so apparent?

He quickly ducked his head, pulling Daniel back to him, hiding his face, heart pounding.

"I talked to Tommy?" Kumiko said sitting down next to them. "Your friends are updated."

"Thank you," Johnny mumbled into Daniel's shirt.

"And Aunt Yukie gave me toast for you guys. Said you hadn't eaten."

"Thanks, Kumiko," Daniel said.

"Is Johnny okay?"

"He's fine."

"Not fine," Mr. Miyagi said setting down a big basket of supplies. "Johnny-san in pain."

"Well yeah, I- Mr. Miyagi, it's different-" Daniel sighed giving up explaining.

"Miyagi fix," Mr. Miyagi said.

Johnny turned his head to watch as Mr. Miyagi rolled up his sleeve again from where it's slipped, studying it and then very gently rub some cream on his shoulder and wrapping it gently back up. He was so gentle that if Johnny hadn't been watching he might not have noticed.

He felt tears well up in his eyes, glad Mr. Miyagi was there.

Glad he hadn't gone anywhere, hadn't been murdered by his childhood friend.

Mr. Miyagi then held up a little cup. "Medicine, drink. Eat toast, go to bed."

"It's morning," Daniel said.

"Hai, Johnny-san need rest. Go on dates later."

Kumiko burst out into a fit of giggles while Daniel sputtered trying to say something, shocked and blushing.

Johnny ate the toast Kumiko gave him and drank the medicine Mr. Miyagi had given him.

He was tired.

The medicine he knew would make him even more tired.

"You'll all be okay?" Johnny asked.

"Yes," Daniel said.

Johnny nodded.

He could just sleep here.

That'd be fine.

He didn't want to go up the stairs.

And if he was here they could wake him up if something important happened.

He could help if there was some danger or something.

He started to lean back, to slowly ease himself down onto the boards.

"No," Daniel said grabbing his shirt. "You are not sleeping here. You're sleeping in the room."

"Here's fine."

"Yeah, I'm getting that. But again, like the beach, I'd rather you sleep somewhere safer."

"Already have sunblock on, here's fine."

"You're not sleeping in the garden,"

"It's nice though," Johnny said with a yawn.

"Get up Johnny you're going to the room."

Johnny nodded, putting his hand over Daniel's.

He thought he could get up.

Tried to shift to get up but it'd require too much energy.

He'd have to make Daniel move.

But he was too tired.

He could just sleep here.

Daniel let go of his shirt and stepped back to give Johnny the space to get up. Johnny frowned, blinking at him.

Mr. Miyagi's medicine sure was potent.

He slid forward off the walkway and turned, heading towards the steps.

The garden looked cozy. So green.

Daniel was gently turning him, pushing his back towards the stairs.

"I'll make sure he's in bed," Daniel said.

"Careful," Mr. Miyagi said.

Johnny was herded to bed.

It reminded him of after the bath. Struggling to get out of that chair, debating just sleeping in the garden that night, but knowing Daniel would worry.

He'd nearly fallen on his way back so many times that he lost count.

He wanted to stay awake.

He wanted to talk to Daniel more.

Wanted to clarify everything. Set it out in certain terms. Like was established.

Was it too early to tell Daniel he loved him?

Probably.

Ask him out on a date? Kiss?

Every time Johnny tried to focus he couldn't figure out where they were. He'd lost the thread. Was all tangled up in it.

Enemies. Friends. Like.

What came next?

He couldn't remember.

He knew how he felt. But he wanted to take the steps properly.

Didn't want to scare Daniel off.

Saying I like you and then I love you within... twenty-four hours seemed a bit too fast.

Needy? Clingy? There was a word for it.

He couldn't remember what it was.

Desperate? Was Johnny desperate?

That didn't make sense. What did that even mean? Desperate for what?

He couldn't focus. He couldn't think of how it went.

Oh, thank god, the bed.

He'd think about it later.

He sunk down to his knees.

He wanted to just flop onto his stomach but he knew he'd hurt himself.

He laid down carefully.

"You okay?"

"Mmm."

Words were too hard. Thinking was too hard.

He shut his eyes.

He opened them.

Where would Daniel go? What would he do?

Why was he so tired?

Was he already an 80-year-old man going to bed at....oh god the clock said 11 am.

Or was this more like a college kid thing?

Party hard, go to bed when adults with 9-5s are getting lunch?

Though even that didn't feel right.

The college kids he saw in the library were up all night studying and working on projects.

Daniel was talking again.

"I'm going to go for a walk. I'll be back. Don't- well, just sleep okay? You need sleep. I'll be back, okay?"

Johnny nodded.

He wanted to keep his eyes open.

Wanted to watch Daniel.

But when he shut them to blink, when he just rested them a little, he fell asleep.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

It was almost like when Johnny had been sick. The way he kept looking for Daniel until he fell asleep. Like he didn't want to go to sleep and was determined not to but his body took over and knocked him out.

Daniel didn't want to leave his side, but he wanted to go for a walk, wanted to talk to Mr. Miyagi, wanted to take in Tomi Village after the storm because even though he'd walked through it several times going to look for Johnny and coming back with Johnny he hadn't really looked, he'd been too focused on Johnny.

He had a lot to think about. To go through in his brain and he needed time to do so.

He carefully worked his way back down to where everyone else was, sitting and quietly talking in Japanese.

"I'm going for a walk," Daniel said putting his shoes back on.

"Miyagi join," Mr. Miyagi said and Daniel nodded.

He'd expected it. Had hoped for a chance to walk together. It always helped him clear his head to be focused with Mr. Miyagi beside him.

They walked through the remains of the village and Daniel asked Mr. Miyagi questions. About the village, how a vegetable farming village was going to recover from a storm that destroyed what Chozen and Sato hadn't mere days ago.

Had it been days? Had it been yesterday? Time was all a mess.

He was so busy, everything just crammed on top of one another and it messed with his perception of time.

What he did know was that Johnny liked him.

Had confessed to him in the middle of a storm.

Possibly one of the worst times to confess anything but he kind of liked it. He could tease Johnny about it forever.

Remember when you told me you liked me? In the middle of a super dangerous storm when we were supposed to head to shelter? How you just stopped walking like you would refuse to move forward any longer without saying it.

It was sweet.

One day he would tease him about it.

Now wasn't the time.

Now wasn't the time for a lot of things.

He hadn't realized how much pain Johnny was in. Hadn't put the two and two together. All the mud on him from falling off the bell tower in the storm. Though Daniel hadn't seen that. Hadn't seen how high he got up because he'd been helping Mr. Miyagi rescue Sato. But he knew how slippery the wood had gotten. How dangerous it had been.

Johnny also hadn't slept. No wonder he'd fallen asleep on the beach.

Johnny struggled to sleep during normal everyday situations. Heap some danger on top and Daniel should've known. But when they were together it seemed like he did sleep.

That should've been a hint.

That Johnny didn't just trust him but felt safe around him. The way he seemed to gain strength from Daniel, find him to be the sturdy one. Like Daniel was a pillar of strength. The thought was something he felt all the way in his toes if he explored it too much, too much of a thrill.

It was the way Johnny held on to him, hadn't let him go, didn't want to let go when he was in so much pain like it helped.

Just Daniel being there helped.

Daniel thought he pulled strength from Johnny, that it was one way. He'd thought everything had been one way and had only hoped that he could make it go both, for it to be mutual. But it had been the whole time.

Now that he looked at what he knew, it was overwhelmingly obvious that something had been there, stronger than he'd thought if he'd only looked.

Johnny slept well in his arms and when he didn't Daniel could get him to just through breathing techniques.

When he wasn't well he looked for Daniel.

He looked for Daniel even when he was well. All those check-ins. All the blushing was for him. Not general embarrassment.

He'd spent all of his life savings on Daniel within five months of their friendship.

That one stung a little. He wasn't particularly happy about it. But Johnny had been so adamant that it was fine. That he wouldn't change it. It wasn't on the top of the list of things to focus on at the moment. He would later.

Johnny listened.

Every word. All the time.

Liked hearing Daniel talk. Which Daniel didn't understand. No one liked hearing him talk, his own mother got tired of it. Everyone got tired of it. Except for Johnny. Johnny asked him to talk more when he fell silent as if it was something he craved.

That...was definitely something. Did something to him.

If Johnny had liked him for so long, did all those dates count? That thing Johnny had said at the party.

I don't normally let someone feel me up until like the 5th date.

Had they already passed that? He had kind of already done that, twice now, three times now? Did the party count? On the beach for the photo shoot and in the bath.

Could he keep doing that?

More than that?

Or now that Johnny knew he liked him back would there be set steps that had to be followed.

Did he have a laminated free pass?

Would he be giving Johnny who was still injured more baths?

Was it more torture knowing Johnny liked him back and being close but not knowing where they were or what Johnny was comfortable with than it had been before, not knowing?

They were going to have to talk. About a lot.

Daniel was going to have to wait. Until Johnny felt better. Until he could focus on a long conversation and not sink beneath waves of pain and exhaustion.

He wanted to be organized.

He wanted to collect all the errant thoughts and bring them forward.

Organize them, list them, and work their way through, and even though that one kept floating to the top it was, despite how much he wanted to put it on the top of the list, lower in priority.

A fleet of cars and construction equipment rumbled into the village bearing Sato's name.

"What's Sato doing here?" Daniel asked feeling panic run through his veins.

There was no way right? After saving his life Sato had to have turned over a new leaf. No one could hold onto a grudge for forty years and then be saved and still hold onto it right?

"Don't know," Mr. Miyagi said as they walked down the road looking at the cars and trucks as they passed by.

One car stopped and Sato got out without his sunglasses on. Without a suit. He was wearing what looked like a workman's uniform and cap. He carried a little box. When he got close he bowed to Mr. Miyagi.

Everything about him was different, not just the way he was dressed or the way he walked, but his facial expressions no longer held that hatred, and he spoke softly without the gruffness that he'd had before every time he shouted after Mr. Miyagi.

A different man than the one Daniel met originally and he felt relief flood his veins.

It'd be okay. Mr. Miyagi had turned his enemy back into his friend.

Kumiko and Yukie had come over and Daniel remembered the o-bon festival.

Kumiko had said it'd be fun. Could be romantic.

Maybe that'd be a good idea. Sato seemed to be in a friendlier mood.

She should ask. Oh, she didn't want to ask.

Well Daniel could ask. Why not?

He was feeling good.

Mr. Miyagi was safe.

Sato was helping the village.

Johnny liked him back.

"Mr. Sato, you know o-bon dance is soon, and it's gonna be real hard the way things are, to have it here in the village," Daniel said, trying to make the suggestion gentle and like a great idea, unsure if Sato and Mr. Miyagi were on good terms if that expanded to Daniel or the rest of them.

"What you ask of me?"

"Well can they have it in the castle? That's where it really belongs anyway, isn't it?" Daniel asked. He felt like saying it so pointedly would hopefully help get the point across. The unsaid the castle that you're selling away piece by piece even though it's not just yours.

Sato stared at him, clearly catching the unsaid words. The pointed why don't you give back something you took that wasn't really yours to take?

"Your student become my teacher. O-bon will be held in castle. Now and forever."

Daniel was relieved he hadn't meant for it to come off so harshly even though he felt it. Sato had made their week in Okinawa hell. It was the least he could do. The look on Yukie and Kumiko's faces made up for any reservations he'd had. They looked so happy.

Daniel smiled.

He'd let them talk.

Sato and Mr. Miyagi and Yukie had a lot to catch up on, now that they weren't fighting.

He nodded to Mr. Miyagi and made his way through the fields arm in arm with Kumiko.

"Thank you," she said softly.

"It's the least I can do," Daniel said with a soft laugh.

Talking was one of his specialties.

Being the braver one to ask someone a question was easy for him.

"How is Johnny feeling?"

"He passed out," Daniel sighed. "He's probably been in so much pain. He's so used to handling everything on his own, that he just didn't speak up."

"Are you happy?" Kumiko asked, tilting her head to try and see him better.

"Yeah, things have been a roller-coaster here. I think you lied about this being a peaceful island. But they're good now."

Kumiko laughed. "It's usually nice. Maybe you just bring adventure with you."

"Well, I've had enough adventure for the rest of my life. I just want..." Daniel stopped. "Well, I don't know what I want to do with my life. But I do want to spend it with Johnny."

"Ah, romantic," she sighed.

"What can I say, I'm a romantic. Since he's sleeping and hopefully healing, what can I do to keep myself busy until my sleeping beauty wakes up? Help me find something I can do to help the village," Daniel said rolling up his sleeves. "I'll take a page out of his book. Put me to work."

Kumiko laughed looking around.

"Ah, let's help them," she said carefully stepping around to a house that had had a tree fall on it in the storm.

Kumiko talked to the people in Japanese and they responded. They were clearing a path back into the house to see if they could save anything. The tree had been removed already by Sato's crew.

"Sato's people will help re-build. But they need to get whatever they can salvage out and into the wooden boxes to keep it safe," she said pointing.

One of the men in the grey work clothes tapped a pair of gloves to Daniel's chest.

"There's a lot of broken glass," Kumiko explained. Putting her own pair of gloves on. "So be careful."

Daniel nodded and followed her into the house. They went through the debris.

Daniel went where he was directed. He helped carry out furniture that had survived. He carried out fragile things like photos and paintings that hadn't been ruined, books, and kitchenware.

It was a lot of back and forth. A lot of carrying things. In and out of the dim house, with the crunch of broken glass under his shoes, around and past other people doing the same.

A woman sat with the boxes. She took the fragile things, carefully wrapping them, and putting them into the boxes.

She nodded at him every time. Bowing and taking things from him with two hands.

Kumiko tapped him when it was time to take a break. They sat on a flat rock that they'd had in the garden and one of Sato's men gave them bento boxes and thermoses.

"What are they going to do?" Daniel asked.

"They'll stay with neighbors whose homes weren't as badly damaged until their home's rebuilt," Kumiko said. "Without Sato's help, it'd have taken a lot longer. But with them, they'll be back home before the o-bon festival," Kumiko said opening her box. She seemed to approve.

Daniel opened his. It was rice and grilled fish and what looked like tiny grapes still on the stem.

"What's this?" Daniel asked picking them up with his chopsticks.

"Umibudo, mmm sea grapes? They're a type of seaweed."

"This is not seaweed," Daniel said. "These are definitely grapes."

"Try them, salty, not sweet."

Daniel did so. They were good. She was right, they weren't sweet, they weren't grapes. But they were so small and burst on his tongue. They were so small. He liked how it all went together.

Maybe when he got home he'd work on lunches.

He thought they were the most boring meal after years and years of cafeteria food. Just a quick meal in the middle of the day. The only fun part had been talking to friends, which he hadn't had for six months, but those last months with the guys and Johnny had made it fun. But the food had been boring, the only highlight being whatever Bobby had brought.

He liked bentos.

He liked the little lunch boxes that Mr. Miyagi had made him. And Johnny liked them. He liked the idea of one day sending Johnny off to wherever he was going for work or school with a bento. Stopping part of his day to eat lunch wherever he was to eat the same thing wondering if Johnny was enjoying his.

Kumiko was telling him about the o-bon dance. How she was excited to dance in the castle. That her house hadn't gotten too badly damaged, so she could wear her nice traditional clothing and do a dance with a fan.

He finished his bento and drank from the thermos.

It was soup.

He coughed in surprise and she laughed.

"Have to have soup," she said with a grin.

"Needs a warning label. Like careful, there's tofu in this. Don't choke on it," Daniel said with a frown after catching his breath.

"It's good for you," she said with a grin.

"Not for your lungs. I really do not want to have survived all this, for Johnny to like me back, and I die by tofu," Daniel said wrinkling his nose.

Kumiko opened her thermos and poured it into the lid, which he now realized was a cup. "It's a little more obvious this way huh? Less death by tofu?"

"Oh, I see how it is," Daniel said with a sigh, sarcasm dripping. "Totally missed the obvious?"

Kumiko patted him gently on the shoulder.

"I believe that's a common theme in your life."

She managed to keep a serious straight face through the delivery and for a few seconds after before bursting into a fit of giggles.

"Hey! There were a lot of factors okay."

"Sure."

"We hated each other."

"Did you really?"

"He was scary when he was angry."

Kumiko nodded. "But not angry anymore?"

"No. It's like it was all..." squeezed out of him. Daniel frowned at the thought, pouring his soup into his cup. "He went through a lot. Doesn't excuse it. But he's made up for it. And I like him."

"Clearly."

"Okay, yes. Got it. You think I'm not also vastly aware we could've been dating since like January?"

"January!" Kumiko gasped. "Miyagi sensei did not say how long you two had been courting. Daniel! It's June!"

"I know," Daniel grumbled into his soup. "I was gonna tell him when we went home."

"Were you? Really?"

She didn't sound like she believed him. Like Daniel would've continued putting it off. He didn't think he would've.

But what if each of those daydream ideas hadn't gone perfectly?

Did he want everything to be perfect?

Need it to be?

Would he have changed course last minute each time out of fear of Johnny not reciprocating it?

Damn, how had Johnny done it?

He remembered that determined stance, the wind blowing Johnny's hair from his face, whipping at his clothes.

He had been so determined to say it, to get it off his chest that he wouldn't even back down in the middle of a dangerous storm.

He was going to say what he was going to say, he was going to confess whether the storm came or not, no matter what in that moment, and Daniel hadn't even been able to respond.

He'd gotten so used to Johnny following him.

Bending and being flexible that he'd forgotten what it was like when Johnny dug his heels in, when he was determined.

How he turned into an immovable boulder.

It would've been scary once upon a time.

But it was a relief to know that Johnny still wouldn't budge on things he thought were important.

And that had been so important to him that mother nature be damned. Fuck danger. It was brave and stupid, hot and endearing, and made Daniel just want to run back to Miyagi's house, up those stairs to be near him.

But Johnny needed to sleep. Needed to heal.

Daniel would get all his feelings out eventually, the overflow that had been building for months, he'd try and be gentle on voicing them, not a tidal wave of a broken damn like he feared would happen. That he wouldn't be able to shut up and would just keep talking about everything. Every moment. Every missed opportunity. Ever unfulfilled plan he'd had.

He was worried he'd embarrass himself.

"I tried to be obvious and it never worked," Daniel said softly. "I was running out of ideas."

"So from now on your just going to talk to him?"

"I mean I'm still going to flirt, but I don't mind explaining. It seems to have rewards."

He didn't mind at all. The way Johnny had turned bright red over something so simple, a quick explanation was delicious.

He could live off that.

Almost a year ago he never would've imagined it. Never would've thought Johnny would look at him like that. He was pleased by it. Happy.

They finished their lunch and went back to work.

It was exhausting but they cleared out the house of everything salvageable and the family thanked them warmly, bowing and shaking Daniel's hand warmly.

It took everything in Daniel not to turn and run. To match Kumiko's pace on their walk back to Mr. Miyagi's house.

"You're struggling."

"What?"

"It's all over your face."

"Huh?"

"You just want to see if he's awake yet."

"I can wait."

She laughed.

"I can!"

She laughed harder and he knew he was blushing.

He could be patient. He had been patient.

"You want to be a prince," Kumiko said with a giggle.

"No, I-wait what do you mean?"

"Like a fairy tale."

Daniel stared at her in confusion.

"Snow white, sleeping beauty. Wake up to a kiss. Saved by a kiss, by a prince," Kumiko said with a grin.

"That's not-"

"You want to run straight to him and kiss him."

"That should be romantic. If I didn't get to have a romantic confession on my end then I for sure as hell am making sure our first kiss that's sober is romantic," Daniel said.

"If you spend too much time trying to be perfect it will never happen," Kumiko said with a frown.

"Well, I'm going to try."

"Then you are not going to kiss him till your fifty."

"I won't take that long!" Daniel said looking at her horrified.

"You move at turtle pace."

"He's hurt."

"His lips are not hurt."

"He has this thing about only counting kisses that happen when people can remember them. And with the amount of medication he's on, I'm not sure he'd be aware."

Kumiko sighed and nodded. "That makes sense."

The lights were on at the Miyagi house and they walked through the gate. A mat was set out in the garden and a table was set out. Mr. Miyagi, Yukie, Sato, and Johnny were sitting around the table.

Johnny's hair was damp and he was wearing different clothes. Daniel was disappointed. He'd had a bath already.

He'd been hoping to wake Johnny up, to be the one there when he woke up, to help him. To have those eyes look for him and find him.

It looked like they were playing a card game.

Johnny was studying the cards in his hand with his brows furrowed in confusion.

It smelled nice, like something delicious was being cooked.

Johnny looked up when they stepped into the garden and smiled a soft smile at Daniel.

Daniel walked over taking off his shoes and sitting down on the mat next to Johnny.

He wanted to wrap his arms around him, tell him he missed him all day, thought about him all day, but even though Yukie and Mr. Miyagi knew it wasn't really a good place to do so. It was something he wanted to say just for Johnny.

"oh, hanafuda," Kumiko said, sitting down next to them.

"Teaching Johnny-san," Mr. Miyagi said with a soft smile.

Daniel looked at the cards held in Johnny's hand. They were not like any playing cards he'd ever seen before.

Johnny leaned over towards him. "It's not easy. I only understand part of it. They're broken up into months of the year, matching sets of four with animals and plants and stuff. And you want to match them. But then there are different matching themes and those are all worth different points and that's where I'm lost."

Daniel wrapped an arm around Johnny, no one would see it he thought.

"Does not help Sato-san play different," Yukie said with a laugh.

"I play right way," Sato said stiffly but with a smile. "Think Miyagi-san rusty from USA."

"Miyagi play every year with 442nd friends. Not rusty," Mr. Miyagi said. "Yukie-san play same way. Sato play different."

"It's kind of like Uno," Johnny said softly. "Everyone has different rules and thinks they're right. Makes it a little harder to figure out the sets beyond they match."

"Are you playing Koi Koi?" Kumiko asked studying the cards on the table and looking at the ones Johnny held.

"Yes," Johnny said.

"Then you have Koi Koi."

"That's where the argument is," Johnny said as Kumiko took the matching set from his hand and set it out.

"Not a set!" Sato said.

"Is set!" Yukie said with a laugh. "All same! How not same?"

"They've also been drinking," Johnny said softly, pointing out the glasses with ice in them sitting on coasters with condensation around the table.

"Sake cup not animal," Sato said.

"Not animal, but part of set," Mr. Miyagi said amused. "Always part of set."

Daniel wrapped his arm around Johnny. "What are they drinking?"

"Awamori, local drink." Johnny said. "Potent apparently."

"Sato-san think sake cup not animal but think Iris animal," Yukie said with a laugh.

"Iris not animal, but fish in water," Sato said tapping the card Kumiko had put down for Johnny.

"Johnny, say Shōbu," Kumiko said with a grin.

"Shōbu," Johnny said.

Sato groaned leaning back his head. "Sake cup wild card, not animal." He held up his hand. "Fine fine, Johnny-san win. Good job Johnny-san. They teach you wrong, but I outnumbered."

"What does Shōbu mean?" Daniel asked.

"Game," Mr. Miyagi said collecting the cards. "Koi Koi mean keep going. Kumiko sneaky."

Kumiko grinned rolling up her sleeves. "Shōbu means we can join in. Koi Koi meant we'd have to wait."

"Ah, first!" Yukie said getting up. "I bring out dinner."

Johnny shifted and Daniel tightened his grip. He'd remembered Johnny at his grandparents, standing every time his grandmother came or left the room.

"Do you need some help?" Johnny called.

"No no, rest Johnny-san."

The tension Daniel felt in Johnny's back left and he settled back against him. Too well trained.

"What did you do today?" Johnny asked turning to Daniel.

"Kumiko and I helped some of Sato's staff prepare a home for reconstruction. I think that's the right word. Just moved furniture and everything that had survived out so they could safely store it until they get their house rebuilt."

"Sounds busy, a lot of work," Johnny said. Almost like he was disappointed he hadn't been able to help.

"How about you?" Daniel asked.

"Slept most of the day," Johnny said with a frown. "Then woke up to hearing Sato, panicked and came down the stairs and they were all laughing and talking. I'd missed the memo I guess."

"Ah, right, Mr. Miyagi broke a wooden beam that had Sato pinned during the storm. Saved his life and this morning Sato brought the deed to the village, his men to help rebuild, and asked for forgiveness."

Johnny nodded. "So I took a bath, changed, and then Yukie started dinner and we've been playing Hanafuda most of the evening."

"How's your shoulder feeling?"

"Better," Johnny said then turning his gaze to Kumiko, "Do you want to pick a card for tomorrow?"

"Card?"

Johnny shifted pulling out his wallet and passing it over. "Already called the guys today. They were disappointed that I wasn't Kumiko."

Daniel laughed softly and watched as Kumiko pulled out the business cards.

"Ah, what are those?" Sato asked suddenly curious.

"Johnny made friends when we went dancing. They invited him out." Kumiko explained flipping through the cards.

"We should go here tomorrow," Kumiko said putting a card down.

Daniel leaned forward looking at it. "An aquarium?"

"Best Aquarium," Kumiko said with a grin. "Largest aquarium tank in the world."

Mr. Miyagi chuckled softly as Sato set his glass down and missed the coaster. "Too much old friend?"

Sato responded to him in Japanese and Mr. Miyagi replied the same.

Johnny sighed leaning into Daniel. "So, aquarium?"

"Sure," Daniel said. "What time?"

Johnny turned to Kumiko, "What time works for you?"

"Think you can both be awake and ready at 7 am?" Kumiko asked.

"Yeah," Johnny said.

Was Daniel missing something? It'd sounded like a date. But Kumiko was going with them? He'd cleared that up, hadn't he? Was Johnny still confused?

Mr. Miyagi burst out laughing at something Sato said, and Sato was gesturing with his drink speaking rapidly, face red, clearly drunk.

Yukie returned with dinner and they ate.

They played a couple more rounds of the card game, it was difficult to pick up there were so many cards and it was all image matching. Daniel didn't know all his flowers and trees so it was difficult to realize which ones were matching sets. Plus Yukie and Sato would put down sets that weren't matching trees or flowers or ribbons and Daniel hadn't a clue how they'd matched.

"See?" Johnny said softly.

Eventually, they called it a night and Johnny and Daniel headed off to their room. Daniel's heart pounding in his chest the entire way up the stairs.

Was it weird now? Now that they knew? Would it be the same? Different? Did he want it to be the same or different?

"Why is Kumiko coming with us tomorrow?" Daniel asked when they were in their room. "You did understand that I don't like her that way right?"

"Oh, uh...she has a car, speaks Japanese, Okinawan and English, and knows her way there. It's not in Naha, it's further North. I thought it'd be smart. I can't drive at the moment and I don't know if we could even borrow someone's car for you to drive. Or if we might mess up and drive on the right because we forgot they drive on the left. I also don't know if we even could legally drive here," Johnny said. "Plus she's our friend."

Daniel hadn't even thought about all of that. "Oh," he said softly.

"Logistically it made sense, was I wrong? Did you want to do something different? I let her pick because she's doing a lot for us and can read the cards."

"No, you're right. I just was looking forward to spending time alone with you."

"We're alone now."

"I meant as a date," Daniel said amused.

"Oh."

"You said five dates," Daniel said stepping towards Johnny. "If Kumiko comes with, does it count as a date?"

Johnny stared at him confused.

Daniel sighed. He hadn't meant for this to be the first part of their conversation, but it always floated to the top. And he was there now. He was following the wrong thread, but it was the one he always came back to, one of the ones that had given him hope and a goal. But maybe it'd make him look bad if he focused on this one too hard. Revealed how much he held onto that goal and wanted to chase after it. Wanted to know what other rewards came after a certain amount of dates.

"Five dates?" Johnny repeated clearly trying to remember when he'd said it and the context.

"Don't worry about it. It doesn't count," Daniel said walking past him towards his bag.

"Wait, I want to understand," Johnny said.

"You said it a long time ago," Daniel said. "The point is I don't know where we are-"

"Tomi village."

Daniel laughed turning.

Johnny was smiling.

It'd been a joke.

The guy had bad jokes, elementary school jokes.

That was new but nice.

"No, I know where we are physically in the world. I mean our relationship."

Johnny nodded, sitting down on the floor carefully and patting it across from him.

Daniel sat down across from him.

"I like you," Johnny said.

Daniel smiled. "We've established that."

Johnny nodded. "So what do you want to do?"

Everything.

"Date. Exclusively."

"Okay."

"Boyfriends."

Lovers.

Johnny was a little pink but he nodded.

Daniel wondered if for a moment he'd said the second part aloud. He was sure he hadn't.

"I do want to talk more about everything. Make sure we're on the same page," Daniel said after a while. "It's why I was planning to make this big deal out of telling you."

"Do you want me to take it back?"

"Huh?" Daniel asked looking at him surprised.

"Do you want to pretend I didn't say anything so you can continue your plans?"

"What? No! Why would you think I'd want that?"

"You've mentioned it several times now." Johnny said. "If it makes you happy I could just pretend, be surprised."

Daniel shook his head, bring his hands down to Johnny's knees, leaning forward a bit. "No way, you can't take it back even for a second. I will just use the ideas for dates or something."

Johnny's hand that wasn't in the sling came down over Daniel's. "I don't need big statements or romantic things. I'm just happy that you like me."

Daniel looked at him flipping his hand over to hold Johnny's, enterlacing their fingers.

"Me too," Daniel said.

Johnny was definitely blushing in the lantern light of their room but he looked happy. He looked at ease.

This was definitely the right direction.

The way they were supposed to go, the correct path they could take together.

Daniel couldn't wait to enjoy every step along the way. Good or bad didn't matter because he'd hold that hand no matter where they went.

The alarm clock went off at 6:30 am and was followed by a grumble in Johnny's ear. Daniel was curled up behind him, arms around his waist, leg over his hip. He'd said it was the only way to sleep and try and keep his shoulder unhurt.

It'd taken Johnny forever to fall asleep.

He blamed spending all day sleeping, but he knew it was because of how close Daniel was, the feeling of his breath on his skin, knowing that they were boyfriends.

Daniel had fallen asleep pretty quickly. He'd worn himself out throughout the day helping with repairs while Johnny had slept.

An almost dreamless sleep throughout the day. He assumed it was the medicine.

The only dream he'd had in the middle of the night was about being at the animal sanctuary and being asked to take care of a baby hippo that kept charging around like it was a dog and he had to figure out how to feed it a watermelon when it kept trying to jump up, thinking itself a dog and it was a baby so it didn't realize it could totally crush Johnny's arm in its mouth.

It'd been stressful but not nearly as bad as most of his dreams.

Johnny turned off the alarm and shifted carefully to look at Daniel. There was no reason to keep pretending he slept through the alarms.

"Morning," Johnny said softly.

"Does it have to be morning? Can't it be 3 am still so I can stay right here?" Daniel mumbled.

"You don't want to go to the aquarium?"

"I do," Daniel said. He spoke as if there was a but in there, a however, but he didn't continue, just pressed his nose into Johnny's neck. "Why'd we agree to 7 am?"

"She's driving. Driver picks the time."

"If she visits I'm waking her up at five am," Daniel grumbled.

He sighed rolling away from him and pushing himself up into a sitting position, yawning and stretching.

Daniel's hair was all messed up and Johnny sat up, reaching out to smooth some of it down, it refused to stay put.

It was cute.

Daniel heaved himself up after blinking blearily into the gray of their room and then got up, grabbed his bag, and headed off to the bathroom.

Johnny did his best to get dressed.

It was slow going, a button-up was easier he realized so he went for one of those and then shorts.

He'd deal with the sling later.

Daniel stopped him on the way out of the room and frowned, set his bag down, and set about buttoning Johnny's shirt up the rest of the way.

They went downstairs where Kumiko was waiting, leaning against the gate.

"Breakfast on the way," she said with a grin.

The drive was nice, peaceful. The village was already looking so much better. Sato's trucks and men were hard at work putting it back together again. Daniel was talking to Kumiko about the aquarium. Asking questions as they made their way down the long winding roads.

"Ah, almost forgot," Daniel said digging around in the bag he'd brought with him.

He turned to Johnny who frowned. He was holding sunscreen again.

"You don't have to-"

"Did you put any on?" Daniel asked.

"No."

"Then I do."

Johnny frowned but didn't move out of the way as Daniel rubbed the sunscreen into his skin while Kumiko laughed.

It seemed dangerous for him to be doing it while she was driving, he'd practically climbed into Johnny's lap, and his face was focused, looking down at him. Johnny put his hand on Daniel's hip, worried he'd fall if they hit a bump of some kind, wanting to say he'd be fine and it wasn't like an emergency.

Surely he'd be fine for an hour drive or however long it'd take. But he'd also seen Daniel's bathroom back home at South Seas. All the little creams and stuff. He hadn't ever looked in the bag Daniel took with him to shower or bathe, but he had a feeling there was a multi-step routine beyond just washing his face. The guy would look young forever and that seemed his goal.

Daniel was cupping Johnny's face brushing his thumb over his cheek like he had the day before, smiling down at him.

Kumiko was still talking about the aquarium. And Daniel was responding but not taking his eyes away from Johnny's. He had a job to do and he was not going to stop until he's done.

Was this his life now? Was it a good thing? Embarrassing?

Johnny didn't know. But it was hard to breathe, he kept forgetting to, too busy, too focused on everything, the hand on his good shoulder pressing down and using him for balance, the wind messing up whatever attempt Daniel had made on his hair, the feel of Daniel's fingers across his skin, the way his knees were framing his thighs, the way he kept getting lost in his eyes, forgetting where they were what they were doing, only focused on Daniel. Unable to keep any focus on the words he was exchanging with Kumiko.

His world had shrunk down to just the boy in front of him, whose fingers were now rubbing sunblock into his neck, with caution and concern but there was no fear there anymore and not with Daniel.

They got breakfast at a drive-through, Kumiko passing their orders to them and eating while she drove the rest of the way.

Daniel had settled in next to him, pressing close. When he was done eating his hand went to Johnny's thigh like usual, like always, but it was different. Because Johnny knew there was more to it now. That it was just him.

Kumiko parked at the aquarium parking lot and they walked to the front desk where she took the business card from Johnny and spoke quickly to the young receptionist. A woman came out sounding absolutely delighted to see them, listening to Kumiko and nodding her head, and responding in Japanese.

"So she'd like, if we're okay with it, for all three of us to be part of it. We walk around, look at stuff, enjoy the place and a guided tour, someone takes photos. And we get souvenirs from the gift shop for free," Kumiko explained. "I'm down, how about you two?"

Johnny glanced at Daniel who looked surprised but nodded.

They were led through the gates and into the darkness of the aquarium.

It wasn't particularly busy and the guide explained the different fish and animals that called the aquarium home. Showing them local favorites like the little garden eels who poked their heads up out of the sand to look up at them as they stopped to look in.

They watched clouds of jellyfish move through the water in their tanks around them, little crabs scuttle across the sand, and then Daniel stopped at his side and Johnny caught sight of what he was looking at.

A gigantic tank, full of fish and manta rays and whale sharks.

He'd seen pictures of them but never seen one in person.

They were huge.

They stayed there for a while staring up at them, hands finding each other in the dark like always, not even thinking about it, no words necessary. Just knowing.

They worked their way through the rest of the aquarium until they reached the end where a staff member made them bright blue soft serve ice cream in cones decorated with little pearl-looking sprinkles.

They walk around outside eating their ice cream. They walked through the gardens full of vibrant and colorful flowers and with a view of the ocean crashing nearby.

The park was massive beyond the aquarium and it took a while to walk it. But it was peaceful with a nice ocean breeze.

When it was time to go the woman returned, thanked them for their time, exchanged contact info with Kumiko, and handed them each a bag.

"One more, in car," she said with a smile. "Arigato. Enjoy Okinawa."

They thanked her and walked back to the car where a giant whale shark plush animal took up most of the space.

The three of them stopped staring at it.

"How?"

"Daniel you're going to have to hold it the whole drive back," Kumiko said.

"Seriously? It's massive. I didn't know they made stuffed animals that big."

"It kind of looks like it's driving," Johnny said with a laugh.

"It does," Kumiko giggled.

It took a bit of work. They put the bags in the trunk and Daniel sat in the middle hugging the gigantic plush to his chest so it wasn't blocking anything in Kumiko's small white car. Getting it back to Miyagi's place was an ordeal. But they managed it.

Daniel didn't seem to want to let it go. Carrying it up to their room like it was going to go home with them.

Johnny wondered if they'd have to buy it a seat on the airplane. If that'd even be a possibility.

He couldn't, but maybe they'd figure it out.

They let Kumiko pick the next place too and she drove them on another day to a little cafe where they were introduced to an elderly woman who taught them the traditional Okinawan tea ceremony. Kumiko looked delighted. Whispered to them that during the war most of the stuff to make their, Okinawan specific, traditional tea was destroyed. It'd almost been lost. And the importance of this elderly woman teaching them fell with a level of gravity he wasn't expecting. It explained why when she'd been looking over the cards she'd grabbed it so excited with her eyes shining.

They watched the elderly woman whisk tea and she didn't stop. It was the tea he remembered reading about and it foamed up into a cloud. They followed the steps she laid out, sitting in seiza and moving the careful way that was explained, turning the bowl again. It was difficult and a bit different.

The foam, the cloud rising up out of the bowl got on Johnny's nose. Both Daniel and Kumiko laughed.

The lady doing the class also smiled and nodded like this was expected.

It wasn't bitter it was a different type of tea and it went well with the snacks they'd been given, little sweets and cookies. Kumiko paid close attention to every step, talking excitedly with the lady running the class and the one who'd given Johnny a card.

They worked their way through the cards, something to do as the village recovered. As Sato spent time at the house talking to Yukie and Mr. Miyagi, as all the wounds began to heal and Johnny's shoulder got better with the medicine Mr. Miyagi and Yukie gave him.

They took pottery classes and they drove around Okinawa following the cards he'd been given meeting the women he'd met that one night again, this time with Kumiko to help with the conversation.

They ate at fancy restaurants, watched traditional performances, and looked at art, by his side taking in everything was Daniel.

It was like a bunch of dates. Though he knew Daniel didn't feel quite the same since they had a chaperone the entire time, with Kumiko along. But everyone seemed to be having fun and it was worth it.

Pictures were taken along the way by strangers and in a few places Johnny was even paid for his time, which was confusing as he was the one getting free stuff, but it was a bit of a relief to have cash in his wallet again. Not enough to pay to get the whale shark plush home, but maybe they could ship it.

Johnny was beginning to worry he was going to run out of space in his suitcase.

He had to take the library books home. He couldn't afford to replace them. So they couldn't be exchanged for anything else.

They took up a lot of space.

He hadn't expected to be gifted so many things in exchange for just letting people take his photo.

After an afternoon walking through some caves, they returned and Yukie called out to him, welcoming them home and motioning for him to come help her.

Daniel patted him gently on the back of his shoulder saying he'd take everything up to their room.

Johnny found Yukie in the kitchen.

"We make goya champuru," she said smiling at him.

He'd nearly forgotten she'd promised to teach him. She'd set out everything needed to make it in that organized way she had.

There was a strange bumpy green vegetable she pointed to. "Goya," she said.

He recognized the rest of it. Had learned that most of the meat was pork from Kumiko and he was familiar with tofu now.

She had him help cook a few things once his shoulder got better but they'd all been easy things to help her assist by cutting up onions and other vegetables. He was getting much better with a knife under her tutelage. He was feeling more confident in the kitchen, learning her recipes.

Though he hadn't a clue how he'd find any of it in LA. Especially the goya she'd set in front of him to cut in half and scoop out the center with all the seeds, then slice into thin pieces. It kind of reminded him of cucumber or zucchini, just very bumpy.

He cut up the pork, cut up the tofu, and then went about cooking them separately and carefully under her instruction.

She was making him do this one on his own he realized nervously. Like it was a final exam in cooking but open book because she was telling him what to do, or kind of.

After cooking everything individually he added them all together again with some sauces he'd made and whisked eggs.

He put some onto a small plate when she gave him a nod for her to try.

He waited, watching.

She grinned at him. "Good Johnny-san."

He smiled, pleased with her approval and they set about finishing dinner. Rice and soup on the sides and carried it to the table.

He found Daniel and Kumiko talking on the steps, and Yukie found Mr. Miyagi and Sato in the dojo.

They sat around the table and Yukie spoke warmly in Japanese.

"You made this?" Kumiko asked with a big smile reaching out to Johnny, squeezing his arm fondly.

"Yukie-san told me what to do," Johnny said a little embarrassed at all the attention that was suddenly his way.

"What's this?" Daniel asked picking up a piece that was green.

"Goya," Johnny said.

"What's that?"

"Goya is Okinawan for bitter melon," Kumiko said.

"Very healthy," Yukie said with a smile.

"Johnny-san do very well," Sato said as he ate.

Mr. Miyagi nodded in agreement.

It was kind of weird having Sato with them without Chozen lurking. Johnny wondered where he'd gone, but no one had mentioned it. It was as if Chozen didn't exist which gave Johnny a bad feeling. According to Daniel, they'd saved Sato and he turned over a new leaf. But Chozen was probably still out there harboring a grudge, but alone now. He could strike at any moment. He'd be outnumbered now that Sato was hanging around. Going for walks with Mr. Miyagi and Yukie, talking and laughing as if there hadn't been forty years of pain.

Daniel's hand found his thigh. "It's delicious."

"You really do like bitter things huh?" Johnny asked.

The bitter melon was bitter, it was aptly named. But Yukie had had him cut it into thin enough pieces that it wasn't a problem and it was seasoned well.

"I like to think I have an adventurous palate," Daniel said. "I like to try things. You should try almost anything at least once if you're not allergic to it."

"Anything?" Johnny asked.

He'd been reading about a fruit that had a strong smell and was spiky. It was beloved and popular despite apparently it was banned in hotels and public transit. Maybe Daniel would also try that. He'd been curious but they looked massive and he didn't want to waste it. This was the same guy who went on rants about pizza. But, to his credit, he did try them. Just complained the whole time. Maybe he would, one day, try durian with Johnny.

"Anything," Daniel said looking at him directly like a challenge, squeezing his leg.

One day they'd have to go somewhere and try durian then. Maybe they could make it a thing. Try new foods frequently. One of the restaurant owners had been talking about it when they'd gone in. Talked about how much they always loved it when they traveled. That and about something new in Taiwan. A drink with tapioca in it.

Johnny also wanted to try that.

Maybe Jimmy would know about that one. He'd have to ask when they went home.

It was one of those moments where he did wish that Sid liked him. It'd be so nice to keep traveling with Daniel, trying new things and exploring the world, making friends. But he didn't have money.

You needed money and free time to travel.

Johnny only had one of those.

And Sid had the other.

It was so close and felt a little unfair. It wasn't like Sid spent his money wisely. He just relished in having it and other people not having it. But he also viewed it as a moral failing that they didn't. Like he'd actually worked for it and his parents hadn't just handed it to him.

Maybe Johnny could find a job and he could save up.

The problem was a job would take away his freedom. You only ever got one or the other and sometimes you got neither. His mother worked to the bone and got neither.

He refused to worry about it though. Not here. Not now.

This was further than he ever expected to go from home and it was worth enjoying it, the food he'd made himself was delicious enough that it surprised him and healthy.

Kumiko was listing all the health benefits at his side and Daniel was listening on his other side smiling warmly.

It was a table he never would've dreamed of finding himself at and he was grateful.

Grateful to be surrounded by friends, people he liked that he hadn't had in his life a year ago.

He wouldn't have met Daniel for almost another month, didn't meet Mr. Miyagi till much later.

If life could change so fast, then anything was possible.

If he could be in Okinawa eating food he'd made himself with friends, a sensei who cared, and a boyfriend then the world was full of possibilities.

He'd opened the right door.

Picked the right path and someday they'd go somewhere else.

Someday they'd try something else they'd never heard of before and love it just as much.

And someday they'd have a nice table where the people they loved, the friends they'd made along the way could come through the door they left open for them to sit and enjoy the warmth of a loving home with delicious food they'd made.

And on quiet nights where it was just the two of them, Daniel could make Italian food or Johnny could find some recipe he wanted to try and make something new, or something Yukie had taught him and it'd be nice and more than he ever could've dreamed.

Chapter End Notes

The aquarium didn't exist the way it does now in the 80's, but it did exist and was award-winning and did have the biggest tank in the world in the 80's. It's part of the Ocean Expo park which is huge and full of gardens and traditional things like sanshin classes. Again not sure if that existed in the 80's in that exact way, the land did and they did make it a park back then. I'm also not sure if they had the jumbo whale shark plush's then. But it's a lottery ticket prize you can get. It's massive. The ice cream is actually something that the aquarium in Osaka has which is their whale shark inspired ice cream.

Chapter Notes

Daniel had known it'd been selfish to want to just spend time with Johnny. He hadn't looked forward to getting up early to meet Kumiko and go on their date with her chaperoning like they were some couple from that book Johnny had read to him. Maybe his frustration with it was exactly the reason why they needed a chaperone. But Johnny was right. It was just like before. Before Johnny had said anything.

Kumiko showed them around, translated, drove them, and she really was fun to be around. It made Daniel feel bad. He felt bad that he hadn't wanted her to come along even if it'd just been a moment.

She's our friend.

Johnny had said it almost like he didn't understand that Daniel had wanted to spend time alone with him, away from the house, away from everyone, just the two of them. And Daniel had never thought of himself as the person who started dating and ditched everyone, but he wanted a honeymoon period and he was beginning to think he wasn't going to get it. Because he was sure once they got home the guys would be around. And he missed them. Looked forward to seeing them, but he didn't want to share.

He was having fun though. He liked the aquarium. He liked the cafes, the shows, the restaurants. He liked seeing the buku buku tea on Johnny's nose. And it took everything in him not to lean over and lick it directly off. It was tea, and something precious an elderly woman was sharing with them. But still. He knew if he did it Johnny would turn bright red and he wanted to know what would happen after that, because they knew now.

People were giving them free things because Johnny was pretty.

He didn't say it, but that essentially was the reason. They took pictures and said they planned to use them for advertising and Kumiko promised him she'd try to collect them all and send them to him. Which kind of embarrassed him, but he didn't turn her down, didn't correct her because he did want to see them. He wondered if they could do a scrapbook. Scrapbook of their trip to Okinawa, maybe one from New York. He was pretty sure Dutch took photos. It might be fun. A little book for each trip. Maybe it'd be too sappy.

It was shocking they wanted pictures of him too. The aquarium had been a surprise and the fact that nearly every place they went didn't tell him and Kumiko to stay out of the shots. They seemed genuinely happy to have all three of them in the photos. Which made him want Kumiko to get extra copies.

He wanted to show his mom, his grandparents.

Look I was in advertising overseas.

His mom would stick that on the fridge for sure.

Frame it.

It was kind of exciting.

And he liked going through the stuff they got at the end of the day. The little souvenirs. His favorite though was the gigantic whale shark from the aquarium. It was massive. He didn't know how he'd get it home but he knew they would. He'd have to figure it out. Even if he had to hold it in his seat the whole flight. He'd just curl over it and use it as a pillow.

Maybe it was weird. 18-year-old guys didn't have plush animals in their rooms, did they? But it was a whale shark. And Johnny didn't comment. Didn't tell him they should give it to Kumiko or one of the kids in town instead. Just smiled at him and seemed to puzzle over how they were going to get it home. No festival, fair, or arcade prize would compare or live up to it.

Johnny was healing. He no longer needed his sling according to Mr. Miyagi and that was such a relief. And he was practicing sanshin.

While he did that Daniel practiced karate in the dojo with Mr. Miyagi or out near the sea, they were falling into a routine.

Practice then breakfast, then out for their adventure for the day, then back in time for dinner with everyone, maybe more practice together in the dojo, then bed.

And now that Johnny's shoulder was better Daniel didn't have to worry about being very specific and careful about how they slept. And it was a relief.

After morning practice, they met for what Kumiko said was for sure a photoshoot. Some fashion company and Daniel was excited to watch.

Modeling.

Johnny seemed unsure that it was really that. As if he wasn't aware that he was advertising perfect as if he'd forgotten that he already was in magazines back home. As if this wasn't something he knew how to do.

The designer met them, made some quick changes and an assistant got them drinks while they watched, set up chairs and an umbrella.

It was surprising.

They weren't doing anything. Just there to watch but they were treated like they were important.

He liked the fruit smoothie they'd gotten him and Kumiko was happily sipping at her iced coffee.

It was so different from the beach photoshoot. No one was oiling Johnny up with baby oil. But they were dressing Johnny up in all sorts of clothing Daniel had never seen him in. He'd seen Johnny in suits, but these were different. Layered and more complex in soft grays and with vests underneath rather than the button-ups he'd seen before. Another look they put him in was all asymmetrical monochrome and it was completely different than anything Johnny ever wore. But it made his eyes pop, all that black leaving the only color being his eyes and hair.

They styled his hair and made so many different changes. Daniel thought he could sit there all day watching them put their different outfits on Johnny. Watching him move for the photos, needing very little direction, seeming to get what they wanted just from the few words of English the photographer spoke.

"Have you modeled before?" Kumiko asked almost innocently when they let Johnny take a break and he came over to them wearing a sweater over a button-up with a collar and a fake pair of glasses that made him look like a college kid, almost a nerd, but a hot one.

"One of my friend's aunts takes pictures sometimes for a magazine, but that's not really modeling," Johnny said softly.

"Oh," Kumiko said tilting her head listening to the designer and the photographer which had burst into animated conversation. "They want to know which one?"

Johnny frowned. "I don't know. Daniel worked on one of the sets, did Tommy tell you? I usually don't pay attention."

Daniel knew he was blushing but he mumbled the name of the magazine to Kumiko, sinking down in his chair embarrassed as she grinned and told them which spurred more exciting conversation.

"They know the magazine, they're sending their assistant to go get copies. They want to see if they can find you in it."

"I've never seen how they turned out," Johnny said.

"They're promising to send copies of these when they get printed. Oh, she's got another look for you to try on."

Daniel gently smacked her on the arm when Johnny left. "Why?" he asked.

"They were talking about what a natural he was and wondering if he'd done modeling before," she said softly to him. "Besides, they work with fashion magazine here. I thought they might have old copies. I want to see."

The assistant returned with a big box that she dumped onto a table.

"You could save her some time," Kumiko suggested.

Daniel sighed, pulling his gaze away from Johnny and walking over. The assistant looked up at him.

"I know which ones, one moment," he said flipping through them looking for the correct covers and setting them aside. The designer came back over with the photographer and Daniel flicked them open to the right pages before hurrying back to his seat. Kumiko gave his arm a gentle squeeze before walking over to look.

Johnny walked over to Daniel.

"You don't want to see them?" Daniel asked.

He looked nice, another layered suit, a hat, shiny shoes. All smooth lines that fit him well.

"No, it's okay," Johnny said taking another sip of his water. "I'm sorry about all this."

"What do you mean?" Daniel asked.

"It's got to be so boring. Like the most boring of everything, we've done. Like the photoshoot on the beach again."

"It's not boring," Daniel said. "It's kind of fun."

"Really?" Johnny asked looking at him like he was lying. Like he didn't believe a word Daniel said.

Daniel carefully fixed the tie which was a little crooked. "It's fun to see you in all these different styles."

He paused, stopping the words from falling off his tongue, the admission. They were dating now, maybe he should say it. He looked up at him with a smile.

"You look hot. I like watching you model. The beach was different. But I also enjoyed that. Plus I got to be the one to oil you up. That was delightful."

He watched Johnny turn bright red, watched it burn his ears, and Daniel grinned putting his hands up on either side of Johnny's face, his skin was warm beneath his palms.

"Do you like doing this?" he asked.

There was something stupidly simply hot about having a model boyfriend. Saying your boyfriend was a model. But Johnny had spent so much time doing what other people wanted him to do, unable to do what he wanted that Daniel didn't want him to pick something just because he was good at it and Daniel liked the outcome.

"It's easy," Johnny said. "I don't know. I never thought about it seriously. There's this model I met a while back at one of Sid's parties and she was very busy, always had to look a certain way, any changes she wanted to make were a big deal, even changes beyond her control caused her stress. I sounded like it'd be exhausting and too much to have every little aspect of my life under a microscope."

That definitely wouldn't do. Johnny already had engraved into him following rules and strict schedules and work out schedules. He didn't need anyone else trying to take over. He should be free to do what he wanted.

"You should do what you want, across the board," Daniel said.

Kumiko scooped up a magazine and ran over, it was the first one. "Johnny! This is you?"

Johnny glanced over and the blush that had faded came back, rushing down his neck. "Y-yeah."

"You were so small!"

"Every kid starts off small," Johnny said after a moment.

"But Johnny!" Kumiko said holding up the magazine next to Johnny and looking between the two. "I didn't grow this much!" she said with a frown.

"Did you want to?" Johnny asked looking at her confused.

"You look like you could lift Daniel in his chair without a problem, but this boy looks like he'd fall over if he even tried."

"I could," Johnny said looking at the chair and Daniel.

"Do it," Kumiko said excitedly holding the magazine to her chest, eyes shining.

"I probably shouldn't in these clothes," Johnny said with a frown.

Kumiko turned away from them calling to the designer and photographer in Japanese. They set the magazines down and ran over, talking quickly.

"Okay, Daniel, do you mind being in a few pictures? You'll have to change," Kumiko said.

"Seriously?" Daniel asked.

He didn't know whether it was exciting or not. He had mixed feelings about it. He didn't want to be a prop, but it would be fun to dress up with Johnny. He didn't see why they'd want him for photos. "Okay."

The designer clapped her hands.

"Okay!" she said.

Daniel was pushed towards a pop-up changing space and passed along a suit. He'd never worn one like it. He got to see himself in a mirror and he liked it.

He knew Italian suits were popular. His grandfather was always talking about the importance of a good suit, but this was different. He got to sit in the chair again, but they'd moved it somewhere with better lighting.

He felt nervous.

The other photos they'd done were candids. No one had cared what he looked like, he was just there as an extra.

But this time the focus was on him with the way the assistant was messing with his hair. He wasn't used to having someone paying such attention to how he looked. It was usually just him that cared so much.

Johnny walked towards him, dipping down when he got close to put his hands on the chair on either side of Daniel's hips.

"You look nice," Johnny said warmly before standing up, the chair and Daniel going up with him.

Daniel's heart was pounding, looking down at Johnny, mouth going dry. He couldn't look away from Johnny's eyes. There wasn't any stress on his face. No strain. Like this was the easiest thing to do. Daniel put his hands on the chair between his own legs shifting forward to look down at him.

How did he make it looks so easy? He tilted his head studying Johnny up close from a new view.

The sun was making his blue eyes brighter.

They'd put some makeup on him.

His lips were pinker.

Kumiko said something but Daniel didn't hear her, couldn't hear anything over his heart pounding in his ears.

He wanted to kiss him. Johnny was smiling at him. It was smug. Like he was amused.

Then too soon he was gently setting Daniel and his chair back down.

Johnny had a thoughtful look on his face and was talking to Kumiko.

The assistant came back, new clothes for Daniel to change into, and then Johnny was heading to a different spot to change. He looked more sporty, preppy and it fit the look Daniel saw at the country club that one time and when he'd come over for dinner with his Mom.

Daniel's clothes were still fancy. It was a weird combination. He didn't know what they were going for.

"So I've been practicing," Johnny said. "After you mentioned it on the beach. The kids I babysit have been helping. They've found it fun."

"What are you talking about?" Daniel asked looking at him.

"I figured they might like it for a photo shoot if they liked me just lifting you in a chair and I was right," Johnny said with a smile.

Kumiko called out to them and Johnny nodded. He moved to where the photographer was waiting. A few easy photos with easy smiles, stretching, then he got down on the ground, perfect push-ups.

Kumiko ran up to Daniel pushing him forward. "Try to look as at ease as possible. Johnny said he could do them with you on his back. They're pretty excited about it."

Johnny stopped steadying himself, stilling.

Daniel sat down on his back facing towards the photographer.

"You sure you're okay?"

"This is something I know I can do," Johnny said easily.

Daniel carefully drew his legs up, crossing them easily, settled onto Johnny's back. He was worried, nervous, but excited.

He worried about Johnny's shoulder, about him overdoing it and hurting himself. But then he moved.

Daniel could do a push-up.

He could do several.

But it wasn't something he particularly enjoyed. In gym class, the teacher always told him his form was wrong, even though the teacher never told him how to do it properly.

Johnny knew how to do it though. That was clear. Steady movement.

Up and down.

Daniel was delighted. It was as fun as he'd thought.

Maybe it was weird that he found it fun. Johnny being able to do it and so sure of himself, sent warmth through him, a thrill.

He tried to remember what Johnny had said.

He'd been practicing since Daniel had mentioned it. Before they knew they liked each other.

What had Johnny's plan been? He hadn't known Daniel liked him, even though at that moment especially it should've been fairly obvious.

But he'd heard the thought Daniel had about it, the curiosity, and he'd gone for it. Like all the other requests he took them to heart and went to work building up muscle and stamina so that he could do this. Push-ups in Naha with Daniel on his back. Got the kids he babysat in on it.

Daniel didn't know how many kids he babysat. But it had to be chaos. Fun though. Kids liked that kind of thing. Daniel liked that kind of thing. This kind of thing.

The photographer was saying something and Daniel remembered where he was, that this was a job of sorts.

Johnny was to keep going, but Daniel was supposed to change poses, to look more at ease like this was normal. Like it wasn't so wonderfully exciting.

It took everything in him to focus, to remember where he was, and to keep the big smile hidden. To look serious. To look cool. Because that was the point he realized.

They wanted him to look at ease, calm, bored like having Johnny doing push-ups under him was an everyday occurrence. Like it was any other spot to sit.

While Johnny was supposed to be showing off their sporty clothes.

He sat with his legs hanging over as Johnny pushed himself up again, ankles crossed so they could get a better shot of the fancy shiny shoes. It was fun. Daniel kind of liked modeling.

He didn't see why they'd picked him, but he liked it.

When it was over Daniel got off carefully and spun turning around and kneeling next to Johnny.

"You okay?" he asked. "How's your shoulder?"

Johnny pushed himself up, rotating his shoulders, one then the other, sitting up across from him.

"I'm good. Did you have fun?" he asked.

A check-in, Was that what you wanted? Did I do it right?

"Loved it," Daniel said warmly.

It was an understatement but he didn't know how to explain better how fun that had been. How it'd been everything he'd ever wanted since he'd first seen someone do it. That guy in Newark at the gym. This was a million times better. And there'd be photos. He wanted the photos. And they were dating, so this could be a thing. Maybe. He didn't want to be too greedy.

Johnny smiled at him, only glancing away when the assistant brought them waters. Kumiko walked over and sunk down to the ground next to them. "They're pretty ecstatic. They're going to send photos to the magazine back in the USA too. Also, you get to keep some of the clothes."

"I'm running out of space in my suitcase," Johnny said with a frown.

"Because of all your library books?" Daniel asked amused.

"I can't leave those behind," Johnny said with a sigh, taking the headband they'd given him off his head with a sigh. "But I also don't want to leave all the things I'm being given behind. These were altered for me," Johnny plucked at his shirt.

"I didn't think you cared about clothes," Daniel said amused.

Johnny looked at him, tilting his head trying to think.

Daniel had seen how he treated his nice suits and shoes. Like they didn't need to be cared for. It was kind of cool, but also those were like thousand-dollar suits he didn't care about, which was wasteful.

"I don't care about clothes Sid got me," Johnny said. "I care about these. I cared about that jacket, but you guys were more important than a jacket."

Daniel reached out and patted his hand. "It's okay."

"Yeah, besides, you're going home with so many nicer things," Kumiko said warmly.

"That's not why. I liked it because it was a gift from you," he said to Kumiko.

"It's okay, you still have the other shirt I got you, right?"

"Yes, Yukie helped me get the mud out of it."

Kumiko smiled. "See, it's okay."

Johnny nodded. "Thank you Kumiko," he said softly.

She smiled warmly at him, patting his shoulder gently and getting up with a stretch. The assistant talked to her and she followed the assistant over to the table where the designer was bent over a sketchpad.

"Think we're done?" Daniel asked.

"Maybe. I hope so. I'm getting tired."

"What did they put on your lips? It's not lipstick," Daniel asked looking closer.

"I don't know."

"I'm surprised you don't seem to care," Daniel said amused.

"It's common," Johnny said. "At least it's not the gloss. Sometimes Tommy's aunt recommended the gloss to get certain looks."

"Kissing looks?" Daniel asked amused.

"Yeah, that Kissing Potion stuff all the girls like. It doesn't add any color though. Their make-up looks are different here."

Daniel remembered the lip gloss, Ali had some. He reached out and brushed his thumb over Johnny's lip and looked on his thumb. It didn't come off. Lipstick usually came off.

"You might be stuck with that," Daniel said. "Until it wears off."

"Might be a while," Johnny said with a sigh. His cheeks were lightly dusted in pink.

Daniel looked around. The photographer and assistant were talking, the designer was sketching. Kumiko was walking back. Damn. If only they were on their own. If only he had something to hide them with. He could kiss him.

"Ready to go?" Kumiko asked.

"We're done?" Johnny asked.

"Yup. Just change and then they'll ship the clothes to Mr. Miyagi's back in the USA. Except for a gift that they're shipping to Tomi Village."

"Gift?"

"Hopefully it'll be done by the O-bon festival," Kumiko said with a smile.

Johnny nodded, confused but not pressing it and getting up to go change into his normal clothes.

"Do you know if they can make a patch?" Daniel asked standing up.

"A patch?" Kumiko asked tilting her head.

"Mr. Miyagi has this symbol his wife made. Of a bonsai in front of a sun. It's like the dojo's design. Johnny has this jacket back home he likes but he took the patch from the old dojo off of it, because well...so I was thinking of replacing it but I don't know how to make a patch."

"Let's go ask," Kumiko said heading back to the table.

The designer listened carefully as Daniel and Kumiko explained the patch. The design of Miyagi-do. She tilted her head thoughtfully. Flipped the page and sketched out the design holding it up to Daniel. Daniel nodded showing with his hands how big it was. Explaining the jacket. He'd remembered seeing it in one of the magazines. He grabbed it, flipping through to find Johnny, and pointed it out. She nodded and spoke to Kumiko.

Kumiko smiled warmly. "She says she can do it as a gift, she's been wanting to try patches. Apparently their popular."

"Thank you. Er. Arigato," Daniel said bowing. "It's a secret, a gift for Johnny."

Kumiko nodded. "Won't say a thing. Go change. Let's go home."

Daniel nodded running off to go change back into his clothes. He'd be able to fix something for Johnny and he was excited to see Johnny's face when he saw it. Excited to see the result. The least he could do for a day he didn't think he'd ever forget.

> I spent way too long trying to come up with cool clothing from the '80s in Japan and a lot of it wasn't as applicable as I wanted it to be. But this was a cool resource: https://artsandculture.google.com/exhibit/tokyo-street-fashion-and-culture-1980-2017-across/ogKCPmGdPtB7Iw?hl=en
> I also spent too much time looking at cosmetics because I wanted a lip stain and didn't know if it was used in Japan in the '80s and fell down a Kissing Potion (actual name of a lip gloss brand from the '80s in the USA) rabbit hole which really just didn't work. But I liked the name too much not to mention it.

Johnny thought he was ready for o-bon. Kumiko had arrived early with two boxes with the designer's logo on them and a big bag. One she delivered to Daniel before he headed to the dojo with Mr. Miyagi.

Johnny had joined them a couple of times, almost every evening now for a week with Sato. Trying to learn things like the drum technique with Daniel. To listen to Sato and Mr. Miyagi remember the things the late Mr. Miyagi had taught them when they were younger. They sparred some times and it was fascinating to watch, they looked like they were having so much fun. All the dark clouds from weeks ago fading.

"Your gift," Kumiko said warmly to Johnny.

She was already dressed in her blue kimono with a hairpin in her hair and red wrapped around her waist tied in a big bow in the back.

Johnny opened the box, then look at Kumiko.

"I thought sanshin players were supposed to wear black, and sit in the back so as not to distract from dancing and other performances."

She smiled. "True, but not in your case."

"I thought all the colorful stuff was for girls," Johnny said.

Kumiko laughed. "Pretty is pretty."

"Okay, so how do I put this on then," Johnny asked lifting it up with confusion. There were no ties, no buttons. It had to be like his gi, but he doubted he was supposed to tie it the same.

He didn't know the different types of clothing. To him, it looked like a kimono, like the type of thing Kumiko was wearing, but with more layers. The fabric was light and the sleeves were big and there was a light weight jacket in the box.

She explained and he did his best, going into another room to change into the layered robe, it was practically a dress. A complicated dress.

But it was a gift. And it was o-bon. Something Kumiko had been getting excited about since they'd met her. Something she'd worked hard on. But this was that, what was it again? What had she called it? A bingata design? Colorful print on quality breathable fabric. He got to the thing he was supposed to tie around his waist and it wasn't like his gi, it was several layers, he had to go get her help. He couldn't remember how it went, she'd explained it, but he ended up doing it like his gi and that really wasn't right.

Yukie was sitting with Kumiko, dressed in a pinkish-red and grey design on white.

"Johnny-san, let me help," Yukie said motioning for him to come over.

With deft hands, she worked on the cloth, the tie. The little bow she made like it was the easiest thing. He felt like a little kid getting help tying his shoe.

"Ryusou jacket?" Yukie asked head tilted.

"Yes, there's one here," Kumiko said passing it over, it went over his shoulders like an additional layer with big open sleeves, extra colorful.

He couldn't blend in if he tried. There was no way. He already stood out but this was like cranking it up to a thousand.

Yukie clapped her hands. "Perfect."

"Niffee debiru Yukie-san," Johnny said softly.

It was so complicated to him that he had no clue how she did it. She dressed like this every day. A t-shirt and jeans were so easy to just throw on. Well no, he remembered trying to get a shirt on while his shoulder was healing. Even that wasn't always easy.

"You're welcome Johnny-san," she said smiling warmly at him.

Giving him things to store in the sash around his waist, a small bag with coins for snacks she said, a handkerchief, and a fan in case it got too hot.

"Let's go early to practice," Kumiko recommended with a smile.

Johnny nodded, following her to her car. She drove them to the castle ruins where it was mostly set up with lights and drums that people were playing to a beat. Some people were dancing. A couple of people looked like they were already drunk, carrying around bottles that they were sharing.

It was weird to walk in wooden shoes, but not difficult. They were just so loud. He was used to being quiet. Trying to be as quiet as he could be, to hide and fade into the background. This was the opposite of everything he tried to be and it made him nervous.

He helped finish a few things Kumiko asked him to help with. Hanging lanterns on some of the sturdy wiring overhead and putting other lanterns in the water.

As the afternoon turned into evening more cars arrived, more people made their way to the castle. Yukie and Mr. Miyagi came with Daniel in tow. He was wearing a red and black jacket with the Miyagi-do design on it and his white and navy flower hachi maki.

He took Johnny in and grinned.

"Is that your gift from the designer?"

"Yeah."

"Colorful," Daniel said with a smile.

Johnny couldn't tell if he was teasing or just pointing out the obvious. Johnny felt like an oversized awkward parrot. Not nearly as graceful as Kumiko who moved around in her kimono with ease.

"Come, let's dance," Kumiko said taking their hands and joining the group in the center of the castle.

Yuna was already dancing and they fell in next to her.

She grinned at them, moving with ease to the beat of the drums, the gentle turns, and the claps.

Everyone doing the same dance in rows of circles until the music stopped.

It was time.

Time for Johnny to stand in front of all these people and play sanshin while Kumiko danced.

Ichiro walked up to him, finding him as Yuna and Daniel spoke. He pressed a sanshin into Johnny's hands.

"For Johnny-san," Ichiro said, smiling warmly.

It wasn't the well-worn one he always borrowed from Ichiro.

Johnny looked at the sanshin then up at Ichiro in shock.

"Play well."

Johnny bowed deeply. "Niffee debiru Ichiro-san."

Ichiro smiled and bowed back, before turning to join the others on the other side of the wooden plank.

Johnny looked at Kumiko who smiled at him. They'd done this multiple times. It'd be easy. He took his place and looked at her after tuning the sanshin, and strumming a couple of times to check. Kumiko nodded. She was ready.

He began to play. She moved slow, the way she'd done at the tea ceremony. The way she did during practice. Slow graceful movements. She opened the fan, threw it in the air, and caught it, holding the sleeves of her blue wave kimono as she danced and smiled to the music he played.

He remembered the songs. Everything Yuna and Ichiro had taught him. And he saw them sitting together smiling in the crowd. He knew there was supposed to be singing. He didn't know any of the words though. But the point was for Kumiko to dance. She'd worked so hard for so long and dancing was her dream. This stage would be just one of many for her.

Johnny heard something behind him. The sound of something approaching. But it sounded weird. Like it was coming from above which didn't make any sense.

"Behind you!" Daniel called jumping up.

Kumiko turned and Johnny heard someone land behind him. He stopped playing and turned to see Chozen.

Chozen grabbed the sides of the ryusou. He laughed, tilting his head taking in Johnny's ryusou and the sanshin Johnny held carefully in his hands.

"Look like geisha."

"You could've come in a normal way Chozen. It's not invite-only."

"Would not be welcome."

"How do you know that? Have you even talked or asked anyone?"

"Uncle said dead to each other. Will not understand. Unless make him."

He spun Johnny wrapping an arm around his neck. "Need to make him understand."

"By doing this?" Johnny asked panic rising.

It was different, but similar, an arm held tight around his neck. He remembered arguing with Kreese, moments before he'd ended up in the same position. Trying to make sense of the situation and failing. Not knowing why he was so pissed. Not understanding what he'd done wrong. He'd done more than he should've been asked. More than enough he'd thought. And it'd led to him struggling against someone bigger than him. Someone he trusted who didn't care anymore.

Chozen wasn't bigger. Didn't seem stronger. Didn't smell like cigars. It was different he reminded himself. Trying to calm down. Trying to breathe in the festival, the lights. It wasn't a parking lot after a tournament he'd lost.

It wasn't the Valley.

It was Okinawa.

He could smell the ocean breeze. The cologne Chozen used. The smell of festival foods he hadn't tried yet. No trophy to be grabbed from his hands. Just a sanshin, a precious gift.

He needed to remain calm. Breathe.

He could still breathe. He wasn't being choked.

"Need to fight," Chozen said quietly.

Kumiko rushed forward smacking Chozen on the head with her fan.

"Leave him alone," she said.

"Cross bridge," Chozen ordered flicking out a knife and pointing it at Johnny's neck.

Kumiko looked at them wide-eyed like she didn't want to move, but Chozen repeated himself with a shout.

"Had long time to think of what you said," Chozen said quieter as Kumiko stepped back, startled by the shout.

"And this is the result you came up with?" Johnny asked, hand coming up to the arm around his neck.

Needing to find space, to change his own position to try and calm his panicking heart. Panic was dangerous with a knife to your throat.

He could still breathe, he kept reminding himself. Breathing was important. Talking was important. Keep someone talking right? He thought he read that somewhere. Or maybe it was just a Saturday morning cartoon hero/villain thing.

The knife wasn't digging in, just pointing.

"Need you to play damsel, hmm? Will not actually hurt, but you only one that listens. Kumiko fight back. Will not listen," Chozen spoke only loud enough for him to hear.

The arm around his neck wasn't the same. He was telling the truth. It was all show, tense, but it wasn't cutting off his air, there was plenty of space. Not enough to slip out of though. Kumiko was walking carefully across the bridge directly into her aunt's arms.

"So what's your play here?" Johnny asked.

Keep talking. Talking was safe.

"Fight to the death," Chozen said.

"You know that's not honorable."

"They will not see me, I am ghost until I try it. I will not win. I do not wish to win. I just need one, uncle hopefully, to let me back in."

"How does that make sense?"

"Stupid honor as you say. This is fastest way."

"Who are you going to fight?"

"Only one I can."

Daniel.

Johnny's hand gripped the arm around his neck and pulled as hard as he could, tried to kick back at Chozen's feet. He knew what he was supposed to do, but he'd panicked, picked the wrong moves. Trying to escape but avoid the knife. It was harder to move in the traditional clothing. It was trapped in Chozen's grip, everything keeping him stuck.

"You can't, leave him alone, I'll fight you if you need to. Isn't a fight to the death literally to the death?"

"Better, more like distressed damsel. I won't kill him. I just need him to fight me. And he won't will he? Unless I do something to get his attention."

"This is a bad choice," Johnny said

"You say Miyagi kind . Teaches kind men. I will make it look real, but it will be safest death match in history of island."

"That sounds like a lie. You've lied before."

"Not lie. Misled, bent rules. This time, whole truth. Will not kill. Just fight. Only card I have left. Last play."

Chozen shifted his grip of the knife, pointing it more menacingly at Johnny's neck, shouting back to the crowd, to Daniel who was standing horrified.

"For whatever happened, I apologize," Daniel said.

"Apology will not give me back my honor."

"Well, neither will this," Daniel said moving closer.

"In their eyes it will," Chozen said motioning around them with his head.

"If you hurt him," Johnny said trying to fit as much of a warning in his tone over the panic.

"Have to, but not badly. Promise. Won't break a thing. And you, don't worry, you just rest."

Johnny frowned not sure what that meant.

Daniel was walking over the bridge.

Chozen stepped back and away from him, pulling Johnny with him.

Daniel had told him his karate wouldn't be as useful against a knife. He'd been so sure it would've been fine. But he couldn't see an opening. Not without cutting himself, which was stupid and wouldn't help anyone.

Daniel slung the bridge into the water like he was told.

Chozen took the knife, closed it, and threw it to the side. He pinched somewhere on Johnny and his legs went out from under him before he could move, before he could make a plan, and everything went dark.

Johnny woke up to the sound of drums. He pushed himself up wondering when he'd fallen. The jacket part of his traditional clothes had been thrown over him like a blanket. The sanshin was lying by his side undamaged.

He remembered the fight and turned, looking for Daniel. There was blood on the stone and he could hear the sounds of a fight. He followed it to see Daniel, bloody leaning against a stone shisa while Chozen turned, to look at the audience.

Johnny watched Daniel use the drum technique until Chozen fell to his knees.

Daniel walked up to Chozen, grabbing him by his hair. "Live or die man?"

"Die," Chozen said.

"Wrong," Daniel said taking the hand poised to strike and pinching Chozen's nose like Mr. Miyagi had done to Kreese all those months ago. He used it to propel Chozen to the ground with a "Honk."

Daniel spun on his heels running over to Johnny, sinking down in front of him.

Yukie had given Johnny a handkerchief to keep in the sash around his waist and he found it quickly dabbed at the blood near Daniel's eye and around his mouth.

Daniel cupped Johnny's face in his hands, running a hand through his hair, like he was checking for injuries. "You okay?"

"Shouldn't I ask you that?" Johnny asked. "You're the one bleeding."

Daniel laughed softly, eyes going down, looking at Johnny's neck then lower. He grabbed the edges of the ryusou and pulled it back over his shoulder.

"You're the one who was essentially held hostage and then fainted. I just fought the asshole."

"My hero," Johnny said with a teasing laugh. "I didn't faint, he did something weird."

"Weird?" Daniel asked sitting up suddenly, holding the fabric tightly in his hands turning to look at Chozen who hadn't gotten up. Across the way Mr. Miyagi and Sato were trying to find something to use as a bridge to get across. "Maybe I should kill him."

Johnny grabbed Daniel's hand in his. "Don't, just stay here with me."

Daniel sighed. "I was so worried. He had a knife to your neck."

Johnny debated telling him that Chozen was just trying to get his uncle's attention, going about it the worst possible way. Like the worlds most dangerous toddler throwing a tantrum. That they were just pawns in some stupid game. With no plans to hurt them except to make it look like it. Daniel wouldn't like that.

"Because I knew you'd win," Johnny said.

"How could you have known? I didn't even know," Daniel said. He was shaking. "I thought I might have to kill him. That I might die or you. You didn't get up. You weren't moving."

"I'm fine," Johnny said. "I'll even wiggle my fingers and toes and count however many fingers you want to hold up."

Daniel laughed. "Okay, I get it. You really thought I had him from the go?"

"He definitely has underestimated you every step of the way," Johnny said.

"Maybe he got distracted," Daniel said.

"Yeah by what?"

Daniel poked him in the chest, finger tip to bare skin. The ryusou had fallen open again, kept falling open after Chozen had grabbed it.

"Okay I get it," Johnny said swatting at his hand. "I'll have to ask Yukie or someone how to fix it."

"Like an old novel cover," Daniel said with a laugh.

"Didn't we already establish the my hero joke?" Johnny asked, relieved that the haunted look in Daniel's eyes had left and that they were warm again.

Daniel lifted the jacket up covering them from view, from the chaos of everyone trying to figure out how to get across, creating a small little world of just the two of them.

He leaned close and whispered. "Heroes usually get some kind of reward, don't they?"

"There is usually something," Johnny said thoughtfully. "Every single story, can't remember what it is."

"Liar," Daniel said with a soft laugh. His hand reached gently to cup the side of Johnny's face. He leaned forward and Johnny grabbed the front of the red jacket Daniel was wearing, pushing forward towards him, and gently pulling Daniel closer, so they met in the middle.

It was soft and warm. Based on the way Daniel was moving, the way his tongue flicked out to brush against Johnny's lips, the way he seemed hungry, almost starving for a kiss Johnny was pretty sure his mouth was fine despite the blood he'd wiped away earlier. Shouldn't have even worried about it.

It reminded him of their first kiss, but not as drunk, not tasting of beer and pizza.

Sweeter.

Johnny felt almost dizzy. He heart pounding. This would be a problem. He wouldn't want to stop.

He liked kissing. He'd forgotten almost how much he liked it. And

Daniel was good at it. He felt breathless but he didn't want to stop and he was disappointed when Daniel leaned back to catch his own breath, looking pleased, happy in the warm dark under the jacket. Johnny wanted to chase Daniel back, to kiss him again but he felt the vibrations of something land on the stone. Heard the sound of feet rushing over. Daniel leaned forward again, a quick peck before taking down the jacket, covering Johnny in it and standing.

Daniel held out his hand to Johnny and Johnny took it standing.

"You sure you're okay?" Johnny asked as he watched Sato rushed towards Chozen, anger, and concern on his face.

Chozen looked frightened but then Sato pulled the boy into a hug. "I'm sorry."

"Just a little bruised and battered, but I'm fine. Nothing broken," Daniel said.

Johnny saw the look of relief in Chozen's eyes, the almost tears that he hid burying his head in his uncle's shoulder.

Mr. Miyagi and Yukie and Kumiko rushed over to them. Mr. Miyagi had a first aid kit in his hands.

Kumiko threw her arms around the both of them.

"Boys okay?" Mr. Miyagi asked.

"Yes Mr. Miyagi," Daniel said. Mr. Miyagi went to work bandaging him up.

"Yukie-san could you help me?" Johnny asked.

"Yes?" she asked concern in her voice. Johnny pointed out the disarray of his ryusou under his jacket. She laughed and fixed it with ease.

The music began again and Johnny looked at Kumiko who smiled, ready for take two. He wiggled his fingers, he could try. He picked up the sanshin and strummed it a few more times. Daniel refused to cross back over the bridge with the others and sat out of the way watching, head in his hands. While Kumiko resumed dancing and Johnny played. A little further, but not out the light of the festival Chozen and Sato were sitting together to the side, talking. Sato patching up the wounds with a first aid kit. Maybe things would be okay.

Chapter End Notes

So kimono's which are worn in the rest of Japan have their bows in the back, while Okinawan traditional clothing have the bows in the front. I'm not sure which look they were trying to go for in the movie, it seemed to be general kimono's. (Except Ichiro who for some reason was wearing an apron????) (honestly slowing down to watch the fight scene and taking in the background characters was kind of fun, not just catching Ichiro in an apron hanging out with Yuna, but also a super bored kid falling asleep next to a teapot and noticing that the musicians weren't playing sanshin but shamisen, which is interesting because they clearly knew about the sanshin since Daniel has one in the beginning of the third movie, but I'm being nitpicky)

There's a couple of different styles when it comes to Okinawan/ Ryukyuan ryusou/ traditional clothing but I couldn't find any good examples that weren't just pure black or with mild designs for guys. Sanshin players from the images I saw would wear black with little gold caps. Which was so different from the colorful bingata that I decided to rebel.
Here's a website where they compare the two (kimono's and ryusou): https://sakura.co/blog/ryusou-okinawa-traditional-dress/

Going Home

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

It took a while for Daniel to heal, but Johnny worked diligently, fussing over bandages and putting the medicine Mr. Miyagi gave him on his skin. Lots of sprays and bandaids.

Daniel learned a trick. If he complained about the pain Johnny would give him a very soft and gentle kiss.

He abused this knowledge every chance he got.

He wanted to tell Kumiko Ha did not take until I was 50!

But she had other things to worry about. Like some application to a Tokyo dance troupe that Chozen had found her as an apology. She was so excited about it that she nearly forgave Chozen on the spot. She at least warmed up to him. Which was further than Daniel had gotten.

Chozen was around and Daniel was not a fan. He came by with Sato sometimes in the evening. Helped Yukie with gardening. Helped Mr. Miyagi make repairs, some of which were his fault in the first place. And Sato stood over him, watching, arms folded, keeping an eye on him. Like even he didn't fully trust leaving Chozen alone unsupervised.

He was also working in the vegetable fields helping get them into some sort of semblance of normal, working to help the villagers get ready to plant summer vegetables and fruit. Something about it being warm almost all year long meant they could grow other things and make up for lost time.

Chozen even brought pineapple plants in which Daniel had to admit he was curious about. He'd never seen one up close. Hadn't realized they grew the way they did, for some reason thinking they were like a tree. He'd given Yukie a tiny one for her garden at the Miyagi's. It was so small it was kind of cute. Like a bonsai, but not a tree.

They didn't talk much. Usually just a nod of their heads at each other. But Chozen did occasionally ask Daniel about other people.

Fairly early on he asked Daniel about Johnny's arm, walking over to him dressed for farming and not in his barely buttoned short-sleeved shirts.

"How Johnny-san hurt arm? Better now?"

"You dislocated it."

Chozen's eyes widened in shock. "Me? How?"

"While sparring, when you came to leave a message, remember?"

"Dislocating hurts. Army men yell in pain when happen. Johnny-san not make a sound," Chozen said.

"Yeah, and he didn't make a peep when he hurt it worse trying to save Yuna and falling from the bell tower. He's too used to getting hurt," Daniel said with a frown.

"How...his old sensei?" Chozen asked.

"And kids from his old schools and his step-father."

"Give me names," Chozen said holding out his hand, leaning against his rake. "I destroy them."

"Aren't you supposed to be learning and trying to lead a peaceful life?" Daniel asked, folding his arms.

Chozen leaned the rake forward so the wooden end pointed at Daniel. "You take Johnny-san into dojo, but not defeat his enemies. They will come back. Must squash like bugs. His enemies will become yours. Old sensei will come back, bite harder. Must befriend enemies or destroy them."

"I get the urge, I do, but it's illegal in the USA to go around killing people."

"Coward," Chozen said but there wasn't any menace in it. No edge to it. It was teasing.

Someone called out to Chozen and he nodded to Daniel before turning and going back to work.

A few days later Mr. Miyagi told them over dinner that he thought it was time they head home.

Daniel was bubbling with a million questions and he let them out.

He wanted to know when, soon, if Yukie was coming with, she wasn't. Why wasn't she? She didn't want to leave Okinawa, felt too old. Then...why was Mr. Miyagi coming home with them? Home was LA.

It frustrated Daniel.

On the one hand, he was happy Mr. Miyagi was coming home with them. But to be separated by an ocean again after 40 years, felt heartbreaking tragic. But both Yukie and Mr. Miyagi were all soft warm smiles.

"Could you do that?" Daniel asked Johnny.

He was reading a book, laying on the floor on his back. He set the book down on his chest and looked up where Daniel was sitting next to him.

"Do what?"

"Not see each other for forty years and then after a month of knowing those feelings are still there to go our separate ways?"

Johnny pushed himself up. "No," he said kissing him and then laying back down.

Maybe Johnny could kiss him while doing sit-ups. Focus.

"What are you reading?" Daniel asked.

It was a different book than all the other ones he'd seen in Johnny's bag. It wasn't a library book.

"The Tales of Genji. One of my English teachers mentioned it. The first book that was ever written."

"Not another old one," Daniel complained.

What was with Johnny and reading old books?

"Not just old, oldest."

"Where'd you pick it up?" Daniel asked.

He hadn't seen Johnny go to a book store. But maybe Yukie took him or something. She seemed like a person who'd take Johnny to good bookstores.

"Chozen brought it over. I guess Kumiko told him about all the books we brought with us."

"You brought a lot of books. I brought one book," Daniel said. "Why'd you take anything from Chozen? It could be poisoned."

"How do you poison a book?"

"I don't know."

"I won't eat it. Promise."

Daniel sighed sinking down next to him. "That's not what I meant."

"I know," Johnny said, a teasing smile on his lips, turning his head to look at him. Daniel rolled over and kissed him. "Are you ready to go home?"

"Kind of. I like it here. But I miss-"

"Your bonsai?" Daniel teased.

"Yes. How about you?"

"I'm so ready to be home. I miss a lot of stuff. Like driving."

"And your mom?"

"That's a given like I'm sure you miss yours."

"Yeah," Johnny said softly.

He got a faraway look in his eyes. The original plan Daniel knew. That Johnny had planned to spend his summer with Bobby, staying at the Browns. He hadn't planned to go home that often. Hadn't even told his Mom he was in Okinawa.

When did he expect to see her again?

Daniel was pretty sure he'd see his mother soon. He wanted to surprise her. Thought he might tell her the wrong day just to see her face when he walked through the door. She'd be delighted.

He took Johnny's hand in his. Maybe going home wasn't going to be as easy as he thought.

The days passed quickly. They met up with Kumiko and went to the beach.

Daniel watched as Johnny surfed, as Kumiko promised, on a borrowed board.

He looked so at ease cutting through the water. Balanced. Kumiko laughed saying it must be like riding a bike.

Johnny asked Daniel if he wanted to learn and he did, but he wanted to wait till they were home. For the moment he wanted to enjoy the view. Wanted to do some snorkeling. He could surf at home. But he couldn't see the same things in the water, not the coral and the colorful fish.

Kumiko joined him in and after a while so did Johnny and it was fun to point things out to each other in the water. To walk along the beach after and eat ice cream.

When it was time to go Daniel was surprised by how sad he felt. How excited he was to be home. How bittersweet it was.

Ichiro gave him a sanshin. Told him to play with Johnny. Yuna hugged them both with tears in her eyes and little boxes were pressed into Johnny's arms by people that Daniel didn't know.

Sato drove them even though Mr. Miyagi said they could take a taxi but Sato refused to hear of it.

Daniel thought they might get away without having to say goodbye to Chozen but at the airport, Chozen was already waiting and Daniel had a momentary fear that he was coming with them. Like they'd never get rid of them. But instead, he put a box of cookies in Daniel's hands.

"They're called chinsuko," he said.

"Thanks," Daniel said looking at them then up at Chozen in surprise.

Mr. Miyagi and Sato were talking in Japanese. Yukie was dabbing tears from her eyes. Chozen turned to Johnny.

"If you ever come back, let me know. I'll pick you up. Real this time."

"Thanks," Johnny said.

Chozen shoved his hands in his pockets with a shrug. "And if Daniel-san breaks up with you, come back."

"Not happening," Daniel said stepping between the two of them.

Chozen tilted himself so he could see Johnny around Daniel. "Or if he dies, just come back to Okinawa."

"Hey!" Daniel said. "Listen, it took nearly 6 months, you are not-whatever you're doing."

Chozen laughed softly. "Visit again okay?"

He said it to Daniel that time too, catching him off-guard.

"Yeah, maybe, it's kind of expensive. And someone spent all their money getting us here."

"It was worth it," Johnny said.

"You did what?" Kumiko gasped smacking Johnny on the arm.

"It was round trip tickets, and it was an emergency and it was worth it," Johnny said rubbing his arm gently. "So now it's your turn, you've got to visit us."

"We will," Chozen said. "Maybe when Kumiko is on break from the troupe. Vacation."

She looked at him with a frown. "Maybe," she said.

She gave Johnny a big hug.

"Be careful okay?"

He nodded.

"Thank you for showing us around, and driving us around, and putting up with us. Sorry for the danger. Have fun dancing. Tell us all about it, okay?"

She laughed, tears in her eyes as Johnny pulled away to say goodbye to Sato and Yukie.

"Thank you for everything," Daniel said softly.

Kumiko laughed, short and watery, brushing tears from her eyes.

"Thank you for everything. It was a bit messed up the way it happened, but I do get to follow my dream now, because of you."

"You're going to be amazing," Daniel said pulling her into a hug.

It was a long one, he'd miss her a lot.

He'd miss the island, the clean air, the beautiful waters, and Tomi Village.

After a few more goodbyes, tearful hugs with Yukie, and an awkward but less crushing handshake with Chozen and Sato they were off.

After their luggage went through, when they checked in, Johnny took Daniel's hand.

He was kind of shocked, surprised Johnny just took his hand in public.

He had seemingly no desire to let go.

Daniel had done it countless times, but it was different when Johnny did it.

"You're okay with this?" Daniel asked softly as they walked with Mr. Miyagi to their gate.

"With what?"

"Anyone knowing?"

Johnny studied him curiously.

"I don't care."

"So I could tell anyone I wanted?"

"Tell everyone you want."

Daniel grinned at that.

The flight home was faster. Daniel slept for most of it, sitting in the middle leaning against Johnny who sat in the aisle seat, holding his hand for as much of the flight as he could.

They grabbed all their bags when they landed, hands too full to hold each other's hands.

Daniel started talking fast. Complaining already about the smog and telling Mr. Miyagi that he'd told his mother another day. It was a brilliant plan and he couldn't wait.

After a moment he realized Johnny had stopped.

He turned.

Johnny was holding the whale shark and was pale, eyes wide looking in another direction.

Daniel turned back shifting the bags in his arms and grabbing Johnny's hand pulling him along.

"Where'd you park the Avanti?"

It took Johnny a moment, looking behind them still before turning back around and telling him which lot.

It felt like home now, not just because of the smog but seeing the Avanti.

Daniel couldn't wait to see his mother, surprise her and tell her everything they'd seen and done.

Mr. Miyagi sat in the back with the whale shark plush and they put all of the rest of their stuff in the trunk.

Daniel sunk into the passenger seat stretching out with a sigh.

"I missed the Avanti," he said running his hands over the dash.

"Yeah?" Johnny asked turning on the car and pulling from the lot.

"I can stretch out."

"So South Seas first?" Johnny asked.

"Yes," Daniel said. "Mom should be back from Fresno, the guys said she managed to change the job location and got transferred back home."

Daniel turned to talk to Mr. Miyagi as Johnny drove them to the apartment complex.

He was worried about Mr. Miyagi who seemed ready to go back to work and his life.

He was worried it was all for show, but he wasn't sure.

Mr. Miyagi looked relaxed.

They hadn't talked about it and Daniel was a little worried.

Daniel's Mom was home again, which meant he'd be back to living at South Seas, not Mr. Miyagi's house.

He didn't know if Mr. Miyagi would let Johnny stay in the guest house or if Johnny would go to Bobby's.

Would he go home?

Daniel didn't know. But he'd see him. He knew that.

Johnny pulled up in front of South Seas where workers were hard at work demolishing it.

"What?" Daniel whispered looking at the building, getting out.

Mr. Miyagi set the whale shark in the passenger seat with a frown as Mrs. Milo who had been waiting out front with her luggage and dog talked about how the owner was tearing the place down and they were all getting kicked out.

"What do you guys want to do?" Johnny asked.

"Have to clear out stuff," Mr. Miyagi said.

"I gotta call my Mom," Daniel said.

"Should I meet you back at Mr. Miyagi's then?" Johnny asked. "Or do you want me to come with you?"

"Let's meet at Mr. Miyagi's," Daniel said.

Johnny turned to Mr. Miyagi.

"I hope you don't mind, I asked the guys to keep an eye on your place. If there's anything wrong, if they messed up I take responsibility and will try to fix it."

"Hai, thank you, Johnny-san," Mr. Miyagi said.

"You need a lift somewhere?" Johnny was asking Mrs. Milo.

"I ordered a taxi but it's late, so yes," she said getting into the backseat with her dog that jumped up to lick the side of Johnny's face.

"Okay, I'll see you later," Johnny said.

Daniel had left all of his stuff in the Avanti.

He regretted telling Johnny he'd meet him Mr. Miyagi's.

He pushed through the gate.

It was all going to be gone.

The pool he never got to use, apartment 20, Mrs. Milo, and her dog already were gone.

He was sure Freddy was also gone.

Mr. Miyagi headed off to his workshop and Daniel headed up to apartment 20 getting his keys out of his pocket.

"Ma! I'm home!" he called.

The apartment was empty.

He knew she wasn't there, but he'd hoped he'd misunderstood.

That she wouldn't have just left.

That maybe she was still home packing.

It was empty not just of his mother, but all their stuff.

He walked through the kitchen, everything was gone, all the spices, all the food in the fridge, the eggs and milk they hadn't had time to deal with.

Their couch was gone, their TV, all the photos, the photo albums.

He walked down the hall to his room.

His bed was gone. His trophy was gone, the posters were off the wall, it was just an empty room.

He remembered the lady had told him to call his uncle's, which he'd thought was silly.

The guys had said Mom was home.

But it was clear he'd gotten home wrong.

He thought this was his home and now it wasn't any longer.

He called his uncle Louie's and sat down on the empty floor of their apartment.

She explained that Uncle Louie was sick so she'd gone back to New Jersey to help care for him.

He felt his heart sink. She didn't know how long she'd be gone. Asked quietly about his trip.

"What happened to all our stuff?" Daniel asked looking around the empty apartment.

"The boys came by and got it all for us."

"The boys?"

"Your friends. Jimmy said he could store it all at his place," Lucille said.

"Ma! You let them go through all of our stuff?" Daniel thought about his magazines.

The stack of pictures of Johnny in his desk.

He was glad only for a moment that she wasn't there, knew he was blushing as bright as Johnny got sometimes.

Tommy had given him some of those, but not all of it. That had been Tommy's aunt, it hadn't been discussed. And the other guys didn't know. None of it was in pristine condition anymore. And he'd taken the only one Tommy had given him to Okinawa. So all the back issues made him look like a damn stalker without any explanation.

"I asked them to when it seemed you'd be in Okinawa for who knows how long. Told them where the spare key was and they got it all done fairly fast and efficiently from what I could tell when I stopped by on my way back here. I'm sorry I'm not there to welcome you home kiddo, but we'll see each other soon. Just stay with Mr. Miyagi and enjoy college okay?"

"Okay," Daniel said softly.

"Love you."

"Love you too," Daniel said hanging up and laying down on his back in the empty apartment.

He couldn't believe it was all gone.

He was tired of moving.

He wanted to put down roots.

He pushed himself up again and walked around, checking to see if they'd missed anything.

His closet was empty, the bathroom was empty, his mother's room was empty.

He'd never seen it like that.

His mother had had their stuff sent ahead, it'd already been partially set up by movers when he arrived.

It was echoey and weird to see empty.

He opened the front door realizing it'd be the last time he'd ever be there.

There'd be no more dinners there with his mom, no sitting with her on the couch watching her murder mysteries, no sitting in his room listening to the radio while doing homework, and no more dinners with Johnny that his mom had made, no having the guys over.

Never again would he come back to apartment 20.

He set the key on the kitchen counter and shut the door heading down to Mr. Miyagi's.

It was empty except for Mr. Miyagi when he arrived.

"The guys clear out your workshop too?" Daniel asked.

Mr. Miyagi held up a note. "Seems so."

"Should we go to your place then?" Daniel asked.

He held up the keys to the Ford.

Mr. Miyagi nodded.

Daniel drove, fingers on the steering wheel feeling antsy.

He wanted to see Johnny.

Wanted to see that Mr. Miyagi's place was in one piece.

Needed something normal and not shifting underneath him.

What would they do now?

Mr. Miyagi's job was gone.

He'd come all the way home from Okinawa only to lose his job and the semblance of normalcy it gave.

There were more cars in the lot than Daniel expected.

It looked like Johnny had just arrived.

He was leaning into the trunk getting their things out.

Daniel hopped out of the Ford.

"Did you get to talk to your mom?" Johnny asked hauling bags over his shoulders.

One looked lighter.

He'd probably returned his library books before he came back.

Nerd.

"She's back in Jersey, taking care of my uncle in Parsippany," Daniel said. "Whole place is empty. It was weird."

"She moved everything out already?"

"Apparently Jimmy has all my stuff. They emptied out Mr. Miyagi's workshop too," Daniel said motioning to Mr. Miyagi who was walking up the steps with a thoughtful look on his face.

The door opened and there was a little pop of confetti that fell on Mr. Miyagi.

"Welcome home Mr. Miyagi! Made you a welcome home cake!"

"Ah! Hello," Mr. Miyagi said with a laugh as Bobby helped him with his bags and the other guys darted out into the lot towards them at a full sprint, taking things from Johnny and sweeping him up in a hug. Grabbing Daniel and pulling him in.

"How dare you just leave without any warning!" Dutch complained.

"I called and told you," Johnny said

"That wasn't enough time! We had all this shit planned and you weren't here for it!"

"We missed you," Tommy said.

"We did get a lot done though," Jimmy said.

Bobby finished talking to Mr. Miyagi.

Daniel felt them start to tilt, collapsing in a pile as he joined the hug with more force than expected.

Daniel laughed, glad his hands were empty.

"Okay okay, yes missed you too, get off!" Johnny said struggling.

"You've never been gone before, like ever, suck it up," Bobby said.

Johnny sighed and stopped wiggling.

"We're glad you're both alive," Tommy said.

"I'm glad you're all alive."

"I think he just wants to check that we didn't kill his bonsai," Dutch said with a laugh.

"Your bonsai is fine Johnny. Everything is fine. We may be degenerates but we also know how to house watch properly. Daniel, did you chat with your mom?" Bobby asked.

"Yeah, she said you all cleared out our apartment and I saw you got Mr. Miyagi's workshop too."

"We did, Mr. Miyagi's stuff is here and yours is kind of spread out in a couple of our guest rooms, and in another spot," Jimmy said sitting up and plopping down in the dirt. "We've kept fairly busy, so honestly we didn't get to do as much fun stuff as we wanted. I think you had more fun than we did."

Bobby sighed sitting up as well. "A lot of shits been going on, but we're just happy to see you both in one piece."

They all pulled away and helped them up, helping gather up their things to carry off towards the house.

"We kind of took over Mr. Miyagi's place as a central hub," Tommy said picking up the sanshin carefully. "What are these?"

"Sanshin, it's like a three-string snakeskin banjo," Daniel said.

"Ah hell yeah," Dutch said looking over Tommy's shoulder at the instrument. "Oh man, look at all this stuff. Did you leave anything in Okinawa? Wait where's the girl? I thought you befriended a girl? Where's Kumiko?"

"She's going to Tokyo,"

"Aw man, Tommy's the only one who got to talk to her."

"It's probably for the best," Johnny said with an amused smile.

They followed the guys into the house. It was definitely decorated to welcome them home. A giant banner up on the wall and a cake on the table.

Mr. Miyagi was outside in the back. The guys kept walking out and Daniel and Johnny followed them into the backyard.

"We also finished the guest house. How'd we do Mr. Miyagi?" Jimmy asked.

"Boys do by self?" Mr. Miyagi asked, arms behind his back inspecting the work.

"Yeah, we got some pointers and had professionals check over our work. Dutch nearly electrocuted himself setting up the wiring. But it's all up to code," Bobby said.

Mr. Miyagi pushed the door open and took off his shoes, going in and looking around. He came out after a while. "Boys did good job."

Daniel watched them break out into big smiles.

"Thank you Mr. Miyagi!"

"We saw your design on the table, so we hope we followed it right."

"Tried to follow your instructions to the letter."

"Good good," Mr. Miyagi said with a nod, motioning for Johnny and Daniel.

Mr. Miyagi patted the doorway. "Guesthouse for boys. Mother in Jersey. College here," Mr. Miyagi said looking at Daniel. "Stay here."

He turned to Johnny. "If want, stay here too."

Daniel hoped he'd say yes. Wanted him to stay. Wanted to curl up next to him whenever he could. He wasn't ready to let go of him just yet. After a month of being by his side, he wanted to keep it that way.

"Thank you Mr. Miyagi," Johnny said turning to Daniel. "Is it okay?"

"Yes, of course," Daniel said.

How was that not obvious?

But Johnny smiled warmly at him and it was perfect.

Mr. Miyagi nodded, walking out. "Miyagi make tea."

Daniel grabbed his bags and took off his shoes, carefully walking into the guest room.

"Mr. Miyagi's notes said it was for Daniel, so we brought some of your furniture over," Jimmy said leaning against the door while Johnny carried more of their stuff in.

It was like the rest of the house. Tatami mats and Japanese style with light wood. But Daniel's stuff was there. Not all of it.

His bed, his desk, and chair.

They'd built a closet and Daniel opened it looking at his clothes hanging up.

He turned, they were grinning from the doorway, waiting impatiently to hear if they'd done a good job.

"Thank you," Daniel said warmly.

"Johnny-san, mother here," Mr. Miyagi called.

Daniel froze glancing at Johnny.

All the excitement, all the hope, fleeing.

She was here to take him home, wasn't she?

Was he in trouble for leaving the country without her permission?

Was he going to have to go back to the mansion?

If he spoke to her would she let Johnny stay?

If he explained the danger of taking him back?

Johnny set his things down gently and left towards where Mr. Miyagi had called out to him.

"Dude you turned so pale, it's fine," Dutch said sinking down onto the floor picking up one of the sanshin and strumming it.

"Yeah, his Mother's cool."

"I-" Daniel frowned. Johnny had technically given him permission to tell whomever he wanted. "I don't want him to go home."

"I get that," Bobby said with a sigh. "But he won't be."

Daniel sat his things down. "She doesn't like me particularly much."

"Where'd you get that idea?"

"The first time we met."

"Listen, she's intimidating, she's super protective of Johnny and honestly I think she's used to people being mean to him. I mean I got the thirty questions the first time I met her," Bobby said.

"And she was scary after the tournament," Tommy said. "Showed up at my house the grill me on every little detail I could remember about Kreese and the way he taught at Cobra Kai. She also told my aunt and uncle about what Kreese did. They were so upset. I was almost grounded."

"Yeah but she was gathering intel for her case," Jimmy said. "She cleared out Cobra Kai faster than any of us ever could have dreamed. Got the parents to withdraw every kid, nearly got it shut down."

"Why isn't it shut down?" Dutch asked picking up the whale shark and staring at it eyes wide. "This thing is fucking huge, how'd you even get it back?"

"Determination," Daniel said.

"There's a lot of money behind it. Like a lot. Whoever actually owns Cobra Kai has ungodly power and funding. But Kreese can't be the face of it anymore. She's done as much as she can until whoever owns it fucks up," Jimmy said.

"How do you know?" Daniel asked.

"Oh god, don't ask him that," Bobby said with a groan.

Jimmy grinned puffing up. "I've gotten to intern with her lawyers. I've gotten to talk to my school's dean and I'm going to get to skip ahead some steps."

"And there's a girl," Tommy said rolling his eyes.

"Jennifer," Jimmy said with a sigh. "She's been in my orientation classes and she's been helping me research in the library."

"We're sick of hearing about Jennifer," Dutch said. "Summer's not even over and this bastard is already back in school. Fucking nerd."

"Some of us have dreams and plans."

"Yeah yeah, all you have are dreams bud, she's not giving you the time of day."

"I'm working on it. I've got a plan. I'm trying to be like Tommy."

"Tommy's been after the same girl since he was five and failed. Don't be like Tommy, you'll never get laid," Dutch said

"Hey!" Tommy said.

"Sorry man, you're so fucking picky."

"Well some of us don't want to catch something."

"I haven't caught jack shit," Dutch said, arms folded.

"Daniel, tell us some good news, something, anything, this is going to spiral into a nightmare," Bobby pleaded.

"Johnny and I are dating."

Daniel hadn't meant to say it. He'd thought about it. Thought about telling them. But also thought that even though Johnny had given him permission to tell anyone that maybe they should talk about that in more detail. And he was tired from the flight and it was all he could think of.

This room was theirs.

And Johnny was his and these were their friends and he'd just said it.

Oh god.

Maybe he could run.

"I'm going to murder him," Dutch said getting up and turning towards the door.

Tommy grabbed the back of his shirt and pulled him down.

Dutch whirled. "How long?"

"How long?" Daniel asked confused.

"Have you been dating?" Bobby asked.

"Almost a month," Daniel said.

He couldn't tell how he should've been feeling.

He couldn't tell how they were taking it.

"I'm going to murder him," Dutch said getting up again only for Tommy to yank him down again.

He whirled. "Let me go you bastard! A month?! A fucking month! He called almost every damn day and not a peep. I had to listen to a fucking cooking guide over the phone about some damn bitter gourd that we don't even have here and he didn't say a damn word."

"I know," Tommy said. "But calm down."

"Calm down!? All the fucking shit that's happened while they've been gone. And that! That would've been something to call home about."

"He doesn't know about all that."

"He does too! He fucking lived it!"

Tommy grimaced.

Bobby sighed. "You're freaking out Daniel."

Dutch grumbled a bit, settling back down. "How long have you liked him? Give us the details since Johnny didn't, the bastard."

"He's probably going to tell us," Jimmy said. "Just Daniel beat him to it, I mean he hasn't even gotten a chance to see his bonsai yet."

"Yeah yeah, details Daniel, details," Dutch said waving Jimmy off.

Daniel took a deep breath, calming down.

He thought he'd play it off cool.

Tell them about it like it wasn't a big deal.

But he was too damn happy about it.

So he told them. About Johnny telling him in the middle of a storm, about the, what felt like thousands of dates that weren't dates but might've been dates.

Dutch rolled onto his back with his hands on his face with a groan and a string of curses when Daniel said how long he'd liked Johnny.

After a bit he popped up again. "I fucking knew it. I knew you were flirting."

"Johnny made compelling arguments against it though, it was easy to believe him," Bobby said with a sigh. "He was so stubborn it was hard to argue with him."

"You knew?" Daniel asked. "About Johnny liking me?"

"Yeah, I mean there wasn't actually any construction happening to the other bedroom at the lodge," Jimmy said.

"And we took my van so you'd have to sit together," Dutch said. "Same with lunch."

"It's why I invited you to help with the photo shoot," Tommy said with a smile.

"So you were only nice to me because you knew Johnny liked me?"

"No," Bobby said quickly.

"At first," Dutch said. "But you're cool man, we like you anyway."

"Anyway," Jimmy asked with a laugh, "what does that mean?"

"ANY way, whether he went for Johnny or not," Dutch said. "What do you think I meant?"

"Nothing man," Jimmy said shaking his head. "Congrats by the way. Better late than never."

Jimmy stood and stretched. "We should probably go see what's happening, huh?"

Daniel couldn't believe they not only took it well but that they'd known. That they'd tried to get them together all along. That they liked him whether or not he was with Johnny. But that they liked him with Johnny too. Maybe the rest of summer, the rest of the year would go by as a dream.

Chapter End Notes

> Okay so there's a sneaky joke in here that I have to explain. And it's kind of nsfw...I mean this is rated M, I think we're fine.
> So awhile back when Johnny was over at Daniel's home eating what his mother made I was doing research on all this Italian food and the seven veil's cake is all about lust, and cannolli's, y'all, cannolli's are dirty. They're just food versions of dicks. (which makes that whole scene dirtier? I don't know you decide?)
> Here's some reading about that: https://www.bbc.com/travel/article/20210113-the-erotic-origins-of-italys-most-famous-sweet and well here's a quote from the article "Men would give the tubular sweet to women to hint at their sexual desires, singing, "Ogni cannolu è scettru d' ogni Re... lu cannolu è la virga di Mosè," (Every cannolo is the sceptre of every king… the cannolo is the penis of Moses)."
> Does that make Daniel flirting and giving these to Johnny worse or better? No clue. You decide.
> Sharing that with you now because (I forgot if I did before or not) Chozen gives Daniel chinsukou...which is ALSO a play on words and slang for dicks. So Chozen essentially was kind of rude in his gift. Or that was what I was going for. Like one of those sneaky ways to flip people off. Looks nice to everyone but Chozen gets his own little joke, like bye Daniel enjoy a box of dicks. But you know, read it as you want.

And in Okinawa they serve these at tea ceremonies and they're nice little shortbread cookies so it's not always meant that way, but also...they're sold in packaging as like a joke that they ARE dicks so in some gift boxes they're shaped...well... like dicks.
Anyway, I'm sorry but I needed someone else to know all of this too. And didn't know if tumblr would flag it all or not... I just thought it was kind of funny that I kept running into it. Like what are the odds?
Here's a link, someone took a picture of the cookies and explains it: https://www.onookinawa.com/2017/03/03/chinsukou

We'll Find a Good Spot

Laura stood in the kitchen of Mr. Miyagi's home with a large bag over her shoulder. She was in the process of setting her bag down and talking to Mr. Miyagi when Johnny entered.

"Hi honey," she said with a warm smile holding out her arms. "Welcome home."

Johnny gave her a big hug breathing in her perfume and hairspray.

She ruffled his hair, giving him a big hug back.

"Heard you went on quite the adventure. Why don't you tell me about it?"

He stepped back and she pulled out a container of ice cream from the bag and some root beer.

He smiled, she'd even brought her own scoop and glasses.

"Mr. Miyagi do you want a root beer float?" Laura asked warmly.

"Small one," Mr. Miyagi said.

"Whose all here? I spotted some of the guy's cars," Laura said scooping out ice cream into glasses.

"6 not counting you or me," Johnny said.

"Glad I assumed properly," she said shooting him a smile.

"I get boys," Mr. Miyagi said walking off towards the guest house.

"Did you get hurt?" she asked.

"Dislocated my shoulder, but it was an accident. I'm all better now thanks to Mr. Miyagi. Daniel got pretty hurt though."

She twisted the caps off the tops of the root beer, flicking them with ease into the trashcan at the other end of the room.

"Any progress on that front?"

Johnny nodded, heart pounding in his chest, knowing his face was probably too easy to read.

Laura grinned, "I'm going to want to know about that too you know."

"I know," Johnny said softly.

"And you're hoping to live here together?" she asked raising an eyebrow with an amused smile on her lips.

"And Mr. Miyagi," Johnny said quickly.

She laughed. "Moving in together is a big step."

"We spent a month sharing a room in Tomi Village."

"Vacation is different," she said pouring the root beer into each of the glasses and setting them out with a straw and spoon.

"I know."

"Do you know what you want to do?" she asked taking a seat at the table, curling her legs under her on the floor.

"I don't. But I did some modeling while we were there."

"I thought you didn't want to model."

"I didn't but-"

"Tommy and resume building," she said nodding understanding.

"Yeah."

"Are you happy?" she asked softly, gently, almost a whisper.

"Yeah, I feel better. I think I needed that. Some time away. Like an adventure, or a trip to the seaside, but a different seaside."

She smiled reaching out and tucking some of the hair behind his ears.

"So you told Daniel?"

"I did."

"And?"

"Almost a month of dating."

She smiled squeezing his arm gently.

"Congratulations honey. How long has he liked you back?"

Johnny flushed red to his ears looking down at the table, playing with the condensation around his glass.

"Almost as long as I liked him," he whispered.

She burst out laughing.

Johnny's head shot up. "Mom! It's not funny!"

"It's hilarious. Oh of course he liked you, honey. The boy flirts up a storm, but only around you." She cupped his face in her hands. "I don't know how you couldn't see it, but I'm glad you do now."

Johnny looked away and spoke softly.

"I guess I just didn't think I could be so lucky."

Her arms wrapped around him, pulling him close. Her sigh was shaky and she patted his hair.

"You should honey, you really should. We'll get there. And you can stay here with Mr. Miyagi and Daniel. I'll come to get you when I can. I promise. We'll start seeing more of each other. So that all this stuff doesn't build up anymore. I had to hear from Bobby that you went to Okinawa."

"Sorry Mom," Johnny said with a frown, hugging her, brows knit.

Come get him? Why?

Was he in trouble for going to Okinawa? His blood went cold. Did Sid get pissed? His mother didn't look hurt. But she was holding him so tight it almost hurt.

She wasn't going to tell him. She was holding herself the way she did when she gave him the Walkman. He felt almost as if it'd been out and not in his bag, if the Walkman had been within reach she might put the headphones over his ears, pressed play, and walked away to do whatever it was she was gearing herself up for. But instead, she was just hugging him close.

He felt something wet on the back of his neck.

She was crying. Something was clearly wrong.

She took a breath after a while and pushed away.

He couldn't even tell that she'd cried.

She was all smiles, no puffy eyes, no running mascara.

How'd she get so good at that? When?

"I'm just glad you're okay. And that you had fun. And got a boyfriend."

It didn't match. The warm teasing tone with the tears on the back of his neck.

"I also learned how to cook a few things," Johnny said.

He thought his mom would have liked Tomi Village. She would've liked the people Yukie had introduced him to who he struggled to communicate with but who gave him sweets and snacks and cups of tea. People who he understood through body language. The family that had pointed up at something and he realized they wanted him to get something they couldn't reach.

It didn't matter that they didn't understand each other. They'd still figured it out.

He thought she'd like that Yukie gave him lessons. Cooking lessons, cleaning lessons, taught him how to get mud and stains out of clothes. How to care for the traditional clothing he'd been given. Kumiko had taken pictures, said she'd send them with the others.

He'd have to show her later. Make sure she wasn't worried about him.

He wondered if he could cook for her sometime. Dutch said he hadn't been able to find the bitter melon. But maybe he could make the donuts. Or something else Yukie taught him.

She held his hand warmly, smiling at him. It was almost like a trick. That she'd been upset at all, but he knew.

He heard footsteps approaching and looked up when the guys came in, sitting down around the table.

"Oh, root beer floats! Thank you, Mrs. Lawrence," Tommy said.

She smiled. "Got to reward all the hard work, plus its tradition."

"Tradition?" Daniel asked sitting down on Johnny's other side.

"We have some after every tournament he's been in and he tells me all about it. All the details of all the fights. He had a lot to say about you from the last tournament," she said motioning to Daniel with her mug and a grin.

Johnny flushed. "You-I-"

He hadn't known then. But he had known something had been wrong. A different wrong. That he'd done wrong. That he was relieved Daniel won. Maybe he'd talked more about Daniel than he remembered.

She made it sound like it'd been a spark.

Maybe.

But it was embarrassing.

She laughed softly. "So I thought it'd be a good way to get him to tell me about Okinawa."

"I was unconscious for some of it. Most of the big fight."

"Then Daniel can tell me about that?" she asked with a smile.

Johnny nodded trying to organize his thoughts, wondering how much he should actually tell her. Whether or not to tell her about staying up all night at the library or how pissed he felt over Sato and Chozen's disregard to Mr. Miyagi.

It felt a little weird to tell her with Mr. Miyagi there. He realized suddenly it felt like he was just going to be gossiping with his mother, but he had an audience for the first time. Not just his mother but the guys, his boyfriend, and Mr. Miyagi.

There were things he would have told his mother easily, like how stupid Sato had been. Would have ranted to her about that for longer than he probably should have.

That just didn't seem appropriate in this setting.

Or how worried he'd been when Daniel first got kicked in the stomach. About all the terrible things he'd done and how it was suddenly like coming face to face with that in a harsh light again. How much it'd hurt to see him hurt. He might've mentioned that Daniel took care of him when his arm was hurt, but he wouldn't in front of the guys. Not in front of Daniel or Mr. Miyagi.

His mother would appreciate it. Might tease him about it, but it was too intimate to say aloud in front of a group.

He looked down at his mug trying to think of where to start. Feeling nervous all of a sudden. So much had happened in a month.

Daniel gently squeezed his arm.

He'd have to start somewhere, so he did, in his favorite spot, he started in the garden after graduation building the start of the guest house.

He worked his way through to Daniel breaking ice in a bar surrounded by tough military guys ready to throw down at any second, pissed because Daniel had pointed out that they weren't doing it right and then breaking all six, more than anyone had done. Falling into details about stance and how it worked, like board breaking, but how normally when he'd trained you didn't break so many like that, and how ice was thick, but how intuitively Daniel had know the right way to do it just from watching army guys do it wrong.

He talked about dancing with Kumiko, the storm, and then he got to the o-bon festival and up to the fight and he frowned turning to Daniel.

He still didn't know if he should mention what Chozen had told him. How it wasn't real but desperate. Just made to look real to everyone else, and how it probably felt real to Daniel. Would have looked real if he'd been conscious.

Daniel was staring at him, that look he got sometimes that Johnny couldn't place.

"The fight," Johnny said softly. "That's all you. But only if you want."

He knew that Daniel had been very upset about the fight. He wondered if he'd want to even talk about it.

Daniel blinked and nodded. He cleared his throat and began with Kumiko dancing and then Chozen coming down knocking lanterns off the wires above to appear behind Johnny.

It sounded scarier than it felt now.

His mother grabbed his hand again, tight.

If it'd happened months ago who knows what would've happened. If Chozen would've gone for his neck then when anything near his neck freaked him out? He might've hurt himself trying to escape. Panicked too much.

Someone had told Chozen, because he'd apologized about it, apologized for his shoulder too. He'd looked pretty upset. Trying to figure out how to control his anger. That new feeling of anger at oneself once he'd realized he'd fucked up. Johnny knew that feeling. But Chozen was working on it. Sato and Yukie were watching him and Kumiko. She'd keep him in line.

The guys didn't look too pleased.

He hadn't told them. He'd brushed over a lot in their calls because he hadn't known how many minutes were left. Bobby hadn't said. And because they hadn't seemed as enthusiastic after the storm. Like they weren't interested anymore. He'd thought they would've been ecstatic but they never mentioned it. Never asked. So he stopped telling them everything, just checked in. Just mentioned a few things.

Daniel sounded pissed as he said what had happened at the o-bon festival.

A completely unnecessary fight to the death.

Chozen had explained he'd used a pressure point when he came to apologize.

If he knew how to do that, then, the entire time he'd been holding back in some way. That he knew he didn't have to go that far. That they could've been in much worse danger than a bored guy playing cat and mouse with Daniel.

Daniel made Johnny sound like a damsel in distress. That was what Chozen had been going for. But it didn't feel accurate.

Maybe he'd tell his mother later that Chozen hadn't actually planned to kill Daniel. That Johnny hadn't been in danger. That Chozen had apologized. Explain the intricacies of it so she wouldn't worry. Wouldn't try to crush his hand like she currently was.

Daniel fell silent at the end of the fight.

Johnny knew why he stopped.

Daniel looked pleased and a second away from talking about it. Like he was gearing up to say it so Johnny took over quickly.

He knew he was blushing. Knew they'd know he cut Daniel off from something. But the guys didn't seem to want details anymore. And he didn't want to talk about that in front of Mr. Miyagi.

Even though he thought maybe it hadn't been as private as he'd thought in the moment because Yuna teased him about it later. Pointedly telling him he had a boyfriend and she was right and that they were kissing weren't they?

There was a chance a whole village knew they had kissed. Because why else would Daniel have thrown a jacket over them and leaned in like that?

It had seemed so private, so romantic, so right, their own little world, but it'd apparently been so obvious a little girl had caught on and wouldn't stop teasing him about it. Acting like she was much older than she was at times telling him with a nod that he should listen to his sensei more.

He discussed the last couple of weeks in a peaceful Okinawa before coming home. Using the business cards he'd gotten at the dance, all their adventures with Kumiko.

His mother lifted his hand in hers, and took the other one, pulling them up and between them. She looked at him sternly.

"You have to promise me you will not tell a soul the danger you were in in Okinawa. No one. This doesn't leave this room. It was a beautiful trip, full of fun and adventure and some sadness as you went with Mr. Miyagi to say goodbye to his father. No details."

"I-"

Who would he even tell? Everyone he would tell was in this room. But she was so serious.

"Promise me," she said again.

"Okay," Johnny said softly. Her brows were furrowed and she nodded letting go of his hands.

She grabbed Daniel's. He looked startled. Caught.

"You too. Don't even tell your mother."

Daniel looked like he was going to protest. But there was something intense in her look, in her grip that Johnny remembered his graduation bouquet from her.

Maybe that'd been a hint for what was happening. Whatever she was going through. He'd have to tear it apart again in his head, dissect the flowers, and go over it with his book.

He did pack his book, right? Was it in the trunk of the Avanti? Or was it in his room at the mansion?

Daniel nodded weakly and she let go of his hands.

She turned her gaze to the guys. "I don't have to tell you do I?"

"Of course not ma'am," Jimmy said.

She sighed leaning back running a hand through her hair.

"You said you got to learn how to play an instrument. Will you play something for us?"

Johnny nodded and left to go out in the garden.

He paused walking over to his bonsai. It was sitting where he usually put it when he visited.

He studied the leaves, the dirt, the branches.

The guys hadn't tried to trim it. It was growing a little wild, but he could fix that.

He smiled.

"Sorry for leaving you behind, hope you had fun with the guys. That they behaved. But we'll get to stay here for now. With Mr. Miyagi and Daniel."

He picked it up, holding it carefully in his hands, the familiar and comforting weight and he carried it to their room. The guest house.

He looked around. There weren't a lot of options. He tried to think of where there'd be good sunlight.

Maybe it should stay out in the garden.

But he wanted to keep it somewhere close. Somewhere safe. And this was safe. The garden was safe, but this was even safer.

He set it down carefully on the desk. He'd have to ask Daniel later if that was okay. It was Daniel's desk.

He walked to the corner he'd set all of his stuff and started going through it.

The sanshin was out, that was easy.

He lifted it by the strap and slung it over onto his back.

He'd spent some of the money he'd gotten paid on souvenirs.

He found the scarf he'd picked out for his mother. Kumiko and Yukie had helped him pick it out and the snacks he'd gotten for the guys Yuna had recommended.

He put all the souvenirs in a bag and stood carefully so as not to dislodge the sanshin and turned, pausing to look at the bonsai, looking around, trying to think of another spot, a better spot.

But he couldn't. Maybe later he'd find one. He didn't want to take up too much of Daniel's desk. It was technically Daniel's room. Made and designed with him in mind.

His mother had said she was going to come get him again. Some unknown later date. This wasn't permanent. He was expected to return to the mansion.

It'd be like staying with Bobby for a couple of weeks during the summer as planned.

It'd be like the nights he slept in the Avanti or the beach. Just more comfortable. And then eventually he was expected to go back.

For what he didn't know. Maybe Sid had plans. He always talked about military school. About getting a job.

Johnny wasn't free yet. There was a month left before he turned 18.

Anything could happen.

He could run.

He didn't want to run.

He wanted to stay there, with Daniel and all of his stuff, with his bonsai and his sanshin and the giant whale shark plush and the guys and Mr. Miyagi.

He didn't want to go.

He wanted to be allowed to stay.

But maybe something bad had happened.

Maybe his mother was in danger, hadn't been given a choice.

Sid always boasted about his power.

About his reach.

Okinawa was starting to feel like a nice daydream.

Almost unreal. Except for the sanshin's light sturdy weight on his back.

He'd try not to take up too much space while he stayed.

Maybe it was fine.

He turned the bonsai a little on the desk, moving it so it'd get better light.

He'd have to ask Daniel if it was okay to leave it on the desk. That was all there was to it.

He wouldn't know unless he asked.

"I'll see you later, we'll find a good spot," Johnny said turning and closing the sliding door and walking quietly back to the kitchen where everyone else was.

He stopped at the door, his mother was talking.

It sounded like he'd missed part of the conversation.

Something important from her tone.

"-you understand?" she said.

"Yes Mrs. Lawrence," Daniel said his voice was quiet, soft.

"Good. Don't tell Johnny."

Shallow or deep love?

"I'm getting a divorce," Laura explained when Johnny left. "But I'm also suing Sid for abuse. The boys have told me all the things I was unaware of. Johnny's not 18 yet. He was supposed to spend the summer with Bobby where he'd be safe during the proceedings. The Browns said they'd watch him. But then Mr. Miyagi called and that seemed a better alternative as Bobby was going to also take the stand as a witness. And then all of a sudden Johnny was in Okinawa and that seemed even better. Far far away from Sid's reach because once the light was shown directly on him he's been vicious. Plenty of people have come forward to talk about how wonderful Mr. Miyagi is, how safe you boys would be with him. Pillar of the community. If Sid learns that you both got hurt while under his care-"

"You'll still win," Jimmy said gently.

"But he'd have a piece of leverage I'd rather him not have. He's been trying to undermine me, threatening to try and get custody even though he doesn't want it, even though there's only a month," she said her fingers curling into a fist. "I want him imprisoned. Gone. Let the ground just open up under him and swallow him whole. I don't want him to have a fighting chance. I want all the skeletons he hid in his closet to come and drag him to hell."

She looked pissed, furious. She then turned to Daniel again.

"Which is why I ask you to not say anything about your trip that might be negative, not until it's over. No one will ask, but if you mention it and he hears...Please don't say anything, unless point blank asked under oath, not until he's without a doubt buried under everything. So deep that he can't ever dig his way out. We have to move fast, but we're almost there."

"It's been grueling," Dutch said with a sigh.

"For you?" Jimmy asked with a laugh.

"Shut up, Mr. I'm getting college credit by helping the prosecution like some scheming monster. Just sitting in and listening to the shit has been awful. Mrs. Lawrence's spine is made of titanium. i can barely stomach it."

"Woah, you remembered the word prosecution. I'm impressed Dutch,"

Jimmy said eyes wide. "And titanium from science class."

"The goal," Tommy said. "is that Johnny doesn't have to know about it if possible."

"I don't want him in that courthouse unless it's absolutely necessary," Laura said, fingers curling into white-knuckled fists. "I don't want Sid anywhere near him. Do you understand?"

"Yes Mrs. Lawrence," Daniel said.

"Good. Don't tell Johnny."

Daniel nodded.

He watched as Laura uncurled her hands and shook them out and took a deep breath, rolling her shoulders back like she was ready for whatever was coming.

Johnny walked in with his sanshin and a bag. He set the bag down on the table handing the guys snacks and his mother a scarf. She smiled so brightly when she received it, pulling Johnny into a hug and kissing him on the cheek. He took his seat between Daniel and his mother and held the sanshin carefully in his hands.

He tuned it and played one of the songs he'd learned.

"Johnny-san getting very good," Mr. Miyagi said warmly.

Johnny smiled and Daniel felt tears prick in his eyes.

He'd forgotten about Sid. Hadn't even thought that Johnny was technically still a minor despite graduating. Not free from Sid's clutches. Why would he even threaten custody, surely it was frivolous, could be thrown out? But if he was trying to undermine Mrs. Lawrence. Hurt her for leaving him? For calling him out on his stuff and taking it to a court? Drag his name through the mud with a lawsuit, to show everyone just how awful he was rather than going away quietly?

They'd had such a wonderful last couple of weeks. He'd lived in a world without Sid or Kreese, far from their reach. He wanted to turn around, take Johnny back to Okinawa.

The amount of rot that everyone must have been digging up for the case had to be horrible. And the guys had been helping sift through it.

Daniel knew he'd only heard and seen a little bit of it and it made his blood cold.

He wanted to wrap Johnny up in a blanket, keep him safe in their room. Protect that smile that was coming around more often. And maybe here he was safe. Safe from Sid and all the other dangers that seemed to pile up.

Safe with him.

He would keep Johnny safe and he'd get stronger so that Johnny could sleep easy at night so that he could relax and those damn knots in his back wouldn't come back. Though...well...he could get rid of those and that was something he did enjoy doing, though he hadn't tried since they'd started dating.

Might be fun to try again. Might lead to other things.

The guys were talking about the national parks. They had a list they wanted to visit. They were asking Mr. Miyagi about what he wanted to do. That quiet shrug, the pain in his eyes. Daniel had tried to get Mr. Miyagi to warm up to the idea of going after his dreams, of owning a bonsai shop, but the man was stubborn, in too much pain. Daniel would think of something. For the both of them. He liked the idea of a bonsai shop. Thought Johnny might like it too. They would be so happy, if only they weren't so damn stubborn. But Johnny would be easier, he could start there. Get him in on the idea, keep him distracted. Kisses and bonsai would probably be enough for the time being. Just for a month.

Shit a month? A month till Johnny's birthday? He'd have to come up with something for that too. Something fun. Mr. Miyagi had made Daniel's 18th birthday the best one ever. Cake and a vintage car, his Ford. Johnny already had his favorite car. But they could make a nice cake. Could go on a nice date. He'd have to think of something. Figure out what Johnny would like.

As the sun began to set and turned the garden and house golden.

Jimmy got up.

"How about I make dinner?" he asked. "Is that okay Mr. Miyagi?"

"Oh, if want," Mr. Miyagi said sounding a little shocked but pleasantly so.

"Hope you don't mind but we've been here a lot. We took the leftover food from Daniel's and have been cooking a lot. Ate Johnny's cake, anything that might've spoiled in your fridge."

"I was wondering what happened to it all," Daniel said.

"Yeah, we asked your mom and she said to just eat it, so we did."

"They made me learn how to cook," Dutch complained.

"Yeah and now you won't starve," Jimmy said with a laugh.

"But we also got stuff to welcome you home."

"We argued for like a week on what you're welcome home dinner should be," Bobby said amused.

"Decided on steak," Jimmy said with a smile as he moved about the kitchen.

Daniel caught Laura's eye and she made a motion towards the garden with her head. She got up and patted Johnny's hand.

"Stay here darling," she said before walking towards the garden.

Daniel frowned but got up to follow her.

"I've got one other thing we need to talk about privately," she said to him. "I think it's safer for Johnny to be here right now. But I know you two are dating and I got to check that it is a good idea."

Daniel felt blushed bright red, heart pounding in his chest.

She knew.

Which meant Johnny had told her.

The first person he'd told when they got home was his mother.

"Y-yeah?"

"Do you actually like Johnny?" she asked. "Or do you just find him attractive?"

She sighed, hugging herself when he didn't respond, looking out at the garden.

"I made a mistake. I thought Sid loved me but he only liked how I looked, how it made him look to have me by his side, and he hurt Johnny because of it. Because he wanted a "pretty wife" but not a son. I can't approve if it's the same. I can't let him end up in a similar shallow relationship where he doesn't actually matter. I put up with so much shit because I thought he loved me. I thought it was better for both of us and I was so wrong. I can't let Johnny get hurt anymore. I won't let him get hurt anymore. So be honest upfront. Because I can't watch him get his heart broken again, not the way mine was. If it's just fun, you're both young, and I get that, but Johnny gets attached. When he lets people in he cares an awful lot even if it's only the barest kindness. Because that's all Kreese gave. The barest flicker of kindness and Johnny was all in from what I've learned. So, do you actually like him as a person or is this something just lust? Are you hoping for a partnership or just something physical?"

Daniel had felt awful when he'd met Ali's parents. Like everything he said and did was wrong. That there was no chance they'd ever look at him in a positive light. It'd been so easy to know things were going wrong. That they didn't like him instantly

He never knew where he was with Johnny's mother. But it was clear how much pain she was in, how much betrayal she felt. As embarrassing as the questions were. He understood it.

Daniel dug his shoe into the dirt.

"My godfathers talked to me about everything. They like to tell stories. They've been together forever. They were friends with my dad growing up. They taught me a lot about relationships. They do all this stuff for each other. Moshe hates making doctor appointments, so Tristen does it for him and they go out for McDonald's after. Neither of them like spiders but they'll go get the other and it's like when they're together they're willing to flick the spider out the nearest window. When we were home sometimes they'd come to get my parents to get the spider. I remember the door opening when I was little and they rushed in wordlessly grabbed my dad and sent him to catch the spider. They know each others favorite meals, and if they know the others had a rough day they'll cook it. They've got each other's backs. No matter what. They always took care of me when I was sick and my parents or Ma was working. They fought sometimes, but talked through it trying to understand each other and to come up with a plan. They always told me that communication is key. Repeated it all the time. That talking and making sure you understand each other, because everyone likes different things was so important.

And my parents were like that. From what Ma's told me, when Dad found out he wasn't going to...well he did everything he could to try and make things easier. Even though he was sick. She always talks about how much she hated it in the moment, as he jokingly picked out his headstone and the stuff he wanted for the funeral, but how much love there'd been in him trying to be light about it for her, trying to get it done so we wouldn't have to. Because he was scared but leaving us behind unprepared was his worst fear. I'm still finding out things he's done. Still finding notes from him and it's been ten years.

"And yeah, okay, he's, god I can't believe I'm saying this to his mother, Johnny's hot. But I want to make his favorite food. I like taking care of him. I don't want him to get sick or hurt often, but I like being there for him when he does, when he trusts me enough to let me know and to fuss. I want to go for drives with him, he's got this taco place he likes that I want to try. He read to me this book we had to read for English class and I loved that. It was actually the best way to read it. I keep picturing this apartment or something somewhere with a cozy living room with a lot of plants in it and a bunch of books and a nice kitchen with him. I like going on dates, even the ones that- you know what I think those were dates, I'm going to count them, I liked all of those. And I like how kids seem to like him. We were in Jersey and a kid picked him out of the crowd to ask him, a guy from California who didn't know where anything was, for help and he did.

"And in Tomi village everyone loved him. The kids talked to him, swarmed him on our walks with a bunch of questions, the older villagers greeted him. He learned the most basic phrases and it helped. We went dancing and were separated and when we found him again he had this crowd of people around him. I really want to go dancing with him. Like we didn't get to dance at prom or in Okinawa and I want to go somewhere where we can dance. Heck, I might just try and find my radio at some point. See where the guys packed it.

"He's always so surprised by people coming up to him and I think I'm starting to understand that. Where it came from. But I like that they do. I like the way he looks reading a book, how content he is, even if he's not reading it to me, even if the damn thing is from Chozen. I like how he tries his best, how he doesn't complain when Mr. Miyagi gives him stuff to do. I complain. I mean I do it, because it's Mr. Miyagi. But I reach a limit and Johnny doesn't. And I don't know if that's not a good thing, or if it's just him liking to help, or a mix. But I feel better when he's around, more at ease. Like all of the beginning of our trip to Okinawa I was worried about Mr. Miyagi and he'd just take my hand and I felt better. Or he'd do this silly little awkward pat when I'm upset or worried and don't think anyone realized it and he does it and it's kind of silly but it helps.

"For Valentine's day he gave me lavender cookies and didn't say anything and I was so upset because I made him chocolates and then my Mom told me they were from him and there was this little heart in there and I saved it for so long. If I wasn't worried about it molding I would've kept it longer. I did eat it. Because he'd put the time and effort in. And he always does that. And I don't think he realizes people notice it," Daniel frowned, he was starting to doubt himself.

What if he liked Johnny only because he was hot? What if everything was because of that?

"Oh man, I don't know if that sounds like I actually want to be his partner or if- is this like that moral quandary? Where you get a reward for doing something good but because you know you'll get a reward then any good thing is actually selfish? It's no longer pure intentions because it's been tainted? Damn."

Daniel turned towards the garden with a sigh.

Something was wrong.

Something was different.

The bonsai.

Where was the bonsai?

He ran over to where he'd seen it when he got home.

It wasn't there.

"Have you seen the bonsai?"

"Bonsai?" she asked softly following him deeper into the garden.

"It's Johnny's bonsai. It's like, his favorite thing, or like a lifeline? He took it to school every day, Mr. Miyagi gave it to him when he apologized. And he's taken it everywhere with him that he could. I think because he was worried Sid would break it."

Daniel sunk into the grass, trying to see if it'd fallen.

"Did he have it with him when he came to sit with us again? No. He had the sanshin and his gifts, but not the bonsai. Shit, where'd it go?"

Laura stood back up and walked across the garden towards the guest house and turned on the light. Looking in and around.

"Is that it?"

Daniel got up and ran over. She was pointing a manicured nail at his desk where the bonsai sat.

"Oh thank god," Daniel said sinking down onto the wooden hallway platform.

She sat down next to him with a sigh. She brought her knee up and rested her elbow over it before lifting it up and resting her head in her palm turning to look at him. "He tends to put things safe. So a safer spot than out in the garden with all the guys around is your room. Okay, different question."

"Yeah?" Daniel asked uneasily.

"Do you love him?"

Daniel turned bright red, he turned to her eyes wide.

She was smiling.

"You're so easy to read," she said. "I shouldn't have worried. But with everything with Sid and how I hadn't noticed for so damn long. Or I just brushed off his bad qualities because I only thought he was rude to me, not violent to Johny..." She sat up and shook her head. "I had to check. But you were talking about the future the way some people talk about their dreams. Like Jimmy talks that way about being a lawyer. Or Ali used to when I'd see her about being a doctor. I've never seen one talk that way about someone they liked. Or not really. Lucille talks about your father that way sometimes. And she's so sweet, I should've realized her son would be nice too. But there's that murky history from when you met and all the people I've been dealing with, the slimy lawyers from Cobra Kai to Sid's people have been so evil that it made me forget that you're not like that. That this isn't some long con to get revenge or to get even."

Daniel turned to her horrified.

"I would never do that."

She smiled softly.

"Yeah, I can tell. You can't hide your expressions very well."

"At least you can tell," Daniel said with a frown. "I thought Johnny was just putting up with me out of guilt because he never noticed. Or it was a Californian thing."

She laughed. "You've been so obvious though."

"Right? Wait, so you knew? Why didn't you say anything?"

"Johnny made me pinky promise not to interfere. He's going to be so disappointed in me."

"Why?"

She sighed. "I tend to jump a couple of steps ahead. I mean I just asked you point-blank like or lust and then went straight to love. If I'm not careful I'm going to start asking you what cake flavors you think you'd like for your wedding."

"A light caramel cake with a bit of coconut in the in-between layers mixed in with the icing."

She turned back to him eyes wide and he felt his skin burn bright red.

"I-I do it too," he whispered.

He hadn't mentioned that to anyone out loud.

Laura laughed, it was bright and cheerful, before taking one of Daniel's hands in hers.

"Well, we're just going to have to go out for tea or something from time to time. Brunch maybe? Lunch? We'll figure it out. Get to know each other better because it sounds like you're planning to stick around for as long as possible. Your mom knows right?"

"Yeah."

"I thought so, she kept asking about Johnny. I think she was fishing for information for you, but Johnny requested I not interfere. It was incredibly frustrating. But I was good. So I didn't really answer her questions. We got wine drunk at a fancy restaurant and she flat out asked me if I thought Johnny liked boys. I laughed and told her he's always hanging out with the guys so I doubted he hated them. She got so frustrated but didn't know how to clarify. I played dumb. I'll have to call Lucille and apologize and explain. Anyway, after the lawsuit, we'll go out for tea okay?"

"I'd like that," Daniel said.

"Oh and if he asks what's up because he's a smart boy and is probably realizing something is happening and that you know, you can tell him that we talked about his relationship with you and I was embarrassing, but the other thing, that I'll tell him when I'm ready and that I want him to hear it from me," she said giving his hand a gentle squeeze.

"Okay," Daniel said.

She turned to look into the room behind them.

"Living together is a big step. Living with Mr. Miyagi's going to be a big step for both of you. You won't have privacy. To, you know- take care of yourself."

Daniel turned bright red but she just smiled.

"But I hope it goes well. It'll be nice for Johnny. But make sure he knows he can take up space. I've realized he's been damaging himself trying to make himself as small as possible, which for an over 6ft boy made of muscle isn't good for him. And it's going to be hard in this small space."

Daniel nodded looking at the room. It wasn't even all of his stuff, and he knew Johnny hadn't emptied out the trunk. He didn't know where all of Johnny's things were.

She leaned forward, hands on either side of his face, and kissed the top of his head.

"I'm sure your Mom wishes she was here. But on her behalf, welcome home Daniel."

Daniel felt tears prick at his eyes.

She pulled him into a hug.

"It sounds like you went through a lot in Okinawa and you were very brave. I'm sure she was very worried and is very proud of you. And thank you for taking care of Johnny for me. Keeping an eye out for him all the time. You did good."

It wasn't his mother, but it was similar.

The words he'd hoped to hear from his own mother, the warm embraced he'd hoped for.

The happiness to see him home in one piece instead of an empty apartment and her across the country without him.

He'd wanted to come home to stability, not the ever-shifting earth beneath his feet. He wanted it to sit still for once. For the universe to let him stay where he liked. To let him have options. To have come home and for things to be the same as when he'd left it.

This wasn't the same, but it was close enough, and he'd take it.

He hugged her back.

It was like she'd taken one look at him and known, known what he needed to hear in that motherly way he thought only his mother knew.

After a while, the smell of steak filled the garden.

"Dinner!" Jimmy called and they walked back.

Bobby was talking to Johnny about his siblings. Tell him what they'd been doing all summer. Dutch looked bored head in his hand and his elbow on the table and Tommy was talking quietly to Mr. Miyagi.

Johnny glanced up when he came in and gave him a small questioning smile.

This was home.

He'd told Kumiko that home was where you hang your hat when trying to get her to think about coming back with them. Determined they could find a dance studio for her. He'd meant it for her, hadn't thought about it for himself.

He thought home was where is parents were, then where his mother was and now it was just him.

But it wasn't just him.

It was all these people who were there to welcome them home.

They'd moved for him while his mother and he were gone.

The awkwardness of it was unmentioned, they did say a thing, acting like it wasn't a problem.

They'd been ready to come to help, even though they were busy.

They'd given up their last summers to help Johnny's mother, to help his mother.

Daniel didn't think he'd ever had friends like them.

The closest he could think of was his godfathers.

Close enough friends that they become family.

People who show up, not just when things are good but are there when things are bad.

It'd be okay. Everything would be fine because they'd take it on together.

The quiet of night

Dinner with the guys was nice. Johnny had missed them and all the energy they brought around. It was different from Okinawa, easy.

Dutch was glaring at him though. Sitting across the table and kicking him occasionally. Like he was pissed about something.

After dinner and cake and talking about their trip a little more, about the summer that the guys had had, about Jimmy's new crush, Dutch starting Taekwondo, and moving all of Daniel's stuff and hanging out around Mr. Miyagi's his mother said it was time for her to go.

She'd stayed later than Johnny expected.

He kept waiting for her to have her Cinderella hour, the time she'd have to leave before it turned into an argument with Sid.

He was pleased she stayed so long.

Touched.

But he worried. Worried the fight she'd get into on his behalf.

He walked her out. She stopped at her car and dug around in her purse pulling out a business card. Her face suddenly serious.

"Could you do something for me, no questions?"

Johnny took the card with a frown.

"There's a person here," she said tapping the card. "Could you go here, sometime during the week, it'll take a while, but just talk to them. Anything, everything, except Okinawa. It's not going to be pleasant, but it'll be good and it'll help a lot."

Johnny stared at the card wracking his brain trying to think of what him talking about anything could possibly help anyone with anything. But he could for his mother. There was just an address and phone number, no information about the place or what it was.

"Okay," he said.

"Sometime soon, please."

"Okay."

She smiled hugging him close. "Welcome home again Johnny."

"Thanks, Mom."

"I love you, you know that right?"

"I do."

"Good," she said, brushing hair from his forehead and kissing his forehead warmly.

"I'll talk to you soon I hope. Have fun, okay? Enjoy your summer and being home."

"I will."

She got in her car and looked up at him. Her eyes were glassy but she smiled brightly at him so he wasn't sure if it was the lighting that made it look like she was about to cry or not.

"Get home safe," he said. "I love you."

"Good night Johnny."

He stepped back as she started her car and drove off.

It felt like the first day of kindergarten. She had cried then. Kneeling in front of him before work, dropping him off. Watching her drive off leaving him behind for the first time. Like the bubble of their time together was over. Like everything was changing.

It wasn't like he hadn't been left behind before. He'd seen her off before many times. Held her jacket for her before she'd gone to fancy dinners or parties, waved her off at the airport.

But she hadn't cried. She'd been excited, she'd been a little bored, she'd been amused.

He stood a little longer than he should have, peering into the darkness beyond the light of Mr. Miyagi's home. Long after the sound of her car was gone. Past when he couldn't see the lights of it in the distance anymore.

Something knocked his legs out from under him and he found himself in the dirt looking up.

Dutch was standing over him with his hands shoved in his pockets face sour but eyes shocked that he'd gotten away with it. Like he hadn't expected that he could sneak up on Johnny. Hadn't thought he'd actually fall. But Dutch looked too pissed to look sorry about it or feel bad. He crouched down next to Johnny.

"You forgetting to tell us anything?" Dutch said.

"Well, clearly it wasn't that I missed you," Johnny grumbled pushing himself up in the dirt. "Cause that flew out the window like a minute ago."

"You look pretty damn cozy moving in with Daniel. Not a nervous wreck like you would've been before Okinawa. Sure you didn't go to Okinawa to elope and not tell us? Because if so I'm fucking pissed and I've got some letters to go write."

Write letters to who?

Johnny frowned.

"There you are," Bobby said. "Wait what happened?"

"Bastard left his guard down. So he fell like a sack of bricks."

"Dutch," Bobby said, tone tired.

"Bobby," Dutch mimicked the same tone.

"We'll deal with it later," Bobby said.

Dutch glared at him.

Bobby held his gaze steadily.

Then after a while, Dutch sighed standing up. He kicked at the dirt and walked back into the house.

Bobby held out his hand to Johnny.

"Never thought I'd see the day where Dutch got the better of you," he said with a soft laugh.

"Yeah," Johnny said taking his hand and getting up, dusting the dirt off of himself.

"You okay?" Bobby asked wrapping an arm around Johnny's shoulder as they turned towards the house.

He wondered if this was what Bobby had mentioned. Once when they were out, some late-night conversation about the first time he'd gone to a sleepover and that cold night of his parents not being there, that he noticed in a quiet moment that made him sneak away from the fun to call his parents and ask them to come to get him.

It was weird to think of, homesick Bobby Brown as a kid who went to sleepovers.

Maybe it was like the late nights his mom worked, sitting in their apartment waiting for her to come home. The few times where she didn't get home until morning and would find him sleeping on the couch and he'd wake up to her carry him to bed.

It was a similar feeling, but without the morning.

"Yeah," Johnny said, quietly as they walked back into Mr. Miyagi's house.

Mr. Miyagi was had his hand on the door to his room.

"Long flight. See boys tomorrow," he said bowing his head slightly to them before going into his room.

"We got permission to spend the night," Bobby said squeezing his arm.

Where were they going to sleep? He supposed he still had the tent in the trunk of the Avanti.

Jimmy was in the kitchen talking to Daniel and Tommy, Tommy finishing the dishes.

Dutch was looking in the fridge and pulling out some beers.

"I'm going to call my Mom. My uncle kind of cut her off earlier, he should be asleep now," Daniel said kissing Johnny on the cheek and heading off down the hall to the phone.

Dutch stood holding a couple of beers and stared at Johnny, eyes wide.

Johnny stared back with a frown.

Dutch set the beer bottles down with a heavy thud, angrily removing the caps.

"What. the. fucking. hell?" Dutch said.

"Why are you so pissed?" Johnny asked stepping forward. "What did I do to piss you off?"

"You haven't said jack shit about you and Daniel."

"I did too."

"When? Because I've never listened so hard in my fucking life, for some scrap of explanation," Dutch said stepping forward and meeting him.

It was the kind of charge of a fight half a second from breaking out. From punches and kicks to be thrown. Dutch was fucking pissed. And Johnny was too tired to deal with it. Too drained.

"I called home and told Bobby. You all kept telling each other everything, and no one said anything. I figured you didn't want to hear anything about it anymore."

Dutch whirled on Bobby.

Bobby was frowning taking one of the beers.

"I would've remembered if you told me Johnny."

"It was the first call I did after the storm. Tommy talked to Kumiko and then the next call I told you."

"Fuck. That's the night the call kept dropping out. I missed like half of the conversation because it cut out. I thought you were in a good mood and chatty for someone who'd dislocated his shoulder and survived a big storm," Bobby said sinking down with his beer to the floor. "But Kumiko had told Tommy that Mr. Miyagi gave you a ton of medicine, so I figured it was just that. Not that you'd been talking about Daniel and I missed it."

"Well that explains things," Johnny said sinking down to the floor as well.

"So you seriously thought we went from being invested to just not every speaking of it?" Tommy asked softly crouching down.

"Yeah," Johnny said with a shrug.

Dutch and Jimmy joined them on the floor.

"Okay, less pissed now," Dutch said with a sigh.

"Wait so if you didn't hear my call then, why have you been pissy all night?"

"Daniel told us," Jimmy said with a soft laugh. "He looked like he panicked after he said it. Like he hadn't meant to."

"Definitely got the argument happening to stop, which was my request," Bobby said with a smile.

"Can't believe you been dating for a month and we got screwed over by international calling," Dutch said. "I'm going to complain."

"You are complaining," Jimmy said.

"To someone who can do something about it," Dutch said rolling his eyes. "You guys can't do jack shit."

"Such a vote of confidence. And here I thought we were doing pretty well at getting stuff done," Bobby said with a laugh and reached out patted Johnny's shoulder. "Sorry I should've mentioned the call dropped and I missed everything you said."

"Way to drop the ball Bobby," Jimmy said.

"Hey, I'm sorry okay?" Bobby said.

"So are you happy?" Tommy asked gently.

"You didn't get replaced already by that gigantic fish you brought home?" Dutch asked with a smile quirking on his lips.

"I have not," Johnny said. "We got that at the aquarium."

"You didn't win it at a fair?" Dutch teased.

"Nope. We modeled for their ads."

"We? So Daniel's in some ads in Okinawa now?" Jimmy asked. "Going to have to find those."

"And Kumiko," Johnny said.

"Damn, Tommy, your aunt works in magazines, see if she can find us these ads," Dutch said.

"Oh, they were going to reach out to the magazines to put the clothing ads in there too."

"Did you just work the whole time?" Bobby asked with a laugh.

"I learned sanshin, and tea ceremony, and cooking, and-"

"I thought Jimmy was fucking awful with spending his summer learning," Dutch complained. "Get to the good shit."

"Fine, Dutch, what do you want me to say? Didn't I already go over all this?"

"Yeah, and you skipped the good shit. Daniel told us the damn fight. Which by the way Chozen better not show his face around here," Dutch said.

"He went about it wrong, but he kept his promises," Johnny said.

"Promises? Daniel didn't mention promises," Dutch said leaning forward.

"It's complicated."

"Hey you're stuck with us for the night, so go you might as well tell us," Jimmy said sipping at his beer.

Johnny sighed. He told them about all his run-ins with Chozen all the way up to the fight.

"Shit he knew pressure points?" Tommy whispered.

Johnny nodded with a frown, told them that Daniel had done the little honk thing that Mr. Miyagi had done to Kreese and how Sato and Chozen had reunited. Johnny heard Daniel making his way back towards them.

"Please tell me you are not talking about Chozen," Daniel said behind him.

Johnny looked back and up at him and Daniel sunk down to the floor with arms wrapping around Johnny.

"He's trying to be better. I know what that's like," Johnny said softly.

Daniel looked at him and shook his head. "Can that be the one thing we leave behind in Okinawa? Can we just leave Chozen there?" he complained. He looked around taking in the beers.

Johnny held out the one he'd been given but hadn't taken a sip of yet. Wasn't sure if Daniel was even interested. But Daniel took it and took a sip.

"Huh, this is better," Daniel said thoughtfully passing it back.

"Then what?"

"The stuff at the party. I was starting to think I just didn't like beer."

"That had been sitting out for who knows how long."

Daniel laughed. "True."

"How's your Mom?"

"Better, so what's happening here?"

"We learned that technically Johnny told us first," Bobby said.

"Told you first?"

"That you two are dating," Tommy said.

"But the call cut out for the actual admission," Dutch complained.

Daniel grinned at Johnny. "So when was that?"

"Second or third day after the storm," Johnny said thoughtfully.

"I can't believe they all knew," Daniel said with a sigh, shaking his head.

"Since the beginning," Jimmy said with a grin.

Johnny leaned against Daniel. That quiet night melancholy fading, taking his hand in his. Daniel gave his hand a gentle squeeze. They were too excited he realized, talking about all the plans they'd had. It turned into a weird game of was Daniel flirting in that moment or not? And almost every single time Daniel said yes. It was embarrassing to realize how much he missed.

They finished their beers, cleaned up, and headed off to the guest house. The day was wearing heavily on Johnny. Even though it'd been another day where he'd left Okinawa, the travel, the transfer in Tokyo, it all added up and was exhausting.

He wanted to shower and sleep.

So he grabbed his stuff and left.

They'd figure out sleeping arrangements without him. They knew his stuff was in the trunk. If they were camping. But from the way they settled into the guest room it was starting to look like Daniel would be subjected to a busy room.

Showering after a long flight and a long day was nice. Even in Mr. Miyagi's tiny shower. He wondered what Mr. Miyagi would do now.

Daniel had mentioned at dinner that Mr. Miyagi had a dream of opening a bonsai shop. Mr. Miyagi had stressed it had been a retirement dream, but Daniel had that look on his face. An argument already that he wasn't going to give up on. He'd win. Johnny just didn't know what.

Like the guys Daniel liked to scheme. Maybe leaving them all alone together again was a bad idea. Who knew what they'd scheme up?

He was relieved they were keeping busy.

Jimmy had said he was working on some cases as some school program. Had mentioned he was shadowing some guy to court cases and helping. Johnny tried to remember the name of some DA he was trying to meet with. Cole. He wouldn't go into details but he talked about how invigorating it was to be in court and working. Getting to see the day-to-day of the rest of his life. That dream of his. It was that and Jennifer.

And Dutch seemed to be enjoying taekwondo. It was keeping him busy and out of trouble, he'd said.

He looked like he wanted to spar. Johnny was curious to see the different moves.

It sounded like they'd had a busy, boring, and good summer.

He knew they'd had fun things planned. They'd wanted to go to all the parks over the summer. Thought Daniel would like it and knew Johnny would. And Johnny...before Okinawa had wanted to go to scope it out.

It was on his list of places to run away to.

To go into the forests and not come out again. He'd become a ranger and just watch for fires.

He got out of the shower, dressed, and walked back to the room. It was a nice room. The guys had done a good job finishing it up.

They were sitting on the floor in a little circle like some nightmarish spin the bottle game was about to happen.

But he knew they automatically fell into circles, to see each other evenly as possible. It was just a natural way that they moved.

Johnny walked over to his bonsai and picked it up again, he was starting to doubt that a room with a total of six boys in it was a safe spot for his bonsai for the night.

"It will be fine there," Bobby said.

"Just as it's been fine the whole time you were gone," Dutch said.

"We took good care of it," Tommy said.

They were all looking at him. Was it that obvious?

"You can leave it there if you want, it's okay," Daniel said. "It looks nice."

Johnny nodded and set it back down. He adjusted it slightly and then turned back.

"Daniel was explaining more of the bonsai shop," Jimmy said as they scooted to give him room to sit in their circle.

"And they were explaining the process of opening a business in LA," Daniel said looking at him as he sat down. "I've even got a name for it I think, if he likes it, because we know what a bonsai is right? But no one else does, but they are little trees, so I was thinking Mr. Miyagi's Little Trees," Daniel said holding his hand out and punctuating each of the words in the air in front of him.

Johnny nodded. "It's clear."

Daniel grinned, delighted by this approval of the name he'd come up with.

"The problem is," Dutch said amused. "Daniel wants to use his college fund for it."

Daniel frowned, practically a pout. "I don't know what I even want to do, why should I waste my time and money trying to figure it out when I can help Mr. Miyagi? It'd be of more use then."

"It seems kind of like a waste," Jimmy said shaking his head. "You'd deplete almost all of your funds. Who does something like that?"

"Hey, Johnny did it."

"Hey," Johnny said.

"Well, you did! You have practically no money left right? Just what you were paid in Japan. And you spent some of that on souvenirs," Daniel said.

"Wait, you have no money?" Jimmy asked eyes wide.

"I spent the last of it on the flights," Johnny said with a shrug. "I have enough for the time being from modeling, it'll be fine."

"You two are going to be hopeless," Tommy said.

"I suppose you could look at shop locations," Bobby said. "See what's out there in your budget."

"Bobby!" Jimmy and Tommy said turning to him.

Bobby shrugged. "Hey my parents opened a small bakery with all the money they'd saved up and it turned out okay."

"Not everyone is that lucky," Jimmy said. "Do you know how much work goes into a small business?"

"No, but I have a feeling you're going to tell me," Bobby said with a sigh.

Daniel took Johnny's hand, interlacing their fingers and twisting his hand slightly so his thumb could slip between their palms, dragging his thumb against Johnny's palm.

It was nice to be home. Nice to be with the guys, with Daniel.

He was glad he'd gotten to see his mother, even if he was worried about her. She'd tell him not to worry. Remind him she knew how to take care of herself. She'd been self-reliant before Sid. Checking out books from the library to fix things in their apartments herself. Fixing the car on her own. She always told him not to worry about her. She was the mom. But he still worried. Still wanted her to be happy. For things to be easier for her.

He wanted that for a lot of people. For Mr. Miyagi, for Daniel. Nothing was ever easy.

Tacos by the beach

Daniel woke up to the sound of birds. He hadn't set an alarm. The thought of waking up to birds was nice. The reality of it was that he hated the birds with every fiber of his being in that moment.

He buried his face in Johnny's back wanting to avoid the sunlight that was streaming in. He muttered quietly about stupid birds and some people should be allowed to sleep in every once in a while. A guy has to fight an idiot to the death while being overseas you'd think when he got home he'd get to sleep in. That he'd earned it. He was home. Sort of.

He wanted to enjoy it. He wanted to enjoy having Johnny in his bed. Because it was his bed. The bed from the apartment and it at least smelled like home.

While the room was different Johnny Lawrence was in his bed. But he also came with four ex-cobras who'd fallen asleep on the floor in sleeping bags they had with them.

Dutch had suggested the night before they rock paper scissors for the bed but it got nixed unanimously much to Dutch's complaint that he was tired of sleeping on floors.

It was kind of strange. To have them all there. But it reminded him of holidays back home, where when the whole family met up the kids and anyone unmarried and under thirty had to sleep on the floor. This was more manageable than that. Quieter.

He tightened his arms around Johnny. He was definitely awake now. His brain was up and thinking and it wasn't shutting up. He didn't want to get up though. It was comfortable in his bed.

Johnny had looked confused before bed. Like he was unsure where he was going to sleep. Like he expected the whale shark to take his place or something silly like that. Daniel had to get out of bed and drag him over.

You're sleeping in my bed. It's our room, this is where you sleep. Like always.

Johnny had turned bright red.

The guys were there. They probably hadn't known they shared a bed on the floor for the past month. It wasn't like Johnny wasn't used to sharing a bed. They knew that.

He'd come to bed, taking his spot next to Daniel. Maybe it was embarrassing with the guys there. But they were the ones who started it. They were the ones who faked the room shortage at the lodge.

Daniel preferred to sleep next to Johnny instead of anywhere else. He'd gotten used to sleeping on the floor. But this was better.

It was their fault so why should Daniel be embarrassed? They started it.

Maybe it was because they'd built the room that they felt owed some space? Well, Daniel and Johnny had started that.

They'd also moved Daniel's stuff out of the apartment. That...that he didn't have an excuse for. They won that one. Deserved a treat. What did people usually do? Pizza and beer? Maybe he'd cook them dinner some night. That could be fun.

He wondered what time it was. He didn't know where any clocks were.

He pushed himself up and looked around, the guys were still sleeping. Sometimes Johnny had a watch. He didn't wear it to bed, usually took it off before bed. But he also showered before bed. So who knew where it went.

He looked around and spotted it sitting on a little side table from Daniel's room. He leaned over Johnny and reached for the watch. Johnny moved, rolling away, escaping since Daniel had let go.

Daniel nearly grabbed for him, a momentary fear that Johnny having spent so much time sleeping on the floor would just roll right off. But he just rolled onto his back.

Daniel grabbed the watch and checked the time. Ten am. Was that late? It felt late. But it was also summer. Sleeping in in the summer was like 2pm.

He'd gotten 8 hours. But after such a long flight, maybe Johnny would need more. He carefully put the watch back and glanced down.

Johnny was awake looking up at him.

Daniel leaned down and kissed him.

He couldn't help himself.

He wanted a kiss and went for it.

Plus sleepy Johnny had been kind of fun once they started dating, once he knew Johnny was awake in the mornings when the alarm went off.

Johnny reached up and wrapped an arm around Daniel's shoulders, holding him close, kissing him back.

"You know, up until this point I thought they were suspiciously the same as always," Bobby said.

Daniel blinked. He didn't think they would've woken up.

They were being quiet.

Johnny had frozen beneath him, ears pink.

Maybe not quiet enough.

"Yeah, they always held hands," Dutch said.

"But whatever this is, is clearly new. Do we need to leave guys?" Jimmy asked.

"Think they forgot we were here?" Tommy asked.

"Kinda hurts my feelings if so," Dutch said with a sigh. "But otherwise..."

Daniel got up with a sigh.

Johnny probably had forgotten. It seemed to take him a while in the mornings to get his bearings. A few minutes to take stock. But he melted into morning kisses.

He liked those moments. And it'd taken so damn long to work their way there. They'd have to save up and get a place with a guest room or a living room and kick the guys there.

Oh god, was there a chance that they'd be like thirty and he'd wake up to an ex-cobra in his bed or on the floor of his bedroom?

They'd have to have a nice guest room. Lure them there with a bed to themselves.

Maybe it'd be fine. Every once in a while. Like an occasional sleepover. It'd just have to be a bigger bed.

He'd have to just accept it huh?

Date Johnny Lawrence and you get four more friends who will sleep in your bed. Or floor.

Ali had said it was like they were guards.

Maybe it was because of Sid.

Dutch had mentioned how Johnny hadn't had sleepovers growing up. Maybe they were making up for lost time for him. Trying to cram in all the fun they got to experience and share it.

He couldn't be miffed about that. They were going to have to compromise.

They'd have to put up with the sweet morning kisses Daniel liked and he'd just accept that they might end up also in his bed someday, platonically.

Just hopefully not all the time.

"Good morning," Daniel said, shifting and turning towards them.

"Oh, shit, is Daniel pissed off?" Dutch asked. "I don't think I've seen that face in forever."

"It does feel like a parent who's about to scold you. It's that kind of look huh? I thought only Bobby had that expression," Jimmy said with a laugh.

"Well, we did ruin whatever was happening," Tommy said.

"Yeah, so? Rule #1 of common courtesy. Don't bone with other people in the room, who aren't part of it," Dutch said.

"You know I haven't heard that rule, but that's a good rule Dutch," Jimmy said.

"Thanks."

"We weren't going to-" Daniel heaved out a big sigh.

Did he even bother to explain? Was it even something he should do? He did want to, but definitely not with the guys on the damn floor. He had some restraint.

"You're all awful. It's too early for this," Daniel decided on getting up, grabbing his stuff to go shower and hopefully come up with something better. That sounded less indignant.

They'd been drunk, he didn't know how they were functioning.

He remembered how awful he'd felt after the party. And he felt bad after such a long flight and passing out. Showering felt better. Woke him up more.

He liked the guys. But he really wanted time alone with Johnny and it was like the universe didn't want that to happen. There were always other people around. He wouldn't even get a chance to try anything because there were always people.

They got all this alone time when they hadn't known, but now that they did know it was like the universe didn't trust him.

Maybe he couldn't be trusted.

Daniel sighed washing his face.

They were his friends. He shouldn't be mad at them. They were all excited that they were home. And it was nice to have that welcome home. Especially since he'd lost his home and his mother was across the country. It would've been so lonely if it'd been just Mr. Miyagi and him. It was nice to have people excited to see him, even if they started teasing way too early in the morning.

When he finished getting ready they were all in the kitchen making breakfast.

Eggs and bacon and toast.

Dutch was cooking. He looked bitter about it.

Daniel sat down next to Johnny.

Bobby was holding a little sheet of paper in his hands.

Dutch filled the plates and brought them out to the table.

Bobby shifted the sheet in his hand and pulled off a sticker and stuck it to Dutch's shirt.

"Good job not complaining about cooking."

Dutch frowned but didn't say anything. He plucked at his shirt looking down at the sticker and the frown faltered. It looked like he was struggling to seem like he was still put upon.

Daniel wanted to laugh but everyone was so serious. So he ate to stop himself from saying anything.

"Mr. Miyagi left a note," Tommy said passing it over to Daniel.

Gone fishing.

Daniel sighed turning to Johnny. "You want to look at shops with me, to get an idea?"

He caught Bobby putting another sticker on Dutch's shirt.

"No shells, it's good. Good job."

Dutch looked pleased. So this was how they were getting him to cook.

"Sure. I do need to go somewhere today."

"Yeah? Where?" Daniel asked.

Johnny pulled a business card out of his pocket. He felt the guy's eyes on them, on the card. There was nothing to explain what it was. An address.

"Hmmm, that's mysterious. Want me to drop you off and pick you up?" Daniel asked. "We could sign up for a tour of some places, get the ball rolling, and then I can drop you off."

Daniel knew Johnny liked having his Avanti so he could go where he wanted. But Daniel wanted to drive, wanted to spend time with Johnny, wanted to remind him he could be reliable.

"I don't know how long it'll be. It might be long," Johnny said softly.

"That's fine. There might be a cafe or something," Daniel said. "I can chill there and wait. It'll be nice. I'll have time to go over any paperwork they give me."

The more he thought about it the more he liked the idea. They'd kind of have some alone time. He could tell Johnny more about his plan. Get his input on it. Because he liked it the more he thought about it. He liked the thought of picking him up. He'd had fun the last time he'd done it. Maybe now Johnny would notice everything.

"Okay, thank you," Johnny said.

Daniel grinned. "My pleasure."

"I regret everything," Dutch mumbled. "We're going to have to watch this sickly sweet nonsense all the time now."

"Don't make me take back one of your stickers," Bobby said.

Dutch quickly covered his hand over his shirt where the stickers were and turned away. "Don't you dare. I wasn't being serious."

"Breakfast is good, thank you for making it Dutch," Johnny said.

Dutch turned his head back towards Johnny and beamed so bright Daniel thought he'd go blind.

Then he shrugged like it was no big deal.

"Turns out eggs are easy, you gotta whisk 'em, cook 'em slow and add cream. I like adding cheese, onion, and garlic too."

"It's real nice," Johnny said.

Bobby sighed taking a sticker from the sheet and sticking it on Dutch's forehead. Dutch grinned pleased before turning his focus on eating his breakfast.

Daniel had missed the Ford. He'd driven it from South Seas the day before with Mr. Miyagi. But that had been stressful. He'd lost his home after coming home from a trip.

But now he'd get to drive Johnny somewhere. Remind him that not all LaRusso's were bad drivers. That he was safe in the Ford and with Daniel. Plus he was excited to see the steps to starting Mr. Miyagi's business. What he could pull off. Make a dream come true.

Mr. Miyagi needed some good in his life and if it was within Daniel's power to make it happen he was going to do it.

As they left Mr. Miyagi's place Daniel told Johnny all about his plans, his vision. All the things he wanted to try to accomplish. How this was so much better than going off to college.

He felt relaxed, driving at ease. He reached over and placed his hand on Johnny's thigh. He hadn't gotten to do that in a while. Johnny usually took his hand and he liked to hold his hand, but he wanted to see if there was a reaction to this now that Johnny knew. Now that they were together.

Johnny's hand went over his.

Cute. Not what he was going for, but it was fine.

He parked the car in front of the realtor's shop surprised that no one else was parked on the street.

It was LA, parking was always a nightmare.

"Must be a sign," Daniel said hopping out of the Ford and heading towards the building. "Got free parking immediately."

Johnny smiled following him in.

They managed to get a meeting with a realtor, where Daniel explained his business plan, or well...Mr. Miyagi's business plan. The realtor listened with a small smile and nod. When Daniel stopped talking she handed him a large stack of paper.

"You boys seem young and it's exciting to start something new. But I've got a son your age, so I want you to read through all of this and maybe talk to someone with more experience reading documents and about zoning laws and lease agreements, there's a sample on in there to familiarize yourself with terminology. And then come back and if you still think it's for you then I'll show you some places. Give it a week okay? I don't want to see you until-" She looked at her calendar. "Next Friday. Can you come back this time next Friday? There's a lot of stuff you need to think about if you want to succeed. And because you want to sell these...what were they again, little trees? You got to make sure you've got enough lighting, right? Natural lighting and space. So do this, think about what you want in a shop, people usually make a wishlist, and then come back okay?"

Daniel took the thick packet of documents. "Thank you."

"Of course! Here's my business card, let me know if you have questions. But I recommend someone you trust to help you go over it."

It would be enough to read for however long Johnny would be...wherever it was he needed to go. So he stuck it under his arm and they returned to the Ford. He dumped it onto the seat between them and followed Johnny's directions to the place on the business card.

There was thankfully a cafe across the street.

No one was around so Daniel leaned over and kissed him on the cheek.

"I'll be in there," he said pointing to the cafe. "Got plenty to go through so take as long as you need."

"Thank you," Johnny said turning to him.

Daniel nodded kissing him again quickly before grabbing his keys, a packet of paper, and heading towards the cafe. Johnny walked off towards the building he was supposed to go to with the card in his hands.

Daniel ordered a latte and took a seat near the door and window and spread out his paperwork to read through it.

It was...dry. It was boring and dull. But it was Mr. Miyagi's dream. And he could ask Jimmy and the guys to help him look it all over. Have them help look over the lease. But he wanted to have some idea. Because it was his idea. And he'd be the one helping Mr. Miyagi. Wanted to be the one to help him.

After a while, he caught movement across the way and looked up to see Johnny. It was later in the day, afternoon. He glanced at his watch. Johnny had been in there several hours and Daniel had been reading about lease agreements and commercial zoning.

Daniel hopped up gathering all of his things, his long-ago finished coffee, and hurried out to meet him.

"Was it okay?"

Johnny looked withdrawn. Thoughtful.

Daniel moved closer, moving into Johnny's space.

"Can we-"

"Yes. Anything," Daniel said quickly.

Johnny smiled softly, it wasn't very big. He looked tired.

"-go to the beach?" he asked.

"I can make that happen," Daniel said with a grin.

He spun on his heels hopping into the Ford.

He wondered if Johnny wanted to take a nap.

Would they have to get an apartment within walking distance of the beach? That'd be expensive. He'd have to save up. But it'd be nice.

Except during hurricanes, or storms, or if it was in a flood zone. Maybe Tommy could tell him the dangers of owning a beach house.

He held out his hand out to Johnny while he drove, Johnny took it, holding on a little tighter.

He was quiet, looking at the window at the palm trees they passed.

Daniel found a parking lot wondering if Johnny wanted to sit, go for a swim, a walk. He wasn't sure. Would Johnny just run straight into the water? It was the middle of the afternoon but he wondered if he could talk Johnny into going skinny dipping. That would be fun. If only there weren't people around.

Johnny got out and was stretching. Was he going to go for a run?

Daniel followed him down into the sand.

Johnny took off his shoes and socks and rolled his pant legs up and walked into the water, not deep, but just standing at where the water crashed around his ankles.

Daniel stood next to him, looking out at the water.

He should put a blanket in the ford. Some towels. With how much Johnny liked the beach, maybe instead of having a picnic they could do something else on the beach. Not here though, too many people, but if he could find a secluded beach, after skinny dipping it'd be fairly easy to get warmed up again together.

Pay attention, Daniel.

Daniel looked at Johnny.

"Was it bad?" he asked

Johnny ran a hand through his hair with a sigh.

"Just a lot of talking. They want me to come back tomorrow and talk more. I'm tired of talking."

Daniel nodded hooking his arm through Johnny's.

"Want me to bring you tomorrow? I still have plenty of stuff to read. It's all legal jargon. And all sorts of city policies and guidelines."

Johnny nodded.

Daniel wasn't sure whether he should just stand there next to Johnny or talk. He tried not talking. But his brain kept thinking of which kind of blanket was the most comfortable and how maybe he should also make sure to bring sunblock unless it was at night.

But what if it got too cold?

It was safer to talk about the boring stuff he read. So he told Johnny about all the boring stuff he'd read. Trying to make it as interesting as possible, but it was mostly complaining.

After a while, when Daniel thought his legs were getting tired Johnny shifted and Daniel let the words on his lips die.

"I know my mom doesn't want me to know what's happening," Johnny said softly. "She likes to handle things by herself. But she gave me a graduation bouquet and I've been going over it in my head, there were four parts that were weird. Patience in adversity, powerful against evil, courage, and a declaration of war," Johnny rolled his shoulders back in a motion so similar to his mother. Like he was preparing for something awful. "I know she's asked you not to tell me. That's fine. But can you answer one question for me?"

"I'll try," Daniel said softly.

"Is she sick?" Johnny asked voice barely a whisper. "Is...is she dying?"

Daniel grabbed Johnny's arm and spun him so they were facing one another and looked him in the eyes.

"That's two questions and no to both of them. She's-she's just working on a big project. Okay? Several projects it sounds like. Because she's a strong busy lady. She wants to tell you about it herself when the time is right."

Johnny nodded looking up and away blinking and palming at his eyes, letting out a deep breath. Daniel wrapped his arms around Johnny holding him close.

"Everything is fine. What she's doing isn't easy. But she's healthy. It's nothing for you to worry about okay?"

Johnny's arms wrapped around him and Daniel felt Johnny curl around him.

"Just give her some time okay?"

He felt Johnny nod. He rubbed Johnny's back.

"We're not by chance anywhere near that favorite taco shop are we?" Daniel asked.

Daniel felt a puff of warm air, an amused sound followed by a soft, "Yeah."

He didn't let go until Johnny did. And it wasn't for a while, with Johnny holding onto him and the water breaking over their feet and ankles.

When he did let go Daniel took his hand. "Lead me to your favorite taco shop."

Johnny nodded scooping up his shoes with his free hand

Daniel was glad he wore flip flops, a habit from Okinawa, but his shoes stuck a little in the wet sand and he nearly lost one. Johnny laughed softly as Daniel hopped around, windmilling but not falling, leaning against Johnny before turning and catching his shoe before it floated away. Johnny put his own shoes back on in a much easier fashion.

They walked down the sidewalk a couple of blocks to a little shop, a tiny hole in the wall that Daniel wouldn't have ever noticed.

There was only one little old lady working. She was tiny. Smaller than Daniel. She lit up when they walked in. It smelled amazing and the walls were colorful with large paintings on the walls.

She walked around the counter and held up her hands to Johnny patting his face in her hands and speaking slowly in Spanish. Johnny laughed and responded. Daniel heard his name and she smiled nodding her head to him. She asked Johnny something and he nodded and began listing things off.

Daniel heard tacos. That was the only thing he recognized.

She nodded and then walked into the back.

Johnny turned to Daniel and motioned to a table.

Daniel hooked his legs around Johnny's when they took their seats. Johnny glanced at him and Daniel grinned. After a while, she brought them their food. Two glasses of milk and plates of tacos.

"Gracias," Daniel said with a smile.

Daniel took a sip of his drink. It wasn't milk. It was sweet and cinnamony

"Horchata," Johnny explained. He pointed towards the large plate of tacos between them. "Pork carnitas, tacos de Suadero, tacos al Pastor," he said pointing to each as he went. "sour cream, rice, guacamole, beans, and nopales salad."

"Okay, I got most of that, what's nopales?"

"Cactus," Johnny said. "She had to show me to figure out what it was. It's good. All of it's good. Everything on the menu."

Daniel laughed, "Of course everything's good, you found a grandma. Their cooking is always the best."

Johnny nodded warmly.

It wasn't neat. It was messy. But it was delicious.

Daniel wondered how many other little hidden gems Johnny had. Between this and the carhop, it seemed like he kept them to himself, a collection of well-loved places he felt safe in.

He wondered how often Johnny came here. When it started. How he'd found it. The best thing he could do was ask.

"How'd you find this place?" Daniel asked before picking up his third taco and digging in.

"I was pretty little. Some kids were chasing me and I knew the safest thing to do was see if I could hide out in a shop. So I ran in here. Had a bloody nose and a black eye and she ran out and chased off the kids yelling at them in Spanish. One of the schools I went to was in this area. So I'd come here after school and sometimes before. She'd give me molletes for breakfast if I came by early and she wasn't busy. She'd give me snacks too after school, usually fruit. And then when I got an allowance and moved schools I'd still come back when I could. Took me a long time to learn how to read the actual menu and I was really bad at it for a long time. But everything she makes is amazing."

Johnny in Okinawa made more sense all of a sudden. How he'd caught on so fast how to communicate with people without knowing how to talk to them. How to utilize a few words and phrases. He looked around the shop again, taking in the art, the pictures, the colorful decorations. The elderly woman came back after a while holding a dish. She spoke to Johnny who held out his hands palm up and she smiled putting a cookie in them then turned to Daniel who quickly followed suit. The cookie was large and flat.

"Polvorones," she said slowly with a smile.

"Gracias," Daniel said.

Daniel had a large extended family. Lots of cousins, lots of aunts and uncles. Great aunts and great uncles. And it seemed at first glance that Johnny was alone. That it was just him and his mom and his awful stepfather who thankfully was getting booted soon. But Johnny collected his own family and just hadn't realized it. He didn't have grandparents but he had sought out replacements who took him in, made sure he ate the same way that Daniel's did.

Safe havens away from home to hide out from others. People who watched out for him gave him cookies and made sure he ate when he was hungry. The carhop ladies were probably like aunts for him when he was little, or big sisters. And he was sure there were more. He'd just run into trouble when trying to find a father, ending up with Kreese. But what Mrs. Lawrence had said made sense. How when Johnny let you in it became a strong bond. This was it in action.

It was like when Daniel had taken Johnny home. A chance to introduce him to part of his family. Johnny was doing the same, he just didn't realize it. Taking him to his favorite places and introducing him to his favorite people. He just didn't know he was introducing him to his adopted family. It was the same as what Daniel felt he wanted to do. And it warmed his heart.

No Responsibilities

Knowing his mother wasn't dying or sick was a relief.

He had a million questions but he could be patient. He would be patient. He'd focus on other things. Like how happy Daniel was eating good food and how shocked and delighted he was when the Abuela brought them cookies.

No matter how often Johnny tried to learn her name she laughed and squeezed his arm and said for him to call her Abuela.

He'd met some of her family before. Her sons and daughters brought her grandkids by at least several times a week. He'd known them better when he was little. The grandkids had been older than him but had been the only nice kids he'd known at the time. Taught him to skateboard outside the shop. He was pretty sure they were finishing up college soon. Abuela was very proud of them, usually showed Johnny pictures, the most recent ones.

And yup, there she went to go get the photos to give him updates on her family. He looked over the photos and smiled listening.

Daniel leaned forward curious and she seemed delighted in his interest.

Johnny's Spanish wasn't great, but it sounded like the eldest had decided to pursue her masters. Johnny couldn't figure out what she was studying but Abuela looked proud.

She clapped her hands with thought and went back into the back of the shop and came out with a bag full of tamales.

She always did that, ever since he was small. Sent him out with tamales. Extras she said. Leftovers she couldn't sell. Even when Johnny tried to pay for those she swatted at his hands. She only ever let him pay for tacos. Never the cookies she made. Those weren't on the menu.

So when he had money he used Jimmy to find out who her suppliers were and tried to get her the best deals he could. Paid for as much as he could in advance. Jimmy hadn't ever been in the shop but had written the address down on a list, had worked with him to make sure her soda in the fridges always came with at least a crate that was free. That it was all dirt cheap. Because he didn't want her to get suspicious. The price never rose.

At one point he'd thought about trying to buy the lot and gift it to her when her son mentioned that she still rented, but it was too expensive. And no one would sell it to him because he'd been a kid, a minor. And now that he was nearly 18 he was out of money.

She smiled warmly at the two of them as she pressed the bag of tamales into Daniel's hands and Johnny paid.

It was kind of like a game of who could make everything cheaper for the other. She always made the food so cheap for him, so he tried to make everything else cheaper for her. He wished he could keep doing that. Maybe again someday. But it sounded like everything was going well. That all her kids and grandkids were doing well. Happy. It was a relief. That, someone, was doing well and happy who deserved it.

When they left the shop Daniel took Johnny's hand and held up the bag. "So what's this?"

"I think she thinks I still don't eat enough or have enough to eat, so she always sends me home with tamales."

He'd tried to tell her he was okay a million times. Tried to tell her that he lived in the Hills now and could pay for the food. But she would ignore him. It was like the Spanish he knew was suddenly broken. He'd even asked one of the librarians who was bilingual for help and he'd memorized the phrase and she still ignored him. Still gave him tamales.

Daniel laughed softly. "Sounds like a grandmother's love."

"It's frustrating, I want to make sure she's making money, and she's given me so much free food. It helped a lot when I was little. But I'm not starving anymore. And she won't let me help. Unless it's to get something that's too high. I tried to help her carry in a supply of sodas because it was heavy and she shooed me away and gave me a cookie. Made her son do it."

"Poor guy, couldn't show off your muscles," Daniel teased.

"Did you like it?" Johnny asked.

He knew Daniel had, but he wanted to hear it. It'd been on his face. But he wanted to ask anyway. Wanted to point out that he also knew good places. And wanted confirmation that it was the best.

"It was delicious," Daniel said warmly. "And I can't wait to try these. But I'm too full."

Johnny smiled. Daniel had talked during their meal about the stuff he was reading, a continuation of the conversation from before, and the list of questions he was making for the guys and all the things he didn't understand and all the things he did understand.

"Did Mr. Miyagi leave us anything to do?" Johnny asked.

"I didn't see any notes," Daniel said.

"What do you want to do then? We don't have any responsibilities, or plans, or anything we have to do as far as I know."

Daniel stopped walking and Johnny stopped a split second after, turning to look back at him. His eyes were wide.

"We don't! We've been so busy forever, there have always been things to do, but the guys are all busy today and Mr. Miyagi can easily spend all day fishing. Ma's in Jersey. We don't have school or homework. I'm not going to college so I don't have to prep for that."

Johnny nodded.

"I haven't been contacted to babysit or go to the animal sanctuary."

Daniel looked thoughtful like it was a huge decision. Like there were a lot of things he wanted to do, a million of them or so and he had to pick the best one. They'd done a lot of stuff during the year with the guys, but there was still a lot they hadn't. There was still plenty more to see and do.

They hadn't really asked Daniel what he wanted to do now that Johnny thought about it. Just created a fun itinerary under an assumption. And some of it had paid off.

Daniel had loved going to the mountains. Had loved going to different sports games. The one concert they'd all gone to see. He'd loved Golf 'n Stuff's water park on prom night, swimming in the lake.

It really looked like he was going through a mental list, trying to make a choice, comparing them all, struggling to pick the one he wanted to right then and there.

"Okay," Daniel said glancing at his watch. "How about-wait no-damn-okay- yes okay, I haven't seen the pier yet...no, wait that's the same as Coney Island right? Kind of? Fuck. Uh, oh! I know, hiking. Let's go hiking."

Johnny looked down at Daniel's flip-flops with an amused smile, "We'll have to stop by Mr. Miyagi's first."

"Okay, easy," Daniel said. "Mr. Miyagi's and then hiking."

Daniel turned to pull Johnny along.

"That works out, we can put the tamales away, do they go in the fridge? Freezer? Think Mr. Miyagi will like them? We can eat them for dinner. How do you reheat them? We'll change, grab some water and snacks and go hiking. Are there a lot of trails? Ma said it was like a popular thing her coworkers did on the weekend. So there's got to be a lot of them right?"

He was excited and it was infectious. They hadn't gotten a chance to go on a real date before. Johnny supposed they'd kind of gone on dates. But the guys were usually around, or Kumiko. It seemed weird to count them as dates. And after a month of technically dating, they hadn't really been on a date.

He knew which trail he wanted to go on. One with a good view. He had a good idea of an end goal that Daniel would like. Or he hoped he would. But he was curious now.

"Do you have a list of things you want to do?"

Daniel was walking ahead of him like he was in a hurry, pulling him along. He paused turning back.

"So many things," he said with a playful grin.

Johnny wondered if they could spend the days the guys were busy going to these places Daniel wanted to go to. They'd have to budget. Daniel wanted to buy and start a shop for Mr. Miyagi and Johnny had made money in Okinawa, but it wouldn't last forever. And this moment, while they were both free without responsibilities, was precious.

He didn't know if they'd have a chance like it again. The space in time before Daniel opened the shop and gifted it to Mr. Miyagi and before they'd have to get jobs of some kind or go to school. There were plenty of free things to do if Johnny thought about it. He'd only done free things when he was younger. Going with his mom on the few days she had off. But he didn't know what was on Daniel's list.

"You'll have to write it down," Johnny said. "We can budget and make a plan."

He sounded like Tommy. What the hell. Planning? Tommy would be proud though. Maybe they could write the free ones down and put them into a bowl or something and on days where they were free, they could pull one out of the jar. A date jar. Maybe that was too sappy.

Daniel's hand tightened around his, moving faster towards the Ford.

They had enough time.

It was just going to be hot out.

Sunny.

They should grab hats and sunglasses.

Johnny thought he had a pair in the glove box of his Avanti.

Daniel was talking about some family member who hiked a lot. How there were long trails you could do through the mountains. How this cousin took like half a year off to hike from Georgia to Maine. He was tapping his fingers on the steering wheel trying to think.

Appalachian trail was what it was called. Telling Johnny that it was over 2,000 miles.

Maybe that should've been part of Johnny's escape plan. He could've just gone hiking and disappeared on the trails for like half a year. He knew California was part of the PCT. He could've gotten on the trail and hiked north and then when he found some town he liked just move in there.

It would've meant leaving the Avanti behind though, which he couldn't have done. Though he might've had to if he'd run away to the woods.

Daniel was talking about how this cousin had talked them all into hiking around Jersey and how getting all the LaRusso's in one spot was a feat, and trying to get them to hike was kind of hilarious. How he'd found his uncles playing a card game on the trail having gotten too tired to continue on and drinking. How they'd made him promise not to tell his aunts. Only to find his aunts sitting by a stream chatting away and drinking from a shared bottle of wine. Laughing and telling him not to tell his uncles.

Almost no one finished the trail but the one cousin. Daniel had tried really hard but he'd tripped and skinned his knee and his Mom had made him stop so she could bandage it up and sent him back to the car.

He was talking with one of his hands, the other on the wheel as he drove them back to Mr. Miyagi's.

The truck was still gone. Mr. Miyagi was still out fishing. The guy's cars weren't there either.

It was kind of weird being there without Mr. Miyagi being there.

On their own.

It was quiet, but it was too quiet.

Mr. Miyagi was a quiet man, but he hummed and sometimes he sang and Johnny sometimes could hear him moving around. But he wasn't there.

Daniel was talking still on the walk into the house, walking backward talking excitedly, moving on from family hiking trips to snacks they could take.

He was talking about grapes he'd seen in the fridge. Maybe a nice snack. He wasn't hungry though.

Just like Johnny expected Daniel went down, flip-flops being his downfall. He'd been walking as close as he could and reached out to catch him.

"You know, I already know you like me, you don't have to keep falling for me," Johnny said with a smile.

Daniel was looking up at him eyes wide, shocked he'd tripped and Johnny watched him blush and then laugh. "You know I was going to tease you about the same thing."

"Me? I don't fall that much."

"You lose your balance often enough around me."

Johnny leaned down towards Daniel who hadn't tried to right himself yet.

"Maybe we just keep falling for each other?"

Daniel smiled, reaching his arms up and hooking them around Johnny's neck.

"It would seem so," he said softly meeting him in a kiss.

It was an unhurried, slow, languid kiss.

Everything was always so hectic. Everything always felt busy.

They had things they wanted to do that day but there wasn't a rush. No one was waiting for them.

It was almost the kind of slow kiss that Daniel seemed to like to give him in the mornings.

Johnny knew he used to wake up first, but he hadn't in a long while. It was like he'd been trained out of it. That by having Daniel close so much had led to him having fewer nightmares, fewer sleepless nights. That they woke up around the same time.

They could laze in bed for a few extra moments and it always felt so decadent after always being in a hurry, always having to be aware of his surroundings, of sleeping so lightly, ready for anything, ready to grab his walkman and jump out the window to not be found.

Johnny didn't want to go back. He wanted to stay in Daniel's bed, in his room, to keep kissing him nice and slow in the mornings, in the afternoons, in the evenings, whenever.

His mother had asked if he knew what he wanted, she meant as a job, a plan for the future.

And he'd never really let himself think about what he wanted, just good places to hide where he wouldn't be found.

He didn't want much. All he wanted was currently in his arms, kissing him back, and he didn't know how to tell her that there was nothing else he wanted. That he already had it.

Daniel pulled away first even though he didn't want to.

He did want to go hiking.

Though staying home and spending time with Johnny also was something he wanted to do.

He liked the way Johnny never seemed ready to stop, seemed disappointed whenever he pulled away. Like Johnny could easily spend all day like that without getting tired.

It'd be a fun thing to test out someday. It made him tempted to not go hiking. To just spend the day in their room.

But they'd made plans.

He wanted to see which hiking trail Johnny had in mind.

He smiled warmly at Johnny. And turned so that he could go get ready. Had to change his shoes at least.

He knew Johnny hadn't caught his flirting teasing. Knew he was thinking dates.

So Daniel would make two lists. He'd write down the date list, the places he wanted to go.

And he'd keep the other one in his head. He didn't want anyone to find that one. He'd seen Dutch open the drawer to his desk to get a pen and look at him pointedly. A damn Daniel you got enough photos of Johnny? The answer was no.

But Dutch had brought a packet of photos fresh from the printers and added them to the drawer.

Daniel hadn't gotten a chance to look because he didn't want anyone else to look in the drawer.

He'd have to look later. If the guys came by again then he'd be out of luck, but he could look while Johnny showered that night.

Before he went to their room he dropped the tamales off in the fridge.

He wondered if Johnny even realized that he'd been adopted by that grandmother. It sounded like he hadn't. She'd even brought out photos to show them the rest of the family. It was so sweet.

He finished getting ready quickly and met Johnny at the Avanti. Johnny drove and Daniel armed with a notebook and pen went to work making a list.

- Dancing
- Santa Monica Pier
- Angeles National Forest
- Drive-in Theater
- Runyon Canyon
- Cooking-make one of Ma's recipes

He chewed on his bottom lip thoughtfully.

They'd already been to Dodgers Stadium with the guys. He wanted to do something else sporty.

He'd liked skating in Central Park.

He kind of missed competing against Johnny. He thought maybe Johnny thought Daniel was a little fragile. Worried he'd break him if they played a game or competed. Essentially went from one extreme to the other. But he kind of hoped after the deathmatch in Okinawa and breaking the ice that may be Johnny realized that Daniel could take him. That the tournament wasn't a fluke.

- Bike on a trail
- Spar
- Surfing

Sparing was a big one. He wanted to see how they compared to one another now. After Johnny had been training under Mr. Miyagi.

It wasn't a date, but he wanted to make it a date.

Maybe sparing as a date was weird.

Maybe it belonged on the mental list. He thought about erasing it. It was becoming a to-do list and not a date list. He was half tempted to make a to-do list and just sneak Johnny's name on there. See if he'd even notice.

He wasn't even sure if Johnny had a bike. The guys had left Daniel's Mongoose parked next to Mr. Miyagi's house when they moved all of his stuff from South Seas. But Johnny's things were all at the mansion and that was currently a no-go zone.

It'd be fun to go for a ride on his Honda XL 600R but who knew if that was still in one piece since Sid was cornered? Who knew what of Johnny's stuff was still in one piece?

Daniel had wanted to do so much related to the mansion. He'd wanted to go through Johnny's closet to look at the fancy expensive suits. See what the options were. Wanted to see the trophies that hadn't been out any time he visited. He knew Johnny had them. But he didn't know where they were. He didn't think Sid would destroy trophies. But he didn't actually know.

He wanted to take a closer look at the books on his shelf. To go through all the music, listen to as much as he could. Figure out where their tastes overlapped.

Johnny had brought some to Okinawa. It hadn't just been a language tape.

He wanted to drive Johnny's bike. Wanted to swim in the pool. But Sid poisoned the whole place. All the normal things Daniel wanted to do, explore, and just get to know Johnny from his room, just weren't possible because of Sid.

- Swimming
- Day trips to other cities
- picnic

He wanted it to be more than day trips. Wanted to stay somewhere nice and explore other cities, just the two of them. But budgeting was going to be a problem.

There was more he wanted to do but he couldn't think of them all. It'd just have to be a work in progress list.

He wanted to go dancing a lot.

Wanted to go back to the carhop just the two of them.

Johnny parked the Avanti and Daniel looked around. He spotted a sign for Griffith Park.

Daniel turned back and Johnny was right there, leaning in close, eyes on the notebook, reading through the list.

"I can borrow Bobby's bike," Johnny said. "There's a lot of trails and places to bike. It's mostly free. If you like it we can do it frequently."

Daniel lifted Johnny's chin, if he was going to sneak up, that close without warning then Daniel was going to quell the shock that'd run through him with a kiss. A little revenge as he pulled away and licked his lips with a grin.

"Sounds fun," Daniel said turning and pushing the door of the Avanti open and stretching, ready to go hiking. He turned.

Johnny seemed to be frozen in the spot Daniel had left him. He grinned, leaning over the car door and kissing him again.

"Hiking. Don't have to really think Johnny, just got to move," he said with a teasing smile.

It took Johnny a moment like he had to restart his brain, but he locked up and led the way to the trail.

Daniel tried to explain the list. Tried to come up with excuses for sparring being on the list. Tried to list all the reasons why they should do it. Sparring.

It'd be like dancing but competitive and fun.

They hadn't really sparred much.

And now they had the same sensei.

They could see if there were differences in how they'd learned.

See what Johnny's background brought to the table.

He tried to make it sound romantic and not something Daniel thought would be hot. Tried desperately to underplay it and explain it, circling around trying to make points that didn't give himself away.

It'd be like biking or surfing or dancing or playing soccer with the guys. Just fun and sporty. They were sporty guys. It just made sense. Right?

Or had he lost his mind because the thought of sparring with Johnny sent blood rushing in the wrong direction. Of trying to pin him to the mat or the dojo floor or the grass or sand or wherever they did it made him lose track of whatever he was saying.

If they weren't fighting, they could make it fun. Maybe too fun. Maybe karate wasn't supposed to be fun in that way. But Daniel wanted to try.

They reached a clearing. He was nervous.

Would it be bad or good if Johnny saw through him?

Was it weird?

Johnny usually couldn't see through him. Usually, it seemed like it missed the mark most of the time.

"Okay," Johnny said.

Okay. OKAY? Sparing could be a date.

Daniel was delighted.

Johnny had stopped walking and Daniel was studying him, heart pounding.

It was going to be a total misuse of karate. Not for defense. He could never ever tell Mr. Miyagi. Though maybe-no. Never.

Johnny turned back to him and smiled.

He was so fucking lucky.

He took Johnny's hand.

"Well, what do you think?" Johnny asked.

Daniel blinked and took in the view. He could see LA, the Hollywood sign, the view encompassed a lot and Johnny looked pleased. The sun was getting lower in the sky. The sunset would be beautiful soon.

He hadn't seen much of the Hollywood sign. He'd seen it, driven past it, and seen it in the distance, but this view was better.

He looked back, Johnny was watching him with a warm smile.

"It's pretty," Daniel said softly. Surprised.

He wasn't sure what he'd expected Johnny to pick when he suggested hiking. But beautiful city views and the Hollywood sign weren't amongst them.

Johnny nodded and turned continuing on the path.

He wondered if sparring didn't seem weird to Johnny because he also studied karate. If that was a given. In which case the other one that might've been showing too much of his hand was the drive-in.

Couples didn't usually go to drive-ins to watch the film. Not usually. Usually, it was...for more. But that one was so normal that he doubted it was a problem. And he should've just been happy that Johnny was willing to spar for fun.

The sun was setting, turning the skies brilliant pinks and purples when they stopped again.

Daniel knew to take the view in again, and it was breathtaking.

Another gorgeous view of everything.

Johnny then turned. There was a large building that Daniel had seen several times but never had fully taken in. They both walked in and Daniel was surprised they didn't have to pay, following Johnny to join a line.

"There's always a free presentation," Johnny said with a smile.

Of what Daniel wondered, he must've missed the signs. Missed all the clues too focused on daydreaming of sparring. But then the doors opened and he found himself looking at a large telescope in a big room.

A staff member came out and explained the Zeiss telescope and the other ones the observatory had available for guests to see. They explained how a refracting telescope worked and how it weighed over 9,000 pounds or 4082 kilograms. Daniel just stared at it. It was massive. And the ceiling was open, he could see the sky above as the sky darkened.

They got to look through it and Daniel had never gotten to look through such a high-powered telescope. Had never seen the moon like that or the stars.

He was speechless for a moment. He'd thought the stars were beautiful in Okinawa and that in LA you couldn't see them at all. But it seemed he just hadn't been aware that there was a spot to see them up close.

After the presentation, they wandered through the exhibits, sat for the planetarium show. After exploring every inch they walked back to the car.

Daniel talking about the stars and all the things he thought were cool on the way back, holding Johnny's hand, excited.

Without a doubt that was a date. A good date. Perfect surprises. Perfect views. Daniel was excited for the rest of them. He'd keep adding to the list. Trade it with Johnny so he could add all these little things he knew that Daniel didn't know were available.

They fell into a simple routine.

Slow mornings, notes from Mr. Miyagi that he'd gone fishing, and Daniel would drive Johnny to the place that wanted him to just talk, then they'd go somewhere for lunch. Frequenting the beach so Johnny could just re-center himself after a morning of talking so much which meant tacos, which meant hiking and then coming home to have dinner with Mr. Miyagi and to hear about the fish he'd caught. They ate a lot of fish for dinner.

It was nice. And then life caught up with them.

Johnny didn't have to go talk anymore but the parents of the kids he babysat asked if he could watch them for the day.

Daniel didn't know what he was going to do for the day alone, but he noticed Mr. Miyagi hadn't left to go fishing, had put on a tan suit after Johnny had left, and had a frown on his face.

The guys showed up. More suits. They looked tired.

"Johnny-san babysitting," Mr. Miyagi said when they arrived, pouring coffee for them.

"Oh good," Bobby said.

"Is something happening?" Daniel asked.

"The judge is announcing her decision today," Jimmy said running a hand through his hair with a sigh.

"You can come too if you want. She just wanted to listen to Johnny's statement. It was the last part."

"He made a statement? When?" Daniel hadn't left Johnny alone since they'd gotten home.

"They had someone sit down with him and collect statements on his life in the mansion with Sid. His relationship with his Mom," Tommy said softly.

"We've sat through everything else, we're going to sit through this too. We're going to-"

"Have no fear?" Bobby asked with a melancholy amused smile.

"Shit, no, all the fear. The guys a piece of work. I'd rather beat the shit out of him, but Mrs. Lawrence wanted to go through everything through the legal channels so this is how we're doing this," Dutch said with a frown.

"Anyway, if you want to come you can. But it's not necessary. It's not a pleasant thing. It hasn't been since the start. It's been vile but this is finally the end," Jimmy said.

"Okay, is there a dress code?" Daniel said looking at them.

"Anything nice should be fine. A button-up. A suit is unnecessary, we just- it looks better for Mrs. Lawrence."

Daniel nodded turning to go change. A button-up with a blazer and slacks, his black shoes. Worrying his lower lip as he got ready.

"You can ride with me if you want," Bobby said. "Mr. Miyagi's coming with me too."

Daniel nodded follow him and watching the other car head out with Jimmy driving Tommy and Dutch.

"You okay?" Daniel asked.

"Hmm? Oh, me? Yeah. Er. No. We're all kind of pissed off. And it's hard to know what to do with it. Before we would've just gone to karate and got it all out. Or, I guess we took it out on you too. But this is...it's so much worse than anything we were angry about before. Like I knew something was bad. Like things were wrong. I just, I thought she knew you know? She said she'd only seen him yell at Johnny once and she put Sid in his place immediately. Threatened to leave on the spot. He apologized and said he'd never do it again. It seems like he just hid it after that. Pretended to just be strict. She didn't know about the staff, or all the stuff he said to Johnny or all the violence," Bobby said, his hands tightening around the steering wheel. "We knew something was wrong but not how bad. We smelled the smoke but Johnny always brushed it off so we didn't investigate for the fire. We spent the night thinking we could catch if something was really wrong and we never did. I should've tried harder. I mean I've failed him twice now. Sid and Kreese. I couldn't stop either of them."

"Bobby-san not responsible for bad man's actions," Mr. Miyagi said gently from the back. "Good friend. Keep friend afloat in storm."

Bobby blinked rapidly, looking up.

"Thanks Mr. Miyagi."

He sighed after a while.

"There's so much I learned. I hadn't known that before Sid they were homeless. That the florist she worked at originally when she had Johnny was this sweet old couple who treated her like their kid, treated Johnny like their grandkid. Wanted them to take over, make it a family business. They were his godparents, but then they died suddenly. She'd tried to keep it going but the funeral expenses ate up everything. The shop had to close and it just domino affected everything else."

Bobby shook his head and let out a soft humorless laugh.

"I found out that apparently, my parents are now Johnny's godparents. She's been absolutely terrified of something happening and leaving Johnny alone. Like she didn't have many people to trust with that responsibility until he was like 12 or 13 and it was my parents. I didn't know my parents hung out with her, or ever even talked to her. I mean they went to benefits or whatever but they never mentioned it. And that's the thing I learned. She's just like Johnny. You could never know just by looking at her all the shit she's been through. She hides everything so well. They're both frighteningly good at it."

"Where's she been staying?" Daniel asked softly.

"She was going to stay at a hotel. But she's been staying with us. Which turned into this stupid whole thing when all of our, the guys and my, guardians were in one spot. Jimmy's parents wanted to know why she wasn't crashing with them, reminding her they had more space. And Tommy's aunt and uncle reminded her of the beach house. And like I didn't even know they all knew each other. Let alone the fact that she meets them for brunch. Even Dutch's parents, who hate everyone and I almost never ever see wanted her to stay with them. I've never seen so many adults fall over one another to try and be more accommodating.

"She picked my place because while you guys were in Okinawa that's where Johnny called. So you guys would call I'd relay it to her and the guys. And if I was busy because we were planning or something one of the other guys would stay and watch the phone. She didn't want to confuse him if she answered. And sometimes we had to be at the courthouse. So it fluctuated who was on phone duty.

"Also living with her was interesting. She seems very...what you'd expect an Encino Hills lady to be like right? Designer head to toe, but it's all learned, all trained, just like Johnny. My little siblings loved her because she didn't care that my little sister wanted to do her makeup and god, my little sister does not know how to do make-up at all. And my little brother thought that looked like fun and tried doing her hair. And she just told them that it was fabulous. It was sincere.

"She didn't worry about food, we eat junk food because Mom and Dad are always baking they have no time or energy or desire to cook and she cooked. A little. And didn't complain about the amount of junk food we ate or had around the house. It wasn't a need for some organic anything. No special diet.

"She was so busy but she like kept checking in on me. And the guys. Every day we showed up she said we didn't have to be there, that she knew we cared an awful lot and didn't have to sit through this. She did most of the leg work. Most of the calling. Most of the collecting witnesses and people to attest to whatever they could. The sleuthing. Tommy legit was in awe and still is. Keeps talking about what a great detective she could be. But he likes those. Detective novels and comics. And every time Sid opened his damn mouth we wanted to hit him. We had to distract ourselves. Because it was like a full-time job to keep ourselves in our seats. Especially Dutch.

"I ended up starting the sticker thing because we needed a reward for the bare minimum of just staying in our damn seats. Like every time Sid said some bullshit, we didn't try to get up? Great we each get a sticker. And then it just kept going. I've got so many stickers in my pocket now. The stationary store thinks I'm a teacher's assistant or something for a kindergarten or preschool. I don't know how to tell them I'm trying to keep four teenage boys, myself included, from running across a courtroom and straight-up murdering some evil Hollywood monster before the law takes over. I'm rambling, sorry."

Daniel shook his head. "It sounds like a lot."

"Yeah," Bobby said. "I mean it's not like you all had a better time in the beginning in Okinawa."

"It got better," Daniel said softly.

"I can't believe how quickly he went from thinking we weren't interested in you guys anymore. Like he must've thought we weren't happy for him anymore. He just accepted it. And I fucking missed it. Didn't even notice."

"You've had a lot on your plate," Daniel said.

"At least I have a plate. Johnny's just been catching scalding liquid with his bare hands without a complaint or a word for years. Since kindergarten. We saw his school record. He changed schools all the fucking time. Like no wonder when we floated the idea of all going to high school together he jumped on it," Bobby sighed pulling into the parking lot.

Daniel followed him out of the car. He crossed to where Bobby stood and pulled him into a hug. "You are his best friend and being there, just being there, does him so much good."

"I still feel like such a failure of a best friend."

"Bobby, you got your own shit going on," Daniel said. "This wasn't your job, you've done great."

"He's right," Dutch said and Daniel felt him join the hug and the other guys after they got out of their car. "This has been hell. But man, did you see how comfortable Johnny's been since he got back from Okinawa? He's going to be okay. You gotta give yourself some slack. I mean you're the one holding us together man."

"But Jimmy is doing all the hard work."

Jimmy laughed softly. "I'm a gopher. This would be so much worse without you guys helping. I've been debating asking you all to just check on me when I'm in the courtrooms just from time to time. Just like a confidence boost that y'all are around and I'm not going to lose it because I'm not the only one pissed off."

"Besides the stickers really help," Tommy said warmly. "And all the baked goods you bring. I've eaten so many cupcakes and cookies with my coffee on our breaks. It's like the only part of the day I look forward to."

"Not even when Ali came?" Dutch teased.

"Oh hell no, that was brutal," Tommy whispered.

"You guys held hands though," Dutch said.

"Yeah, I've also held your guy's hands during this whole thing because it's fucking awful," Tommy said.

"He has a point," Jimmy said. "Let's go see this through huh?"

Jimmy said that but the guys didn't budge.

"We'll do something fun after," Daniel suggested. "I could make dinner."

"Yesssss," Dutch said.

"That would be nice," Bobby agreed.

And they broke apart like all they'd needed was something to look forward to.

"Boys ready? Remember," Mr. Miyagi said, "Breathe. Very important. Breathe."

"Yes, Mr. Miyagi," came as a group response.

Mr. Miyagi smiled and followed them into the building.

Daniel hadn't been into a courthouse before. Just seen them on TV. In some of the dramas his mother watched.

He sat with the guys and Mr. Miyagi while they waited.

He saw Sid on the other side of the room.

Saw how he had a smug look on his face.

Looked confident and unworried.

Mrs. Lawrence was there as well. Shoulders back, head held high, her lawyer talking to her softly.

The judge came out and spoke.

Bobby grabbed Daniel's hand. The guys were pale.

Daniel thought it had to be obvious who would win.

Laura was Johnny's mother, not Sid's kid and Sid was abusive.

The system couldn't be that blind right?

But they looked like they were so damn worried as she spoke. As she discussed the evidence she'd gone over.

The number of witnesses that she talked about was intense.

It sounded like anyone who cared about Johnny had shown up to talk about him, not just the guys and Mr. Miyagi.

Teachers had come, librarians, Ali, the guys' parents and family who knew him, people whose names Daniel didn't recognize.

All taking time out of their summer to go through the grueling task of talking about Mrs. Lawrence and her son.

Painting a better picture for the judge to understand the situation.

He wondered if it was because Sid looked so smug. Because he didn't look like he had any remorse, any fear.

Or maybe they knew something he didn't know. Maybe he was more powerful than Daniel thought.

She spoke about listening to Johnny's statement. How she was thinking that due to the neglect, whether or not someone else should be caring for him.

Sid looked too damn smug.

Was this why?

Instead of keeping Johnny himself, he'd make it so that Laura wouldn't get to keep him either?

Even with only a month left? How petty.

She kept talking about Mr. Miyagi taking care of the boy and how such an honorable war veteran was arguably the best choice. But with only a month left she'd let Laura decide if he lived with her or Mr. Miyagi.

Daniel wanted to hop up and cheer, but Bobby's hand tightened around his and he shook his head. They weren't holding hands for just comfort, but to keep each other in line, from jumping up. From speaking. From vaulting over the seats and running full sprints at Sid to see how much damage they could do before someone pulled them off.

Mr. Miyagi stood and said he would accept responsibility for Johnny if wished before sitting back down.

The judge nodded and made a note. Then she moved some papers and began listing off things.

Property, the mansion, the land on it, the cars, the art, the amount of money Sid had, every single thing worth anything was listed off.

She gave a date and turned her head to Sid.

"Generally these are several different cases. But I've been given permission to make a decision on all of them," she said. "Divorce and child custody is usually family court, while abuse goes under a criminal court judge. But because there's one month, we're making all decisions now. Mr. Weinburg your divorce has been decided upon. You will pay emotional damages, the mansion and land and half the art, half the cars, and half of your finances will go to Mrs. Lawrence. For the rest of your things, you will have a third party go to collect them and put them into storage for you. You will partake in a 52-week batterer intervention program, will take part in substance abuse and anger management programs. Under California Penal Code 273d and 273a for abuse and endangerment, and the fact you seem to have absolutely no remorse for your actions I've decided to go with the maximum I'm allowed to. The numerous cases of visible injuries you did on purpose and the additional medical files I've gone over and witness statements are by no means anywhere close to the normal discipline of a child. These were the willful choices you made. The maximum sentence is a felony Mr. Weinburg, and time in state prison for 6 years. During which time you will attend these aforementioned classes and programs."

She kept talking but Daniel stopped listening as Bobby's hand was practically crushing his.

He patted Bobby's hand gently with his other free hand and that got it to release a little.

He glanced at Sid again. He was turning so angry red that he was nearly purpling.

He was shouting at the judge, at Laura that she'd still be on the damn streets if he hadn't taken her in.

His lawyer was trying to calm him down but Sid punched the lawyer in the face.

Guards had to get him and restrain him.

The judge sighed. "I'll add that to the list. You're already digging yourself pretty deep there Mr. Weinburg. Keep going if you want. I can just add to your sentence."

He spluttered, shouting at her and she nodded, looking bored taking notes.

"When you calm down sir I'll let you know your revised sentence. Please note it's going up, not down. Everyone else you're dismissed. I'll get you the proper paperwork so you can get on with your life Ms. Lawrence."

Ms. Lawrence and her lawyer stood and walked out of the courtroom, she glanced at the boys and gave them a small smile and they quickly got up with Mr. Miyagi and left as well.

Daniel stood down the hall with the guys and Mr. Miyagi. Jimmy sunk to the floor with a groan.

"That's one that's finally over."

Bobby pulled out a packet of stickers and stuck it onto Jimmy's suit. "Good job. Hang in there. You're doing very well. You just got to find whoever actually owns Cobra Kai and then hopefully you'll be done."

Jimmy laughed, it was dry and humorless. "Guy's a ghost. I thought I had a clue but the DA I wanted to talk with but he stopped taking my calls."

Bobby gave him a second sticker then turned to Tommy. "You didn't cry this time. Good job."

Tommy looked down at the sticker on his jacket. "There's still time yet," he said softly.

"Dutch you didn't even attempt to jump over the seats this time when he started cursing out the judge or Ms. Lawrence. And you didn't mutter curses under your breath the whole time. Progress."

Dutch nodded like he knew he'd been good and deserved his stickers.

Bobby turned. "You nearly got up and cheered. But you caught on. Good job." He stuck a sticker on Daniel's shirt.

Daniel nearly burst out laughing but he grabbed the stickers from Bobby instead and stuck one on him. "Good job not actually crushing my hand."

Dutch laughed grabbing the stickers as well. "And not stomping your foot on mine when I mutter."

"You didn't cry this time either," Tommy said.

"Or just break apart."

Daniel heard the sound of high heels walking towards them and turned in time to see Ms. Lawrence pulling the boys into a hug. "Thank you for all of your help. I'm sorry that you lost your summer."

"Not a problem."

"Wouldn't have spent it any other way."

"Whatever to get rid of that bastard."

"Of course Ms. Lawrence."

She laughed softly. "Well, you guys do something fun. I'm going to go get Johnny. And then next week come by the mansion if you want."

"Divorce party?" Tommy asked.

She laughed and winked. "You'll see."

She turned to Mr. Miyagi and bowed. He looked surprised and bowed back.

"Thank you for everything Mr. Miyagi. Especially bringing us lunch every day since you've gotten back."

"My pleasure Ms. Lawrence."

Chapter End Notes

The judge was given permission by me to roll everything into one case because it felt too awful to have criminal cases and the divorce and custody cases separate. Also, I didn't want to dig around too much into details of the process because it felt like it'd be too...upsetting, to figure out how one of these cases would even go. The penal codes are accurate to California law and so are some of the consequences.

The Griffith Park and observatory stuff though is accurate. :D That was more enjoyable to research.

Steady Ground

Johnny took souvenirs for the kids. Cute puzzles and toys he'd been given from the aquarium.

They loved it and were so excited to see him.

He'd taken the sanshin to play for them, see if they wanted to learn.

It was fun.

He hadn't ever thought he'd be good with kids, but he liked working with them.

Then there was a knock on the door and he went and opened it.

Their parents had come home and they smiled, welcomed him back and gave him a hug, and then motioned behind them.

His mother stood wearing a black suit dress and high heels. She smiled and was holding paperwork in her hands.

He looked around. She didn't have her car.

"They picked me up," she said waving warmly at the parents that had walked past Johnny scooping up their kids.

Johnny rushed out the doors towards her.

"Are you okay?" he asked as she held out her arms and he gave her a big hug.

"Better than ever," she said warmly smoothing down his hair. "You mind going for a drive? Maybe the beach?"

He nodded.

She smiled and sat down in the Avanti holding her stack of paper and her purse on her lap.

She was quiet for the drive, hair going wild in the wind and not even bothering to try and corral it out of her face.

She wasn't dying. Daniel had promised him that.

She wasn't sick. But she did look better. Happier. Lighter.

He parked the Avanti and she hoped out stretching and walking down the boardwalk.

"You know when you were little we'd walk past here. We'd hang out on the beach but didn't spend a lot of time actually walking through here. I always wanted to sit down in a booth and buy you lunch or dinner but you would always take one look at the menu and would say you weren't hungry. You were so perceptive and would be so stubborn. If we couldn't both eat you didn't want to. And then somehow you started bringing home food. I never understood where you got it or where you found it until recently," she held his hand and walked straight up to an ice cream shop placing an order and letting go of his hand to pay.

She turned and pressed the ice cream into his hand. Holding her own. Mint chocolate chip for her, rocky road for him. The one he always looked at as a kid but never asked for. She hooked her arms through his.

"You never complained. Ate whatever you were given. Even when it was just toast and ketchup, or fried baloney. Never asked for anything until we moved in with Sid. And even then you never asked for that much. Just things you wanted to try and learn. A magic trick kit, snowboarding, drum lessons, guitar lessons, surfing, karate lessons. Which financially no matter how much Sid huffed and puffed over it never made any dent in his finances. I always wondered how I ended up so lucky," she said as they walked out to the beach, taking off her heels and dumping them and the papers into her purse before taking his arm again.

"I worried so much that not having enough food would stunt your growth, would make you sick. But then you grew like a tree. I always thought it was just you and me. But these last couple of months I realized that it wasn't. I don't know what other kids didn't like but you charmed almost every damn adult you ran into. I just don't think you ever realized it. I mean I hadn't. The manager from the car hop and the girls were delighted when I reached out to them. Said you came by with your boyfriend and his Mom. Said it was cute."

Johnny blushed bright red. They hadn't been dating then. Hadn't even really been friends.

She laughed softly. "I told them you hadn't been dating yet and they said you never brought anyone else by. So they assumed it had to be your boyfriend. Thought you were cute and serious since his mom was with you."

She sat down in the sand.

"Mom, your dress," Johnny said worriedly.

She laughed, sounding delighted. "Sid bought it, who gives a shit if it gets dirty?"

Johnny stared at her, eyes wide and she patted to the space next to her. Johnny sat down in the sand next to her and she took his hand in hers, turning to face him.

"Our divorce has been finalized as of today. I didn't want you to worry about it. You worry about everything. About me. And I know you didn't say anything because you were worried about me. You kept everything in because you were worried about me. Even though I constantly tell you I'm the Mom."

"What will you do now?" Johnny asked softly, voice barely a whisper.

"I have more money now than I know what to do with, do not worry about me. I do want your opinion on some things though," she said.

Johnny nodded.

"Do you like the mansion at all? And be brutally honest."

Johnny shook his head.

She nodded turning back towards the water and eating her ice cream thoughtfully.

"Tommy asked if I wanted to host a divorce party. Did I tell you how much I like your friends?"

Johnny shook his head again.

She laughed warmly.

"All the country club people would consider that too gauche. But honestly, I'm not surprised, they've been quiet. All gone underground. Even the Mills. Except for Ali. She showed up. Also, you never told me Dutch was his last name."

"He doesn't like his first name or middle name," Johnny said softly. "It's what he wants to be called."

"Well I met Mr. and Mrs. Dutch for the first time," she said wrinkling her nose at the weirdness of it. "It was apparently a huge deal. Sid looked like he swallowed a bug. It was the only day in court he was silent. I didn't realize they were such busy hotshots, or that they didn't like anyone. But you know who they do like?"

Johnny looked at her confused.

"You. All of your friend's parents or guardians adore you."

"Wait, why did they go to your divorce proceedings?"

"Because we found the one judge in California with permission to do family court civil stuff and criminal proceedings in one fell swoop."

Johnny's eyes went wide turning to her again.

"I'm fine," she said quickly. "I think he knew if he tried anything with me I'd break his nose and walk. No, I-I learned all the stuff he did to you. I doubt I even learned all of it. So it went from just a general divorce to see if I could open a portal to hell and send him off with a first-class ticket. And it looks like I succeeded," she said warmly tapping her cone to his in a mini cheers.

"You'll never have to see the bastard again. When I left he was digging himself the rest of the way there on his own. He punched his own lawyer in the face and the whole thing erupted into chaos," she said with a laugh. "I can't believe I actually loved him at one point."

"I'm sorry Mom."

"Oh honey, you have nothing to apologize for."

"Was that what you meant with the flowers?" Johnny asked.

"Yeah, to hang in there because I was going to battle and that you wouldn't see me for a bit. Because the bastard threatened to try and get custody. And that gummed up the damn works. But because I didn't see it for so long it kind of lost me some ground. But Mr. Miyagi got it back for me. Came by every day around lunchtime with these little lunch boxes for us. Talked about all the stuff he was working on with you with the judge. She nearly gave him sole custody of you."

"Mr. Miyagi?" Johnny said surprised.

Laura laughed. "Yeah. He stood up today and said if it was wanted he'd take responsibility for you."

Johnny rubbed away tears. "That's kind of weird right?"

She bumped her shoulder against him. "Why because you're dating like his adopted son?"

"Yeah."

"Maybe he just figured you're already his son-in-law."

Johnny blushed bright red and she grinned. "He would've had to fight though against all your godparents."

"All of my godparents?" Johnny asked looking at her.

"Did you know you can technically have as many godparents as you want for a kid?" she asked with a big grin.

"What did you do?"

She dug her feet in the sand and finished off her ice cream cone with a grin.

"Mom?"

"Well, when I was getting married to Sid he recommended I talk to a lawyer first. It was kind of charming right? This guy is so worried because I had nothing that he wanted to make sure I knew what I was getting into getting married for the first time. And it wasn't even to do a prenup. Never made me sign one of those because he thought I'd be too scared to ever leave him. Anyway, so I found this lawyer who met with me pro bono because I didn't want to use Sid's money for it right? And so we sat down and we talked, off and on for like weeks. And this guy straight up tells me not to change my last name right away because sometimes these things fall apart and it'd be harder on me later. He also told me to create an account in my name that was my own in case I had to run."

"An emergency fund?" Johnny asked.

"Yeah, I think I talked to you about that at one point. It was such a fascinating idea because I'd never had enough to actually create one. But I saw the need for it. Like in case you lose your job, or your partner is abusive, or just if shit goes south. So I did. And this guy was giving me such good caring advice. Talking to me about all this stuff I didn't know that I straight up asked him if he wanted to be your godfather."

Johnny laughed.

"He told me that he was honored but to wait. Just like he told me to wait and maybe not let Sid adopt you, to keep sole custody. And so I met up with him from time to time and eventually he agreed. And then the manager at the carhop, she agreed too. And then when you started hanging out with Bobby and I met his parents and they talked about how much of a delight you were they also agreed. I nearly asked Mr. Miyagi," she said with a laugh. "No one told me to stop. I was so used to being alone that I didn't want you to be if anything happened. And your original godparents passed away when you were little so suddenly that I just thought more was better. I'm lucky they let that lawyer represent me for my divorce."

"Where did you stay?" Johnny asked softly.

"With the Browns. It was kind of sweet. All your friend's guardians offered for me to stay with them. Haven't had a lot of people fight over me before. It was kind of fun. But you were calling from Okinawa to Bobby's so I picked them. I ate so many sweets I thought I was either going to bounce off the walls or turn into sludge. They put me to work taste testing and the creative chaos of that house is so much fun. Every time I turned around I was being offered like a cookie or a cupcake or a tart, or like could you try this? Their kids, Bobby's little siblings would ask me if I could sneak them vegetables. I've never met such kids who run away from a cookie the way most run away from brussels sprouts. You always said they were cute. Always talked warmly about the Browns. And I get that. But they also talked warmly about you you know. It was very sweet. Said we are always welcome. Which all your friends and their families extended. It was... heartwarming. I cried a lot."

Johnny held out a hand to his mother, ice cream finished. She took it warmly and gave his hand a squeeze. "I also met your Abuela. You would've thought I'd have known your Abuela. Because that's how she introduced herself. Gave me a ton of tamales. Brought her granddaughter to translate."

"How'd you find her?" Johnny asked.

"Jimmy. He said there was a shop you asked him to help make everything cheaper. So he invited her. And she's such a sweetheart.

Said you did what I told you to, that if someone was bullying you to seek help. Run into a shop or somewhere with an adult. And that you were always trying to help her. But you always looked hungry so she always fed you. And that explains where all those tamales you'd bring home came from. So I got to finally thank her for that. So between her and Mr. Miyagi and the Browns, I didn't have to spend money on food for like three months," she said with a soft laugh. "She also said your boyfriend and you were very cute."

"She could tell?" Johnny asked blushing.

"Yeah, she dropped off tamales yesterday. Apparently, now that she knows where to find me I'm on her list of "not getting enough food" I think she thinks I'm starving still. I told her granddaughter I'm fine and she laughed and told me that her grandmother always feeds everyone and it's just how she is. You get used to it. And she told me you and Daniel were coming by frequently and were very sweet. She also mentioned that after you started Cobra Kai and had your growth spurt some guys were harassing her and you scared them all off. Got into a fight for her. She said she berated you for an hour, but mostly because she'd been scared to see you get hurt. Her granddaughter said you were very sweet. So did a small army worth of librarians, nurses, and teachers who showed up," she said smiling at him.

"Your friends said they always thought you just were trying to seem good to all the adults and thought it was weird, but all these adults talked about how you'd help out when you could. Carrying heavy things, organizing stuff, a quiet and helpful boy. I also got to meet the parents and kids you babysit who adore you and the people from the animal sanctuary. You went out and sought all these people to be a part of your life. And you created such strong bonds with all of them that I just had to mention that I was getting a divorce and was looking for people to talk about you and they all volunteered. My lawyer said he'd never seen so many random strangers pop up out of the woodwork like that. They even called Lucille and she talked to the judge over the phone. So I want you to realize something that I realized. Okay?"

She squeezed his hand gently turning to look at him.

"I know things have been bad and you had an especially rough year last year and you made some awful choices, and before that, you had a rough time. And I pried, wouldn't leave your friends alone. And I know you heaped all of everything onto yourself. Thought you deserved every damn thing that happened. Because of the shit Sid said and the other kids at the other schools you went to. But you didn't deserve any of that. Ever. No excuses. But we don't ever realize how much what we say or do impacts the lives of other people. It can seem small to show up and help someone carry a heavy box somewhere or to help someone who's a little overworked with what they're doing, or just remembering things and asking about it when we see them. It has a ripple effect.

"You put all this good into the world without even knowing it and it came back in a fucking tsunami. And Sid put all this hell into the world and nothing came back from it. None of his staff spoke kindly about him. Either the people who worked for him in Hollywood or the people who worked in the house. The only people who even attempted were country club people who weren't sure if he'd win or not. You're not evil Johnny. You're just a kid. Kids make mistakes. And you took responsibility for the things that were truly your fault. Ali and Daniel are in your corner you know, despite everything, and because of everything. Because of the work you put in. Just like there are all these other people."

She lifted her hand and brushed the hair from his eyes where it was getting longer and tucked some behind his ear, cupping his face.

"It's not just me and you. And it might take you a while to realize it fully. To see the whole implications of it. But believe me, I've seen it and it's awe-inspiring. I think you won't fully see it until you get married, when I make you invite all these people and see when they show up to celebrate you and your happiness, but you'll see it someday. And that it's okay Johnny to just be. You don't have to make a big plan for your life. You can just be. Because whatever you are doing is going well. And I've got your back okay? Talk to me about what you want to do, if there are things you want to try and I'll help. Let me help. Let me be there. Let me be the mom. Let me finally get a chance to spoil you like I always wanted to."

She brushed tears from her eyes and sighed flopping back in the sand. "Do you want to continue to live with Mr. Miyagi?"

"If that's okay?" Johnny asked softly.

She laughed.

"Well, I want to have dinners. Once a week? Twice a week? Should we get lunch? Fit me into your schedule. I'm going to get an apartment or something, so call me. Maybe I'll get a condo. Or a house. A smaller more manageable one. I don't know yet, but I'll let you know when I do. You can stay with me when you want. In a week or so we'll go to the mansion and clear out our stuff."

"In a week?"

"Yup. I'll let everyone know. I gotta wait till Sid's people finish what they've got to do. And then we gotta decide what we're doing for your 18th birthday. What do you want to do?"

"I don't know,"

She smiled. "Well let me know before I order a clown or something."

Johnny wrinkled his nose with a frown.

She laughed. "No clown got it."

Johnny looked at her.

He didn't think she'd ever get a divorce. It hadn't ever seemed like a possibility.

He knew when Sid and his mother had started dating he'd seemed so kind, so nice, so caring. And then they got married and it all came crashing down.

For him to be gone. For his mother to remove him, clean out the space like a cavity while Johnny was in Okinawa, while he was going out hiking with Daniel, and little dates that were so simple but so nice to just relax.

She'd picked herself and him over Sid. Gone to war in her finest clothes.

It was like a shadow on his life was gone and he almost didn't believe it.

It felt like a dream. A good one. One where they were finally free and on steady ground.

Everything Must Go

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Daniel was nervous.

He knew Mrs. Lawrence was telling Johnny now. He wondered if he needed to stop referring to her mentally as Mrs. or if now it was Ms.?

Could he jump the gun and go with Laura?

No that seemed too presumptuous.

He was working hard making manicotti from scratch.

The guys were sitting with Mr. Miyagi asking him about bonsai. Sneakily trying to get more information out of him about his dream.

Daniel was pretty sure he wanted to make spinach manicotti.

It'd be nice. He just wasn't sure if Johnny would be joining them. Or Ms. Lawrence.

It seemed like a night to celebrate and manicotti was more of comfort food for him. Not really celebratory. But the guys needed a pick me up and he wanted to do giant stuffed noodles.

He wanted to see Johnny. Wanted to kiss him. Wanted to go on a date. He'd been spoiled by getting to go on dates for nearly two weeks. Then today it stopped.

When they got home he'd showed the guys all the paperwork the relator had given him and Jimmy had looked it over and answered all his questions.

Daniel had been worried that Jimmy would be too burnt out, but he laughed and had said that this wasn't as emotionally draining so he was happy to talk about zoning laws.

Dutch had whined that it was so damn boring. Told them he was going to take a nap and to wake him up when they got to something interesting. He fell asleep immediately. He was still asleep on the floor near the table.

When Daniel was plating the food he heard the front door open.

"Something smells divine," Ms. Lawrence said.

"Daniel must be cooking," Johnny said and Daniel grinned.

He made two more plates and set them out on the table.

Tommy woke up Dutch who sat up fast, half of his face red.

"How can you tell?" Ms. Lawrence asked.

"Different smells. Mr. Miyagi cooks mostly Japanese food, its different oils, and seasoning. Italian usually means Daniel."

Daniel could hear Johnny explaining as they were getting closer.

"That's adorable," Bobby said with a laugh.

Johnny stiffened in the doorframe, looking shocked that they were all there, but his mother pushed him forward towards the table, saying hello to Mr. Miyagi and the guys. They chatted warmly and Daniel sat down next to Johnny who took his hand and gave him a gentle kiss on the lips.

"Oh no, they're getting too used to us being around," Tommy said.

"Yeah they're just forgetting about PDA now," Bobby said.

"Johnny your Mom and Mr. Miyagi are right there, come on man," Jimmy said teasingly.

"If this is you behaving around adults we're going to have to start knocking," Dutch said.

Daniel caught Johnny picking up his glass in a very specific way to sneakily flip them off, which just made them laugh.

Ms. Lawrence started eating and then paused turning towards them and Daniel felt panic flood his veins.

Oh, what if she hated spinach?

Or his cooking?

Was it not as good as his mom's?

"Johnny he can cook," she said slowly. "You're going to have to hurry up and marry him. You just have to move to West Hollywood."

Johnny turned bright red and she burst out laughing.

"Why West Hollywood? That's super close," Bobby said.

"They've got a domestic partnership registry for everyone, started in February," Dutch said.

"Bingo!" Laura said warmly.

Bobby and the guys turned to Dutch eyes wide.

"How the hell do you know that?"

"I know shit," Dutch said holding out his arm in front of Bobby expectantly.

Bobby sighed digging out the stickers.

"Fine, only because I'm impressed," he said sticking one on Dutch's arm.

"Mom," Johnny said.

"I want a son-in-law to cook for me," Ms. Lawrence complained. "Plus that'd make Lucille family."

"Mom!"

"Okay okay," she leaned forward to look at Daniel and smiled warmly, "It's delicious Daniel, as good as your Mom's cooking. You're definitely a catch."

Daniel grinned pleased. "I can still cook for you," he said.

"Oh, that's dangerous. Don't promise me that, I'll take advantage," she said with a laugh.

Daniel smiled warmly and put his hand on Johnny's thigh and gave a little squeeze.

Johnny jumped a little, still bright red.

They both looked okay.

He'd been worried. He shouldn't have been.

It was like they'd cleared out all the bad stuff so they could start new.

Now one was gone. There was just Kreese. But she was working on that too, with Jimmy. They only had to wait.

The week passed by quickly with the guys over more frequently than he expected, dragging them out of the house. Away from what Daniel had hoped for alone to go on dates. They wanted to catch up on their original plans to go to the national parks and drive around. A moment of pleasant summer before school started back up. He couldn't be too mad. They'd given up the majority of their summer for Johnny and Ms. Lawrence and for himself and Mr. Miyagi.

They'd also gone with him back to the realtor who looked a little stunned to see two boys return with four more boys crowding in her office. Three of which spoke adamantly about all the things she had questions about. Before Daniel knew it they were looking at shops and locations, all her worries and reservations transforming into excitement over the project and talking with the guys about shops and real estate.

There was a big run-down shop next to a railroad track that said oranges and lemons with an orange painted on it.

Daniel thought it had a lot of potential, that it was charming.

Dutch hated it. Said it was too close to the tracks. Hated the spiderwebs.

He walked into a big one as soon as they stepped in and let out a string of curses.

Jimmy said it looked like an old fruit packaging factory and learned Mr. Miyagi could keep all the stuff in it which only felt like another plus to Daniel.

Tommy frowned but didn't say anything, just running a finger through the dust.

Bobby checked the wood and the structure with the air of an inspector.

Johnny just quietly leaned over and said, "I used to live around here."

It was loud enough that it caught everyone's attention, only because it was so quiet in the room.

He'd tried to be quiet but all eyes turned to him including the agent who turned on her heels back to him.

"When did you live here?" she asked interest piqued.

"Oh, uh, I think ten years ago?"

"Well, it's very up and coming. Lots of young artists are moving in. There's even a ceramic studio across the street that's been doing well."

"Yeah?" he said.

Daniel couldn't tell whether that meant it was a good area or not. But she had so many others to look at so they kept going.

The other shops that Daniel looked at didn't have the same type of personality.

They were also out of his price range.

After the twelfth shop that was downtown or near the Sunset Strip that the guys liked Daniel pulled Johnny aside while they were talking about what was in style with the agent and what wasn't and foot traffic.

"You think that one near the ceramics shop is safe?"

"Safe?"

"The area?"

"Yeah. It's safe."

"I like that one the best. What do you think?"

"I think it'll be nice. Just needs a little elbow grease."

Daniel smiled and when they waved the guys goodbye because they had dinner with their families, he turned to the agent and got the ball rolling.

At the end of the week, Johnny packed an overnight bag and so did Daniel. It felt weird that Johnny was packing one but Daniel understood that there was no knowing what they'd find.

Ms. Lawrence wanted Johnny to spend the night at the mansion, she'd given an open invite for anyone else who wanted to come.

Daniel had jumped at the offer.

He knew with all the memories it was probably awful. But it was a mansion.

And if he went he could share a bed with Johnny far far away from anyone else, far away from Mr. Miyagi. And it'd be Johnny's bed. A fancy expensive bed. It'd be luxurious and wonderful and maybe they could swim in the pool.

His hopes were dashed when the guys showed up at Mr. Miyagi's. Meeting them at the door. Johnny was holding his bonsai in his arms like a kid who needed a nightlight staying somewhere dark and scary. Maybe Daniel could scare all that fear away.

They wished Mr. Miyagi a good evening passing Bobby who popped his head in.

"Mr. Miyagi we got you something."

"For Miyagi?"

"Yes. We've kept your place pretty loud since you got back. We assumed you'd enjoy some peace and quiet. But worried you might get lonely," Bobby said handing over an envelope.

"It's an international phone card Mr. Miyagi," Jimmy said.

"So you can call Ms. Yukie," Tommy said warmly.

"Yeah we got the max amount of hours, you can talk for like a whole week non-stop with that thing," Dutch said.

"Oh, thank you boys," Mr. Miyagi said warmly.

"Bye Mr. Miyagi!"

Johnny drove the Avanti to the mansion.

Daniel watched him.

Johnny had the bonsai in his lap like it was keeping him grounded.

Johnny parked in the garage, somewhere Daniel had never been.

The guys following parking their cars.

Dutch let out a whistle.

"Damn look at all these cars."

Maybe they hadn't ever been in there either. Which seemed weird after all their years of friendship. But the mansion seemed to be a weird location. He remembered the staff who'd answered the door.

Daniel thought Mr. Miyagi had a lot of cars, but these weren't all classics, these were the expensive cars that only rich people owned.

The kinds of cars that Louie talked about in a hushed whisper when they went through car magazines at the nearest bodega.

Johnny's Avanti almost looked humble next to them all. The door to the garage opened and Ms. Lawrence leaned against it.

"Welcome boys," she said with a grin. "Sid's people are done with all their work. Anything he got to keep is gone."

"So he didn't get to keep all these cars?" Jimmy asked in awe.

"Nope, those are technically mine now," she said with a shrug turning.

"I already set aside anything I actually wanted, so you see something you want, mark it with a sticky note. Movers come in the morning. And then the true fun begins."

Daniel wonders if she decided to take Tommy's idea of a divorce party to heart.

It might be fun.

She handed them each a different color of sticky notes and waved her hand.

Johnny beelined straight for his room, pushing open the door with a frown. Like he hadn't expected the door to be open and suddenly was worried that there might be something in his room he didn't want there.

A monster of some kind.

Bobby walked ahead of him.

"It's fine," he called.

Johnny set his things down, put the bonsai on the desk.

Bobby was holding an envelope and reading.

"What's that?" Johnny asked.

Bobby turned so Johnny couldn't read over his shoulder and then let out a laugh.

"What?"

"Sid left you a note."

"Oh," Johnny said all interest dying immediately.

Daniel set his things down.

"It's not worth a read, but I'm kind of surprised," Bobby said.

"Why, what's it say?" Jimmy asked stepping forward.

"It should be burned, but he did say," Bobby cleared his throat. "If I had known that Dutch was of The Dutch's and you liked guys I would've had you break up with Ali earlier and date Dutch instead. You should rethink your relationships. That one is actually worth pursuing if that's the way you swing. You'd be set for life. Then there's some more garbage, but essentially if he could redo anything, which like no remorse because he's a monster, the only remorse is that he didn't realize Dutch was a Dutch and that he tried to get you to marry Ali when he should've tried to get you to marry Dutch," Bobby said before bursting out laughing.

"Let me see that," Dutch said snatching the paper from Bobby who was doubled over in his fit of laughter.

"He hates us all but Dutch, man, he approves of fucking Dutch of all people now."

"I don't know whether to be honored or offended," Dutch said wrinkling his nose.

"Hey man you said yourself Johnny's a catch," Tommy said with a grin.

"Yeah, but this is Sid, it's not compatibility because he doesn't even fucking know me. It's just that he knows of my parents. Their notoriety. He's regretting not brown-nosing while he could. Not realizing my parents hate Sid with a burning passion and anyone like him."

"So you're saying your parents wouldn't have approved if you brought Johnny home?" Jimmy teased.

"No, they like Johnny, that wouldn't have been a problem. It all would've been Sid." Dutch said sourly.

"Wait, okay now I gotta know. What's that game, fuck marry kill? Johnny, pick."

"No," Johnny said walking out of the room.

"Johnny come on," they called following after him down the hall.

"I wouldn't want any of you to die," Johnny said heading down the hall and throwing open a door.

"Damn, okay well, the other two then."

"Daniel wins," Johnny said.

"Daniel doesn't count you're already dating him. This is a hypothetical."

"Dutch you're the one who Sid was planning to marry Johnny off to if he could go back in time, who'd you marry? If you had to pick one of us."

"Johnny," Dutch said with a shrug. "Parents already like him."

"Okay Jimmy, how about you?"

"Tommy. He plans a lot of shit, I figure we'd create some super couple." Jimmy said with a shrug.

Daniel tuned out the chatter. He'd gotten the answer he'd wanted to hear and it looked like Johnny wasn't going to say anything else. There were more interesting things to focus on. Like taking in the rest of the mansion.

The room they were in was a library. The guys burst out into a fit of laughter over their conversation and Daniel walked up to Johnny who was staring at the bookcase studying the books.

He hooked his arm through Johnny's.

"You okay?" he asked softly.

Johnny looked down at him. "Uneasy. I keep expecting someone to come to yell at me, around any corner. But the staff is gone."

"Yeah."

"Damn are these first editions?" Bobby asked picking up a book.

"Probably," Johnny said.

"Johnny," Jimmy said throwing his arms around both their shoulders. "I forgot to tell you. Anything you need to store you can store at my place."

Bobby burst out laughing.

"What?" Jimmy asked with a frown.

"Your parents still jealous Ms. Lawrence stayed with us?" Bobby asked.

"Yes, but don't ever let them know I said that. They're very competitive. So the fact she picked you guys, even though it was logical made them offer up like half our guest rooms. For storage. Anyway, Johnny we've already got the LaRusso's stuff. My parents already offered it to your Mom. But like if there are things you want, grab them, and we'll put it in my house."

"Thank you," Johnny said.

He was looking up.

Then he glanced around.

He grabbed a ladder and leaned it against the shelf and climbed up.

He pulled a book from the shelf, leather-bound, and fancy-looking.

He passed it down to Daniel.

Pride and Prejudice

Daniel looked up at Johnny who smiled down at him warmly. He wanted the book because, Daniel realized, because of him, them, because of their study dates.

A room full of books and the guy only had eyes on one.

"Why don't you grab more?" Daniel asked as Johnny started to come back down.

"Mom's donating whatever I don't pick that she doesn't want. I can check out books from the library. This one though was one of the few that was gifted by a teacher I liked that, here look," Johnny opened the book gingerly. "He never touched it or read it."

"You said one of the few, why don't you grab those?"

Johnny nodded thoughtfully.

"Yeah, those are fine."

He put the book back in Daniel's hands and carried the ladder across the room, climbing up and grabbing another.

In the end, he only left with four books.

Daniel looked at them all and shook his head, he didn't even know where to start.

They walked from room to room.

Johnny didn't seem particularly interested in anything, except the kitchen where he opened the cabinets and grabbed a jar.

"Oh, we have a few of those at home," Dutch said. "What 'cha going to use it for?"

"Farmer Johnny? Going to make preserves?" Bommy asked.

"I could see that," Jimmy said.

"No," Johnny said and then after a moment. "Daniel made a list of date ideas, I thought it might be fun to have a jar to put them in, so when we're free we can pick one at random."

Daniel had been looking at a pasta machine looked up surprised.

"That's a *Van Vliet. Y*ou're going to turn a $10,000 jar into a date jar?" Tommy asked eyes wide.

Johnny shrugged.

"The pencils are probably worth $1,000 each. Sid liked having worthless things worth a lot. So that if you broke a pencil or lost something he could complain about who expensive it was."

Daniel stuck one of his sticky notes on the pasta machine and a few other appliances he knew Mr. MIyagi didn't have.

A coffee maker for the shop.

For him mostly, since Mr. Miyagi didn't drink coffee.

That made things interesting.

What could he repurpose for the shop?

There was a thick heavy table that looked like it would work well in the shop with bonsai on it.

"Someone's focused," Tommy said amused.

"Oh, I just realized I could get all the stuff I need for Mr. Miyagi's shop for free."

"That's a great idea," Jimmy said.

"What kind of stuff are you thinking?" Johnny asked. "I'll help you find it."

"Office furniture for the office, a few things like towels and whatnot for the bathroom, mostly ways to display bonsai."

Johnny nodded taking his hand and turning, heading off down a hallway full of art.

Pedestals with vases and paintings and statues.

"Shit, I never went down this hallway," Dutch said.

"Think he'd like some vases?"

"Those are Imperial Ming Johnny!"

Johnny shrugged. "Sid broke like five of them on his own."

"Broke a Ming," Jimmy repeated hand to his chest. "Fucking bastard."

Daniel studied the pedestals and the shelving used for displays, picked out a few while the guys complained about mistreatment of art.

In the corner were two big vases with big plants in them, he ran his fingers through the leaves. They were real. He stuck his sticky notes on the vases.

"We should go to the gardener's workshop too," Johnny said before leading them out to the garden and a shed on the property when Daniel was done.

Daniel watched Johnny stop and turn towards a part of the garden and took one of his sticky notes and stuck it on a plant before rejoining them.

Daniel got supplies he thought Mr. Miyagi would find useful, found more fishing rods and fishing equipment, and marked that for Mr. Miyagi as well.

He found a desk, some chairs, a nice table they could use for checkout, a whole bunch of cleaning equipment, and a nice toolbox full of tools and power tools.

They stopped for lunch. Ms. Lawrence bringing them reheated tamales.

Daniel laughed as soon as he saw them.

"I need help. I'm drowning in these," she said.

They sat out in the garden by the pool eating.

Daniel was tired.

There was so much stuff.

He thought rich people had tended to go for minamalism. But Sid had so much stuff.

They'd only gone through like a fourth of it.

And he knew if he wasn't following Johnny he would've gotten lost.

It was a maze.

Johnny didn't grab much and it made sense but it felt like a waste.

Johnny only seemed to go for useful things, like tires that fit the Avanti from the garage and a few things he could use to keep the Avanti in tip-top condition.

But he ignored the other cars. He ignored all the art. He ignored most of the stuff in every room, in the lounges, in the game room, in the conservatory, in the offices, in the guest rooms.

They ordered a pizza for dinner and sat around in one of the smaller kitchens at a tiny table.

Tiny in comparison to everything else.

It felt more comfortable, less vast.

Johnny seemed more comfortable. He poured them soda and wine for his mother who asked about their finds.

The guys complained about all the mistreated art and she laughed.

"Whatever you don't pick gets donated," she said warmly.

"Where to?" Jimmy asked. "Your taxes are going to be wild this year."

She laughed.

"Art's going to a museum or to the embassies. There's are a couple of schools I want to donate books to, and a friend was telling me that prisons also need books donated, I thought that would be a good idea. Some of it's getting auctioned off for charity, like the cars." She shrugged. "I've got like fifteen people my lawyer put me in touch with that are helping me empty this place out. Like a closing sale. Everything must go."

They played a few card games in the game room before Daniel started yawning.

Johnny wished them all good night and Daniel hooked his arm through his following him up to his room.

Johnny showered and Daniel changed getting in the bed.

It smelled like Johnny.

It was kind of overwhelming.

Was that how Johnny felt in Daniel's bed? That everything was overwhelming.

He wanted to snoop the way he'd gotten to explore through the entire house.

But unlike Sid who'd gotten to grab all his personal things, this was all Johnny's and he hadn't had a chance to separate his stuff.

Daniel got out of the bed and looked at the posters on the walls.

There was a book on Johnny's desk about the language of flowers.

Daniel smiled sitting at his desk and opening it.

He flipped through idly.

Then sparked by curiosity and a warm memory he flicked to lavender.

Devotion.

No. Of course not.

He re-read it.

But the florist in Newark said Johnny knew the language of flowers.

That had been so long ago.

They'd only been friendly for less than a month at that point. They had just become friends.

Johnny gave everyone the same cookies.

But his Mom hadn't gotten a heart.

Would it be too forward to jump in the shower with Johnny?

Johnny was quiet, but if Daniel played close attention he spoke so damn loud.

Actions.

The book he wanted was the equivalent of grabbing a record of their song.

He turned walking through his hated home into shopping for Daniel.

For Mr. Miyagi's new shop.

Daniel just yawned and Johnny bid everyone else goodnight.

Daniel didn't feel tired anymore.

Heart pounding in his ears.

There was no doubt that Johnny liked Daniel. A lot. Maybe as much as Daniel liked Johnny. Maybe-

Daniel just needed to figure out how to just be as clear. Just as loud.

But first, he needed Johnny to get out of the damn shower as soon as possible before he opened the door to the bathroom and did something stupid. Like, be in too much of a hurry to even take off his own clothes.

Onwards to Better Things

Johnny thought that if the guys hadn't come he wouldn't have done much in the house. He would've followed his mother around like a lost puppy or one of those ducklings. Or he would've just stayed in his room.

He caught himself walking as quietly as possible. He didn't mean to, he knew Sid wasn't there, that the staff had left.

His mom had said they'd all found new jobs in better places and she'd asked if they needed anything. She didn't blame them for being shitty because it was Sid. But she didn't want to keep them and made that clear, made Sid pay their severance and make sure they'd have enough to get them through till they landed on their feet.

He appreciated that but was mostly glad they weren't there.

He even parked the Avanti between two of Sid's nicer cars out of habit.

He was glad Daniel was there.

Watching him go through the house with the shop in mind helped. Gave Johnny something to focus on. A goal. Things he needed to do. So was helping the guys grab things that they liked or thought would be good gifts or useful for their dorms.

It was weird to be home and knowing it wasn't his home anymore. The weirdness of the word home, and how that really meant people he cared for. Where the guys were, where his mother was, where Daniel was. That was home.

Johnny finished his shower and was drying his hair when he opened the door and Daniel was right there, unexpected and sudden, grabbing the edges of the towel on the top of his head pulling him down and into a kiss, pulling him back with him towards the bed. It wasn't slow and lazy like a lot of their kisses had been lately, this was almost all tongue.

Daniel had been half asleep when Johnny had left to take a shower. He didn't know what had happened but Johnny wasn't going to complain. He liked kissing Daniel. Was pretty sure that was a given. That had to be clear as he leaned over Daniel who'd sat on the bed and was pulling him down with him. Reaching out to catch himself so he didn't crush Daniel.

"I thought you were tired?" Johnny asked softly.

"Not as much anymore," Daniel said, moving back under the covers and tugging Johnny along as if Johnny needed any invitation. "I realized, I get to be alone with you in a big bed in a big quiet home."

The mansion didn't seem particularly exciting.

Mr. Miyagi's house was pretty quiet usually too.

They'd spent plenty of time alone there now. And Johnny wasn't so sure about being alone in the mansion. But Daniel was pushing him down in the middle of the bed and kissing him and Johnny was trying to remember if he'd locked the door or not but it was hard to focus with Daniel's tongue brushing against his because that was a million times more interesting.

The way Daniel was moving was different than usual. It was like the way he talked, never-ending, barely stopping for a breath, like he had urgent things to tell Johnny but could only do so in this way. And Johnny was enjoying trying to parse through it, trying to keep the conversation going and then suddenly it spluttered out into curses as the bed dipped.

"Which side are you sleeping on Daniel?" Bobby asked. "Pick a side and rollover."

Daniel's face went through about fifty different expressions before he buried his head in Johnny's neck with a deep frustrated sigh.

Johnny didn't think he'd ever heard so many colorful curses fall from Daniel's lips.

"I thought you two were going to bed, not going to bone," Dutch said plopping down on Johnny's other side. "Sneaky Daniel, very sneaky. You looked like you were going to pass out. Now we know you're full of lies and mischief."

"You know that's a good way to put that," Jimmy said. "I mean he definitely has that streak huh? I bet he was a class clown at his old school."

"Why?" Daniel asked eventually. It came out as a whine, a complaint.

There was annoyance underneath it but mostly frustration.

"This is where we sleep, thought you knew that. Didn't Ali tell you?"

"Aren't there like 50 guest rooms?" Daniel asked pushing himself up and flopping down beside Johnny looking like he was trying to think of grey areas in Mr. Miyagi's defense only karate.

"Yes, but it's scary Daniel. This house is creepy. So skootch close, we usually take the floor, but fuck that today."

"You are not all going to fit," Daniel said.

"You're going to have to just get super close to Johnny. Didn't seem a problem five seconds ago."

"I hate you all."

"We love you too."

Daniel continued to grumble but curled up next to Johnny wrapping an arm around his chest, kicking a leg over his waist, and pressing his cheek against Johnny's shoulder as he complained softly about privacy and normal people just walking away and not heading closer like they were some damn animal documentary filmmaker. What kind of weirdos? Why was it a packaged deal? Buy one get four free? What if you wanted to return four? Who could he even complain to? He'd get his revenge. Wait till they got girlfriends or married or whatever, and he'd drop by and they'd have to explain why there was an Italian from Jersey telling them to make space. See how they liked it then. When they were on the other side of it then. He was going to keep track of every single damn time this happened and he'd just do it right back. Wait until their dates were going well and then show up.

Johnny wrapped his arm around Daniel.

"You do realize there are four of them. You're going to exhaust yourself."

"How are you not upset?"

Johnny glanced at the guys who'd taken up the bed and laughed softly, "Because-"

"Don't say it's because they're our friends," Daniel complained.

"I was going to say because they wore me down. Like a pebble."

Daniel pressed his forehead against Johnny's chest with a groan.

"You got the rest of your life," Dutch said reaching out and ruffling Daniel's hair. Daniel swatted at his hand and Dutch laughed.

Johnny wondered if he could help. Ran his fingers up and down Daniel's arm.

"I thought only one of you usually was up here," Daniel complained, but he seemed to be relaxing. He looked tired again. Fight fading.

"We usually do because we don't want to wake him up. But Johnny's already awake," Tommy said.

Johnny lowered his head and kissed the top of Daniel's head before resting his head on the pillow again. He listened to the quiet mansion. No one else there. No staff. No Sid. He heard a sound moving through the half towards the room.

Slow.

Dragging.

Johnny sat up carefully. It was difficult with Daniel. The door opened. His mother took in the room, eyes wide, and then she doubled over laughing.

"Like peas in a pod," she said when she caught her breath before laughing again. She caught her breath and brushed tears from her eyes. "Oh this is one of those things, oh I know," she walked over towards the closet and opened it, dug around, opened a board in the ceiling, and pulled out a camera. She took a quick picture giggled again dropping the camera in her bag.

"Mom?" Johnny asked.

"Okay, okay, sorry, like I knew the guys slept over and it was like this, but I usually didn't see it. Ali complained all the time about it. But this is adorable," she walked over. "You've got a month left till your 18, and you get to stay with Mr. Miyagi, so pardon me Bobby," she leaned over and kissed the top of Johnny's forehead. "I'd tuck you in but it looks like the guys already made sure you're not going anywhere." she laughed again stepping back.

She was dressed for bed. It was like when he was little, t-shirt and shorts, the only thing worth anything was her silk eye mask that she had over her hair.

"What's happening?" Johnny asked softly.

"Right, so I wasn't sure where everyone would be sleeping," she said turning and going back into the hall and dragging a mattress in.

"You're staying here too?" Johnny asked softly.

"Yup," she said plopping down. "This place is too big. Too echoy. And the bastard sprayed his cologne in like every room but yours."

"That's what that was," Jimmy said. "I thought it was weird that so many rooms had the same smell."

She laughed, "Like a skunk. Anyway, it's better to be here."

Johnny nodded. It had to be hard for her to be here. In the mansion at night. Her room had also been Sid's and he didn't blame her for not wanting to be there.

"You sure that's going to be okay?" Johnny asked. He wondered if he should kick them all out of his bed, give it to her. Daniel was already falling asleep, even just leaning against him as he sat up.

"Of course. I've slept worse places."

He knew that was true. They both had. Plus she slept easily. Just passed out at the drop of a hat. Usually after parties in the car. Kind of like how he could sleep on the beach.

He laid back down carefully, tired as she turned off the lights and flopped down on the mattress she'd dragged in, curling up under the blankets she'd brought with her, as the guys fell asleep around him.

Johnny woke up and for a moment the past several months felt like a dream as he took in his mansion room. But then he felt the arms around him, felt the weight of Daniel.

His mother was correct.

There was no escape.

But he could see the clock. Could hear movement in the house. He tried to see if his Mom was still sleeping on the mattress at the foot of his bed.

The mattress was gone.

He glanced around.

Bobby was still asleep.

Daniel was still asleep.

Blocked on two angles. The others were gone. He wondered if he could scoot into the empty space now that there was some. He didn't want to wake either of them.

The bathroom door opened quietly and Dutch looked at him with a laugh in his eyes. A look of good luck before he walked off and out of the room.

Johnny looked up at the bonsai, hoping for some inspiration.

His arm was asleep.

He wiggled his fingers. It was all pins and needles.

He stared at the bonsai. Sending it an S.O.S.

The bonsai did not respond to his mental S.O.S.

Or at least couldn't help.

But eventually, Daniel started to stir.

He rolled over, seemed to realize suddenly there was so much empty space next to him, and flopped over.

Johnny sat up, suddenly free.

He wasn't sure if the bonsai had done it but he sent it silent thank you. He wondered if it'd be bad to leave Daniel and Bobby alone in his bed as he wiggled his fingers more trying to get the feeling back. He couldn't.

Who knew what sleepy Daniel would do. Bobby would freak or would tease him.

They'd murder him.

Daniel woke up with a frown, like having been unable to find Johnny the way he left him had confused him. He blinked around blearily, looking under him like he thought Johnny was there and couldn't figure out why he wasn't. Disappointed.

Johnny leaned over and kissed his cheek gently. Daniel grabbed the sides of his face kissing him on the lips.

Johnny pulled away and Daniel frowned.

Johnny turned.

"Bobby, we're going to go get breakfast, you want to keep sleeping?"

Bobby grabbed the blanket and pulled it over his head.

Johnny took that as it was okay to leave him alone in the bed and motioned at Daniel to get moving. He got out of the bed and Johnny moved to follow out the other side when Bobby's hand shot out and grabbed his wrist.

Johnny paused and turned back. It's just an arm sticking out from under a comforter, kind of like how the cats at the sanctuary would do.

Bobby didn't say anything so Johnny lifted up the comforter and looked at him.

"You okay?" they asked each other at the same time.

Johnny blinked in surprise and Bobby laughed.

"Did you actually sleep at all?" Bobby asked.

"Yeah. I've slept better for almost a month now."

Bobby nodded.

"You okay?" Johnny asked again.

"I'm sorry," Bobby said, his voice soft.

"For?"

"Not noticing earlier. About any of it. Kreese. Sid. For not telling you the call dropped."

Johnny caught Daniel moving out of the room, with a little motion for Johnny to stay and to not worry.

Johnny shifted back, laid down like the one time when they were younger and Bobby had broken down in tears because he'd forgotten to pick his siblings up from school and it'd been raining.

Johnny picked up the edge of the blanket and threw it over himself and rolled over onto his side looking at Bobby.

"Sid wasn't your responsibility," Johnny said. "And we didn't know Kreese was going to go that way."

"But-"

"No buts," Johnny said. "Promise me something."

"What?" Bobby asked.

"Don't beat yourself up over this. There are going to be moments where I get hurt that you can't protect me. Like are you going to get upset every time I get a papercut?" Johnny asked with a playful smile.

Bobby's brows furrowed. "That's what I told you in Okinawa. It's different Johnny."

"How? If you beat yourself up over it then don't you just damage yourself? You take on all the responsibility even when it's not your job. You already do more than your parents ask at home. You're not parent version two, you don't need to be my parent either. Or the guys. Just our friend. And you're already acing that. Have since day 1. Did you know you're the first person my age who ever came up to me to talk to me on their own? The only kids who were friendly to me were introduced to me by their parents because of Sid or were much older than me. You came over to me at Cobra Kai and introduced yourself and invited me to hang out. Asked if I wanted to be friends. Thank god Kreese didn't overhear," Johnny said with a soft laugh. "You're not just my best friend, you're my first friend."

"That is so fucking sad man," Bobby said burying his face in the bed.

"I don't think of it that way. I feel like I got a chance to filter past all the bull shit people to make a lifelong friend. I got to make real connections. Yeah, it's a bummer, but I'm happy now. I mean even Daniel is aware you guys are going to be around for a long time. That this isn't one of those friendships that fades. I'm planning to drop by the college to visit you, your church wherever you end up, to sit and have talks with you."

"Just don't interrupt my sermons drunk," Bobby muttered.

Johnny laughed. "That might be more of a Dutch problem. Bobby, you're not a pastor or whatever you want to be yet. You don't have to try and fix people or take care of them yet. All I needed was a friend and you aced that job."

Bobby sniffed brushing tears from his eyes. "You're really happy?"

"You and the guys helped my Mom vanquish Sid. I didn't even think that was possible. And you all tried really hard to help me get a date with Daniel."

Bobby laughed. "We custom-made you like 50 dates."

"Do those count?"

"Oh poor Daniel," Bobby said amused.

"The point is, almost all good in my life comes from the moment you shook my hand and said "Hi, I'm Bobby Brown. I hope you like Cobra Kai. Let's be friends."

"Was that what I said?" Bobby laughed. "How uncool."

"Yeah what would you have said differently? I liked it. Straight to the point."

"Cobra Kai fucking sucks, let's grab these three other idiots and run before the bastard who runs this place absolutely destroys our ability to tell right from wrong, or at least tries. Let's just hang out at the ice cream shop instead and see if we can find a different dojo."

"You didn't introduce yourself in that one, why would I go with you?" Johnny said amused.

Bobby sighed. "Picky."

"Very picky because I know how to pick out the best and how to keep the best."

"Oh god, please tell me that's not how you flirt with Daniel because that poor boy."

"Hey. I can flirt. Why should I listen to you about flirting advice?"

"Johnny, you know I visited UCLA this summer, right? And that there was a group of girls waiting to welcome me right? They even made me a sign."

"Wait, you did not mention that, the party girls?"

"I wouldn't say it that way, but yes."

"What's that got to-"

"I am master class at flirting Johnny."

"Oh good to know your ego isn't damaged."

"It's just a fact. What you don't know is while I was visiting them I got more numbers."

"Are you really master class? I mean I've been dating Daniel for a month how long have you been dating...have you even been dating? How does one actually pull off dating a group of girls?"

"I'm having fun."

"You're going to be the cool preacher huh? The one who partied in school."

"Of course. I'm also going to be the pastor who can kick ass."

Johnny smiled. "You are."

Bobby sighed and pushed himself up, pushing the comforter aside. He turned back and looked at Johnny.

"Thanks," they said at the same time.

Johnny laughed and Bobby smiled, getting up and heading towards the door.

Johnny sat in his room for a moment.

Alone.

The first time he'd seen it he'd been so excited he'd given Sid a hug. It was huge compared to the car, he hadn't had a bed in ages, and everything was bigger than he'd ever had before, and Sid had made all sorts of promises. Had laughed and told him yes, it was all his. That boys need their own space.

It'd been so fun in the daytime and then it'd been too scary at night. He'd gotten used to smaller spaces with his mom. Her asleep upfront, him asleep in the back of her old car. Always within reach.

He'd thought of going to find her. But he was scared of getting lost. So he'd stayed put and listened to his music, he read the book on flowers. Over and over and over again until he memorized it. Until he got used to the sounds of the staff walking through the halls, the vast darkness of the room. And now it'd be over.

He picked up the bonsai and sat back down on the bed.

"What do I do now?" he asked.

He studied it closely.

He'd spent one of his evenings, while Mr. Miyagi had cooked and Daniel had called his mother, trying to coax the tree back to the way it'd been before he'd left for Okinawa. But now he was thinking of changing it.

Letting it grow a little and changing the design.

Something new.

"I guess I start with breakfast hmm?"

He set the bonsai back on his desk while he got ready.

He returned then to get it and carried it out of the room.

It felt weird to carry the bonsai openly through the mansion.

He normally tried to hide it in his bag. But it was fine he reminded himself.

Everyone was in the kitchen.

Daniel was making pancakes.

"I was walking around...Johnny did you put a note on the fuchsia?" Laura asked pouring him juice looking at him with a smile.

She was wearing overalls and a t-shirt, boots and her hair was up in a ponytail.

"Yes, I uh, I planted that."

"They've been lovely. I'll make sure they get dug up and set aside," Laura said walking out towards the kitchen doors in the garden. She leaned against the door. "Set the fuchsia in the red Avanti will you?"

"Yes ma'am!" came a chorus of voices and Johnny jumped, startled.

"Mom?"

"There's a lot to get done today. After breakfast, you boys should pack up your room. The rest of the house is being taken care of. They got here early this morning and went to work. Your things are being put in your car or into mine. The guy's stuff is being put in Dutch's van or driven to Jimmy's. The stuff from your room will also be driven to Jimmy's. But I'd rather you all pack up your room."

Daniel turned and set pancakes down in front of Johnny and smiled warmly at him.

Johnny reached out and grabbed his hand and squeezed it.

Tommy took the spatula out of Daniel's other hand and patted him on the shoulder, taking over at the stove.

Daniel sat down next to Johnny.

"They worked really fast and quietly," Daniel said. "I walked around a little bit. The library we walked through? Empty. Your mom got up at like the crack of dawn."

Laura walked over with a smile and kissed the top of Johnny's head.

"I've got some supervising to do, when your room is empty meet me outside okay? Tommy, when breakfast is over just shout out the window or something okay?"

"Yes, Ms. Lawrence."

Johnny ate his pancakes. They were chocolate chip and Daniel was talking about all the stuff that he'd seen. The guys adding that they'd never seen a house emptied out so fast. The garden was unplanted even.

"It's like your mother found a loose thread and unraveling the whole place," Jimmy said.

Johnny nodded thoughtfully.

They finished breakfast and returned to his room where his things were packed up.

Daniel flitting around the room like he was trying to do everything. Like he wanted to do everything. Packing up every drawer, digging around in his closet, checking the little space in his closet ceiling that he hadn't touched since they'd moved in, pulling out some of his things Johnny had forgotten were up there, things from the previous apartment.

It all went into boxes and which were passed to workers who were standing by to carry things off.

Eventually, Johnny just had his bag and his bonsai.

The room was completely empty.

Bed gone, posters gone, closet empty, even the box of leftover Cobra Kai things. His trophies and medals. Whisked away.

Dutch's hand came down on his shoulder and leaned against him.

"It's weird man. But it's good."

"Yeah," Johnny said looking around. "Echo-y."

"You know we're getting pretty good at this," Bobby said.

"Let's not make a habit of this though," Jimmy said quickly. "I'm tired of packing up everyone's lives into boxes. No one else is allowed to move."

"Aren't you all going to college in a couple of weeks?" Daniel asked.

"Fuucccckkkkkk," JImmy said rubbing his face. "Man I don't want to pack up my own shit."

"I forgot," Tommy said softly. "I should've started already."

"Great job Daniel," Dutch said with a laugh. "You've started the panic and new school anxiety."

"Sorry, I didn't realize that was a touchy subject."

"We'll be okay," Bobby said. "You'll just have to come and help us."

They walked out of the room.

Johnny shifting the bonsai in his arms and taking Daniel's hand in the other as they walked out to the front of the mansion, down the steps Johnny rarely took, only ever running.

Johnny saw his Avanti had been moved as well as the guy's cars out to the street past the gates and far away from the mansion.

His mother was grinning talking to a man. He looked amused nodding.

Johnny walked over with the guys and she smiled brightly.

"Everything is ready ma'am," a man called from somewhere further away.

"Come with me," she said motioning for them to follow.

There was an umbrella set out and a table with chairs.

Johnny sat down next to his mother and Daniel facing the mansion.

A worker came over with a folder that they set down on the table for Laura and she read it over, nodding as she did and signed at the bottom with a big flourish.

She was poured a glass of champagne and she held it up in a cheers.

They were far away.

It didn't look like a party to Johnny. But his mother looked excited. And then he heard it.

He'd only heard a similar sound when dropping off Mr. Miyagi and Daniel at Seven Seas weeks ago. But that had been a slower sound.

Glass was breaking.

Everything was breaking and before Johnny's eyes, the mansion was falling apart.

Construction equipment was digging through it from the other side, knocking it down.

It wasn't quiet. But they were far enough away that it wasn't painful.

Laura leaned over towards Johnny, not taking her eyes off of the crumbling mansion.

"I asked if I could do it, but I learned it's best to let the professionals do it. Also wanted to see if I could use explosives, but with California's penchant for wildfires I got a hard no for that one."

"I thought you were going to sell it," Tommy said eyes wide.

"The land yes, the house no. No one else should have to set foot in that monstrosity."

"The land is technically worth more," Jimmy said softly.

"This is fucking cool as hell Ms. Lawrence," Dutch said looking absolutely delighted.

Laura smiled. She gently squeezed Johnny's hand.

"You know that animal sanctuary you work with sometimes?"

"Yeah?"

"Well, they put me in touch with some of their friends. They're wanting to start their own not-for-profit, so they're going to figure something out using the land."

"What about you?" Johnny asked, "Where are you going to go?"

"Not far, I've found a smaller house with a nice yard. Closed on it a couple of days ago. Just wanted to get my stuff set up first. And then you can come to visit, we can have dinners and do some gardening. You'll have a room for any time you want to stay with me."

"Do you want to plant the fuchsia there?" Johnny asked.

"That's yours though," Laura said tearing her gaze away from the rubble.

"I want it to be with you," Johnny said.

She smiled leaning over and kissing his temple. "Okay, I'll plant it in the garden somewhere nice. You'll have to come by and help me figure out what else I should plant. And we'll do dinners, as soon as it's set up."

"I'd like that," Johnny said smiling at her.

Laura turned to raise her glass one more time with a grin as the last bits of the structure collapsed. "Onwards to better things!"

Friends Near and Far

Daniel walked around the mansion by himself.

Bobby had looked so upset that he thought Johnny and Bobby needed time to talk.

He understood that. And hopefully Bobby would remember the next time Daniel tried to have alone time with Johnny.

The library was empty. He stared for a couple of moments remembering how full it'd been just the day before.

He'd wanted to look again, just to see what someone else did with a library.

Johnny hadn't liked this one so he wanted to look and find another style, but it was like when he'd walked into his apartment and found everything gone. That same sudden ghostly feeling. Empty and echoey.

He checked other rooms.

Every room was empty.

Nothing to be found.

He heard sounds and followed them to a kitchen, a small one where Ms. Lawrence was drinking coffee and talking to Jimmy, Tommy, and Dutch.

She tilted her head at Daniel looking for Johnny at his side. Raising an eyebrow when she realized he was alone.

"I thought you two were attached at the hip," she said with a warm teasing smile.

"Not yet," Daniel heard Dutch say with a smile.

Tommy hit him.

"We're currently debating breakfast," Ms. Lawrence said.

"All I do are eggs and bacon," Dutch said. "Haven't gotten to master anything above that yet."

Daniel looked around the kitchen, opening drawers and cabinets.

"You have enough to make pancakes," he said after he checked the fridge.

"Ohh, let's do chocolate chip," she said with a smile.

Daniel nodded gathering ingredients and getting to work.

It was nice to keep busy and not wonder how the house had emptied out so quickly in the night.

Ms. Lawrence didn't seem upset about it, or worried.

She had to have noticed that there seemed to only be two rooms with anything left in them.

Johnny's and the kitchen they stood in. It felt like that scene in Alice where the little brush creature erased all of the road but the part you were on. As soon as they all left he had a feeling the kitchen would also disappear. He worried for a moment while he cooked that maybe taking his eyes off of Johnny in such a time and place was bad. Like Johnny too could just disappear. But the kitchen was too warm, too sweet, and eventually, Johnny and Bobby came down joining them and he was relieved.

Whatever was happening would be over soon and Daniel couldn't wait.

After breakfast, they emptied out Johnny's room. Daniel got his hands on the red jacket and quietly asked Bobby to make sure that ended up at Mr. Miyagi's.

He looked at the trophies, two All-Valley, and a few others from tournaments he didn't know of.

Perfect attendance records for three years in a row.

A few books.

Lots of nice suits and clothes.

Daniel expected Johnny to have more stuff.

The cassettes he wanted to go through, but there didn't feel like there was enough time.

He dug around in the space above the closet that Ms. Lawrence had pulled the camera out of and found a couple of boxes.

Johnny said to just put it with everything else even though Daniel wanted to open them, to look in.

He'd hoped there would be so much else to dig around through. He'd wanted to be like an archeologist on a dig. Searching for the little things that made up Johnny.

But Daniel felt like his own room was so much more telling.

But this was...sad. He remembered Johnny saying how his surfboard broke. Had there been more stuff in there over the years and it just kept breaking? Sid kept taking anything away that Johnny liked and Johnny just gave up on collecting things?

He had more stuff in their room at Mr. Miyagi's. Johnny didn't even have any magazines.

Dutch laughed. "Seriously man? You've barely got anything. This is the easiest move we've done this summer."

"Yeah Daniel's room took like 3 days to pack up," Jimmy said. "That was just his room."

Johnny just shrugged picking up his bonsai and holding it to his chest.

"What about your bike?" Daniel asked.

"I left that at Jimmy's...last semester?" Johnny asked.

"Yup, it's in our garage."

"It was safer there," Johnny said.

Daniel held the box he was using to pack up Johnny's desk that was so bland and boring that he wanted to drop it to the floor and hug Johnny, but Tommy beat him to it.

"Well your new places can be filled with stuff," Tommy said.

"I really don't need much," Johnny said. "But thanks."

A lot of Johnny's stuff went to Jimmy's place with the promise it'd be moved into his room at his Mom's new home when she got set up.

She seemed so excited, following them to their cars to see them off holding her champagne in one hand, her other hand in her pocket, looking so at ease.

The rubble of the mansion behind her, workers taking it apart like ants to carry off pieces that could be reused elsewhere.

Johnny promised to come home for dinners, to the new place and Daniel wanted to see what kind of house Ms. Lawrence would create.

The mansion was all Sid from the looks of it. All gaudy and extravagant in unnecessary ways.

She promised a housewarming party that could double as a divorce party and Daniel thought that sounded like fun. A good way to celebrate the end of an awful chapter.

He sat in the Avanti as she walked over to the driver's side, leaning over to give Johnny a hug and kiss the top of his head. A promise to see each other again soon.

When they got home the phone was ringing and Daniel took off in a run to get it. He watched Johnny carefully carry his few things to their room listening as the agent told him his bid for the property by the train tracks and the pottery shop was cleared. She congratulated him and told him to come by to sign the paperwork at his earliest convenience next week.

He thanked her warmly and took off towards their room, throwing his arms around Johnny telling him the good news.

"Congratulations!" Johnny said catching him, hands thankfully free.

"I just have to pick up the paperwork sometime next week. And then I can tell Mr. Miyagi."

"How are you going to tell him?" Johnny asked.

"I'm thinking I might make a joke. Tell him I graduated early, present it as a diploma."

Johnny laughed. "Cute."

"Cute? I'm going for tongue in cheek. A way to kill two birds with one stone, which maybe I need another idiom that isn't violent. Mr. Miyagi would not approve of that one huh? But I want to find a way to soften the blow that I'm not going to college. Because that money he gave me for betting on me and winning in Okinawa was for school and like I tried to give him the money back to pay for his dreams. Because like yeah I broke the ice, but Mr. Miyagi taught me what I needed to know to do it, and he's the one who put money where my mouth wouldn't stop running. And I get that that was stupid, but like he was doing it wrong, don't you have to tell people when they're doing it wrong if they could hurt themselves right? He could've turned to me and been like, okay so how should I be doing it? But instead, it just pissed him off. My own fault. I know. I know. But I want to give some of it back. And I'll have enough money to pay for rent for a couple of months and with everything I don't have to buy now, it'll be much easier to set it up for him. I mean I kind of hope he'll let me work there you know. That'd be nice. Assisting with customers. Talking about bonsai. Answering the phone. Much more fun than sitting in a classroom. I'd get to talk to people. This would be my classroom. So like Hey Mr. Miyagi didn't actually go to school, bought you a shop for your dreams instead, don't be mad. I'll workshop that. Come up with something better. I just hope he can see its charm and potential you know? That he gives this retirement dream a-" Daniel paused and laughed softly, "college try."

Daniel was excited. That, even was an understatement. Ecstatic. He had a good feeling about the shop. About Mr. Miyagi's Little Trees. He had so many plans and ideas. Where he wanted things to go, how he envisioned the shop. But it wasn't his. It was Mr. Miyagi's. But he wanted to help. Whatever Mr. Miyagi needed. The man had been through so much he deserved a chance to live out his dream.

The rest of July slipped past Daniel. He got the paperwork from the agent, helped the guys pack for college which was hectic. But it was kind of nice to just work and not think. To see what they thought was important to go with them. What they floundered about.

Bobby had a list. Things the girls had told him to pack that were useful to take. His siblings wandered in and out fluctuating between upset and curious. They had a million questions about college. They were mad he was leaving them. Sad he was leaving.

He kept answering their questions, patient. Every once in a while when they'd end up in the way Dutch would just scoop them up, one under each arm, and they'd shout and giggle in delight and he'd carry them off dumping them off somewhere else in the house before running back and shutting the door.

It was clearly a game, as they'd come back and it'd start over again.

"You're just trying to get out of work," Jimmy complained with a sigh.

"If anyone should it should be me," Dutch said gathering them up in his arms again as they came giggling pushing the door open. "I mean I'm the only one who isn't moving this year. By the time all of you are in the dorms I'll have moved everyone. The LaRusso's, Mr. Miyagi, the Lawrence's, and you three," he said turning and walking down the hall.

"I hate to admit we've worked him to the bone this summer," Tommy said.

"It's good for him," Bobby said but he looked like he doubted it. He sighed, hands over the box he was working on and head down. "We are kind of leaving him behind. I mean Johnny's got Daniel and they have Mr. Miyagi. What is Dutch going to do?"

"Look at you all worried," Dutch said with a laugh.

Bobby looked up startled. "How did you-?"

"They said they wanted to go outside and play so I just dumped them outside the door this time," Dutch said with a shrug. "Don't worry about me. Taekwondo's been keeping me busy. My Sabomnim's talking about competitions, apparently, I'm better at it than I was at karate. So right now I'm studying Korean, because there's a chance to study in Seoul. My parents like it. They've got contacts there for work, so it's useful. I've got plenty to do. Plus I plan to visit you all and Johnny and Daniel aren't moving, so I can visit them and the shop if I get bored."

"Shit Dutch you didn't tell us it was going that well!" Jimmy said.

"We've been busy," Dutch said.

"You'll have to let us know when you have tournaments so we can come watch," Tommy said.

"Well of course, but bring babes will you? I want my cheer section to be hot, bring all the smart college chicks so they can watch me win and show off," Dutch said with a grin.

"You might be overestimating our collective abilities here, Bobby is an outlier," Jimmy said with a laugh. "I mean he might be able to get your cheer section full, but I don't think it'll be the way you want it to be."

"We'll try," Tommy said. "It's the best you'll get."

"I'll take it. I don't think I'll meet too many babes just hanging around with Johnny and Daniel at this point. The last cool one they met is still overseas."

"Hey, you don't know that," Daniel said. "We're opening a shop, who knows the kind of people who'll become frequent customers."

"You know one of the things I like about you, Daniel?" Dutch asked tilting his head back to look at him.

"What?"

"Your optimism."

Getting all of the guys packed up was a feat and it was exhausting. But it was a relief when it was done. He could focus on other things, like the presentation of his gift for Mr. Miyagi.

Daniel decided to make a box for the paperwork. He talked with his old shop teacher who said he could come in over the summer and work on it. The teacher already had summer classes he was teaching so it wasn't like the high school was locked.

Daniel left early one morning towards the end of the month to put the box together. He was pretty proud of it.

When he came home Johnny was sitting with Mr. Miyagi.

Mr. Miyagi was drinking tea and Johnny was reading a piece of paper.

There were a lot of them, a whole stack in his hands.

"What are you reading?" Daniel asked after sneaking the box into his room and coming back.

"Ah, we get mail from Okinawa," Mr. Miyagi said.

"Really? Who's it from?"

"Chozen-san," Mr. Miyagi said.

"What!" Daniel asked louder than he meant.

He thought they'd left Chozen behind. Thought he'd never have to hear that name again.

If they were going to get mail from someone he'd expected Yukie or Kumiko. Not Chozen. And why was it so long? Was it a damn love letter? Daniel should be the one writing love letters. Not Chozen. Did Chozen not understand that Daniel and Johnny were dating?

Daniel thought he'd learned his lesson, but apparently not. Did Daniel have to go back and kick his ass again?

It sounded exhausting. He didn't even want to think about it.

Johnny glanced up.

"Not just Chozen. He collected updates from everyone and transcribed them. Kumiko's started her dance troupe in Tokyo. She's doing well. Rehearsals are almost over and her first show is in a couple of weeks. Sato's dojos are doing well and he's working on trying to restore the castle and got rid of some of the fishing boats to try and bring the fish back. He's included all the vegetables and fruit they planted and how they've been growing and the progress. Ichiro and Yuna are both doing well, they send their regards. Both want to know if we've been playing. Yukie also wrote a couple of pages which I haven't gotten to, there are about 6 pages in Okinawan for Mr. Miyagi. But she also wrote to us."

"That's it? He talked about vegetables but then collected for everyone else?" Daniel asked suspiciously sitting down next to him.

"Well, I'm not done reading yet."

"Johnny-san reading and summarizing," Mr. Miyagi said with a smile.

"We'll have to write them back," Johnny said. "Also Yuna sent us art, see?"

Daniel saw Johnny flip back through and show a picture of the village, drawn in a kid's crayons of a blonde boy sitting at the temple with a brunette next to him.

Daniel smiled warmly. Mr. Miyagi chuckled a little.

"What's funny?" Daniel asked.

"What's written," Mr. Miyagi said with a smile, pointing. "Yuna misspell, write old married couple."

Daniel looked closer at the writing, he couldn't read it, but he wanted to memorize it.

Daniel leaned against Johnny gently taking it from him. They'd have to stick it up somewhere. Frame it. It was very cute.

After a while Johnny flipped to the next page, reading again. "He listed everything he's working on. He wants to know what we've been up to. Promises to relay it to everyone else. Wishes us well. Wants us to write back soon and to visit again."

Daniel frowned leaning over. It said you. He wondered if it meant Johnny or both of them.

Daniel was going to assume Chozen meant Johnny but would act as if he meant both.

He'd write back after he told Mr. Miyagi about the shop. But Johnny could get started. Johnny had a lot happen so far since they'd gotten back. If that was something he wanted to share.

Johnny flipped to the next page, but instead of pages, it was photos.

Photos from their trip to the Aquarium.

Johnny and Daniel and Kumiko wandering around together, looking at everything. It was cute. They were lit in a blue glow. Johnny's eyes were so bright.

Daniel's arm was hooked through Johnny's in one, pointing at a fish he remembered he'd never seen before.

"Turn out nice," Mr. Miyagi said with a nod of approval.

"They did," Daniel said smiling. "I wonder how they were used."

"No one said," Johnny said flipping back through the letter.

Maybe getting mail from Chozen occasionally wasn't an altogether bad thing.

Especially if Daniel thought of it as him having to run around and collect what people wanted to say and sit and translate it. Putting Chozen to work wasn't bad. They could give him a lot to tell everyone else. Make him do more work.

It was effort for something good, positive. To keep them connected despite the ocean. With friends.

Plus Mr. Miyagi was holding his half of the letter like it was precious. And Daniel could almost forgive Chozen because of the tender look on Mr. Miyagi's face. Almost.

Neighbors

Johnny had dinner plans with his mother.

It was the day Daniel was supposed to go to college but planned to tell Mr. Miyagi. Johnny wasn't so sure about Daniel taking Mr. Miyagi at night to the shop location but Daniel was determined. Said it would seem like he'd gone to classes.

Johnny liked the shop. Liked the space. But he thought taking Mr. Miyagi there in the dark might not be starting off on the right foot. Might not give off as much charm as Daniel believed. But he was sure Daniel could fill in that gap. He could charm enough to make the most run-down place seem okay to Mr. Miyagi or himself.

They drove around for part of the day. Killing time.

Daniel was too excited, too nervous to focus on anything he wanted to do.

They had put together the date jar, but Daniel had said he was too nervous about his surprise for Mr. Miyagi to do anything. He didn't want to ruin any date.

So he drove. Talking as he drove. It was all twisty and winding, everything he said because he was too excited. Jumping from one topic to another. Talking about the last call he'd had with his mother, about his uncle Louie. About the letter, they'd gotten from Chozen and all the things he was planning to write back. About different trees that might be fun to see as a bonsai. That turned into him just trying to list off trees for a couple of hours.

He ended up dropping Johnny off at his mom's new place early.

Laura invited Daniel in when he shifted on his feet outside the front door, determined to walk Johnny up but then unsure whether to come in or not. Relieved she invited him in. A welcome distraction.

She walked around, giving them the tour.

"Three bedrooms, this one's yours," she said smiling warmly.

Johnny's things were in there. A new bed. A bear he hadn't seen since he was little that Daniel seemed way too interested in.

He looked at his Mom, trying to express the Why would you put it on the bed like that? mixed with Where did you even find it?

She smiled at him. "I kept some of our stuff in storage. Anything Sid said I should throw out went into storage. Glad I decided to not listen to him."

Daniel turned around the room taking it in before grabbing Johnny and pulling him in.

Johnny turned to see what he was looking at. A wall with a big window with a window seat in it and two big bookcases full of books and photos on either side.

Photos of him and the guys. From starting karate, birthday parties at their homes, just random adventures, pictures from New York. From when they met all the way up to the last night in the mansion.

His mother had taken a marker and written "Peas in a pod" on the glass of the photo she'd taken.

Laura walked in and smiled.

"They gave me copies of all the photos. I'm just waiting on getting copies from your trip to Okinawa," she said with a pointed smile. "Not sure who to talk to about that. Tommy's trying."

"Chozen sent us a few from the aquarium," Johnny said.

"Chozen huh?" Laura said thoughtfully. "Guy who tried to kill Daniel? Why's he sending you mail?"

"I asked the same question, but he did send the photos and updated us on everyone," Daniel said.

Laura had an amused smile on her lips looking between the two of them. Holding something in, stopping herself from saying something. She turned to continue her tour and showed them the guest bedroom, the kitchen, her office, and the backyard. There was only his fuchsia planted in the garden.

"Not much yet, but that's kind of the fun of it. Daniel you'll have to let me know when Mr. Miyagi's Little Trees officially opens so I can get some."

"Of course Ms. Lawrence," Daniel said.

They ended up sitting for a while talking about plants and what she wanted to put in the garden. She'd gotten a book on plants from a local shop and they poured over it, putting sticky notes on the ones she liked. Purple Needle Grass, yucca, a vegetable garden with carrots, eggplant, squash, and tomatoes, some blue mountain lilacs to cover some of the beds, a desert willow, and a western redbud.

It was going to be a lot of work. But it'd be pretty. And it'd keep her busy.

She looked happy. No fancy dresses. No high heels.

The house was exactly what Johnny would've thought of when he thought of a place that was his mother's. Cozy, bright, functional.

Eventually, Daniel had to leave and Johnny walked him out to his Ford.

"It's going to go great," Johnny said.

"I know, I just hope he likes it," Daniel said holding the box with the paperwork in it.

"He will," Johnny said leaning in through the window of the Ford to kiss Daniel. "He'll love it. Because it's from you."

Daniel smiled at him. "You enjoy your dinner with your mom. I"ll see you later."

Johnny kissed him again before carefully moving back out the window and standing a couple of steps back so Daniel could drive away.

"Very sweet," Laura said wrapping an arm around his shoulders. "Now, what sounds good for dinner. Whatever you want. Let's make it happen."

Johnny smiled following her back to her house.

It was hard not to think of what could've been. How nice growing up in a house with just his Mom might've been. How much easier on the both of them. If things had been just a little different. If he'd found the guys sooner. If, like Bobby had said, they'd all picked a different dojo, if instead of starting a fight with Daniel he'd been a friend from the start if the elderly couple from the flower shop hadn't died, if his mother hadn't met Sid, if Sid had actually been a good person and not awful, if Kreese had actually cared.

For a long time, Johnny thought it was his fault. Some things were. But he thought Sid hated him because of who he was. Because there was something about Johnny that turned a charming man into something sinister.

He'd thought the same with Kreese the night of the tournament. That Kreese had been patient with him right up until that moment and then because of Johnny something had snapped.

But Johnny had heard Sid's staff whispering at parties when he got older, while sneaking drinks for Ali and him to have in the gardens of whatever fancy place they were in. Whispering that Sid seemed charming at first, a dream to work with until there was the smallest bump in the road, until things weren't going his way, until you didn't move fast enough or get his drink just right and then he was a nightmare. Whispers that made Johnny think as he walked through crowded rooms that it wasn't just him.

With Kreese it took longer. It took the guys and Daniel and the gentle conversations with Mr. Miyagi and time spent in Okinawa to heal and repair the damage.

He wasn't sure if he'd even fully healed, but it was no longer a raw gaping wound that hurt every time he tried to breathe. It was manageable and there were moments he forgot. When the shadows of them didn't darken his skies.

He'd needed a vacation from his life to see it better. To understand that Kreese and Sid's behavior wasn't his fault, that there wasn't something inherently and irrevocably wrong with him.

His mother pulled out a pitcher of iced tea from the fridge and poured him some. Sitting down next to him at her kitchen island.

"You need a vacation," Johnny told her.

She looked at him head tilted, waiting for an explanation as she squeezed lemon into her tea and dropped it in.

"It can help sometimes," he said.

"Okinawa?" she asked.

"Yeah," he said warmly.

"Maybe after I finish setting everything up," she said. "Do you want to go somewhere? We could go somewhere together."

Johnny nodded and she smiled patting his hand.

"That will be fun," she said.

Johnny smiled, sipping his tea as she got out a list of local delivery shops and set them down in front of him with a flourish, like a fancy waitress at a fancy restaurant to tell him all the options he had to chose from.

He laughed and leaned forward looking at them with the air he'd seen countless times of a guy in a jewelry shop looking overwhelmed trying to tell the difference between actual diamonds and cubic zirconia, determined that he actually could tell the difference to impress whoever he was with.

He picked one and passed it to her and she smiled.

It was nice. To just sit with her. To just talk. To hear the things she wanted to do and work on.

The narrow possibilities he limited himself to opened up.

If he wanted to go to school he could.

He could study whatever he wanted. Not just something Sid found useful. No caveats. No restrictions.

If he wanted to study overseas they could work it out. They daydreamed as they waited for their food. A time where Johnny studied overseas and his mother came to visit. Anywhere in the world.

He could go backpacking if he wanted, not to run away but to actually just go on an adventure for the fun of it.

The problem was he didn't want to go anywhere for an extended period of time at the moment. He wanted to stay right there.

But maybe, someday.

When the shop was doing well. When everything else was flourishing. A mini-vacation. A mini trip.

She sketched out her plans for the garden and he helped.

She talked about the business she might start. Something to help and give back. Maybe help other women, single moms like her, like Lucille. She liked that, Johnny liked that.

She said she'd call Lucille and get her input, grabbing another piece of paper to write out her ideas.

When the night came to an end she drove him home.

She'd kept the old car.

Johnny froze when he saw it and she laughed.

"I kept everything. I think there's something about losing almost everything that makes you try to hold onto as much as you can. Had it fixed up and maintained and it's been in storage for a while, but it's still reliable," she said patting it. "Kind of part of our family you know? It got us through the rough times."

Johnny nodded, opening the door and sinking into the passenger seat.

It smelled the same, hitting him suddenly like he was a small kid being driven around by his mom, trips to the carhop after a doctor's appointment, sleeping in the backseat, driving to the beach, to the park. Listening to music on the radio. His mother singing as she drove.

It was like a blast from the past. He'd never felt the full force of that phrase until then.

A different world a different time.

When she dropped him off and kissed him on the cheek, he waved her off.

No one was home.

The truck was gone but the Ford was there.

There was fish set on the table getting cold.

He cleaned up.

Mr. Miyagi would want to eat later.

The little outside grill was still going.

Daniel must've been in a rush. Too excited.

Johnny put out the fire, relieved that it'd been small enough not to have spread.

His mother had given him champagne for Mr. Miyagi for his shop.

He put it in the fridge to chill.

He wondered what else they'd like. It looked like they hadn't been able to eat dinner. He could reheat it. It wouldn't be as good as Mr. Miyagi's, but Yukie had shown him ways to reheat fish with rice that wasn't as nightmarish a result as putting it in the microwave. He'd work on that while he waited. Putting the rice back on to warm up again.

He'd brought his bonsai out for company. Telling it about his mother's place, how comforting it was. A dream of what could have been but a nice place to go now. Told it about Daniel in his mother's place, watching them interact. How Daniel's shoulders hadn't been as tense this time like he was getting more comfortable around her, about how when Daniel got home with Mr. Miyagi there might be a shop full of bonsai just like it. A place full of little trees to brighten other people's lives just like this bonsai had brightened his.

Johnny heard the sound of the truck returning and re-set the table with a hot dinner and tea for Mr. Miyagi and waited.

He heard them talking. Mostly Daniel talking about all the designs. Mr. Miyagi telling him about the bonsai. Where they could go to find some good ones.

"Welcome home," Johnny said warmly motioning to dinner, remade.

Mr. Miyagi smiled sitting down to his fish and rice and soup and Daniel hugged Johnny, all excited.

"I just needed to hug someone," Daniel sighed into his neck. "Mr. Miyagi, tell him what you told me."

Johnny sat with Daniel still holding on tight.

"Daniel-san make paperwork mistake," Mr. Miyagi said handing the box over to Johnny. "Fixed it."

Johnny took it as Daniel rested his chin on Johnny's shoulder looking over all excited.

Johnny unfurled it and looked for changes. He found it, next to Mr. Miyagi's name was Daniel's.

He glanced over and Daniel grinned absolutely ecstatic. Delighted. "Partners," he said warmly.

Johnny smiled. He should've expected it. Mr. Miyagi wouldn't have let Daniel give him such a big gift without equaling it out somehow. Balance maybe was a better term for it Johnny thought amused as Daniel pulled away to help himself to dinner and eat.

"We're going to go looking for trees we can turn into bonsai, do you want to join us?" Daniel asked, leaning towards Mr. Miyagi, "What time again?"

"Five am, lots of climbing to do," Mr. Miyagi said.

Daniel blinked then looked sheepishly at Johnny. "Maybe you won't want to join us then," he said with an uneasy look.

"If you don't think you'll need help getting the trees, I can go to the shop and start cleaning up," Johnny said remembering all the spiderwebs.

"You really don't have to," Daniel said looking at him.

"It's fine, I'd like to," Johnny said.

He probably shouldn't have said that. He didn't sleep much longer than Daniel, getting up and eating breakfast with them in the morning before the sun rose, in the dusty gray of the morning. Daniel had dug out his orange puffy coat and he and Mr. Miyagi left and Johnny went to the shop.

The amount of dust and spiderwebs was intense. He'd come prepared with his Walkman and his own bonsai for companions. But it was a lot of work. Getting rid of the dirt and grime and layers of dust that made it seem like the place hadn't been touched in a century.

Johnny tried to remember when the last time he'd been in the area if he could remember the actual shop. He couldn't. No matter how much he tried to remember as he worked.

He locked up to go for lunch, wandering around the area. There was a little cafe further down the street. He entered the bell ringing. He ordered a sandwich and a coffee. A red-haired girl came in looking up at the menu. She was covered in clay. Smelled like the high school art classroom. She glanced up at him.

"Any recommendations?" she asked.

"I don't know actually," he said.

"New to the area?" she asked.

"More like returned after a long time, but also new I guess," Johnny said.

"Jessica Andrews," she said holding out her hand and smiling up at him.

"Johnny Lawrence," he said.

She smiled up at him. "Nice to meet you, Johnny."

She stepped forward, looking at the menu, and placed her order.

"Hey," she said turning back to him. "Want to sit together? I got time off from the shop. I haven't really had a chance to like meet or talk to anyone."

"Uh sure," Johnny said.

They got their food and sat at a table by the menu. She worked at the ceramics shop across the street. Lived above it. Talked about how she'd been looking forward to having a good time in LA, to enjoy the beaches and the summer but was bored. Had been in town for two months but hadn't met anyone cool. Present company excluded, Johnny seemed cool.

She wanted to go climbing but she was just always making things. Which was fine. But it was lonely. She told him about her stupid boyfriend back home who cheated on her. Talked to him about how boring it was around there. How a summer was supposed to be fun and full of adventures and it'd just been full of clay.

Day in and day out. Clay.

He laughed softly telling her they were neighbors. That he was currently cleaning the shop across the street.

She leaned across the table and pulling a bit of webbing out of his hair. "That explains why you're covered in webs," she said with a laugh.

"Not surprised," he said frowning at the webbing. "Just let me know if you see the spider that belonged to."

"I'll definitely let you know," she said. "So what kind of shop is it going to be?"

"Plants," Johnny said. "Specifically bonsai."

"That's cool!" she said. "I'm so glad something cool is finally moving in. I mean the place next to us is still for sale and it's empty which sucks. It's like we're the only shop open and other than like kids classes no one really comes by. We take most of our orders over the phone."

Johnny wondered if that was a more popular way of selling things. If it might be a good idea for the bonsai shop. To expect to have someone man the phones. Just in case.

It was nice to talk to someone new. To actually meet the neighbors. He'd never really known any neighbors before. It was nice to walk back together, to hear about the neighborhood. The good places to eat. The places to avoid. The people who were dicks. It was good to know.

He bid her a good afternoon, feeling a little better when he opened the door again. He went back to work and soon the place looked different. Bright. Sunshiney. Ready for the next steps.

Pleased with his work he put away his cleaning supplies and cleaned up before heading off to the Avanti, ready to drive home.

They still weren't back yet so Johnny hopped in the shower ready to get rid of spider webs, dust, and dirt.

They were home when he stepped out of the shower. Mr. Miyagi cooking in the kitchen and soft music was playing from the guest room. Their room.

Johnny knocked softly waiting a moment before pushing the door open. He was still trying to figure out what was polite.

Daniel was dancing, he turned to see Johnny and reached out to grab his wrist, pulling him in.

Johnny caught on quickly. Dancing and fighting held similarities.

Watching your partner to see where they telegraphed their move so you knew where to go, a subtle movement of an arm, a leg, a hip and you followed.

It stopped you from having to look at your feet.

It was probably something that had helped Johnny with karate. Having been made to learn at the country club how to dance from a small age. Having to know on the fly how to move, to stay soft on his feet, to be able to read someone's body language to know whether they wanted him in close or to keep his distance.

Daniel wanted him in close. Pressed right up next to him.

The room had enough space. Not for anything fancy, but for the kind of dancing Daniel wanted to do.

No spins, no space between them. It made it easy.

"How was your day?" Johnny asked, voice barely a whisper.

He didn't have to be loud. Daniel was right there in his arms, arms around him, so close Johnny could feel his heart beating in his chest, feel his breath against his skin.

"We got some nice trees," Daniel said with a smile. "We swung by the shop. You worked hard, I almost didn't recognize it."

"I met the neighbors," Johnny said. "Or a neighbor."

"Oh?" Daniel asked, moving his hand around Johnny's waist along his spine.

"A Jessica Andrews from Ohio, she works at the pottery studio."

"Is she pretty?" Daniel asked, head tilted.

Johnny wasn't sure how to answer that. She was kind of what Johnny expected of a little sister. She had been in town for two months with nothing to show for it. Except for a whole bunch of pottery. He was surprised how little she'd gotten to do despite being in town for so long. But it sounded like she was struggling to get out and explore, like she didn't want to on her own. Which didn't fully match the adventurous spirit she had.

"I think it gets lonely around there. A lot of the shop fronts are still for sale and she lives there. Plus she's really cut up about her breakup."

Johnny had heard a lot about her ex and Elizabeth Anne Rooney. Maybe they could help her make friends. So her whole California experience wasn't a total bust. He remembered how awful breaks up were and what it was like to not have friends. Daniel's hand on his back that was keeping him close was moving down.

"Johnny," Daniel whispered, eyes dark. "Sounds like you made another new friend. Like Chozen?"

Johnny was so surprised he laughed. Chozen and Jessica Andrews were nothing alike.

It almost distracted from the weight of Daniel's hand.

Johnny thought they were going to change the subject to that, the hand on his ass, not Chozen or Jessica.

He didn't think he'd have to tell Daniel everything about Jessica. He figured he'd go over and talk to her too. Work something out like he'd planned to with pots for the bonsai. Get custom-made things.

Johnny didn't know where Daniel's mind had gone. What he was thinking about with that look on his face? Johnny took his hand out of Daniel's and lifted his hands to Daniel's face.

"Nothing alike, you'll see when you meet her. You can get to know her yourself. But if you don't mind, before Mr. Miyagi finishes making dinner I'd like to kiss my boyfriend who I've missed all day and haven't seen all day."

He brushed his thumb over Daniel's lips, looking for an answer to his request.

Daniel licked his thumb. Johnny took that as permission and kissed him softly as the radio played romantic ballads, as Daniel's hand that had been holding his and was free now, went up into his hair, the two hands trying to hold Johnny as close to him as possible.

He'd missed Daniel all day. It was why he'd taken his Walkman and bonsai, because he knew the silence would be too much. Missed the sound of him talking, the hand in his, the warmth of his skin, the smell of him, his laugh, his smile, the way he talked with his hands.

What was Johnny going to do if one of them ever had to go somewhere without the other for an extended period of time? He'd be like one of those dogs that whine by the door, moping and sad, waiting for Daniel to come back and be in his arms again. Or to run back to him, impatient to be home once again.

No matter what happened, no matter the path before, even if it'd been dark and hard, it led to this home. The one that was Daniel and it made everything more manageable, worth it to come home and find Daniel. To feel his lips on his, to hear him talk, and to feel the strong heart beating in his chest.

Somewhere between 14 and 400

Chapter Notes

> According to the wiki Daniel's birthday is December 18, 1966. Which according to my math means he was 18 for the first match and will be 19 for the second All-Valley. I get that the age thing is kind of wonky because otherwise, Daniel's 16 from the candles in the first movie and thus skipped a bunch of grades to graduate over the summer. (thank you usa123 for this alternative explanation when I expressed my confusion on the whole timeline and Scaperanya for also trying to explain the weirdness of the all-valley documents in the first place.)
> Either way the whole things a mess. I'm going with the wiki's birthdate instead of the candles for Daniel.

Daniel thought things were maybe going to start getting good, not that they weren't good, but better. Better better. But Johnny barely reacted to Daniel's hand on his ass. Like he hadn't noticed.

What the hell did that mean?

Was it welcome enough that Johnny didn't mind? Could he keep going?

Or was the guy absolutely numb? Was this one of those cases of waiting until marriage?

Wait, Johnny had had sex with Ali.

So what the hell?

They'd dated for 2 years. How long had it taken?

Oh god was he going to have to meet up with Ali and ask?

Was that something you asked your boyfriend's ex-girlfriend?

That seemed to be over the line. Which one he didn't know, but one of them.

Plus she was at school, he didn't want to go all the way out there and be like Hey Ali, how long into your relationship did you two have sex?

She'd probably slap him.

He didn't want to say make love. Or become lovers. He needed it to be more impersonal for those two. A separation through terms, which would make it sound worse. Harsher.

He'd deserve to be slapped.

What if it'd only been a few weeks? What if it'd been a shorter period of time?

What if it was longer?

Was it like the five-date thing?

100 dates later and congrats you win sex?

He tried to do the math in his head.

How many dates had they officially been on?

How many if you counted all the ones from before? Surely well over 100.

Daniel wanted something. He had Johnny in his bed already, but he hadn't had Johnny in his bed.

Old married couple was what Yuna wrote.

Had they skipped a step?

Didn't old married couples still have sex?

Surely they did.

Hadn't he overheard old people talking about sex still? Well into their 80's? 90's?

They were open about it, awkwardly from what he remembered in Newark, of the old people chatting away in the parks while playing chess.

And Johnny was out here meeting girls.

Daniel already still had to shoo away Chozen who he thought they'd left behind in Okinawa, and now there was some girl at the pottery shop across the street?

It was that stupid game at the arcade with the mallet with gophers.

Johnny had been left alone for a day.

He was like a wounded antelope and the lions came circling.

But that kiss.

All the kisses were always so damn nice.

He was going to have to talk to Johnny. Have to learn more if there were steps and rules.

Which with five dates it seemed like there were. How weird was California? Was it an LA thing? Or just a Johnny thing?

In the morning mail came from the All Valley addressed to Daniel.

Mr. Miyagi showed no interest in it when Daniel showed him, just nodding and getting into his truck, saying he'd go work on the shop and see the boys later. He asked Daniel to teach Johnny the kata Mr. Miyagi had shown him in the mountains.

Johnny was sitting on the wooden walkway reading.

Daniel had the urge to bite him.

An ear, or his neck, to kiss him and leave a mark. A hickey. A love bite.

He needed to get a response, and maybe that'd do it. Proof that Johnny's blood got going somewhere somehow.

What if Johnny was going slow because he thought Daniel's knee was still bothering him? Didn't want to do anything to hurt him?

Daniel frowned at the thought sitting down next to Johnny holding up from the All-Valley. Maybe whatever this said would prove that Daniel wasn't as frail as he looked.

Johnny looked up from his book turning to look at Daniel, putting a bookmark in and setting it aside. Waiting.

"I got mail from the All Valley," Daniel said sitting down next to him.

"Really? Revoking your title for your illegal kick?" Johnny asked with a teasing smile.

Oh, that's where they were with that huh? Mr. two first-place All-Valley trophies was going to tease on technicalities?

Daniel was 100% going to bite him. See how long the teasing lasted then. But curiosity was killing him.

He opened the envelope and pulled out the letter scanning it.

"It says I just have to show up and defend my title in the last match. I don't have to compete the rest of the way. A change in the rules."

Johnny frowned leaning over to read the letter over Daniel's shoulder.

"Wait, really?" Johnny asked scooting closer eyeing the paperwork. "Daniel, they haven't changed their rules since they started it. It's the All-Valley Under 18. You were 18 for the last one. You'll be 19 for this one. You don't qualify anymore. Why would they even send this to you? Why would they change the rules now?"

Huh. Daniel hadn't thought about that. He was a little disappointed but the All-Valley had been stressful the year before. Exhausting.

He leaned against Johnny with a sigh.

Johnny was right, it must've been through an error he'd gotten it in the first place.

He balled it up and threw it towards the house.

He turned his head, besides, there were more interesting things to do. He pressed close against Johnny and kissed the soft skin behind his ear, then his neck. Soft and gentle.

This was more interesting. A better way to spend his day than trying to prepare for a tournament he wasn't even sure he really had wanted to do.

He'd just liked that they called him a champion, said it was his title.

He ran his tongue against Johnny's skin, feeling Johnny shiver.

Better. Much better.

He tried to pick a spot he liked. An angle. He let his teeth graze skin. He had to be careful. It was Johnny's neck after all.

Going backward wasn't the goal. He was hoping this would propel him forward. Them forward.

It was a ride for two he wanted if it was an option. He was tired of doing it solo when he had Johnny in his hands, in his arms, he just wanted a green light to move forward, something easier to read and understand.

He nipped at Johnny's neck, trying to tell if it hurt too much but while Johnny had jumped in surprise he hadn't stiffened, hadn't pulled away so Daniel kept going, sucking on skin, drawing out a soft sound from Johnny that was enough to spur him on, to think about working on another, maybe somewhere lower, maybe somewhere else.

Daniel put his hand on Johnny's chest and trailed down and back up, slow, over the fabric and then under, feeling Johnny's skin under his hand, bringing the shirt up with his hand, trying to think of what else sounded good when the phone rang.

"Daniel."

That sounded nice. That tone was what he was looking for. Low and thick. Syrupy.

So he wasn't a damn monk.

The phone was still ringing.

"It-it might be our moms or Mr. Miyagi. Someone might need something."

Daniel needed something.

But Johnny was right.

He could feel Johnny's heavy breath beneath his hand.

If it was a damn salesman Daniel was going to unplug it.

He pulled away looking at Johnny. Lips parted as he tried to control his breath, pupils dilated, face pink.

Damnit.

Just a quick kiss.

Whoever it was could wait a little longer.

He pressed his lips to Johnny's, slipping his tongue between parted lips, he'd eaten something sweet.

Daniel wanted to keep tasting, to figure out what it was.

The phone was still ringing.

If it was the guys he'd murder them.

He pulled away again.

Damn the damn phone.

Whoever it was it better be important.

Daniel got up and got the phone, answering it to find Mr. Miyagi asking for supplies to be brought to the shop if Daniel had time.

The anger and frustration fizzled out and Daniel took down notes on what Mr. Miyagi asked for.

Charcoal, paper, his pen, maybe Daniel would take the bonsai he'd been working on.

He glanced back.

Johnny was lying on the wooden planks on his back with his arm over his eyes.

Daniel smiled. Okay, he could work with this. He'd figure something out.

But responsibilities first. Then he could come back and maybe they could take this somewhere more comfortable.

A quick trip to the shop. Help Mr. Miyagi like he promised, then back to spend time with his boyfriend. Maybe tack on lover to that title.

"It was Mr. Miyagi," Daniel explained hanging up the phone and holding his list, prepared to look around for all the things they needed in the shop that Mr. Miyagi had asked for.

Johnny didn't move. Didn't respond. Maybe Daniel had overdone it.

He walked over and crouched down next to him.

"He wants me to bring stuff by the shop. I probably should've gone with him this morning, but he left the time he normally goes fishing and I didn't want to. I wanted to spend time with you. I still do, but we're partners. I don't want to let him down."

He leaned down, struck by a spark of inspiration. Maybe now Johnny would be receptive by flirting.

"I'll take care of you when I get home," he said, leaning down low next to Johnny's ear, he kissed Johnny's cheek where it wasn't covered in his arm.

Then he frowned, this was no good.

He wanted a kiss before he left.

Johnny wasn't responding.

He'd get the things Mr. Miyagi had asked for then come back. Try again when he came back.

He stood up with a sigh.

Maybe he broke Johnny.

He found the paper, the charcoal, some tacks, his favorite pen, and few other things Mr. Miyagi might need. He grabbed the All-Valley tournament letter because he might as well tell Mr. Miyagi about it anyway. He found the tree he'd been working on in the morning.

Johnny was sitting up again, staring at the book in his hands with a frown. He got up after a moment looking around, gazing through the house, searching until his eyes stopped on Daniel.

Daniel pushed one of the glass doors open.

"I got all my stuff I need. I'll see you later okay?"

Johnny nodded coming towards him, he might get that kiss he wanted after all.

Oh, with that look, for sure.

Daniel smiled tilting his head a smile on his lips.

"Do I get a goodbye kiss?"

Johnny stopped a breath away from Daniel and frowned.

"Never."

Daniel blinked at him in confusion.

It was said so firmly, so flatly.

Hey now, what did that mean?

Why'd he look upset?

Surely Daniel should be upset by that rebuff and rebuke.

Johnny gently tilted Daniel's chin. "Only ever until I see you again. Not goodbye. Never goodbye."

Daniel felt his heart pounding in his chest. Damn.

He didn't want to deliver supplies to Mr. Miyagi.

He wanted to stay there, with Johnny.

Johnny kissed him, it was too short.

Even though it'd been soft and sweet, slow, it was still too short.

Daniel needed a day.

A vacation.

A motel room.

A hotel room.

Something.

Hell, he'd seen a tent in Johnny's trunk. Maybe they could go camping.

Johnny was smiling at him.

"Have fun," he said kissing him, a quick peck on the lips before turning and heading back into the garden.

The bastard was doing it on purpose, wasn't he?

That smile. That damn smile. Did he live off of the continuous frustration in Daniel's life? Did he realize what he did to Daniel and he just refused to take responsibility for it?

Oh, he'd take responsibility for it. Daniel would make sure.

One day he'd corner Johnny, no escape, no interruptions. Just the two of them. And Daniel would take his damn time. Would enjoy whatever they did.

He had a list. They would do it all, slowly. Let Johnny be the one unable to hold back.

Daniel would win.

Maybe this wasn't a good thing to get competitive about.

But that smile was that damn smirk.

The one Johnny had given him in the mirror the first time he'd seen Daniel walk through the doors at Cobra Kai. That playful look. Like Johnny was amused by something and wasn't going to tell him.

He'd corner him and find out, exactly what Johnny was thinking.

Maybe he'd knock two or three off the list in one go.

Daniel turned on his heels with the stuff for Mr. Miyagi and headed out to the Ford.

He could make this quick.

Go help Mr. Miyagi, come back, pick up where they'd left off.

Though that hadn't worked once yet.

Something always interrupted.

Dinner with someone, the guys, Mr. Miyagi, and it was like the door he'd opened just a crack was gone.

He was tired or it took too long or something just always happened.

He sighed as he turned on the radio for the drive.

How did most couples do it?

How had Ali and Johnny-no he didn't want to know.

But they'd both lived at home, had nowhere else to go.

Both had been busy, but still, they'd found a time and place to- he didn't want to know...but he needed advice.

Time. Something.

The drive was easy.

He could do this.

He could act like it's a normal moment, a normal time, like everything was fine because it was.

Johnny was at home not thinking of him, not...doing whatever Johnny did when he was alone.

Damn.

Probably Johnny was just reading whatever damn book he was reading before, but what if he wasn't?

How fast could Daniel drop off the stuff and turn around?

He had to get himself under control.

To just breathe.

He put a big smile on his face.

Dropping off stuff with Mr. Miyagi, setting up the paper on an old door for him, and joking with him about the All-Valley before Mr. Miyagi sent him across the street to get the pots started.

Damn. Okay. It'd be fine.

He wouldn't get distracted by meeting new people or the curiosity about Jessica Andrews that Johnny had sparked.

He walked in, looking around, curious. He knew with a sinking heart he'd lost already. The momentum was gone. He was too damn curious to stay wound up and focused.

There was a girl making a vase or something, totally focused.

She looked young. A picture of her climbing on the wall with a guy's face cut out.

They talked and it was easy, friendly.

Jessica Andrews.

He introduced himself, mentioning he worked across the street with his partner.

"Oh Johnny?" she asked.

Kind of. How did he work that one out? Technically his business partner was Mr. Miyagi. His other partner was Johnny. Very different.

"Johnny works with us," Daniel said warmly.

He didn't know a good way to explain it. They talked a little longer, longer than he meant to, and he agreed to meet her at 7 pm.

He got why Johnny had laughed now.

She was just looking for a friend.

She wasn't looking to date.

It was a non-starter.

And he remembered what it was like to be in LA without any friends, so he agreed to hang out.

Before he even thought of it. Just agreed. Doing exactly what he feared. Distracted, lost the thread he'd held onto so tightly.

She didn't seem enamored with Johnny. Which was a relief.

He made his way across the street realizing he'd given himself a shorter window than he'd meant to find that thread again.

It might as well be lost. Gone for the time being.

He started chatting with Mr. Miyagi as soon as he opened the door.

Mr. Miyagi nodded, listening to Daniel until there was a break.

"Don't forget," Mr. Miyagi said turning. "Teach Johnny-san new kata, we practice together soon."

"Right, don't worry Mr. Miyagi, I'll go straight home," Daniel said with a nod. "You okay here?"

Mr. Miyagi nodded, then passed the All-Valley Tournament paperwork back to Daniel. "Should take match to it."

Daniel blinked at him but shrugged, stuffing it back into his pocket and heading back home in a hurry.

Kata.

He'd forgotten he'd promised Mr. Miyagi to teach Johnny the steps to the one they'd learned while out picking bonsai. Mr. Miyagi thought it'd help both of them figure it out if they worked together. Learned better. Some new teaching techniques. But if it meant alone time with Johnny, it would be more fun then any other chore he'd ever been given. He wouldn't even count it as a chore.

Johnny was laying and reading out in the garden. Same book.

He hopped down into the grass and sat down next to him, trying to get a good look at the book.

Dracula.

Daniel laughed. Why didn't Johnny read anything current?

"Hey, Mr. Miyagi wanted me to teach you the kata he taught me when we were digging up trees for bonsai. Ready to learn?" Daniel asked.

Johnny set his book aside with a bookmark in it and nodded.

He stood and Daniel hopped back up, excited to guide Johnny through the moves.

They turned to one another and bowed.

It was different trying to teach someone, he was acutely aware of every move he made knowing that Johnny was following him, every step he made, every movement of his arms, eyes focused on him, and nothing else.

It got in his head.

A warmth flooding through him.

He tried to focus, remembering each step and doing his best to find and follow the flow that always was so easy.

He could see Johnny out of the corner of his eye moving just a beat, half a second behind him.

Better than he did sometimes trying to follow Mr. Miyagi.

There was that two-time champion at his side.

He'd been wondering where that Johnny had gone. He'd seen the trophies in the back of Johnny's closet. Proof of hard work, just like the muscle. The gi's, the white one for practice, the black one for tournaments. The other little metals and other placed trophies from when he started. All hidden away in a box like it was tainted. Like it was hard to look at. Maybe someday he could get it back out into the open. Because even though Kreese had been the teacher, Johnny had won those through hard work. He deserved to recognize how much work he put in.

Daniel moved carefully, in tune with his breath, taking his practiced steps around the garden until they had gone through the moves enough times that Johnny was moving in sync with him. No longer a beat behind him.

Daniel turned and bowed.

He wondered if he could get Johnny to spar.

Johnny bowed back, blue eyes watching him.

Maybe.

He hasn't practiced much with just Johnny. Usually, they practice alone or with Mr. Miyagi. But he has too much energy even after calming kata.

He smiled and moved into a starting stance.

Johnny stared at him for a moment and then mirrored it.

Daniel circled, Johnny followed.

A perfect mirror, reading him easily in the moment.

How was it he can do that for fighting but almost never any other time?

Johnny made the first move and Daniel grinned.

It's what he was waiting for, blocking the arm that reached out to him.

It was like an intricate dance, moving towards each other and away.

Clashing, testing the ground beneath them, trying to figure out where they were.

The first shot Johnny tried was barely a whisper of a move. Easy to track, easy to block.

But now he was trying.

Warming up, and there went his leg, he always went for a kick Daniel remembered.

Able to kick those legs up higher than Daniel had seen before.

He blocked.

There was more weight to it. Like Johnny was picking a level of difficulty, still fine-tuning it.

And then there was a look in Johnny's eyes that Daniel hadn't seen in a long time.

That smirk from earlier in the day reaching his eyes.

Daniel knows in an instant that he fucked up somewhere.

He'd left something open but he didn't know what or where and he was on the ground looking up at the blue sky, the air knocked out of him and Johnny on top of him.

"I believe that's enough points for a win," Johnny said with a smile.

Daniel didn't know what Johnny did or how he did it.

It was too fast but he can...well... he can cheat.

Daniel surged up kissing him and Johnny kissed him back like it was his prize for winning.

But it was a distraction.

Daniel flipped them, pinning Johnny down.

"Cheater," Johnny said.

Daniel laughed, delighted. Kissing him again. He sat up.

"Question."

"We're breaking for questions?" Johnny asked with a frown, brows knit.

"How many dates have we had?"

Johnny blinked looking up at him, fight flooding away as he calculated.

"14?" Johnny asked.

Daniel frowned.

"Wait, which ones are you counting?"

"You've got a different number?"

"Nearly a 100."

"Definitely not 100."

"Are you only counting the ones since we've gotten back?" Daniel said suddenly realizing where the number came from.

"Two weeks of dates," Johnny said. "Mostly hiking, wait where are you starting your counting from?"

"From like the party."

"We weren't dating."

"People count dates before they're official," Daniel said firmly leaning down close.

Johnny looked at him thoughtfully. Recalculating. Then he frowned.

"What constitute's a date?"

Daniel groaned sliding off of Johnny and laying down by his side covering his face in his hands. Torture. The whole thing was damn torture. He turned to look at Johnny. He could feel the thread he was trying to follow slip through his fingers. He sighed. "You and me, spending time together."

"Then I need a calculator," Johnny said. He frowned thoughtfully then looked over at Daniel again, that playful look in his eyes again. "Wait so any time before we started dating might count?"

"Yes," Daniel said.

Johnny pushed himself up. "Any time we spent together?"

"Yes."

"Okay, that's easy then."

Daniel bolted up. "Then how many dates?"

"Nearly 400," Johnny said with that smirk.

Daniel was going to kiss that damn smirk away.

Wait.

Four hundred?

How the hell did he get that number?

"How did you-"

"We met over a year ago, saw each other nearly every day, sometimes more than once a day. A year is 365, but we've seen each other more than that," Johnny said, proud of himself.

"That doesn't count! Are you counting the damn beach?" Daniel asked.

Johnny was up on his feet, that frustrating fast movement and he was laughing.

"You didn't specify that we had to like each other. Just had to be together. I didn't make the rules, you did."

Daniel got up, reaching for Johnny but he was dodging out of his grasp. Clearly pleased at the loophole he'd exploited.

The way he was staying out of Daniel's reach, Daniel was going to catch him and he was going to kiss him so much that he wouldn't be able to think straight.

He just had to catch him first.

He knew he was smiling back at Johnny.

"You know that's not what I meant."

"I know," Johnny said warmly stopping suddenly and Daniel hadn't expected him to stop moving and crashed into him but Johnny didn't move, they didn't fall, but Johnny caught him and kissed him, beating Daniel to it. Deepening it. "You like lists, we can count them back, it might be fun, together."

It did sound fun. A waste of time, they'd probably argue over what counted as a date, but also fun. Anything could be fun with Johnny.

Mysteries abound

Johnny had taken a nap in the garden. There was a spot well-shaded where he liked to read during the day and after they'd sparred Daniel had hit the shower because he'd run out of time.

Johnny was pretty sure he was dreaming.

Too much Dracula had seeped into his brain.

Because it was dusk and there was a man walking through the house.

Snooping. Looking at things.

He was tall and wearing all black, smiling a devilish smile as he went through Mr. Miyagi's things.

He didn't pocket any of it. So it wasn't a thief. A vampire maybe?

It's not what he thought Dracula would look like.

Dracula had a mustache.

This man had no facial hair, but long black hair slicked back into a ponytail.

He darted off to hide as Daniel walked out of the shower in his robe, dancing and humming on the way to their room.

The man stopped to look near the front door at Mr. Miyagi's medal of valor.

The smile was sinister.

The man panicked looking caught and then ducked low and disappeared up the chimney like a reverse Santa Claus.

Definitely a dream. No one in real life would do that.

Johnny shut his eyes going back to sleep, hoping for a different, less weird dream.

Johnny woke up when he felt Daniel gently patting his shoulder.

"Hey, I was wondering where you were."

It was dark out and Daniel looked a little shaken up.

Johnny sat up fast.

"You okay?"

"Yeah," Daniel said with a smile not quite bright as normal.

Johnny pulled him close, into his arms.

Daniel had had plans to meet up with Jessica. Something about how she had no friends and showing her around.

He'd asked Johnny if he wanted to come but he was too tired, had overdone cleaning the shop.

But now with panic flooding his veins, he was wide awake.

"Did you get hurt?"

He'd let down his guard. He knew Daniel was a magnet for danger. But he thought Jessica wouldn't bring any with her. That the neighborhood would be fine.

"Yeah, just some guys determined that I join the All-Valley this year, came into the shop. They didn't start anything really but it was there you know. Like the start of something. But I'd never met them before. It's not like you or Chozen, they're gunning for me and I don't even know them or anyone they would know," Daniel whispered into Johnny's shoulder.

"How many?"

"Two," Daniel said.

Maybe someone had broken into the house. But how? They'd come in from the garden side and there was a big fence.

Through the gate?

Johnny would, when Daniel was calm, grab a knife and poke around in the chimney to see if there was someone still up there, maybe call Tommy and ask for advice on mystery solving.

But first Daniel was upset.

Two guys.

Against Daniel at the shop.

Johnny was pissed.

For the All Valley?

Who cared?

"Did you tell them you were too old?"

Daniel laughed softly into his neck. "No, but I walked Jessica back and came home. Kind of ruined the plans."

"Do you want to do something with me?" Johnny asked.

"Yes," Daniel said.

He was wearing his red shirt, one of the ones from Okinawa under a blue hoodie. Dressed nicely for a night out.

They could do a night out.

He just needed to poke around first.

Maybe tea. Tea first. Tea was calming.

"How about we have some tea, I make a call, and you think about where you want to go or what you want to do," Johnny said.

Daniel nodded but didn't move.

"Want me to carry you?" Johnny asked.

Daniel took a deep breath and slowly pulled back.

"No," he said softly standing up.

Johnny took his hand pulling it up and kissing the top of Daniel's hand.

"I'm sorry about your evening."

Daniel ran his free hand through his dark hair with a sigh.

"It's fine. I just-I'm getting tired of it you know? Like every couple of months it feels like someone new hates me. I've managed to befriend or sort of come into good standing with everyone up until now, but this one, Johnny, he looked like he wanted to rip me to shreds for the fun of it. Even if he got what he wanted. He was...worse than everyone else."

"He came into the shop?"

"Yeah," Daniel said softly.

"I'll ask the guys about security measures."

"I don't think that's necessary," Daniel said. "I don't want to worry Mr. Miyagi."

"Jimmy's cousin's bar had pests, they got rid of them, Let me ask around okay? Do you know this guy's name?"

Daniel sighed as they walked back into the house.

Johnny depositing him in the kitchen at one of the tables and starting the kettle.

"Mike."

Johnny turned with a frown.

"Mike?"

Johnny had seen a Mike in one of the karate magazines Bobby got. A Mike Barnes. Couldn't be the same one. He wasn't LA though.

"Yeah. You know him?"

"I know of a Mike. I don't know if it's him. He's not an LA local for karate. So we haven't fought. But he sometimes is in the karate magazines. They gave him the title of Bad Boy even though that's usually used for...well it's usually used for a guy girls want to date for looking rough on the outside and their parents not liking him but being okay on the inside. He's actually just a dick from what I've heard. I mean you have to pay to put out an ad like that in the magazines, so he's full of himself to take out a full-page ad or someone is. Because it wasn't an ad for a show or a fight or anything. Just him. He's the kind of fighter that Kreese would love. Though I don't think he was even on Kreese's radar. He didn't really look outside of LA. He didn't pay attention to the competition."

The kettle whistled, finished boiling and he set the box of tea out in front of Daniel so he could pick one and grabbed the mug Daniel always gravitated towards, it looked homemade.

Johnny set it on the table in front of Daniel and grabbed another mug for himself.

Pouring water into both and setting it back on the stove.

Mr. Miyagi's truck was home. So he was around somewhere. He'd have to talk to him too.

Johnny grabbed a pair of scissors, thinking a knife might scare Daniel.

"I'll be right back," he said picking out a tea bag and set it down next to Daniel for himself, and walked out towards the fireplace ducking low. He lit a match to see better and with match and scissors held in front of him, he twisted to look up into the chimney.

No demonic man was hiding up there.

That was a relief. Maybe it was a dream.

But- But!

There was a shoe print in the fireplace.

Johnny felt his heart race.

Damn it. It hadn't been a dream. He should've gotten up. He should've tried to fight the bastard.

He grabbed the phone and called Tommy.

"Hello?" came after the fifth ring.

Tommy sounded tired. It was the first week of school. He'd been sent all the guy's schedules and syllabuses. He was reading the books they were supposed to be reading, think they could all talk about it together like old times.

But his heart was pounding in his chest to think that far in the future.

Someone had broken in. And not a small guy he could easily take.

A guy bigger than Kreese.

"Tommy, it's Johnny. Someone broke into Mr. Miyagi's house. There's a shoe print in the fireplace. I was half asleep so I thought it was a dream. Daniel's being harassed by- well... possibly Mike Barnes and his friends, there's was two of them but usually, there's more. What do I do? Do I tell them about the break-in? Do I call the police? Daniel's already pretty shaken already," Johnny whispered in a rush.

"Woah woah, Johnny slow down. You saw someone poking around Mr. Miyagi's?"

"Yeah. I don't think he took anything though."

"Hold on," Tommy said.

Johnny heard him rummaging through the drawer.

"Okay, I'll call Jimmy to see if it's even worth filing a report. Usually, it is but the police can be...a pain. Plus with Daniel already dealing with shit it might be best not to. Try to get a picture of the print with like a ruler next to it so we know more about it. I'll send Dutch to do a sweep, maybe take Daniel out to the movies or something in the meantime. Do you remember where you saw him? Damn, I wish I was closer. I'm going to have to make Dutch do everything. Don't touch anything that you think he touched. I'll make Dutch dust for prints."

Tommy sounded like he was excited and frustrated.

Johnny sighed. "Yeah okay, I also want to know a good way to get security for the shop. You know, like how Jimmy's cousins got rid of their pests."

"I'll ask Jimmy when I call him," Tommy said. "Now where all did you see this guy?"

Johnny told him about where he'd seen the man looking around, going through Mr. Miyagi's stuff. Then after answering Tommy's questions and saying goodbye.

He found a ruler, and a camera with flash and took a picture of the footprints. They weren't great not full clear prints, but it looked like something had been burned in the fireplace after he'd gone up and there were markings on the floor left behind because of it.

He left the camera out for Dutch and returned to Daniel.

Daniel had made their tea and Johnny put away the scissors then sat down next to him.

"Called Tommy, he's calling the guys. We'll figure something out," Johnny said taking Daniel's hand in his.

"It might not be that big of a deal," Daniel said. "Maybe they just wanted to come to scare me and they'll leave me alone."

"Maybe, maybe not. But still, someone ignored the closed sign, came in, and threatened you. We shouldn't take that lightly. I'm not going to take that lightly," Johnny said.

He lifted up the cup of tea and breathed it in.

Daniel laced his fingers through Johnny's.

"Since you're all dressed up with nowhere to go, where do you want to go?" Johnny asked. "The movies? Out for ice cream?"

Daniel smiled. "How about a drive-in?"

"Okay," Johnny said sipping his tea thoughtfully. "Your car or mine?" he glanced at the clock.

They could make the 8 o'clock show.

Daniel really hadn't stayed long.

Maybe he should change. Dress up too.

He'd have to let Mr. Miyagi know that Dutch was coming by to check something...what would he say? That he saw something suspicious? Daniel didn't want to worry Mr. Miyagi but a stranger had come into the house.

"Yours," Daniel said.

Johnny smiled lifting Daniel's hand to his, gently kissing Daniel's knuckles.

"I'll change, be right back," he said after another sip of tea.

He got up and went to their room, pausing to knock on Mr. Miyagi's door.

"Hai?"

Johnny pushed the door open a little.

"We're going to the movies. Dutch might swing by, I want him to check something weird I saw. If you...if you see any tall guy with a black ponytail be careful okay? Or some guy named Mike."

"Problems?" Mr. Miyagi asked with a frown.

"Maybe nothing yet, but I just want to be cautious. And if you see anything weird or if something goes missing please let me know."

Mr. Miyagi studied him for a moment then smiled and nodded. "Hai Johnny-san."

"Okay, there's still hot water in the kettle if you want some tea. Avoid the fireplace."

Mr. Miyagi nodded and Johnny carefully slid the door shut before walking to the room to quickly get ready, uneasy with every step.

He should do a sweep.

He should take Mr. Miyagi on their date, find an excuse to make sure they were both safe in his car.

But Dutch was coming. And the guy had to have left. He was too big to just hide somewhere other than the chimney. It wasn't like he was hiding under the bed. Though Johnny checked anyway. And their closet.

Daniel was wearing red. Something nice from Okinawa. Johnny looked through his shirts. Dark jeans would work, white shirt, he had a jacket his mom got him the last time he'd seen her. A denim jacket. It was softer than he expected, made him think it was expensive. Probably was now that he thought about it.

He fixed his hair, glancing at his watch, grabbed his wallet and keys, thought about taking the bonsai but forced himself to leave it. It was fine. The guy was gone. If he was taking the bonsai he had to figure out how to also take Mr. Miyagi without freaking anyone out.

He turned and hurried to where Daniel was waiting with his tea.

"Ready?" he asked, he wasn't sure if it was a good look or not. He'd been in a bit of a hurry. Not wanting to leave Daniel alone in the house until after he'd gotten the all-clear from Dutch.

Daniel took his hand with a smile on his face, kissing him gently on the cheek.

Mr. Miyagi would be okay he told himself. The man confronted a storm to save his enemy and broke essentially a solid wood beam. The man had jumped over a fence.

He could defend himself. And Dutch would be there soon to help.

He still felt guilty.

Worried as he drove to the drive-in.

As he paid for their tickets and got them popcorn and soda.

As they set up the speakers in the Avanti, as he put the top up for privacy, so they could fade into darkness.

So he could hold Daniel's hand and run his thumb over the back of his hand, worrying it like a stone as they watched the film Daniel had picked.

After a while he realized Daniel wasn't watching the film anymore.

Felt eyes on him.

He turned.

Daniel reached out, gently pulling the jacket back, his shirt down, looking at the bruise, admiring his handy work.

Johnny had to look away.

Daniel was so focused. He got so bored so quickly with the movie.

Johnny tried to focus on the movie.

Wait.

Was the reason they came here not for the movie?

Johnny turned back to the passenger seat, forcing himself to turn, he could feel his skin getting hot, the warmth of his ears.

Daniel was running his fingers along the back of Johnny's neck.

Distracting.

Daniel was close. Leaning closer.

Johnny leaned over to meet him, kissing him, fingers gently reaching out to Daniel's jaw, cupping the side of his face.

Daniel shifted more towards him.

Johnny remembered earlier in the day, the question about dates. It was the second time it'd come up.

Something was there he was missing.

He pulled back and Daniel pouted.

He didn't move far though.

"What is it about the number of dates?" Johnny asked.

"That's what I want to know," Daniel said with a huff.

Johnny ran his thumb over Daniel's cheek. Waiting.

Daniel sighed.

"At the party, you said you didn't let people feel you up until after five dates. Is it some weird Californian thing again or just a Johnny Lawrence thing? What comes after?"

Johnny stared at him.

Daniel's other hand was on his thigh.

When had he-?

Why had he-?

The party was when Daniel was drunk. Kissed him. He'd been-fuck, he had said that, hadn't he?

Had Daniel-

Johnny sighed.

"It's not a California thing or a me thing,"

"What?"

"It was just-I thought you were just-" he took a deep breath and tried to organize his thoughts that had scattered at the realization. "It was a bad joke because I thought maybe you were like trying to catch up with Ali or like rebounding, and you were drunk, so it was like a gentle rebuff. I was trying to let you down without letting you down. Does that make sense? Because I was interested but it wasn't a good time, and I don't-you were still dating Ali and your heart had just been broken and your pride. I didn't want to take advantage. It was supposed to mean like come back when you're not dating someone and not drunk and let's see then."

Daniel's arm was over the back of the seats and after a blink, he turned his head and buried his face in his arm.

Was he mad?

Johnny turned to look at the film again, hand coming down to cover the one on his thigh.

Running his fingers over the back of Daniel's hand.

"Are you mad?" Johnny asked after awhile. Softly.

"No," Daniel said. "Not at you. I just. I spiraled. I should've just asked. I keep telling myself I should just ask and I don't. I'm upset with myself."

Johnny leaned in close. "Did you want dating to be like an arcade game? A reward? I could ask Bobby where he got his sticker booklet."

Daniel laughed looking at him, cheek against his arm. "I know why I got tripped up. Why didn't you make a move?"

Johnny leaned back, against the door of the Avanti looking at Daniel. "A couple of reasons. The party-"

"What else happened at that damn party?" Daniel asked with a sigh, pouting.

"You had a panic attack during 7 minutes in heaven about sex," Johnny said gently. "I didn't want to pressure you to do anything you didn't want to do."

"Oh," Daniel said softly. "I forgot about that."

Johnny smiled softly, taking the hand that had been on his leg gently holding it in his. Johnny looked at the hand he was holding, running his fingers over the soft skin. Trying to think through the information he'd be operating on. How to explain it. Maybe he'd been wrong. But maybe Daniel was thinking something else from what he'd said.

"Everyone likes different things. I figured if you wanted to, if you were ready, one day you'd let me know."

"How long were you going to wait?" Daniel's voice was soft.

"Didn't matter. I like spending time with you. It could've never been on the table and that's fine. I don't want you to do something you don't want to."

He didn't fully hear what Daniel said, he was muttering into his arm again, into his blue hoodie.

It sounded like

Damn fucking gentleman.

Or

Ham duckling pelican.

Johnny couldn't be sure. Sometimes Daniel said weird things. So the second option wasn't completely out there even if it was weird.

Johnny looked out at the movie again.

"Plus maybe I wasn't ready for a long time either. I mean it's not like I know what I'm doing," he said with a laugh looking back at Daniel.

"You don't know what you're doing?" Daniel asked amused.

"Do any of us know what we're doing?" Johnny asked.

"Did you just verge from saying you're inexperienced with guys to philosophy?" Daniel asked with a laugh, a smile on his face.

He was leaning forward and Johnny met him halfway. Shifting to face him, mirroring like they had when they were sparring.

"You do not want to know who gave me the talk," Johnny said amused. "Nothing should be trusted."

Daniel wrinkled his nose. "Not Sid."

"Thank god no. On the general front, Mom handled that. Babies and respect were the majority of that conversation. No, Bobby and Dutch."

Daniel laughed and Johnny smiled. "What did they get their information from Cosmo or something?"

"No, but Tommy's aunt works for magazines so she's always got a stash full of magazines so we did read some Cosmo, and...people really like different things."

Some of their tips had been the stuff of nightmares. Like reading a horror novel in the form of a magazine.

Daniel seemed thoughtful for a moment.

"Wait when did Dutch talk to you?"

"At the lake house."

"I talked to him, he should've been fairly accurate."

"Is that what you were talking about?"

Daniel laughed. "Yeah, he asked so I told him."

"I did not get a part 2," Johnny said shaking his head amused.

He thought about the afternoon.

Blessing Mr. Miyagi's phone call because he'd been having a rough time staying focused.

But maybe, maybe

His hand reached up to his neck.

He might've been reading the situation wrong.

Not Daniel just being playful, or a pain in his neck literally.

His mind always went back to the party, it sounded like both of them did, but to different things. They were trying to use it as a starting point. How to understand one another. But maybe they'd both been wrong.

Daniel kept going back to to kissing him and the joke Johnny had made.

Johnny went to seeing Daniel's eyes widen and the panicked look on his face, the way he bolted from the room as soon as Dutch opened the door. How he'd worried that he'd made things worse. The way it looked like the room had been closing in on Daniel, unsure what to do because they weren't close. They weren't much of anything at that point. So he thought maybe nothing would ever happen. Thought that was just how it might be even before they dated. That only dream Daniel was interested.

If that wasn't the case then there was a good chance he'd been reading Daniel wrong in a lot of situations. Wasted a lot of time using breathing techniques to calm back down when Daniel wanted to not be calm.

There was also that look he got from time to time.

He knew pupils dilated in anger, in fear. He saw it a lot when fighting. Had seen it in the mirror enough times. He'd been reading that instead of-he'd been assuming.

The lady he talked to about Sid told him he needed to talk to people about how they felt, about how he felt, about the questions he had.

To just ask.

That not everyone would bite his head off for asking questions like Sid did.

That most people didn't mind and that it wasn't his job to try and figure out what they wanted without asking. That he wasn't a mind reader and shouldn't let people get mad at him for not being one.

He rubbed his face.

Daniel was quiet watching him, and yup there was that look. The one he always thought was something else.

Johnny moved closer. "So are you interested in sex?"

"Yes," Daniel said amused.

"And this look, the quiet way you get, it's not because you're upset or scared?"

Daniel frowned. "No, is that what you've thought?"

"The first time you really got quiet and stared at me it was anger, right? In Mr. Miyagi's office when I came to apologize?"

Daniel reached out and cupped his face. "Yeah, I was scared and pissed. But it hasn't been that in a long time. A long long time."

"So what do you want to do?" Johnny's heart was racing.

Normally he'd try to curb his thoughts, try to get himself under control, lots of breathing. But it sounded like he didn't have to anymore. Or not as much. That was such a long-held habit at this point that he'd have to work on it. On letting go.

"Everything," Daniel said with a breathy laugh.

"You have a list?" Johnny asked with a teasing smile.

"I do," Daniel said.

Of course he did.

Johnny shouldn't have been surprised, he leaned forward kissing Daniel.

"Pick one that's less likely to get us in trouble," he whispered into the kiss.

They were still kind of in a public place.

The movie was still going.

They had plenty of time.

Daniel had a look on his face like he was thinking. Like Johnny had asked him an impossible task.

Johnny moved to kiss along Daniel's jaw, the side of his neck, this could keep him plenty occupied while Daniel went over his list to make a decision. That hadn't changed, probably never would, that Johnny liked kissing Daniel, anywhere. Johnny licked Daniel's neck slow, pleased at the shiver it elicited. Revenge for the afternoon.

He had an idea. He had a lot of ideas, but a lot of them were too much for the location or space.

He shrugged out of his jacket. It wasn't that cold in the Avanti anyway.

Daniel turned, pulling him back into a deep kiss and Johnny ran his tongue over Daniel's.

He ran his hands down Daniel's sides, his hips, back up touching where he could. Unzipping Daniel's blue hoodie, his hands running up under Daniel's shirt, feeling warm skin.

He wished they were home, in their room. Somewhere he could see, but this was fine. There'd be other times.

"Can I touch you?" Johnny asked, his hands on Daniel's hips.

Looking down pointedly and then back at Daniel.

Daniel looked like he was going to say something, like he'd figured out what he was going to suggest off his list but he changed his mind. Changing course and nodding, a warm "yes."

Johnny kissed him, moving his jacket like a blanket over Daniel's lap.

They weren't close to the other cars but he wanted to be careful. Everyone should've been paying attention to the movie or their own partner they were with, but he would still create as much privacy as he could, even if it meant he wouldn't see what he was doing. But he figured this he could do. Knew how to do it, thought he knew how to do it. Confidence always helped. Even if it was held up like a house of cards.

He shifted in closer running his tongue over Daniel's, tasting the moan on his lips that Daniel let out as he touched him. A louder moan than Johnny had expected.

He'd have to keep kissing Daniel. That was never a problem. Though he wanted to watch his face. That'd have to wait for some other time.

The windows were shut, but it didn't mean that anyone walking by couldn't hear.

He'd thought about replacing his hand with his mouth but there was no way they wouldn't get caught then. Not if anyone got anywhere near the Avanti.

His Avanti wasn't sound proof.

It didn't keep sound in or out.

Plus it'd be obvious to anyone what he was doing.

Maybe it still was.

Daniel didn't seem to know what to do with his hands, one was flittering around Johnny's arm, like he wanted to get a good grip on him, to hold on, sometimes it'd dip under the jacket like he wanted to help Johnny, or to hold the hand around him. He settled eventually for one arm around Johnny's shoulders, like he needed to hold him close and the other on the back of Johnny's head, fingers in his hair, kissing him back in that hungry way.

The way that felt like a conversation.

One Johnny felt like he finally understood.

He'd been reading the wrong dictionary, following the wrong words.

They'd both been following the rules they'd thought were understood from the same night but they were vastly different. But he got it now, and when Daniel pulled back Johnny followed, capturing the sound, not stopping it but quieting it, keeping it for himself, for them until Daniel stilled, panting and looking up at him.

Johnny smiled dipping low to kiss him again. Maybe if he kept kissing Daniel he'd figure out a way to tell him how he felt without feeling like his heart was going to bolt. He'd get the courage to say it, by whispering it in every kiss on his skin until it felt like a normal thing to say. Like practicing to say something in the mirror. If he kept saying it in his head maybe he'd figure out how to say something that seemed so simple but kept retreating back down his throat.

It seemed easy. Like picking out flowers for a bouquet to say what he felt. But not everyone knew that, not everyone could read the roses or the lilies or carnations and even still it didn't feel like enough. Just like three words didn't seem enough and he couldn't even figure out how to say them. But he'd figure it out. Eventually in time, like everything else.

Apologies Delivered Too Late

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Awful people were just a blip in Daniel's life. Maybe if he didn't spend so much time thinking about them they could just disappear and Daniel could just focus on the good things, like finally being on the same page with Johnny and the boneless feeling he had.

Johnny was driving back home. Which Daniel wasn't happy with, but the movie had ended and they couldn't just stay there.

Something always interrupted.

But maybe when they got home-wait was that Dutch's van?

Damnit.

He'd forgotten that Johnny had said he'd called the guys. He should've known it'd be short lived.

After the shop was set up and they were making money Daniel was going to save up for an apartment.

Johnny gently let go of his hand, getting out of the Avanti and Daniel followed.

Johnny turned and kissed him gently at the doorstep. The door opened and they both jumped, startled.

Dutch laughed leaning against the doorway, holding a flashlight.

"What even are you doing? It's not like you're dropping one of you off, you both live here you dorks."

"Is everything safe?" Johnny asked.

Dutch gave him a little salute, before flipping the flashlight he was holding in his hand.

"All clear, but I'm spending the night love birds."

Daniel sighed as Johnny pulled away.

"I'm going to take a shower," Johnny said, slipping away and into the bathroom.

Daniel didn't blame him.

But now had a weird understanding of why Johnny showered every night without fail. Maybe it wasn't the main reason every time, but it was something to think about.

If Dutch wasn't there he'd see if he could join him.

If it wasn't Mr. Miyagi's house.

That apartment was imperative.

Dutch walked back to the guest room.

Daniel sighed following.

Dutch beelined straight for his desk pulling something out of the drawer and turning.

"So you didn't open this yet huh?"

Daniel caught the packet. He sat down on the edge of his bed and flicked the envelope open. He upturned it into his hand while Dutch looked through the photos on his desk from Okinawa, sitting at his desk, kicking his feet up.

"This Kumiko huh?" Dutch asked holding up a picture of the three of them looking up at the swimming overhead manta rays and fish.

Daniel looked up. "Yeah."

"Cute."

Daniel flipped the photos over.

New York.

Photos he'd seen in Johnny's room at his mom's.

But there were more.

Not just photos of him and the guys or all of them together, but photos of him talking to Johnny, a big smile on his face as they walked through New York, holding hands, Johnny smiling softly back at him, listening, wearing that blue jacket.

There was a photo of them asleep on the bus back from Coney Island, curled up against each other. It looked both comfortable and uncomfortable at the same time.

There was a picture of the two of them standing in front of his favorite painting. Johnny turned slightly towards Daniel, Daniel up on his tiptoes whispering in Johnny's ear, holding hands.

Daniel glanced up, Dutch was looking at him.

"I thought if I took all those photos then Johnny would realize you liked him back," he said. "But I don't like wasting film and I didn't finish the roll during our trip, so I didn't get it developed until summer, and well, you were both gone." He shrugged. "Looks like you had fun though," he said holding up another photo from the aquarium.

Daniel nodded flipping to the next one, he remembered a few of them, of Dutch with his disposable camera, but there were so many where Daniel hadn't noticed, lost in his own world, too focused on Johnny.

"Oh, before I forget and on a shitty note, want to tell me about this Mike guy?" Dutch asked leaning the pictures against the bonsai.

Daniel sighed, he told Dutch about the guys who'd come into the shop even though he'd flipped the sign. How for some reason they wanted him to compete in the All-Valley which Johnny had pointed out he couldn't even compete in.

Dutch pulled a magazine out of his jacket, flipped through a couple of pages, it was black and white like the kind of magazine you ordered stuff out of.

"This the guy?" Dutch asked.

It was definitely the guy, Mike Barnes. Karate's Bad Boy. Whatever the hell that meant.

"Yeah, that's him."

Dutch nodded leaning back and looking at the photo. "You be careful around this guy Daniel. He's a piece of shit from what I've heard. There are rumors he fights anyone who gets in his way. He won't hold back around a girl or an old man, so he for sure isn't going to be nice to you if he's got his sights set on you. Why he'd be after you for the All-Valley's got me though. I mean it's a trophy. There's not actually money attached to it. You only get money for that shit after 18. When people can bet on you or if you compete for like a scholarship." Dutch pushed himself up. "Maybe he's got a sponsor. Who'd be pissed off you won last time?"

"I don't know. I mean I would've considered you guys but you guys aren't pissed. Really it was only Cobra Kai."

"Hmm, shit I was supposed to be taking notes," Dutch said patting his jacket pockets and digging out his notebook. "Tommy's gonna give me an earful if I don't do this properly. You know, maybe Johnny and I will go get a list of everyone you went up against last year and see if like Barnes had some rich older brother in the tournament you defeated. I doubt it, but it has got to be All-Valley related. Just got to figure out, what was it Tommy said? Who lost the most last year."

"The only person I can think of is Johnny," Daniel said softly.

"Clearly you've got a one-track mind," Dutch said rolling his eyes. "I get it, focus LaRusso."

"No, I mean from the tournament. He's the one who had the worst go of it, right?" Daniel said leaning forward.

"Oh yeah but he's no evil mastermind. We've got no connection to Mike Barnes."

The door opened and Johnny came in sinking down on the edge of the bed next to Daniel.

"Confirmed it's Mike Barnes," Dutch said holding up the magazine.

"Damn," Johnny said.

"Don't worry either of your pretty heads," Dutch said. "I'll keep you company, go get ready for bed LaRusso. Let Johnny look at those photos I gave you guys."

Daniel pressed the photos into Johnny's hands and kissed him gently on the cheek before dipping out to get ready. Not missing, before he shut the door, the way Dutch flopped onto the bed next to Johnny.

He sighed.

This was his damn life, huh? At least it was better than all six of them trying to share a bed.

All hope to be alone for the night gone.

But the anger that flared up usually, the frustration over it didn't flare up as high as it had the last couple of times.

Dutch was there because he was worried. About him. Because of Mike Barnes.

They both were. Worried and upset on his behalf.

It was comforting.

He got ready and came back.

Johnny was on his side of the bed reading.

Dutch had changed and was on the other side taking notes in a notebook.

Dutch smirked looking up at him and patted the space between him and Johnny.

Clearly not planning to move.

His options were through the middle or to climb over Johnny.

Daniel flicked off the overhead light rolling his eyes grabbing the whale shark and throwing it at Dutch who caught it with a look of surprise.

He had a feeling that it was more on the behalf of the whale shark than for himself.

He walked over to Johnny's side of the bed. He was reading by lamplight.

Daniel tried to go over him.

Johnny glanced up and Daniel stopped, caught, mid-straddle. Unable to make himself move on, like sitting on Johnny with his hand on his abdomen was where he had planned to be, even though he'd meant to keep moving, to move fast. But he was like a deer, caught in headlights when those blue eyes looked up from the book.

Maybe this was a silly way to get into bed. But he knew Dutch had done it on purpose to make it awkward. Maybe he'd picked the more awkward option.

Johnny was looking up at him and Daniel felt his face redden, watched as Johnny's did, and heard Dutch laugh around the whale shark in his arms.

Daniel hurried to Johnny's other side wiggled under the blankets pulling them up to his chin, turning his back to Dutch.

Johnny and Dutch left to go find their list of suspects, which was disappointing. But Dutch made breakfast and Mr. Miyagi recommended they do kata in the morning to practice, to re-center.

It was going well.

He was getting better at it. Catching on.

Mr. Miyagi had been right, teaching Johnny had made him work his way through the parts he'd been struggling on.

Watching Johnny practice had also helped. Adjusting to make sure he got it all made it so much easier.

The gate opened and a tall man walked into the garden asking for Mr. Miyagi.

The last time a stranger came into the garden they'd flown to Okinawa. Daniel had nearly died. Mr. Miyagi had nearly died. They met Chozen. Nothing good came from strangers coming into the garden.

This guy talked about South Korea and Daniel tried to wrack his brain over when Mr. Miyagi had ever mentioned Korea.

Mr. Miyagi had fought in Italy. Was born in Okinawa, had moved to Hawaii and then LA. There wasn't much else on his country list.

So what was this guy talking about? The All-Valley? They heard about the All-Valley all the way in South Korea?

Why?

Daniel had never heard of it before coming to-wait what?

Kreese was dead?

What the hell?

Should he tell Johnny?

How would he tell Johnny?

Kreese had tried to kill him. And now he was dead from, was this guy trying to make it sound like Kreese had died from a broken heart? Was that...even feasible?

Mr. Miyagi was nodding, wishing the man well and then he was bowing and expressing his sympathy.

Daniel followed suit, puzzled and confused.

How could Kreese be dead? Was he that old? Had been that old?

The man left.

Daniel turned to Mr. Miyagi who was ready to pick up where they'd left off.

"Mr. Miyagi," Daniel whispered. "Do we tell Johnny?"

"Not yet," Mr. Miyagi said. "Confirm first."

Confirm first?

Some guy just showed up and said Kreese was dead.

That was huge.

Sid was gone and now so was Kreese.

Daniel knew he shouldn't cheer on the death of someone, but the guy was evil.

But maybe Mr. Miyagi was right.

Maybe it'd be painful for Johnny.

Sid was the shitty dad Johnny got and Kreese was the one he sought out who failed him.

He couldn't think of Kreese in the same vein as his own father or Mr. Miyagi's, but there was a chance that despite everything Johnny would take it the same.

He'd talk to the guys, ask them.

When they finished with kata he left Mr. Miyagi to sit with his tea and think about his trees to get ready.

His mind was too scattered. He had to ask for advice before he said the wrong thing.

Daniel went to his room, changed, and grabbed the paperwork that Bobby gave Johnny. The stuff that had Bobby's class schedule.

He hopped in the yellow Ford to drive to UCLA. He tried to think of how to tell Bobby that Kreese was gone. Practiced it over and over again in the car, trying to sound sympathetic. He hoped the shock would help.

He parked his car and hopped out. He crossed across the green, tapping a college kid on the shoulder asking for some intro class on the list of Bobby's classes and followed the directions, looking at the clocks and then finding the classroom.

He waited outside rocking nervously on his heels.

According to the schedule, Bobby had three hours between this class and the next. Plenty of time to tell him that Kreese was dead and ask if he should tell Johnny.

Daniel's opinion after spending more time with Johnny was molten in regards to Kreese.

He wanted to throw a party in the worst possible taste.

Confetti maybe.

He was pissed that Kreese had just up and died without any attempt to apologize.

Just some sad "he was going to", like how did that guy even know that?

Maybe he just told his friends and teacher he was going to apologize because he had no other option. Then he just didn't.

The guy had said he was there to help him apologize. Who the hell needed help apologizing?

Like he felt bad the guy came all the way to LA just for his friend to be dead. Like that sucked. But Kreese wasn't a good teacher.

The door opened and students poured out, talking and chatting.

He spotted Bobby amongst a group of girls and rushed through the crowd.

"Daniel!" Bobby said holding out his arms for a hug.

Daniel hugged him. The sugary smell he usually had faded to just shampoo. Daniel kind of missed it.

"Dude, what are you doing here? Oh, yeah, I'll see you later, still on for that study date?" Bobby said turning mid-conversation to talk to the girls who dispersed with waves.

"Can we sit somewhere and talk?"

"Sure," Bobby said arm over his shoulder leading him towards the dorms.

He talked easily about the school, which helped.

Talked about the guys. UCLA wasn't even that far. But with their class schedules and the fact they'd all decided some stupid challenge to have morning classes they were usually unable to party. Wanting to actually get good grades. They'd promised themselves whoever got the best grades would get a free steak dinner from the others and they took their challenges seriously.

Bobby opened the door to his room and motioned towards a chair that Daniel sat down in while Bobby sunk on the bed looking at him.

"Okay Daniel, what's happening. Tommy mentioned something's been happening back home but didn't have time to get into it because he had a class that's already thrown a research paper at them."

"A guy came by today and said he knew Kreese."

Bobby leaned forward, eyes wide.

"Oh fuck, are you okay? Is everyone okay? Was Johnny there?"

He jumped up grabbing his keys and his jacket.

Daniel grabbed the edge of his shirt and tilted his head back towards the bed.

Bobby slowly sat back down.

"He said they served together and that he had come from South Korea to help Kreese apologize."

Bobby's face wrinkled in confusion.

"Apologize? Kreese? That's against his whole M.O."

"He said that Kreese was heartbroken over the loss of his students."

Bobby laughed.

"You're joking, right? Kreese, heartbroken over us leaving? He tried to fucking kill Johnny. Are you sure this guy wasn't stoned out of his gourd? The guy has no remorse. If he was going to apologize it should've been to Johnny first then you. He owes all of us an apology. Bastard can rot in hell for all I fucking care."

"Well according to him your wish might be true."

Bobby stared at him.

"What?"

"He said Kreese is dead."

"No. Fucking. Way." Bobby said getting up. He paced the room, stopping occasionally hand out to say something then bringing it back in and turning again. Continuing to pace. "Jimmy would know for sure," he said after a while. "Because of the lawsuit." He paused again. "Did you tell Johnny?"

"No, we, Mr. Miyagi and I finished our practice and I came straight here. I don't know how to tell him. Mr. Miyagi said he wouldn't yet. I figured you would know. I didn't know any redeeming factor for Kreese. I can't be sympathetic. I don't think I'd be a good person for him to hear it from."

Bobby nodded sitting back down.

"Okay, we find Jimmy and we ask if he knows. We don't tell Johnny until we've got a notarized death certificate in hand and are standing over a freshly dug grave. Hell, I might try and dig it up just to check."

Bobby buried his head in his hands.

"There's no way he's fucking dead." He looked back up at Daniel. "I meet Tommy and Jimmy for lunch usually. Do you want to hang around until then? Or do you have to get back? Want to catch me up on all the stuff happening? Tommy mentioned something but he didn't go too deep into it. Some guys giving you trouble?"

"Yeah," Daniel said pulling his feet up under him. He told him about Mike Barnes and the All-Valley paperwork feeling like maybe next time he'd just get all the guys on one phone call and pull Johnny into the room so he could tell everyone at once. He was tired of repeating it. It seemed like nothing now. Not in light of Kreese being dead. Like an annoying gnat in the background.

"Daniel, did you like steal a mummified paw as a kid and wish for like an adventurous life or something?" Bobby asked.

"No, who would wish for this?"

"I'm out here in college trying to figure out who I am. Which is, by the way, like a whole freshman course we all have to take to figure out our identity and you're out here being like a scooby doo character where like every time I feel like I turn around you've got some new villain popping up. Tommy might be a little jealous actually. A whole bunch of weird mysteries dropped into your lap and he's also having to sit through the same class to figure out his identity. Who usually is the villain? Old Man Jenkins I think. Daniel, have you pissed off Old Man Jenkins?"

"Laugh all you want, but I beat the last two," Daniel said.

"You did," Bobby said with a nod. "But the difference between the last two is pretty steep and it sounds like this one's even steeper. I do not want to meet the next guy. We need to find you repellant or something."

"Well Mr. College guy, while we wait for lunch how about you show me around? You guys made it seem like such a big deal, we packed you all up, but you're like only a half-hour away," Daniel said. "I thought UCLA was like hours away. Why are you guys even staying on campus?"

Bobby put on his jacket and grabbed his keys and wallet and held the door open.

"Well, I wanted to stay in the dorms. Before Kreese showed his hand I thought it might be nice to join a fraternity. I mean Cobra Kai kind of felt like one. I thought it'd be nice to have another one. But I don't want to go anywhere near one now. The sororities on the other hand, apparently the fact I know how to bake is like a welcome breath of fresh air. There's apparently a bake sale season and I've been enlisted by almost every sorority on campus. I joked they might have to make me an honorary sister and they actually took that seriously. So life's going to get a little weird when they start having events. Don't tell the guys that part, I didn't mention that. I will not live that down. But it means a lot of cool shit. They go on all these trips and they have all these speakers come. On top of that, they do this business training and apparently having a guy around kind of helps with some of it? I don't know but like the head of the house was talking like a mile a minute and I lost half of it. I just know I'm baking and then invited on like trips...which sounds like more than it is. I think I became the equivalent of a water boy," Bobby said with a laugh. "But I don't mind."

They walked around the quad for awhile until it was lunchtime and Bobby bought Daniel lunch and headed to a table in the busy cafeteria, saying hi to a few people as they passed until Tommy and Jimmy sat down, looking at Daniel shocked.

"What are you doing here?"

"Is everything okay?"

Bobby leaned forward voice low.

"Some guy showed up at the Miyagi house and told Daniel and Mr. Miyagi, Johnny wasn't there before you ask, that Kreese died."

"What?" Tommy cried. "How?"

"The hell?" Jimmy said turning to his bag pulling out a big binder.

"Yeah, the guy said Kreese was going to come by and apologize to Daniel and Mr. Miyagi but died of a broken heart first."

"A broken heart?" Jimmy scoffed.

"Well not exactly," Daniel said, trying to remember what guy had said exactly. He'd been a little too shocked for it to settle into his head on how exactly Kreese had died.

"There's no fucking way," Jimmy said. "Did he give you a date or time of death? If he was all cut up about it then maybe he shouldn't have tried to murder Johnny. Guys probably trying to lay the groundwork to fake his death." Jimmy pulled his pen cap off of his pen with his teeth and made a note in his binder. "I'll check though. Timing is super suspicious."

"The guy seemed pretty upset about it," Daniel said.

"Well there are ways to make it seem like you died but didn't actually," Tommy said. "Kind of like what Juliet used in Romeo and Juliet. And a lot of other things. It's possible that he did fake his death and this guy didn't know, actually came home and found his friend seemingly dead."

"That's a lot of work Tommy," Jimmy said with a frown. "Kreese lost it when a minor lost a tournament. He's not cunning enough. Daniel, we're coming up this weekend, you be careful until then okay? Keep Dutch and Johnny close. Something fishy has to be happening."

"Johnny and Dutch are currently getting All-Valley tournament info from last year to try and find a connection or a reason for why Mike Barnes is after me."

Tommy nodded. "That's a good idea. Hey while you're here we should do something fun. The pier is nearby, so is the Getty. What do you want to do?"

"Seriously Tommy? Just rub it in our faces that your classes are done for the day," Bobby groaned.

"Hey, not my fault you hate your freshman class."

"You hate yours too!"

"Did Bobby explain the point of it?" Jimmy asked taking a sip of his soda and leaning back amused as the two complained about their class.

"Identity?"

"Yup. It's breaking our brains. Because who are we? What does that even mean? We're having to dissect who we are now and present it to the class in little sections and it fucking sucks. There are a couple thousand kids in every class so it feels impersonal. So we're looking forward to this weekend."

"This weekend?"

"Well, Johnny's birthday is next Tuesday. So we're coming up to celebrate this weekend. Thought you might appreciate us not taking up your room on the actual day. I got these two idiots to agree, but Dutch is a wild card since he's not in school. So good luck with that one," Jimmy said.

Daniel hadn't forgotten about Johnny's birthday. Just maybe that morning and yesterday and maybe the last week.

He had Johnny's gift, he just had to have time alone to put things together. And he was running out of time, which was stressful.

Maybe he should turn around and go home. Work on it while Johnny and Dutch were visiting the All-Valley offices.

"I can't actually stay," Daniel said putting his things on his tray. "I'll see you this weekend. Good luck with your classes. Thanks for lunch and for checking on Kreese."

Jimmy laughed softly while the other two looked up at him with concern.

"Did we say something?" he heard Bobby ask.

"Nah man, I reminded him how soon Johnny's birthday is. Any good boyfriend would bolt after that," Jimmy said with a laugh.

Daniel hurried out of the cafeteria and looked around trying to remember which way to his car.

The plus of it being yellow was that it was always easy to spot.

There it was.

He sped walked at the quick pace of a new yorker dodging around students moseying around.

He hoped he still had time.

It shouldn't take too long, but Daniel didn't have much free time. There wasn't a lot of time to himself.

He hoped Johnny liked it. He knew Johnny would like it. But he hoped Johnny liked it more because of Daniel.

He hopped in the Ford and drove back to Reseda hoping Johnny was still out with Dutch.

Daydreams

Chapter Notes

Dutch tried to argue that they should take the van because it was less conspicuous.

Johnny said they weren't hiding or on a stakeout. He was going to walk in and ask Mrs. Douglas for last year's tournament information. He'd competed in it. He'd gotten to the finals, it should be easy. Plus he knew Mrs. Douglas.

If only he could get Dutch to calm down as he sat in the Avanti.

Dutch needed a distraction. He was too coiled for a fight. Ready to strike. It was all in his body language and it was too much for something simple.

"Tell me about Taekwondo," Johnny said.

Dutch looked at him suspiciously. But Johnny knew, even if he said he was fine with the guys being at school and Daniel and Johnny doing their own thing, even if he said Taekwondo was keeping him plenty busy it didn't mean that Dutch wasn't lonely.

Dutch was almost as lonely as Johnny had been.

His parents were almost never home. And the staff just cleaned. It wasn't like some magical Mary Poppins story.

Dutch had become a little feral from not having people around.

His parents hadn't put two and two together, just had said once to Johnny that they were glad he no longer was a biter.

He had made other friends in school, was a lot of fun, but that core loneliness was always there.

Dutch talked.

He liked to talk because he didn't have a lot of people to listen to him, so when he got the chance he was a waterfall.

Johnny listened as he drove, asking questions, comparing the two in his head, taekwondo, and karate, trying to picture it.

When they got to the All-Valley offices Dutch was trying to get him to spar.

Johnny was wearing down.

It sounded like fun. But they didn't have a place that was safe to try it.

There was no way he was sparring with Dutch at Mr. Miyagi's. They would break something for sure.

"If you find a spot other than Mr. Miyagi's then sure," Johnny said.

Dutch grinned, delighted, arm clapping onto Johnny's shoulder.

Johnny walked up to the front desk where Mrs. Douglas sat.

Same as always.

"Hello Mrs. Douglas," Johnny said.

"Oh! Hello Johnny!" she said smiling up at him. "What brings you here? Going to sign up for the All-Valley to try and win back your title?"

Johnny hadn't thought about that. Technically because of his birthday being over the summer, he could try and swing it. He'd have to write an essay if he remembered correctly.

No. Focus. Daniel was already having a rough time.

Plus you had to have a sensei sign off and Mr. Miyagi didn't like tournaments.

"I heard the rules changed and the previous winner only has to fight in the last fight, the finals."

Mrs. Douglas sighed taking off her glasses and rubbing the bridge of her nose.

"Yes. We got a new sponsor. Dynatox. Their CEO asked for some changes in the rules."

"But why?" Johnny asked leaning down, dropping his voice down low.

He knew Mrs. Douglas liked to gossip. Plus she knew everything All-

Valley related.

"I don't know. But so far we have a new entrant who is a little wilder than even you boys," she said leaning forward and whispering back.

"That wouldn't by chance be Mike Barnes would it?"

She grinned slapping Johnny's arm. "Look at you! You have your fingers on the pulse of karate just like I knew you did. Though you," She turned to Dutch. "I heard you defected to taekwondo."

Dutch ducked down to join their little group. "You'll have to come and cheer me on at a Taekwondo tournament and then maybe you'll see why."

"Ooh, Mr. Dutch I'll be expecting an invite now. I will be thoroughly disappointed if I don't see it."

"Will do."

"I was wondering Mrs. Douglas. Could I get a copy of last year's brackets for the tournament? What the lineup ended up being?"

"Of course Johnny!" she said with a grin digging around in her desk. "That really was something you know. Had never seen someone execute such a good crane kick while injured."

"Daniel did quite well," Johnny said.

"Daniel huh? When did you move on to first names Johnny?" she asked looking up at him with a curious tilt of her head. "If I remember correctly, and I know I do. You arrived early last year and sat with me and my son and complained the whole time about LaRusso before the rest of your Cobra Kai arrived. About him not being ready, going to get his ass kicked in the first match, probably get injured. And you complained about him when you came to sign up months in advance. It was always LaRusso. Don't tell me our previous champion and our current champion are friends now?"

She looked too happy.

Too delighted.

Johnny had to look away.

He knew he was too easy to read.

Knew he was blushing.

He remembered that.

Mrs. Douglas always brought him frozen grapes to snack on.

She was upset his mom didn't come to the fights and took over like it was her job.

He knew he wasn't the only one she did that with, but he liked her.

She was friendly, one of the reasons why he liked fighting at the All-Valley more than the other competitions.

Dutch leaned back in.

"They're at the same dojo now."

"Oh Miyagi-do?" she asked with a little gasp. "Oh, how exciting! You know," she said digging around. "We were expecting not to have Cobra Kai competing this year but they've signed up."

Johnny felt his veins freeze turning back to look at her.

"Under Kreese?" he asked softly.

"It doesn't say yet. But I assume so. They've only asked for a few spots instead of their like ten," she said looking at her paperwork with a frown before closing the book and grabbing the paper she found with a bright grin handing it over to Johnny. "Here you go," she said. "Last year's tournament details. Something specific I can help you with?"

"Mrs. Douglas, do you know why Daniel was invited this year?"

"He's last year's champion," she said with a frown like that should've been obvious.

"His birthday's in December. He turned 18 last year," Johnny said holding the paper in front of him studying the names, Dutch looking over his shoulder.

"That can't be right," she said with a frown digging around in her desk again and pulling out a piece of paper. "This says he's 16, wait," she held it close squinting. "Someone erased part of the 8."

"He graduated with us Mrs. Douglas," Dutch said.

"That's strange, who would've erased that?"

"I think something fishy might be happening Mrs. Douglas," Johnny said. "Mike Barnes been coming in person to try and get Daniel to compete."

"Well that's not okay," Mrs. Douglas said with a frown.

She grabbed a pink highlighter.

"Our competitors are supposed to only fight in the ring. Not supposed to harass each other."

She marked something in her booklet.

"Thank you for letting me know Johnny, Mr. Dutch. I'll keep an eye on things here. Try and figure out who erased that number."

"Can I keep this?" Johnny asked.

"Of course," she said warmly.

"Thank you Mrs. Douglas," Johnny said folding it up and turning.

"Mr. Dutch please do not forget my invite," Mrs. Douglas called.

"Of course!" he called back.

In the Avanti, Johnny looked over the tournament line up again with a frown.

"I don't see any Barnes."

"Me either," Dutch said pulling a notebook out of his jacket and a pen.

"What are you doing?"

"Taking notes, Tommy will kill me if I forget anything."

Johnny laughed handing the paper to Dutch and driving back towards Mr. Miyagi's.

"Hey," Dutch said without looking up as he scribbled his notes. "Let's go to the park to spar."

"Really?"

"Yeah, Daniel's probably at the shop anyway. We can stop by after.

Grab lunch."

"Okay, sure."

"Hell yes!" Dutch said flipping the notebook away and putting it away with the lineup.

Johnny smiled, turning down the road out to the park.

Maybe August was just sparring month. Everyone wanted to spar. Maybe they missed it.

He had.

Dutch hopped out of the car bouncing on his feet warming up. Johnny had to admit he was curious about the difference, to see what Dutch was learning that he was so much better at.

"I think you'd like taekwondo," Dutch said. "But you'll see."

He bounced a little more and then fell into his stance, waiting, ready.

It was different, his weight was on his back leg, putting more distance between them, and then Johnny learned why as Dutch kicked.

Johnny blocked.

So much kicking.

Johnny knew he was smiling.

Karate used kicking as a backup, and Johnny liked kicking, liked spinning high kicks, no wonder Dutch had been dying to show him. He was better at it.

He was so used to mirroring Daniel, reading Daniel, and following him or Mr. Miyagi that it was hard to not kick back, trying to absorb Dutch's new fighting technique.

Dutch did so many spins, so many jumps, his feet barely touching the ground.

It was so different that Johnny had a hard time reading it, losing ground as they went.

"Damn Dutch," Johnny said when they both collapsed on the ground to catch their breath.

Dutch tilted his head back in the grass grinning.

"Fucking light on your feet now huh?" Johnny asked. "How the hell?"

"A lot of fucking practice," Dutch said smiling. "My tournament is next month."

"I'll be there. Just give me the details."

"I will," Dutch said. "Things going well with Daniel?"

"Yeah."

Dutch's hand reached out and poked his neck. "Clearly," he said with a laugh.

Johnny frowned covering his neck with his hand.

"I'm glad you two are doing well, happy for you man," Dutch said.

"I'm glad Taekwondo is going well, that you've found something you like," Johnny said.

"I didn't think I would," Dutch said. "I thought all the guys would go to school and you would be sent off to somewhere by Sid. I figured we'd meet up you know, but this is...it's better, nicer. Nice is weird man. Very fucking weird. I don't know what to do with it."

"Me either," Johnny said.

Johnny hadn't ever let himself hope for good, or nice. Just one foot in front of the other.

He assumed Dutch had a better grasp of things, had more hope or plans for the future. Even if it was something simple like just have a good time. But it sounded like he'd decided to carve his own path and was excited for his future. For the possibilities, he hadn't even known were there and Johnny had a similar feeling.

He liked the idea of going to Mr. Miyagi's Little Tree's and helping Mr. Miyagi take care of bonsai while Daniel chatted with customers.

He liked the idea of going home and cooking and eating together around a table in a cozy way where the conversation happened.

He liked the idea that a couple of times a week he'd get in the Avanti and meet his mother at her place. Spend a night here and there and help her plant the garden or around the house. Sit in the living room and read together on the couch or watch TV.

It didn't seem like big dreams but they were more than he'd ever had before.

Hope for a nice peaceful future.

Johnny laughed and Dutch rolled over looking at him.

"Sorry, I just realized something. That as peaceful and quiet as I kind of dream about it might never be possible."

"What do you mean?" Dutch asked with a frown.

"One of the first times I really pissed off Daniel was telling him I was worried his knee would slow him down when he got himself into trouble, because trouble always finds him. It was an unfortunate observation that I hoped would go away, but it's true. Like we've poured all over that tournament register and there isn't a single Barnes on it. Yet a random stranger has shown up to decide to threaten him.

"I'm going to be like 70 and I'm going to be sitting in some chair reading some book and he's going to come in and tell me about some fight he got into with some random other old guy at the grocery store because he said all kinds of pasta are the same or something and Daniel tried to explain it or something and it starts a fight. Because you'd think I'd be around when he gets into fights or is threatened right? Well, it was like every time I turned my back in Okinawa that was when Chozen bothered him. I only got to interfere once and I was in the damn bath when I heard a fight happening. And you'd think oh I'm an award-winning karate fighter, but no, dislocated my shoulder because Chozen wanted to fight with spears. Like who does that? Right? So maybe I am going to have my quiet life or I'm going to have to get faster at like jumping out of the bath."

"Or you could just follow Daniel around everywhere," Dutch said.

"I did think about that but then realized it probably wasn't a good idea. Though maybe I should just accept I might be 70 and getting into fights still but at the grocery store."

Dutch laughed sitting up. "What a rough life you live. Where your future daydreams are I get in fights at the grocery store as an old man with my boyfriend. Come on old man let's go get some food," Dutch said getting up and pulling Johnny up with him.

"Okay, well what about yours?" Johnny asked walking over the Avanti.

Dutch sat down in the passenger seat and looked thoughtful. "Well not all of us jump straight to the prime of our lives at 70 in our daydreams," he said with a laugh. "But I did find this poster of Seoul that I've tacked up on my wall. I think I'd like to go. Maybe live there for a while and study there."

"Have you gotten to try the food?"

"It's delightfully spicy," Dutch said with a grin. "Let's get some for lunch."

"Do you know a place?" Johnny asked.

"I do."

Dutch gave him directions as he drove, interspersing it into the conversation about his classes, the language class he was taking, how tournament preparation was different when Kreese wasn't in charge and how much calmer it was. Which was kind of funny because everyone else was nervous but because there wasn't some guy yelling at him trying to get everyone worked up into a frenzy it felt suspiciously easy.

Johnny parked the Avanti and followed Dutch through the doors to a table.

Dutch ordered for them which was a relief as he was handed a pair of flat metal chopsticks and a spoon.

They were brought a bunch of tiny dishes, their table slowly filling up and Johnny looked at each one then up at Dutch who looked absolutely delighted.

A hot black bowl was set in front of Johnny and across from him, Dutch was given what looked like orangeish red rice. Both had a fried egg on top.

"I ordered you bibimbap, it's rice with veggies and meat," Dutch explained.

"And this?" Johnny motioned to the plethora of tiny dishes.

"Side dishes."

"Side dishes? All of these, for yours or for mine?"

"For the table man."

"Seriously?"

"Yeah, this one's kimchi try it," Dutch said tapping one of the dishes.

Johnny tried everything. Tofu, little tiny fish, tiny eggs, fish cake, spinach, and potatoes.

Dutch explained what he knew while he ate his kimchi fried rice, talking excitedly about what he had learned from his teacher.

It was so vastly different from Cobra Kai.

No bad guys lurking around every corner that you had to defend against and then defeat before they tried to kill you.

His class had a bunch of teachers in it at different levels. All the way from little kids who came in after school to people older than Dutch. He'd found a community and Johnny was happy for him.

They drove to the shop after lunch.

Dutch was skeptical.

Still a little upset about the spiderwebs.

Johnny had to promise multiple times that he had scrubbed the place from floor to ceiling. That he'd gotten every single one, unless spiders had come back the day before and worked at an intense schedule, he doubted Dutch would walk through another web.

The truck was out front and they walked in.

Mr. Miyagi was working on his trees.

Dutch walked around with his hands shoved in his pockets looking for spiderwebs with suspicion.

"Anything we can help with Mr. Miyagi?" Johnny asked.

"Pick up dirt," Mr. Miyagi said pointing to a wooden piece of furniture with slots. "Put order in at shop."

Mr. Miyagi got out a receipt and then handed over his keys. "Take truck, too messy for nice car."

"Thank you Mr. Miyagi," Johnny said taking the keys and the receipt.

Dutch followed him out to the truck.

"It looks better," Dutch said as Johnny drove.

"I told you," Johnny said with a smile. "I cleaned every inch of that place."

"You do realize it's a plant shop. It's just going to be full of dirt." Dutch said.

"I know that. But that's going to be our dirt, not some random other dirt."

"Our dirt huh? Do Mr. Miyagi and Daniel know that you've thrown yourself into their plans?"

"I'm just helping."

"Uh-huh, sure. Is it because your mom won in the divorce settlement?"

"It helps, but I would've done all this anyway. I just would've also found a job on the side. Now I don't have to."

"Seriously?"

"Yeah. Plus I told her I want to help out with the shop. So I'm getting an allowance. Just in case everything is slow for a while. She was super upset to know I had an emergency fund and then blew through it. Though she agrees with each thing I bought."

"You realize she's probably more upset that you had an emergency fund than you spending it."

Johnny frowned, he hadn't thought about it that way.

"Your Mom isn't like Sid," Dutch said. "She cares more that you're okay and that you're safe. Plus you guys had nothing for a while, of course, she's giving you an allowance when she can because it probably scared the shit out of her to realize you'd gone to Okinawa without any money in your pocket if there'd been an emergency. All you had was a damn phone card. And then you got hurt while you were there and kept getting into fights and there was a bad storm that knocked half the village down. Of fucking course she got upset. Hell, my parents are always checking on my funds to make sure I've got enough. It's like how they know I'm alive when they're gone for long stints. I'm spending money on food and gas and shit."

Johnny nodded parking the truck. He hadn't thought about it like that. Sid had made it always sound like spending his money was one of the worst things Johnny could do, so he didn't do it much. Didn't ever ask for much. His mother was clearly trying to change that. To try and make up for lost time.

"She found my childhood bear," Johnny said pushing the door to the shop open.

"Oh man I gotta see that," Dutch said with a laugh.

"I think she kept everything. I don't know how. But she did. I thought Sid made her throw it all out, but it seems like she didn't."

"Smart lady," Dutch said with a grin.

Johnny handed the receipt over to a worker who nodded and motioned towards a pile of large bags.

"You know, I'm glad I don't dress up to see you guys," Dutch said. "I'm going to have to make it a rule though to not wear clothes I actually like when I visit you specifically again."

"Huh?" Johnny asked scooping up a bag and hauling it over his shoulder and carrying it out to the truck.

Dutch following suit.

"Well, when we were younger I didn't wear clothes I liked cause I was worried I'd get blood on them. You know all the fighting with Cobra Kai and shit. And then we quit and I started wearing all the shit I liked. Well, I'm doing free labor with dirt involved. I gotta go back to my old habits man. Life around you is always messy for a guy who used to live in the Hills."

"I used to live a little bit of everywhere," Johnny said setting the bag down in the back of the truck and walking back into the shop to get the next one.

"I know, but you clean up nice man. That well-trained country club kid. So like just looking at you I wouldn't have realized how much I'd be handling actual fucking dirt," Dutch said with a laugh, throwing the next bag over his shoulder.

"Do you need to send me your dry cleaning bill?" Johnny asked.

"You cannot afford it even on your Mom's allowance," Dutch said. "Even my boring ass t-shirts are designer."

"You know you can buy cheaper clothes right? Like actually have normal clothes."

"I know," Dutch said. "But it's kinda like, oh what's it called, an artistic statement or something? Some tightly wound rich kid would take one look at my closet and cry if they saw the labels and then saw the amount of dirt I dragged my clothes through."

"So then what are you complaining about?"

"That looks can be deceiving."

"That is an understatement."

They had moved most of the pile and were on the last ones. Dutch gently elbowed Johnny and Johnny turned at the door to see that they'd had an audience.

"Thanks for setting these aside for us. It's for a bonsai shop that's opening up soon. Mr. Miyagi's Little Trees," Johnny said. "Hope to see you there."

He caught Dutch wink as he turned back around at the group of people as Johnny walked back out and dumped the last of it into the back of the truck.

"Okay I renege everything," Dutch said.

"What do you mean?" Johnny asked.

"I'm going to hang around with you more."

"Again, what?" Johnny asked starting up the truck.

"I forgot babes love that shit. Carrying heavy shit. Manual labor. Your shop might actually attract ladies. I thought it was a shot in the dark because it's LaRusso and Mr. Miyagi right? I figured your whole client base would be tumbleweed and little old ladies and the occasional person who got lost. But this is fucking LA. If those get popular then your shops going to get swamped like a restaurant with the newest trendy health food."

"You got that much hope for us now?" Johnny asked amused.

"You really put blinders on when you like someone huh?" Dutch said with an amused smile. "Daniel should've never fucking worried as much as I heard he did from Ali."

"You talked to Ali? You two hate each other."

"I don't hate her."

Johnny gave him a look when they stopped at a red light.

"Okay, so she's never been, my favorite person. But she came to the courthouse for a couple of days to give her piece right? So we saw a lot of each other. Tommy dragged us all out to get like coffees and shit and then when you got back from Okinawa and we found out you guys were dating Tommy made us all meet up again before they all went off to school and we got shitfaced. Turned out she knew Daniel liked you. We swapped wingman stories. So apparently Daniel kept stressing about the girls right? That kept flooding your locker and kept trying to walk you to classes like you were some feeble grandmother. So after she learned Daniel liked you that's when you got put back on that banned list. Tommy was so frustrated by the whole thing. They got into a little fight, it was kind of cute. There was no bite to it, they were both so damn drunk. But it was like a little kid fight right? Hilarious. But like you were too focused on Daniel to realize right? And then dude, totally didn't clock any of the hotties in that shop."

"I've got what I want," Johnny said parking in front of the shop.

"Well I'm going to tell Daniel that he can expect a bunch of girls to show up because we carried dirt around, I want to see his face."

"Don't tease Daniel," Johnny said.

"It's not teasing."

"I'm pretty sure it is teasing."

Johnny got one of the bags and walked up the steps into the shop.

"We're back Mr. Miyagi. What do you want us to do with the dirt?"

Mr. Miyagi set his shears down and got up. "Thank you! Separate types separate spots," he said motioning to the different slots.

"Got it," Johnny said reading the bag he was holding.

Akadama: red ball earth he poured it in the one on the left.

"Dutch this one's the red ball earth," he said looking around and grabbing scissors to cut off the label and then taped it to the front.

"This ones," Dutch said squinting, "Pumice, hey ain't that a rock?"

"Hai," Mr. Miyagi said. "Good for bonsai."

"Okay got it," Dutch said dumping it into the next one, taking the scissors from Johnny and cutting off the label, and taping it.

They worked through the rest. Bringing in soil, tiny gravel, and lava rock along with more of what they'd already brought in.

"Damn I didn't know so much shit went into those tiny pots," Dutch said after opening the last bag of dirt and dumping it into the trough.

Mr. Miyagi nodded. "We mix in shop."

"Smart," Dutch said walking over to the sink and washing off his hands. "That's going to be cool. Oh hey!"

Johnny turned to see Jessica wearing her apron and covered in drying flecks of clay on her hands and arms.

"Thought I'd just pop by and check to see if this is the design you all wanted," Jessica said holding a small piece of clay in her hands.

Mr. Miyagi got up and walked over peering at the piece in her hands. He smiled warmly.

"Beautiful."

"Thank you Mr. Miyagi," she said beaming.

Dutch followed Johnny over, looking at the bonsai design.

"Daniel said he wanted something like this on pots. What do you think Johnny?"

"It's great," Johnny said.

"Yeah, very cool. I'm Dutch by the way," Dutch said leaning against Johnny, arm around his shoulder and holding out his other hand.

She carefully shifted her little design into her other hand and held hers out to shake his hand but stopped mid-reach, her hand covered in clay, hesitating.

"No worries, I just lugged in a bunch of dirt and organized it, dirt and clay are not a problem."

She smiled shaking his hand. "Jessica Andrews."

"Nice to meet you, you work at the shop across the street?"

"Yes, do you work here?"

"No, just free labor," Dutch said with a laugh.

"I'm almost in the same boat. I work for my aunt. Anyway. I'm glad you like the design, I will go finish a pot so hopefully, it'll be ready soon and you, Mr. Miyagi can tell me if you like it, or Daniel can," she said turning.

"Wait, what are you doing this weekend?" Dutch called.

"She's got a boyfriend," Johnny whispered quickly in Dutch's ear.

"Oh, uh, nothing, why?" she asked looking back.

"We're celebrating Johnny's birthday this weekend. Our friends are coming up from UCLA, you should come to hang out."

"That sounds like fun, just let me know the details. I'll be there," Jessica said with a smile before leaving.

"What part of she has a boyfriend did you not get?" Johnny asked.

Dutch held up his hands and put an innocent look on his face. "She looked lonely. Besides last I checked your birthday party is like 99% guys, the 1% is your mom. We need some variety just to behave."

"Invite Bobby's little siblings then."

"Not that kind of variety man."

"If you know the party is going to be mostly guys why would you invite only one girl?" Johnny asked. "Isn't she going to be uncomfortable? She doesn't know us that well and she doesn't know the guys."

"It's not my fault you haven't made more lady friends," Dutch said. "Meet more girls and then this won't be a problem."

"In a few days? Dutch that's impossible."

"You know very well that Bobby and the guys are going to be gentlemen, they're well trained, it's fine. She cannot spend this weekend alone in the shop across the street while we're out partying. I won't hear of it."

Dutch had his arms crossed across his chest and was trying to look like he was putting his foot down but there was that mischief in his eyes Johnny knew too well.

"Be nice Dutch, we're friends and trying to set up a working relationship here. "

He grinned. "It will be fine. Actually," Dutch said looking at the clock. "I gotta go man, take me back to Mr. Miyagi's. I gotta class I gotta prep for."

"Okay. Mr. Miyagi, I'm going to take Dutch back to the house so he can get the van."

"Hai," Mr. Miyagi said as he worked on his bonsai, focused, waving a hand in their general direction.

Johnny followed Dutch back out to the Avanti, getting in and turning around towards the tracks.

He could hear a train in the distance and then there was a familiar yellow Ford coming towards them, crossing over.

"I'm going to do do something stupid," Johnny said, looking around.

There were no other cars. He waited and the Ford parked. He eased forward pulling as close as he could and then put his foot gently on the brake trying to get right where he wanted to be as slowly and carefully as possible.

The window was down. The Ford was off, parked.

"Hold the wheel will you?" Johnny said to Dutch, twisting pushing himself up and over, keeping one foot on the brake

"What are you doing?" Daniel asked with a laugh.

"Taking Dutch home," Johnny said leaning over.

"You know that's not what I meant," Daniel said amused leaning out of the window of the Ford.

"I know," Johnny said kissing him.

Johnny didn't pull away until the train passed and the road was clear again. Taking the wheel back from Dutch and pulling away from the Ford and Mr. Miyagi's Little Trees as carefully as he could, raising his hand up and waving to Daniel who he saw through the rearview mirror wave back.

Something Old Something New

The rest of the week went by fast working in the shop. Daniel helped set up Shoji screens and built shelves.

Jessica would pop over around lunchtime to see if they all wanted to get lunch together.

She introduced them around the neighborhood to the different shops and restaurants.

There weren't any other plant shops in the area.

Johnny talked easily with the other shop owners who seemed instantly charmed by him. Something about him being from around the area seemed to break down barriers and he'd talk about what he remembered and they loved it, catching him up on all the changes. They were curious about Daniel and Mr. Miyagi and Daniel took over there, talking about the trees and Mr. Miyagi and himself.

They all promised to check it out on the opening day and Daniel felt good about it.

Johnny always handed them one of the printed posters.

"They really like you guys," Jessica said with a grin. "I haven't really talked to them before, my aunt does. So I know them but I haven't gotten to know them you know?"

"Yeah," Daniel said with a smile.

So far there'd been no more Mike Barnes or his friend. Things were good. And he'd finished Johnny's gift.

Which felt a bit like a fake gift. But he'd put several hours into it so he was claiming it as a gift.

"I heard Johnny's birthday is this weekend. Your friend Dutch invited me, is that okay?"

"Was Johnny there?" Daniel asked.

"Yes."

"Then of course. It's Johnny's birthday. Though most of our friends are guys, just as a heads up. So it'll probably be mostly guys and like his mom."

"That's fine," Jessica said.

"We'll make sure the guys behave."

She laughed.

Daniel remembered Johnny saying the same thing to him once. It seemed so long ago.

They had Johnny's birthday at his mom's house in the garden. She'd had a few new trees planted since Daniel had last been by.

They had arrived early. Ms. Lawrence met them at the gate.

There was a table set out and a piñata. A familiar-looking elderly woman and a younger woman were walking around talking.

Ms. Lawrence grinned.

"Your abulea heard it was your birthday and brought a piñata and cooked more food than I know what to do with. She kind of took over. Her granddaughter came as well. Your cousin I guess? My niece? That's kind of fun. I like that," she told Johnny pulling him into a hug.

Daniel had brought his gift, he'd been a little unsure whether to bring it now, or give it to Johnny later.

It felt a little weird to carry it around, so it was in the trunk.

He didn't know what he'd be asked to do, but he expected he'd be put to work, and that was fine.

He'd thought he might cook, but it looks like Abulea had already taken care of that. Maybe he'd cook for Johnny on the actual day.

Ms. Lawrence was talking softly to Mr. Miyagi gently letting go of Johnny and patting Daniel on the shoulder as he passed. A gentle squeeze.

He noticed a box on a table, there was something familiar about the handwriting and he walked over while Johnny greeted Abulea and her granddaughter.

He was right.

His mother said she was sending something in one of their calls, but it'd just been a little blip between a whole bunch of other updates about his uncle and cousin, aunts and grandparents, and the rest of his family.

Being in Jersey meant she had all the information. Knew how all his younger cousins' classes were going, his aunts and uncle's jobs and marriages, it was just a constant deluge.

He knew more about family members than he wanted to. But he knew it was because his Mom missed him that she was trying to catch him up on everything. He was pretty sure he told her about the most inane stuff as well. About the shop, which she'd been mad about but had warmed up to after he talked her through his plan.

She wasn't 100% on board, still miffed he'd lied in her opinion, withheld information was what he thought instead, but she was getting there.

She asked how it was having Johnny helping out and reminded him that at some point they'd have to sit down and figure out how much to pay him because it wouldn't be fair otherwise. And Daniel knew that. He hadn't planned to keep Johnny on as unpaid labor.

He didn't want to be another person taking advantage of him.

Johnny already was babysitting for free and volunteering at the animal shelter. And when stuff needed to be done around the house he did it. But it was in one of those awkward zones, like the fact they didn't pay rent so how much did they actually owe Mr. Miyagi in free labor, cooking and cleaning and running errands? Nothing had been said, they just did it. It was working so far. But he knew his mother didn't like it.

It was just an uncomfortable conversation.

He hadn't even asked if Johnny did want to work at the shop. He thought he did. But thinking he did clearly was a hole he kept falling into and then he'd realize Johnny was in a different one just as confused.

Daniel resolved that once the shop opened he'd ask.

He never told or asked Johnny to be at the shop, or help out, Johnny just showed up and helped. Asked what he could do to help. But Daniel wanted to make sure Johnny knew he didn't have to. Only if he wanted to. Because now was the first time Johnny could do what he wanted and Daniel didn't want to put him in a low-paying manual labor job just because they were dating, or because they lived together. But he liked the idea of all of them being in the same shop. Of getting to spend more time together.

He'd have to work on keeping his hands to himself though. Another weird gray area they'd have to work out and talk about.

There were a lot of gray areas, a lot of conversations they'd have to have. But right now he was dying to know what his mother had sent from Jersey for Johnny.

He forced himself to walk away, to walk over to Johnny and to wrap an arm around him and to meet Abulea's granddaughter. Gabriela also apparently went to UCLA, she was talking about her studies, some sort of science it sounded like, her abulea was beaming and Johnny was asking her questions about her thesis.

Daniel heard a car and turned to see Jessica Andrews. He hurried over to introduce her to Johnny's mother. She had a gift in her hands looking around taking everything in. The decorations, the lights.

"It's so pretty," Jessica said softly when Daniel got over.

"Thank you," Ms. Lawrence said.

"Jessica Andrews, this is Ms. Lawrence, Johnny's mother. Jessica works at the ceramic shop across the street. She's in town until after Thanksgiving."

"Nice to meet you," Jessica said carefully moving her gift to shake Ms. Lawrence's hand.

"Thank you for coming." Ms. Lawrence said with a smile. "It's all still a work in progress, but I'm glad you like it."

Daniel walked with her to the gift table where she set her gift down.

"This says LaRusso," Jessica said pointing at the package on the table and looking at Daniel with an eyebrow raised.

"Yeah, my Mom sent it. I'm dying to know what she sent."

"You don't know?"

"I don't. I guess it's weird. For someone's mother to send something for someone else's birthday? But it's not that weird. I mean there's like a reason. I think there is. I'm not really sure. I means she likes Johnny but I think the real reason is because Johnny and I are dating."

"I thought so," Jessica asked with a soft smile.

"How-"

"You hold hands," she said counting off on her fingers. "You put your arm around his waist, and you two kiss. If you weren't dating I'd have been more surprised."

Daniel blushed. When had he kissed Johnny in front of Jessica? Had he got so comfortable he forgot? He would really have to be careful once they opened the shop.

Oh god how bad was he at the house? No wonder Mr. Miyagi was always leaving to fish at the crack of dawn and then to the shop.

"When did we kiss in front of you?" he managed.

"Well our shops are across from each other. Sometimes you will kiss on the steps. Though the first time I saw it, Johnny leaned out of his car to kiss you."

"Yeah, I didn't even think about that."

He'd forgotten how comfortable he'd gotten around their shop. There wasn't a lot of foot traffic or shops nearby and they were still setting up. So they did kiss a lot.

Jessica smiled hooking her arm through his. "So what do you think your Mom sent him?"

"I don't know!" he said. "For my 18th birthday, she made me a cream cake and gave me money for the movies. But that wouldn't have survived the trip. Though it's big enough. There's no way she sent money in that box."

"She's in Jersey right?" Jessica asked.

"Yeah."

"Could that just be full of pizza?"

"No way. It's not greasy enough."

"Moms like to send sweaters. Does your Mom knit?"

"She doesn't have time. She taught me to sew but not knitting."

"Well, now I'm dying to know what's in there."

"Right? I feel like you don't usually show up somewhere and then there's a mystery box for someone else from your own parent."

Jessica laughed. "Wait, where's your gift? Don't tell me your Mom got your boyfriend a gift but you didn't?"

"It's in the trunk of my car," Daniel said. "It's not great."

"No?"

"There's a good chance my own mother's going to upstage me."

"Well I made him a mug," she whispered in his ear. "Did I upstage you?"

"No. Well. Maybe. It's a weird gift," Daniel said frowning.

"You can't do this to me Daniel, you can't leave me with two unsolved mysteries within arms reach. When can we get Johnny to start opening gifts?"

"We're missing four loud guests," Daniel said turning towards the gate.

"The friends from UCLA?"

"Yes. Well except Dutch. He's not in school."

"You know you told me it'd all be guys, but currently there are more women here."

"I was unaware that Gabriela and her abuela were coming," Daniel said spotting two cars pull up with four familiar faces in them.

Bobby was carrying a couple of containers stacked on top of one another and he pushed the hip open with his hip.

"First up is Bobby," Daniel said softly to Jessica.

"What's he got? His hands are full."

"I'm going to bet cake? Pastries? His family owns a couple of bakeries."

Jimmy followed holding a large cooler.

"Jimmy's got the cooler, probably drinks, family owns a couple of bars and I think they do international drink imports and exports? I've never really asked."

"What kind of drinks do you think?"

"International sodas? Beer?" Daniel said with a soft laugh. "There's a fridge at his house just full of drinks."

"A fridge just for drinks?"

"Yup."

Tommy was carrying wrapped gifts and Dutch hurried forward to catch the gate so it didn't hit him. Tommy relaxed, turning to thank Dutch, and headed towards them. "Tommy's I guess got the gifts, and you met Dutch."

"More mystery packages," Jessica said with a laugh.

"Right? It's been so long since I've been to a birthday party. What's the order again? Cake then gifts?" Daniel asked.

"You know I think it's food, gifts then cake," Jessica said.

"No way," Daniel said. "After cake for sure."

"Well here's a question for you then, does the piñata come before or after?" Jessica asked pointing to it.

"Oh, that throws off the entire thing. No clue."

"Hello, Daniel. Jessica Andrews right?" Tommy asked setting down the gifts on the table.

"Yes, nice to meet you, Tommy."

Tommy smiled then looked out across the yard. "This is our first time here. Have you been inside Daniel?"

"Yes, I dropped Johnny off for a dinner and got a tour."

"I'm still waiting for the divorce party/open house," Tommy said.

"She's probably going to wait till the garden's done," Jimmy said passing Tommy a clear glass bottle full of a yellow liquid.

"Jimmy," he said holding a hand out to Jessica.

"Jessica."

"Nice to meet you, help yourself to whatever you want from the cooler. It's full of ice too so everything's nice and cold."

Jessica nodded and pulled Daniel along to look in the cooler.

She let go to open it.

Daniel peered in. There were a lot of the same bright yellow liquid in glass bottles.

He picked one up.

"What is Inca Kola?" she asked grabbing one for herself and shutting the lid.

"No clue. But I'm sure we can find out," he said tapping his glass to hers and twisting off the cap.

"On three?" she asked following suit.

"Yes," he said with a grin.

"Three."

"Two."

"One."

Bubblegum was not the flavor he was expecting from a yellow drink.

"Oh that's a problem," she said with a laugh.

"You don't like it?" Daniel asked.

"No, that's amazing, but like where am I going to find this in Columbus Ohio?" she asked.

"I don't know. Can you petition someone for it?"

"I'm going to have to," Jessica said, then turned to him, dropping her voice low. "So why don't you grab your gift and add it to the pile?" Jessica asked.

"I-"

"He's going to like it I'm sure."

"How do you know that?" Daniel asked.

"Because you're so nervous," she said with a gentle smile. "You care an awful lot, which means you put a lot of effort into it."

"I didn't buy it."

"I didn't buy mine either."

"Yeah but yours is-"

"Daniel," she said putting her hand on his shoulder and looking him sternly in the eyes. "Go get your gift and put it on the table."

"Yeah, okay," Daniel said, letting her turn him around and push him gently back towards the gate.

He walked to his Ford looking at the gift.

His mother was better at wrapping than he was. It looked like a five-year-old had tried to wrap a very patient cat.

It was in a box, but you could barely tell.

He should've opted for a bag. Throw a bit of tissue paper on top and you're done. Easy. But he had the box. And he'd liked the feeling setting it carefully in the box.

The moment he got to hold it in his hands had been weird. So strange. That he'd had to take a moment to just sit there and stare at it. It was such an odd choice that he kept backing out.

He nearly shut the trunk again. But he steeled himself.

He took a deep breath and grabbed the box and shut the trunk and walked back into the garden.

He set it down on the table and joined everyone else to eat.

The food was delicious. The cake Bobby had brought was perfect. And Johnny kept holding his hand, gently squeezing it from time to time. He wondered if that level of nervousness was why Johnny always looked like he was going to bolt. If that was how Johnny had always felt, an overwhelming feeling, a need to just be anywhere else, then Daniel got it.

He wanted to grab the box and put it back in the trunk.

But Johnny was rubbing his thumb over the back of his hand and that was easier to focus on as Ms. Lawrence brought over gifts.

Jessica pushed hers forward first with a warm smile, reassuring to Daniel, like it was fine. But she'd 100% made hers. He hadn't. It wasn't the same.

He didn't pay attention to the other gifts until Johnny picked up the box he'd wrapped.

Daniel wanted to be anywhere else. Let him sink under the table.

How did he explain it? In front of an audience of people?

He should've asked.

What if Johnny didn't like it?

What if he'd fucked up?

What if it'd been a terrible idea?

Too presumptuous?

He had asked Mr. Miyagi. Mr. Miyagi had listened to him talk through it for hours on end. An unending stream throughout the week. Waffling on whether it'd been a good idea or not. Because taste changes. Maybe it wasn't something Johnny would like anymore. Maybe it'd hit him as strongly as it hit Daniel. Maybe that was a bad thing.

They'd done a lot of breathing practice.

Johnny opened the box and set aside the lid.

He carefully picked up his red leather jacket staring at the patch, the Miyagi-do design done by Mrs. Miyagi reproduced by the designer in Okinawa where a cobra had once been.

Johnny gently ran his fingers over it.

Daniel had hand-stitched it.

Leather wasn't easy to sew into. A pain in the ass really. But his mother had taught him how to sew, how to sew on practically anything. Something about his cousins throwing out perfectly good clothing because they didn't know how to fix it. He'd never thought that skill would be as useful as it had been.

Johnny turned to him, eyes the color of a perfectly clear summer sky.

"How did you?" he asked softly trailing off.

"I asked the designer in Okinawa. Gave her the design Mrs. Miyagi had made, after asking Mr. Miyagi what he thought. You mentioned in New York you were looking for something to put on it, and I thought, well I thought this was good. I uh- I sewed it on, so it's not going anywhere any time soon."

"It's perfect," Johnny said smiling warmly putting it on.

It was like a missing piece Daniel didn't know he'd been missing.

He hadn't seen Johnny in that jacket in so long that it'd been a completely different guy wearing it the last time he'd seen it. The last time he'd worn it was after the tournament. The night Kreese had tried to kill him.

If Johnny hadn't said he wanted to replace the patch he would've thought Johnny never wanted to see it again. Wouldn't have blamed him. But he had remembered watching Johnny sifting through patches in New York, every gift shop they walked through, even around LA, Johnny had stopped to look.

That smile warmed Daniel's heart, he had picked the right thing and Johnny looked good in his jacket. A little closer to the old Johnny, but better, because this Johnny smiled at him like that.

Birthday

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Johnny had spent part of his week trying to figure out more about Dynatox. There was surprisingly little he could find. The librarians recommended public records. All he got from that was that it was a toxic waste company.

He couldn't find the name of the owner or whoever it was who decided to sponsor the upcoming All-Valley.

He wasn't sure if it was a good lead. After all, rich kids in the Hills would have their parents sponsor their sporting events all the time. Maybe Mike Barnes was some rich kid whose parents had told him they'd buy him a yacht if he won the All-Valley against whoever had won last year.

He felt like he'd reached a dead-end. He'd scoured newspapers at the library on microfilm readers but so far nothing on Dynatox.

Before he knew it it was the weekend and he was getting into the Ford with Daniel and Mr. Miyagi.

Daniel nervously tapping, hand waving, as he talked. Nervous chatter.

Johnny wanted to grab his hand, wanted to hold it, but it was too wild.

His mom and Daniel had seemed on good terms last time he'd seen them together. So it probably wasn't that.

He got along with the guys.

Johnny didn't have a clue what was making him so nervous.

The trees his mother had said she wanted to get were in the garden and planted.

He could see the starts of the outline take shape.

The garden she wanted to build. It was nice.

He was surprised to see Gabriela and her grandmother.

Daniel seemed distracted by something so Johnny walked over to say hello.

"Happy Birthday Johnny," Gabriela said with a smile.

"Thank you."

"Abuela has been complaining that she hadn't known when your birthday was for years. So she's making up for it," Gabriela said with a smile. "She cooked up a storm. I had to carry so much food from the car."

"Gracias Abuela," Johnny said.

Abuela said something about school and Johnny blinked looking at Gabriela who laughed.

"She wants me to talk about my studies. Sí Abuela. Honestly, she just likes it when I talk about school."

"You're working on your masters, right? Abuela told me but I didn't get what it was you're studying."

Gabriela laughed. "No, that makes sense. It's not like teaching or something you'd probably learned. I'm pursuing a master's in chemical engineering."

"What can you do with that?"

"A couple of things, a lot of my classmates want to be chemists. But I want to work in environmental science. There are some jobs as investigators. That's what I'm writing my thesis on, in that vein. Investigating how the chemicals we produce affect the environment. Might be able to join the FBI if I do that."

Maybe she'd know.

"Have you heard of Dynatox."

"Oh they're the fucking worst. Sorry, Abuela. They keep trying to dump stuff in Borneo. Chloride sludge last I heard. Which will destroy the local fish and prawns which are a huge portion of their food and the drinking water. It'll poison it all and people will get sick and possibly die. But whoever owns that company has a shit ton of money and can make people stop talking. Our teacher is currently tackling the Borneo situation or trying but the DA flipped. He's no longer is working with us. Wait, why do you know of Dynatox?"

"They're sponsoring the next All-Valley."

"Your karate competition?" Gabriela asked with a frown. "Maybe they're trying to better their image? They're kind of a ghost, so even that seems silly. I thought you couldn't compete anymore. Isn't it the under 18?"

"I might be able to compete if I wanted to this winter, but no. I was looking into it because people have been harassing Daniel over it. They want him to compete."

"Is he going to?"

"He can't. He'll be 19 when the competition starts."

"Then why would people want him to compete?"

"You understand the confusion now," Johnny said with a sigh. "Someone erased part of his age to make it look like he's currently 16. I went to get more info and that's when I learned Dynatox is sponsoring."

"That is weird," Gabriela said crossing her arms thoughtfully.

Johnny felt an arm wrap around his waist and he turned to look at Daniel. He still seemed distracted. There but not fully.

Gabriela explained her thesis and more about investigating the effects of dumping toxic sludge into the environment and the solutions they were working on.

Daniel gave him a gentle squeeze and then wandered off again.

Johnny made a note to check in with him at some point in the night, see what was wrong.

Maybe Mike Barnes was bothering him?

Maybe the finances of the shop were off?

Daniel had decided he'd keep an eye on that and be in charge of their accounting, saying he helped his Mom with it and that he was the best at math.

He saw Jessica come in through the gates and waved. She smiled at him and he watched Daniel rush over to her, how the two moved together across the garden. Relaxing a little. That was good. Maybe he'd been nervous about her getting lost.

He turned back to Abuela and Gabriela. Abuela had left to go talk to his mother and he blinked, wondering when she'd walked off.

"You know, almost all of the family has moved away," Gabriela said softly, eyes also watching the two women talking. "I'm going to UCLA, so I'm the only one still around. But then one day she said this fancy lady showed up to talk about you. Abuela knew you always said you were okay, lived in the Hills but she said you weren't happy. Eventually, it was better, but not happy. And when she got to learn why and was so pissed. We nearly got thrown out of the courtroom because she nearly hit your stepfather with her shoe. Thank god we were in the back at that point, so I got her before the judge noticed." She sighed.

"Abuela was getting lonely and then your mother showed up and kept showing up. Kept coming by early in the morning for breakfast burritos and molletes like she always used to make you. And then you showed up again with Daniel and also kept showing up. My dad called and asked what was happening because apparently when he calls now Abuela says she's busy. It's partially revenge for not calling enough, I know because she can be stubborn, but it's also because your mom and Abuela have been hanging out a lot. Abuela says your mother's Spanish is getting better. She says it reminds her of you. When you were learning. That you two are definitely related and it's kind of fun to have gotten to know the kid first and then see the same traits in the parent. Like ah, that's where he got that from. Not just the hair and eyes. They go out for coffee, go grocery shopping in the markets together, they even do bingo night. Abuela comes here a lot. I just, you know, thanks. I was getting worried about her. If I didn't keep such odd hours because of the labs and my thesis I'd move in with her. I was planning on it. But she seems fine again now. I still might at some point. But it's a relief that she's happy, you know? Like she said you seem to be now."

"I owe her all the thanks," Johnny said. "Her tamales kept us going."

"Your mom said she's in debt for those tamales as well," Gabriela said with a smile. "Abuela's planning on teaching her how to make them. But I think it'll be after she buries her in them. I saw her freezer. Your mom has so many tamales in there, there's like one pint of ice cream and the rest is tamales. It's worse than my fridge in my apartment."

He heard the sound of cars and turned to see Bobby's car and Jimmy's pull in next to Daniel's Ford.

"You already met them right?" Johnny asked.

"I did. And Mr. Miyagi. Just the girl who is here with Daniel I haven't met." Gabriela said.

"Jessica, she works across the street from Mr. Miyagi's Little Trees. Ceramic shop."

"Selling ceramics or making them?"

"She makes them. She's currently designing pots for our bonsai with her aunt," Johnny said.

"That's going to be very nice," Gabriela said. "I look forward to seeing it. Go say hi to your friends. I'm going to go see if Abuela and your mother need a translator."

Johnny nodded.

Bobby carried one of his things into the house and then came back, setting the rest down on a table, and came over pulling him into a hug.

"Happy early birthday Johnny."

Johnny hugged him back.

"How's school?"

"Good. Different. I kind of like it, but there's so much to do."

Johnny watched as Dutch, Jimmy, and Tommy talked with Jessica as Daniel was nowhere to be seen.

He scanned the garden then spotted him at his Ford looking into the trunk.

"I told Dutch she's got a boyfriend," Johnny said with a sigh.

"That's fine," Bobby said.

"You sure?"

"Yeah. His parents, I guess before summer, made this big deal about how he didn't have any lady friends or whatever that was supposed to mean. Said he needed to soften his image and the best way to do that was to hang out with girls platonically. They're apparently coming to his tournament, so he's scrambling to make friends. It's why he wanted us to bring girls to his match. It's some stupid argument his parents got into with him. He called and ranted about it for like three hours because his parents have like no friends, so doesn't he have a leg up over them? And now they're being picky because most of his friends are guys. Though not all. He said a lot of the friends he's made at taekwondo are girls, but they'll be competing as well. His parents said classmates don't count. He even tried super hard to get along with Ali and they made some progress. It was impressive."

"Your sticker method at work?" Johnny asked.

"A bit," Bobby said with a laugh. "But that was before I knew. The girls I know at UCLA are down. They're actually excited about it. Especially because Dutch's teacher is a woman. They want to invite her to some sorority event."

"So you've done your job," Johnny said amused.

"Yup. Dutch's section's going to be like three sororities, his ego is going to be the size of the moon. I haven't told him yet though, so don't let him know. Now he just has to be good at it."

"What if his parents don't show up?" Johnny asked with a frown.

Dutch's parents were the type that didn't show up. Mrs. Douglas usually brought him frozen grapes and snacks too during the All-Valley.

His parents promised to and didn't always make it. They had once.

Johnny was surprised they'd been in town for his mother's divorce. That they'd tried to help. That they'd shown up for him but didn't regularly show up for Dutch.

"I'm going to take so many photos," Bobby said. "Like one of those obnoxiously proud parents. I've got film and cameras ready. I'll give you one too. So that even if they're a no show then we've got proof for him, so he can go back to just enjoying slowly making friends instead of this speed friendship dating he's doing."

"Well, Mrs. Douglas is planning to come to cheer him on."

"Oh, shit really? How's she doing?"

"She's good. Dutch and I went to talk to her." Johnny turned to look at Bobby, away from the guys. "Bobby, someone tried to alter Daniel's file at the All-Valley."

"What? Why? How?"

"We told Mrs. Douglas that Daniel will be 19, someone made it look like he's currently 16. I think whatever is happening is related to the All-Valley, something from last year. But I can't figure out who would have it out for him. Because you and I beat everyone else. Whoever it is should've also been gunning for us too if they're bitter that they lost. But they're focused only on Daniel."

"He did win."

"Yes, but I can't find anyone related to Barnes on the roster."

"Hmm, you know Dutch has been talking to Tommy a lot about it. I've only gathered some of what's going on. Got anything else I can look into?"

"Dynatox. They're a toxic waste company that's sponsoring the All-Valley. Gabriela says she thinks whoever owns it is paying off government officials to look the other way. They're the ones who made the new rules that the champion only has to fight the final match."

"Damn Johnny," Bobby said. "You've already got a suspect? I'll tell Tommy. See what he thinks before I forget."

Johnny nodded and watched Bobby head over to the guys and Jessica, as Jimmy turned to the cooler.

Jimmy came over with drinks in hand.

He passed one to Johnny. Inca Kola.

He looked down at it and then at Jimmy who was smiling at him.

He'd remembered.

Johnny's birthdays weren't usually good. Fine was stretching it. Okay was even stretching it.

Sid turned them into events.

The other kids didn't want to be there. But they whatever Sid had gotten as entertainment.

It was more of a chore than anything he actually enjoyed.

Another time where he had to play a part rather than just be.

When he'd gotten older, he had asked if he could invite his friends from karate and Sid had said no.

It'd been the first time that he'd had friends to even invite, rather than a whole bunch of kids he only knew from the country club with who he didn't have anything in common. Kids who talked about their vacations overseas, their fancy tutors, the languages they were learning, the fashion brands they wore, whatever the coolest gadget was, the cars their parents bought them even though they weren't old enough to drive, all this stuff that Johnny thought he was supposed to know about, to have in common with them but he didn't.

He'd usually been very good about just going through the motions. Playing the part.

But that year he did have friends.

He actually had something better he could be doing. He could spend time with them.

So when all of the parts he had to play were over, when the entertainment started, he snuck out.

He'd had a bike, some fancy thing that Sid had bought him to get around so that he wouldn't have to drive him around anymore. Wouldn't have to have the staff drive him around.

Johnny hadn't told his friends it was his birthday. He didn't want anything but to spend time with them. Knew they'd be at Jimmy's so he biked his way there. They usually were during that time of the week.

He rang the doorbell and was let in by one of the staff. Who actually had smiled at him, knew his name, and welcomed him in, showing him where the guys were.

He was all dressed up for a fancy party, some stupid suit that Sid had picked out, overdressed for a casual hang out, but he didn't care.

They looked happy to see him and he let himself relax joining them for the board game they had set out and it was a million times better to sit with them and play games than it had been to listen to kids talk about their tennis lessons and violin lessons and their expensive watches and shoes, their stock portfolios, miniature versions of their parents who only cared about their wealth and making friends who could solidify or better that wealth.

He hadn't planned to tell them it was his birthday. But he had mentioned it.

A quick sentence at the end of the night before going to his bike that he'd said to Jimmy.

The other guys were tussling and practicing the karate they'd learned in class that week.

He'd told Jimmy it was the best birthday he'd had in a long time and thanked him.

Jimmy had looked at him with his eyes wide, telling him to stay right there before running back into the house.

He came back with a pack of bright yellow drinks.

"They're new for us. From Peru. Supposed to be like a champagne version of soda," he explained. "I'll bring you this every year. If you like it."

Johnny tried it and nodded.

Partially because he did like it, and partially because that promise meant he'd have a friend every year which he hadn't hoped for.

That promise was the best birthday gift he'd ever gotten up to that point in his life. It was still one of his favorites. Worth the bruises he'd gotten when he was caught sneaking back in.

Jimmy clinked his glass against Johnny's.

Johnny twisted off the lid and flicked it. It landed on the table.

"Happy Birthday Johnny," Jimmy said with a soft smile.

"Thanks."

He liked catching up with the guys. Hearing about their classes. But soon it was time to eat, his mother gathering up the guys to help Abuela to carry out the food. Johnny knew her menu backward and forwards. This wasn't on the menu. This was new stuff or at least a lot of it he hadn't seen before.

Gabriela went through explaining what everything was.

Johnny glanced at Daniel. He looked nervous again. He reached out and took his hand, interlacing their fingers, rubbing his thumb over the back of his hand, listening and hoping to help Daniel at the same time.

Tostados, picadillo, mole, some stuffed bell peppers, salad, bionicos, and tacos he did think he recognized.

Everything he ate was delicious.

Bobby brought a cake. A weird-looking cake.

It looked like Bobby had had a rough time trying to get candles on it. But had managed it eventually.

He set it in front of Johnny. He tried to think of a wish. His wishes had always changed over the years. For friends, for Mom to get a job that wasn't awful, to be happy. He had gotten all those wishes granted, slowly over time, so he didn't know what he wanted now.

What was worth wishing for?

He felt the hand in his, still nervous.

He leaned forward and blew out the candles.

Bobby had to cut it with a sharp knife.

"It's the ice cream," he explained. "The whole thing is rock solid for like half a second before it melts. You wouldn't think it'd be a problem since I had to set the whole thing on fire, but that's how bombe Alaska is."

Fancy ice cream cake.

Bobby had always teased him about being the youngest. Said they always had to make up for all those missed birthdays before they were friends. And for the birthday where Johnny hadn't said anything to anyone but Jimmy.

Last year had been a dinosaur confetti cake. The year before that had been a red car. Even though they were usually kidlike, Bobby always made sure a lot of effort went into them. And this one looked the most time-intensive.

Laura was asking about it, Bobby explaining. Chocolate orange cake with vanilla ice cream and meringue that he'd doused in rum and lit on fire. He was smiling like it'd been a lot of fun to set it on fire.

He was sure it had been.

Dutch was asking him about it, interest piqued by fire.

The cake really did collapse into a mess in the LA sun pretty fast. Jessica was helping Gabriella and Dutch finish it off moving on to spoons when his mother brought out gifts.

Jessica pushed her gift first and Johnny pulled out a green handmade mug.

There was no way for her to know that it matched Daniel's favorite at the house. They clearly weren't the same, it was pure coincidence, but it was perfect.

He got clothes from the guys. Each box was full of clothing.

Bobby had a big grin on his face. "You'll have to let us know which looks you like the best."

It was like they thought his fashion taste was awful.

Actually, he knew they did from Valentine's Day. He could tell from their smiles that this was that part two. Which look would grab Daniel's attention the most? They did realize he and Daniel already were dating. That it was fine now right?

Apparently no, his fashion sense was going to forever be one of their complaints. Wait till he wore the stuff he'd gotten from Okinawa. Maybe then they'd stop thinking he was a fashion disaster. No one else really ever complained.

It was nice though that he was slowly clearing clothes from Sid out of his closet. This would help. Even if they clearly were taking bets on whose look would garner more attention when the last time they'd tried Daniel hadn't even batted an eye.

He picked up a box that was wrapped haphazardly.

Daniel was sitting stiffly next to him. Was this what he was nervous about? A gift? Johnny didn't care what Daniel got him. He'd like whatever it was. Even if he wanted to tease him about his wrapping skills, the fact that he'd tried was sweet.

He carefully set the lid aside and found himself looking at his own red jacket.

The jacket he'd walked past in the window for months.

The one he'd saved up for working at the country club for.

How he'd worked extra hours worried someone else would buy it first.

He carefully lifted it up.

He remembered putting the patch on it. The cobra because he'd been so happy to be a part of something that he'd gone out of his way to incorporate it into all of his stuff. Not even thinking that it'd be a mistake. To ruin in his jacket, the only article of clothing he'd ever bought himself because he wanted it, not because he needed clothes for school or because Sid wanted him to not embarrass him.

He remembered all the work that had gone into getting that patch on, and then the tedious task of removing it without destroying the jacket, hoping desperately that it wouldn't be obvious, but nearly five years had made the difference obvious.

He couldn't bring himself to throw it away or put it into the box with his other karate stuff.

There was a new patch, covering the spot where the old one had been, hiding the difference in color, the shadow of the old cobra.

It was the same one that he'd seen on the back of Daniel's gi during the tournament, similar to the red jacket he'd worn at the o-bon festival in Okinawa.

It was sewn on, sturdy.

Johnny had tried to sew the cobra on. It'd taken him over a week because he kept stabbing himself with the needle and kept breaking thinner needles. He'd had to ask one of the librarians who had a leather jacket with patches on it how to do it.

He turned to Daniel. "How did you-?"

Daniel turned to him explaining what he'd done. Nervous in his tone. Unsure if Johnny liked it.

If they weren't sitting at a table surrounded by friends and family Johnny would've kissed him.

He would later. When there was time. When the spotlight wasn't directly on him.

He smiled putting it on, "It's perfect." he said.

It was like the return of an old friend, a problem he'd been trying to solve for a little over half a year and Daniel had solved it. Had fixed it for him. Better than before.

The next thing passed to him was a large box covered in stamps. It said it was from LaRusso.

Johnny looked back at Daniel who seemed relieved and now was staring at the new box with intense curiosity. So different LaRusso. His mother?

Johnny took the scissors his mother passed him uneasily.

He got along with Mrs. LaRusso but he never had expected her to send him anything.

He opened it up, quietly read the card wishing him well and wishing she was there too.

He pulled out a hand-knit sweater.

"Your mom knits?" Johnny asked looking at Daniel, catching a triumphant look on Jessica's face.

"No, uh, my grandmother knits. That's from Nonnia," Daniel said. "Everyone in the family has one. It takes her several months. So she had to have started that right after she met you but...I guess Ma said something. Had to have, yet..." he trailed off chewing his lip thoughtfully.

It was blue with grey and it looked warm. Something nice to wear in the mountains or if they visited Newark again.

Johnny carefully folded it back up and set it aside.

Something the whole family had.

What did that mean? That seemed like too much. He'd met them once.

That was a promise that threw him. Hadn't expected that. He pulled out a box of saltwater taffy.

He turned to Daniel. "From Nonnino?" he asked.

Daniel laughed. "Yes."

Johnny felt like he'd never was going to finish the saltwater taffy he'd been given last time. Had ended up sharing a lot of it with the kids he babysat and the staff at the animal shelter.

Maybe they could make a candy dish for kids at the bonsai shop and put saltwater taffy in it. Okinawan bonsai with New Jersey candies to give away.

Fitting, but kind of weird.

Underneath were a bunch of jars carefully wrapped in multiple layers of bubble wrap and recipe cards, handwritten.

Johnny handed them over to Daniel to read through as he unwrapped the jars and set them out.

"Blueberry pie filling. Ma just made it from this year's blueberry haul," Daniel said tapping a few of them. "And peaches she also harvested. We've got an aunt with a fruit farm," Daniel explained tapping some more jars. "Cobbler and pie," he said holding up the cards.

Johnny would have to ask to talk to Mrs. LaRusso the next time Daniel called her. Thank her. Maybe send a note. Something from LA for her and his grandparents. His mom and Daniel could help.

Next up was his Mom who'd gotten him a bike.

Sid had gotten rid of his when he got the Avanti.

It had just disappeared one day.

He'd told her about the date list, bike rides, and how he was going to just borrow one of the guy's bikes. But this would be easier.

She kissed the top of his head and ruffled his hair. Mr. Miyagi explained his gift was back at the house for his actual birthday.

Johnny hadn't expected anything. He already had gotten so much from Mr. Miyagi. He didn't need anything else. But he thanked him warmly.

Gabriela then taught them the piñata song and the game began. It was fun. Not easy.

He liked watching the guys fail to hit it. Even his mom and Mr. Miyagi tried. Mr. Miyagi got a good hit in, but it didn't crack.

It did crack when Jessica hit it but not enough for it to fully open.

But it made it easier for Johnny's next turn when he did get it, a cascade of colorful candies he recognized from what Abuela would sometimes give him and ones he didn't recognize.

"Pulparindo," Gabriela said, explaining to Jessica the different ones she'd picked up. "It's tamarind."

"This one?" Dutch asked.

Gabriela smiled. "Peanut mazapan."

Johnny picked up what looked like a lollipop he remembered was like a chocolate-covered marshmallow with a face on it. He saw Daniel pick up a yellow and red package. "Careful, that's spicy, if I remember correctly it's mango flavored but with like chili powder."

"Sounds good," Daniel said with a smile. "Fun to try."

"Gracias Abuela," Johnny said smiling at her. She gave him a big hug, wishing him a happy birthday.

It took a while to clean up all the candy off the grass. Maybe not the chaos of if he'd been five, but it was nice to sit around and chat about it. To listen to Abuela talk about her favorite ones, Gabriela's favorites, and what had changed since she was a kid, laughing with her grandmother.

Eventually, it got dark out and Jessica had to leave, giving him a warm hug and wishing him a happy birthday again.

The guys were spending the night at their homes with their families. Dutch decided to crash with Tommy.

He'd see them later.

He thanked Abuela and Gabriela again before they left. Gabriela promised to ask more about Dynatox and would talk to her professor.

His mother helped carry his gifts to the Ford. Carefully putting them into the trunk.

"Where does this fall on birthday parties?" she asked with a smile.

"Best one," Johnny said with a smile.

She smiled kissing his cheek. "We'll do lunch on your birthday. I'll swing by and drop your bike off then. It's not going to fit."

"Thanks, Mom," he said hugging her.

"Of course, 18 is a big deal. I'm glad we got to celebrate it here together," she said warmly. "So proud of you."

"I'm proud of you," he said.

She laughed, hugging him tighter. "Okay, you guys get home safe. I'm going to go enjoy the margaritas Abuela made me before she left. Hers are the best."

She walked back into the house and Johnny walked over to the passenger seat.

It was the best birthday he'd had.

He didn't want to imagine what his birthday would've been with Sid still around. He'd probably have been kicked out. Woken up Tuesday morning by the staff with his bags packed and sent on his way. Promptly kicked out of the nest.

Daniel's hand found his on the drive back home. Talking to Mr. Miyagi about pie-making. How he used to do it all the time back home, asking him which ones they should make first. Blueberry or peach? Relaxed and at ease.

Johnny gently squeezed his hand. He cast his vote for blueberry and Daniel grinned at him, a quick warm glance but it led to the details of making blueberry pie and Johnny couldn't wait.

You may notice there's a little link in "works inspired by this one" note now. usa123 wrote a fic called "Warm Places, Safe Spaces" exploring if "The next time Sid gets angry, Johnny is forced to take Daniel's advice." Warning for Sid being well...Sid.

Did not know Ao3 had something set up for inspired by works, it's super cool. I'm honored that you were inspired to write something based on this.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

They'd gotten home and carried all of Johnny's gifts into the house. The fruit and candies going into the kitchen, the leftovers Ms. Lawrence had given them went into the fridge, the mug was washed and set out to dry, and the clothes went into the closet.

On the last trip Johnny had leaned over him, hand on the top of the trunk, preparing to close it when Daniel grabbed the last box of clothes.

Johnny had leaned down, kissing him, other arm wrapping around his waist pulling him in close, or as close as he could with the box in Daniel's hands.

Johnny had only pulled away when they heard Mr. Miyagi humming, leaving them both breathless.

He took the box from Daniel, thanked him, and walked back into the house, leaving Daniel to shut the trunk to the Ford and lean against it. He wanted to chase after Johnny but Mr. Miyagi was talking to Johnny with a small deck of cards in his hands. So he waited till his heart settled and his breath returned before going back into the house. The rest of the gifts were put away and they'd all sat together and drank tea and played hanafuda until it was late.

He'd woken up early and was in the kitchen. He was staring at the jars his mother had sent it was nice to have his mother's recipe cards. He missed fruit season in Jersey. Missed how they'd all visit his aunt as a kid and pick fruit to make compotes, ice cream, sweets, and all sorts of things to eat. On the farm, the family orchard, they had a yearly recipe contest and his mom had won. Several times.

He remembered being little and holding his father's hand and him telling Daniel that everyone in the family was going to be bitterly jealous and his mother would be so proud because she was the best. Everyone would know what his father knew.

Daniel had told his dad that he too knew his mom was the best. Which had made his dad laugh and ruffle his hair.

It was her award-winning pie recipe. Most of the hard work was already done. He'd have to call her and let her know they'd made it safely and the bigger question. He had to ask her why Nonnia had sent a sweater.

He was suspicious about that.

It took Nonnia months to complete her designs. Especially now that she was older.

Johnny and he had only been dating two months now? Almost three? But he hadn't told his mom until he got home from Okinawa. So much less than that for his grandparents to have found out. Had they taken one look at Johnny and decided, we're keeping him? Because that was what the sweater was.

Nonnia didn't make them for anyone.

She didn't make them for his cousin's boyfriends or girlfriends, didn't make them until someone was engaged, or hell, if she didn't like them, not until after they'd been married and winter was coming.

She'd dally.

She'd be stubborn about it, wouldn't make it until the last possible second.

One of his cousins was supposed to be getting married and her fiance's sweater had been in the works for over a year.

Nonnia was determined not to finish it until the first winter they were married.

Said the guy seemed like a flake.

But Johnny...it was going to stir up a fight in the family if anyone heard. And knowing the family...Well...His mother would gloat for sure.

She had to know.

And Johnny had treated it so carefully. Almost as carefully as the jacket. He clearly knew it was a big deal, just not how big of a deal.

That his nonnia didn't just make sweaters for anyone. And it was a nice sweater. Johnny was going to look nice in it. It'd made his eyes pop. It'd be easy to get him to wear it.

Nonnia had gone for the good stuff. A cool design, a fun look, soft yarn. It'd been made with care and love and Daniel didn't know how to tell Johnny that the next time, there would have to be a next time, that they went to Newark, that Nonnia had decided he was family.

And that meant a lot.

Or would it be better not to tell him? Not to make him nervous?

Oh god what was he going to do?

They were going to expect him for Thanksgiving and Christmas, his grandparent's big events, wedding anniversaries, and big birthdays.

Daniel thought he was bad about jumping too many steps ahead. He'd always wondered where he got it. Clearly, it was from Nonnia. Nonnia already blessed their union.

Though...

What if she hadn't? What if she just adopted Johnny as a grandson?

No, she had to know.

There was no way around it. Nothing else made sense. Nonnia was jumping ahead. Further, than Daniel even dared.

Was it because of laws? Did that put Daniel in a different spot than the rest of the family? Because he couldn't legally marry, his boyfriend got a sweater after only dating a couple of months?

His cousins were going to go ballistic.

He could hear the family arguments already.

Would they drive down or fly? Daniel liked the idea of driving. They could stay at little hotels along the way. It'd been about 10 states or so on the way to LA, taken over 40 hours and they'd taken their time.

Maybe Daniel and Johnny could take their time.

Maybe they could add it to the list.

To the jar.

Long road trip. He'd just hope they could do something fun in every state, they'd be alone, so Daniel could try.

Maybe if he floated the idea across, maybe next year after the shop was all set up he could suggest they drive to Newark for the holidays and if Johnny complained about awful traffic or something, Daniel could recommend they explore along the way.

The states and each other.

Johnny liked adventures, and he was pretty sure Johnny would be down for the second part too.

It might be the only chance they'd get that wasn't interrupted.
